² [For uniniquae read unicuique.—Tr.]

³ [For invitis read invitis.—Tr.]

the world. For surely they would do a great injury to their offspring, if they begot them only to die. Therefore, by the act of begetting they appear voluntarily to have bound themselves to give all the care they are capable of, to see that the life which they begot shall be preserved. Thus, therefore, there will be a perfect right in the children to secure maintenance from their parents. But preventing that right from producing all its effects, is the natural weakness of children at that age when they are unable to look after themselves. Therefore, it is not so much that right which fails them, as the power to assert it, save when civil laws come to their aid and compel recalcitrant parents to furnish them maintenance. Yet the wisdom of the Creator has endued the natural affection of parents with such strength that even without the constraint of civil laws they are as a rule glad to fulfil their duty.

5. In general there falls under the head of maintenance not only such things as are necessary to preserve natural life, but also such as make a man fitted for social and civil life. And the former are owed down to the time when the young are able to secure sustenance for themselves by their own endeavours. How much should be spent on education, whereby children are trained for civil life, will have to be decided with an eye to the means of the parents and the ability of the children. The least that is required is that they shall grow into honest and useful members of human society. A general conclusion is, that, as nature apparently does not require poor parents to cheat their own promise out of favour for their children, so a parent who has enjoyed the smile of fortune will not escape censure if he does not concern himself to secure the very best advantages for his offspring.

6. Under the name of children are included not only those who are of the first degree, but those of the second and further degrees, whether descended from sons or daughters, provided they cannot be maintained by their actual parents. See Code, VI. lxi. 8, § 5. Digest, XXV. iii. 5, §§ 1, 5; XXV. iii. 8. Furthermore, maintenance is owed not merely to legitimate children but to natural children as well; nay, even to those born of incest. For why should a pitiable and innocent child perish of hunger for another's crime? Yet if such enter into competition with legitimate offspring they can scarcely demand to be admitted to equal shares with the latter, unless their parents expressly desired it. See Genesis, xxi. 10; xlix. 19-20; Judges, ix. 18; xi. 1-2. Add Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 4. Regarding the maintenance of such upon the death of their parent, an inheritance is owed children 429 still of immature years not only from an intestate, but it cannot rightfully be taken from them even by the express will of their father, so far as it is needed for this end. For it does not seem likely that a child of that age could have committed such a crime as to render him unworthy of maintenance. Add Digest, V. ii. 27, § 3.

7. Whatever exceeds such maintenance is owed children who have become able to look out for themselves, not so much by any clear command of natural law, as for the reason that parents in general wish no one to be more fully provided for than their own children. It is an unusual disposal of Crates the Theban, recorded by Diogenes Laertius, Bk. VI [88], that he is said to have left his fortune with a banker on the condition that, if his children were but of the ordinary kind, he should turn it back to them, but that if they turned out to be philosophers, he should divide it among the common folk; for if they pursued philosophy they would have need of nothing. Now as for the contention which some advance, namely, that parents acquire everything for the sake of their children, and so the latter, even in the lifetime of their parents, have a right in their goods which will avail against them in addition to the necessity of maintenance, it is false. For every man acquires things first of all for himself. Horace, Epistles, Bk. II, ep. ii [190 ff.]: 'I shall use and take from my modest heap as much as need requires, nor shall I fear what an heir may think of me because he does not find more than I leave him.' (W.) Juvenal, Satires, xiv [136-7]: 'It is palpable insanity, to live a beggar's life, simply that you may die rich.' (E.) But a man wants what exceeds his own necessities to go to those who are dearest to him, and such are regularly held to be his children. See Nicephorus Gregoras, Bk. V, towards the end. And children above all others are so far accorded an expectation to their parents' estate, because, when there is no express desire to the contrary, they are preferred to all others, and because it rarely happens that parents vary from that ordinary affection. Nor do we admit the conclusion of Digest, XXVIII. ii. 11.

It was, however, a good provision of the Roman laws that a parent would have to show reason for disinheriting a son, and that only special considerations would avail for such an act. Nay more, they went even further, and allowed disinherited children to enter a complaint against a will not made in accordance with duty [inofficiosum testamentum], in which the question was not concerned with whether the testator had for just reasons the power to bequeath his estate to others than to his children, but the reasons were discussed which led the deceased to come to a conclusion different from the common inclination of men. And if it was discovered that the father had passed by his own children owing to some deception and fraud on the part of others, or from an absurd whim, the authority of the state turned the inheritance over to those to whom it would otherwise have come, had the father followed good judgement in his counsel. Therefore, Cicero, For Sextus Roscius [xix], replies quite properly to Erucius, who was maintaining that Roscius, the father, intended to disinherit his son:

It was the duty of a regular accuser, who was accusing a man of such wickedness, to unfold all the vices and sins of a son which had exasperated the father so as to enable him to bring his mind to subdue nature herself—to banish from his mind that affection so deeply implanted in it—to forget in short that he was a father. (Y.)

Add Digest, V. ii. 2, 4, 5. In this connexion the claim deserves notice which the disinherited¹ advanced in instituting such a case: Since they had to presuppose that there were no just reasons in their person for disinheriting them, they advanced the plea that their parents in making their will were of unsound mind. See Mornay on Digest, V. ii. 2 and 4; Grotius, Sparsio Florum, on the passage just cited.

In other matters a father should favour his children, yet in such a way that he does not entirely disregard his other duties. Therefore, when it appears that he has looked after his children adequately, he is by no means hindered from using his property in acts of gratitude or liberality, even if it will mean that less comes to his children. Thus, if a man has availed himself of great kindnesses from another, or can give an opportunity to a great genius, now struggling with want, to advance to high achievements, why may he not give some part of his goods to such persons? Certainly great acclaim is accorded the act of Attalus by Plutarch, On the Love of Brothers [xviii, p. 489 ff.], and in his Apophthegms [p. 184 A ff.]; for since Attalus had been honoured with most notable kindnesses by his brother Eumenes, he later willed his kingdom to the latter's son, although he had several of his own. A similar example is found in Hieronymus Osorius, De Gestis Regis Emanuel, Bk. IV, p. 117. 430

8. There is also no necessity for a father dividing his property equally among his children, but he can assign to one or another some distinction above the others, because of his particular merit, or illustrious hope, or even because of a special love for him. See Genesis, xlviii. 22. In the same way, in apportioning the estate, regard may be had for the family as a whole, that it may continue to retain its splendour and strength. If it will probably suffer some hurt from an equal division of the estate between several children, the father can, without prejudice to natural law, assign the outstanding portion of his goods to one, ordering the rest to remain content with smaller shares. Therefore, the rights of primogeniture are accepted² among many nations, which, in accordance with the most ancient customs, gave the elder son the headship in the family, priesthood in the household worship, and a double portion in the possessions of his father, the double portion serving, as Grotius observes on Deuteronomy, xxi. 17, the purpose of meeting the expenses of entertainments and worship. On the special prerogatives of primogeniture among the Japanese, see Bernhard Varenus, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xv.

However, there are instances of nations in which the younger brothers receive a larger portion, or at least have their choice as to which they want to take. The reason for this rule is that the elder brothers have enjoyed their father's care for a longer time, and since the younger are often too early deprived of this, some recompense is properly due to them. Yet this custom is more fitting for plebeian than for noble families.

¹ [For ex haereditati read exhaereditati.—Tr.]

² [For primogenitur aere cepta read primogeniturae recepta.—Tr.]

Again, when daughters pass into other families, it is not necessary for them to share equally with their brothers in their father's property. For it is foolish indeed to believe that it is opposed to the piety required of a father, to distribute his property unequally among those who, one as well as another, were begotten of him. Nay, Pliny, Letters, Bk. VII, ep. xlii [VII. xxiv], calls that a 'most honourable will', in which a grandson was left heir to two-thirds of his grandmother's estate, and a granddaughter to one-third. Consequently, it can be instituted not only by law but by a pact as well, that also those who are born of a marriage that is only by nature, are merely owed maintenance, or that such may at least be excluded from a large inheritance. See Grotius, loc. cit., § 8, towards the end, and the comments by Boecler.

And in this connexion one may wonder why Augustine, On the City of God, Bk. III, chap. xxi, condemns so severely the Lex Voconia, by which only a stipulated per cent. of an estate could be left to women. 'I know not', he says, 'what can be said or thought that is more unjust than that law.' This law, passed upon the initiative of Cato the Censor, stipulated that no one should have his daughter heir to more than 25,000 sesterces, as is to be gathered from Dio, Bk. LVI, according to Paulus Manutius, De Legibus Romanis. Yet [Pseudo-] Asconius Pedianus on Cicero, Against Verres [II. i. 107], in writing of the urban praetor says, 'Voconius had had a law passed that no census, that is, no one of means, could leave a daughter as his heir.' He had said above that formerly that person was called census who acknowledged an estate of 100,000 sesterces. Add Livy, Epitome, XLI; Quintilian, Declamations, cclxiv; Gellius, Bk. VII, chap. xiii; Bk. XVII, chap. vi. Certainly the Spartan law, that forbade one to give a portion to girls, was much more severe, the reason for it being, according to Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms [xv, p. 227 F]: 'That none might be slighted for their poverty, or courted for their wealth, but that every one, considering the manners of the maid, might choose for the sake of virtue.' (G.)

Nevertheless, there will be need of prudence in such matters, lest a father sow the seeds of envy and hatred among his children, if, without substantial reasons, he appear¹ to have treated unequally those who 431 were equal in position and merits. See Genesis, xxxvii. 4. And the divine law of Deuteronomy, xxi. 17, is based upon the weightiest ground, namely, that a father, enticed by the blandishments² of a beloved³ wife, should not conjure up false charges against his first-born, or magnify his slight failings. Nay, the safest of all ¹ courses in such matters is not to depart from the rule of civil laws. See Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. III, chap. xiv, n. 38; Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. II, chap. viii. Bacon, Essays, chap. vii, observes: 'Younger brothers are commonly fortunate, but seldom or never where the elders are disinherited.'

¹ [For visius read visus.—Tr.]

³ [For delictae read dilectae.—Tr.]

² [For delinementis read delenimentis.—Tr.]

Hence it follows, also, that when a father had died intestate,² and the civil laws have not ruled otherwise, the children inherit by equal portions, because, in a case of doubt, those who are related to the deceased in equal degrees are held to have been equally favoured.³ And those are held equal portions which a person has chosen with the consent of the rest, either personally, or when he has approved what was assigned him by his co-heirs, or has taken what fell to him by lot, even if that may not be equal in value with the other portions. The statement of Quintilian, Declamations, v [12], should be considered in this connexion:

There is the same natural affection towards all our children, yet in the case of one or another it has generally certain peculiar reasons for fondness, and, without breaking the equality of their dearness to us, there is something which by an unconscious instinct of the mind makes us love each separate child as though it were the sole object of our affections. One is loved because he is the first-born; another because of his infancy; a third for his happier expression and a face that more readily invites a kiss and a hug; others for their restraint and goodness; and some receive a more passionate⁴ affection because of their misfortunes, and we embrace with a peculiar fervour a crippled body or a maimed limb. But still the general equality holds good, since whatever one child is felt to lack in one respect is made up to him by some other ground of affection in another respect.

9. But it should be added on this point, that, not merely civil laws, but also natural reason as well, favour legitimate children above natural, although the latter partake as much in the father's blood⁵ as the former. For those who come into the world because of a father's irregular lust, without his direct intention, can on no score compare themselves with those who were begotten to the end that the family might be continued,⁶ and that a man should have heirs for his estate. But if a man wishes to advance⁷ a natural son of his into the portion of a legitimate son, that will be possible in a state of natural liberty, provided no injury is done thereby to legitimate children, or to any persons who have otherwise secured a right; it will be possible in commonwealths also, in so far as the civil laws permit it. See Code, V. xxvii. 6 and 7. In Aristophanes, Birds [1661-6], a law of Solon's is given: 'A bastard is to have no right of inheritance, if there be lawful children. And if there be no lawful children, the goods are to fall to the next of kin.' (R.) On the other hand among the Mohammedans it makes no difference, in the matter of participating in a father's estate, whether a child was born of a lawful wife,⁸ a concubine, or a maid-servant.

¹ [For omnio read omnino.—Tr.]

² [For delicti read dilecti.—Tr.]

³ [For sangine read sanguine.—Tr.]

⁷ [For adschissere read adsciscere.—Tr.]

² [For testamento read testamento.—Tr.]

⁴ [For inpatientius read inpatientius.—Tr.]

⁶ [For propagnandam read propagandam.—Tr.]

⁸ [For matre familias read matrefamilias.—Tr.]

But when some man has preferred to secure offspring from a concubine who gives her body to him alone, rather than from his lawful wife, in order that he may in this way favour the children of a former marriage, the sons of the concubine will be ranked after such children, even without the express will of their father, and after receiving some modest share shall leave to the same the rest¹ of the inheritance. But if, on the other hand, a man has taken to himself a concubine in order that he may not have to endure the haughtiness or extravagance of a lawful wife, or if he will not accord her the position of a wife for other reasons of policy, or even because of some pact, then it must be decided in accordance with the laws of the state, whether children born under such circumstances shall be admitted together with the others of a lawful wife or whether, in case there are no legitimate children, they shall exclude other kinsmen. For if this takes place without the restraint of positive laws, I see nothing standing in the way of such children, since the cohabitation of their father with their mother constituted in natural considerations a real marriage; especially if the father made no distinction between them in their education, treatment,² and the expression of his paternal affection. Therefore, I should feel that the sons of Jacob by his handmaids should have succeeded in equal portions with the rest, even though there was no existent disposal by their father, because it is nowhere stated that he treated them differently from the rest. But if the father had expressly given out the statement that he refrained from taking to himself a lawful wife, to the end that his property might pass to his nearest of kin (and reasons of policy at times lead one to such an action), then such issue will be able to seek nothing more from their father's estate than maintenance, or what the desire of their father or the civil laws may further assign them. See Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 8.

Now as the mere law of nature knows no distinctions of rank, so it is with it the same thing, whether a man begets a son of a noble or a humble mother, provided conjugal faith is rendered by the latter. Therefore, if in any place the children of a less noble mother are of a lower condition, that is due to positive laws. And just as these can be influenced by reasons of policy to prefer legitimate offspring to others, and not to admit the latter together with the ascending line upon it and ac were disregarded by later translators and editors; but that we should have had actione is clear from the first syllable, ac, which was printed at the end of the preceding page. It should be added that the text of pages 431 and 432 was incomplete in the copy of the edition referred to and consequently these pages were later reproduced, for the facsimile, from a copy at Trinity College, Dublin, in which the pages in question were complete. In the Trinity College copy the text of the two pages had been rearranged by the printer in order to correct errors of omission, and in this corrected text the word actione is clearly printed, thus establishing its correctness beyond question.—Tr.]

¹ [For relinquam read reliquam.—Tr.]

² [This word (actione) is omitted by Barbeyrac and by the edition of 1744, no doubt because of a printer's error. In the British Museum copy of the 1688 edition used for the facsimile, the text reads (end of page 431) 'educatione', (top of page 432) 'catione'. The latter word being a vox nihili, both

failure of the descending line, so it seems scarcely fair for them to be entirely excluded, in case there is no blemish in their birth. Yet they are under every circumstance¹ to be distinguished from those who have been born of a union to which there has been attached some natural taint, such as adultery or incest. Although these last have contracted 432 no guilt from the crime of their parents (see Gratian, Decretum, I. lvi. 3 ff.), that misdeed will nevertheless constitute a reason why they are forced to be content with maintenance, and are not to be ranked along with those who were begotten in the hope of having heirs. Such a hope the parents certainly did not entertain for these when they were conceived, for they hoped that their misdeed would always remain concealed,² rather than that they could by it create those who bear, as it were,³ public testimony to the baseness of their parents.

10. Grotius, loc. cit., § 8 [II. vii. 7-8], goes on to observe that children only succeed to a man who dies intestate, 'provided it be established that they are his actual offspring or provided that there be no evidence that he wished otherwise'. (K.) For no man has a fatherly affection for the offspring of another, and a presumed desire fails, when an express one points in the contrary direction. Yet that a person is the father of another cannot always be so clearly proved on unquestionable grounds, or on the testimony of others, as can be done in the case of a mother; especially where women live guarded by practically nothing else than their own modesty and conscience. Therefore, the final proof in such cases is held to be marriage itself, in which a woman promises a man that she will give her body to no one other than her husband, and as his wife is placed, as it were, under the eyes of her husband, granting to him at the same time the power to protect her body. Digest, II. iv. 5. It is also assumed that every man will keep his plighted word and avail himself of his power, unless the opposite is clearly proved. Therefore, every one is, as it were, possessed of this right, that he be regarded as the son of him whom the marriage of his mother designates. And no one of his own accord, unless he be insane, will lightly raise a question on this point, and 'find himself a father by the adultery of his mother'. Tacitus, Histories, Bk. IV [lv]: 'Julius Sabinus, in addition to his natural vanity, was inflamed by pride, in consideration of his falsely supposed descent. He pretended that his great-grandmother attracted the admiration of the deified Julius, during his Gallic campaigns, and had an adulterous amour with him.' (O.*) 'Jove is either not your father, or is so to your disgrace.' (M.) [Ovid, Metamorphoses, IX. 24.] But if others raise a question on this point, the burden of proof will rest upon them, such as, for instance, that he who is called the father was at the time of conception critically⁴ ill, or out of the country. It is related

¹ [For omnio read omnino.—Tr.]

³ [For vel ut read velut.—Tr.]

² [For oc cultum read occultum.—Tr.]

⁴ [For fontico read sontico.—Tr.]

in Xenophon, Greek History, Bk. III [iii. 2], that Agesilaus raised such a question against Leotychides on the following grounds: His father had once denied that he was his son, that he was handsomer than his father, that he was born in the tenth month after the last meeting of Agis with his mother, and that Agis had expelled his mother from his bed.¹

11. It is a second exception, whereby a son does not succeed to an intestate father, if there is an express desire of the father to the contrary; if, for instance, he has renounced him, as was the custom of the ancient Greeks, or disinherited him. In both cases, as has been shown, the decision should be backed by just and weighty considerations. In Dictys Cretensis, Bk. III [xxvi], Antenor resolved to close his home to his son Glaucus, because he had gone along in the company² of Paris when he stole away Helen. Add Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 7. Yet Grotius in that passage asserts, that, unless the disinherited or renounced son has deserved death, he should be supplied with maintenance. Yet I can scarcely see on what ground a son of the age when he should by natural law be given maintenance by his father, can deserve being disinherited or put to death.

12. Now as to what we said above, namely, that parents owe maintenance to children not merely of the first but of other degrees, if the parents by whom the latter might be maintained are no longer alive (see Digest, I. vi. 7; XXVII. i. 2, § 7), from this principle first of all is sought the equity of the so-called right of representation, by which children are understood to be advanced into the degree of their deceased³ parent, so that in inheriting from their remoter progenitors they secure the same consideration that their father would have had, had he been alive at the time, and succeed by descent together with those who were of the same degree as their father. And it would surely have been grievous, if, in addition to the affliction of the early death of their parent, they should also fail of those goods which their parents had hope of coming into, either by law or by the intention of their remoter progenitors. Add Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 6. But if the civil laws of any state do not recognize the right of representation, those who have been prematurely deprived of their father will bear this as an affliction visited upon them by fate.

433 13. In the lack of children of the first and further degrees, reason suggested that the succession fall to the ascending line; and this both because the estate itself or its beginnings at least, which the children afterward increased, proceeded for the most part from the parents, and because they deserve it for their good services. Since these had hoped that their property would fall to their children and that they would have heirs to survive them, it was but right, upon the reversal of nature's order, that they be reconciled to that loss by the solace of receiving their children's estate. Pliny, Panegyric [xxviii. 5]: 'It is miserable enough for a father to be a son's only heir.' Digest, V. ii. 15; XXIX. iv. 21; Code, III. xxviii. 28; VI. xxv. 10, § 2; Institutes, III. iii; Code, VI. lvi. Philo Judaeus, On the Life of Moses, Bk. III [xxxii], calls attention to the law on inheritances established by Moses, whereby sons succeed in the first place, then upon failure of them, daughters, then brothers, and in the fourth place uncles on the father's side, and he concludes from this that fathers may become the heirs of sons.

¹ [The sense of the passage in Xenophon is but imperfectly rendered by Pufendorf. See the introduction by Mascovius in the edition of 1744, vol. I, pp. xvii-xix.—Tr.]

² [For committatum read comitatum.—Tr.]

³ [For defuncti read defuncti.—Tr.]

For it is a very foolish idea (he says) to imagine that when he allots the inheritance of the nephew to his father's brother, out of a regard to his relationship to his father, he has excluded the father himself from the succession. But since the law of nature¹ permits the property of parents to be inherited by the children, but does not allow the parents themselves to inherit, he has abstained from any express mention of the subject as one to be deprecated and of evil omen, in order that the father and mother might not seem to receive any gain from the inconsolable affliction of the loss of children dying prematurely; but he indirectly intimated their right to be invited to such an inheritance when he conceded it to the uncles, in order that in this way he might cultivate propriety and avoid the alienation of the estate. (Y.*)

There is the further consideration in some parents of the weakness and want of old age, children having been obliged² otherwise to maintain those so afflicted. This was especially provided in an Attic law. Isaeus, Orations, vii [viii. 32]:

The law bids parents to provide for the nurture of children; and parents are father and mother, grandfather and grandmother, if these be still alive. For these are the beginning of the family, and their property passes on to their descendants from hand to hand. Therefore,³ they must nurture their children, even though they leave nothing behind.

Add Grotius, loc. cit., § 5, and the comments by Ziegler. But if a father has without⁴ reason pursued his son with deep hatred and injuries, and no reconciliation has followed, it will be just for him to be cut off from his son's inheritance. The same applies to a father who has exposed his son as an infant, for there is no question that the one who shouldered the burden of the son's education should be preferred to such an unnatural father, and it seems right that the foster-father be favoured above the natural one, so that he can recover what he expended upon the education of another's offspring.

It should also be observed,⁵ that the lawyers allow no representation in successions of the ascending line as they do in those of the descending; for instance, if a man die without offspring, leaving a father, and grandfather on his mother's side, the latter will not be admitted to the inheritance on the claim of his daughter. The reason for this seems to be that the hope of succession does not ascend but descends, and so the

¹ [The words 'of nature' are added by Pufendorf.—Tr.]

² [For tenebantur read tenebantur.—Tr.]

⁴ [For citer read citra.—Tr.]

³ [For Qua propter read Quapropter.—Tr.]

⁵ [For opervandum read observandum.—Tr.]

son had a hope of succeeding to his father, which hope he can himself also pass on to his sons; but the mother never had any hope or desire to inherit from her offspring. Therefore, she was unable to pass that hope back to her parents, contrary to the order of nature, and so in such a case the nearest claimant will justly exclude the more distant.

14. When heirs are lacking in the descending and ascending lines, collateral heirs to the intestate will be called to the succession. The order in which these should be admitted will have to be decided by natural conjecture, when there are no civil laws on the subject. This favours him¹ to whom the affection of the deceased is supposed to have been most strongly directed, provided we measure that affection more by the common inclination of sane men, and as it tends to avoid quarrels, than by the morose disposition of this or that individual. Therefore, in such a case it is the opinion of wise men that natural reason favours first of all nearness of blood, provided, however, that consideration is given to the source from which that property devolved upon the deceased, or who was once the loser² from the fact that the deceased came into the world. So Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, 434 chap. xiv, gives the first place to friendship between parents and children, and the second to the love of brothers, which arises from the fact that they owe their life to the same pair, and is maintained by similarity in years and education. After these follow cousins on the father's side and other relatives, because they are joined to us by that relationship. After these, affection for whom nature herself commends and in a way enjoins upon us, those are finally admitted who are recommended by kindness, congeniality, a special sympathy of spirits, or proved faith. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xvii], arranges the degrees of relatives in this way:

The first principle of society consists in the marriage tie, the next in children, the next in a family under one roof, where everything is in common. Next follows the connexion of brotherhood, next that of cousins, in their different degrees; and when they grow too numerous to be contained under one roof, they are transplanted to different dwellings, as it were to so many colonies. Then follow marriages and alliances, whence spring more numerous relationships. The ties and affections of blood bind mankind by affection. (E. *)

On the relationship between brothers one may consult in general Plutarch, On the Love of Brothers; Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VIII [vii], in the last words of Cyrus, and Memorabilia, Bk. II [iii]. Add Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 9-11. To illustrate the obligation between those united by ties of blood one may use the law in force in the kingdom of Tonquin, according to which disputes arising between such persons are not decided by a judge but by relatives of both sides acting in the capacity of arbiters, as is reported by Alexander de Rhodes, Divers Voyages, Bk. II, chap. vii.

¹ [For illa read illo.—Tr.]

² For decesterit read decasserit.—Tr.]

15. The question whether friends are not sometimes to be preferred to relatives, may be raised because of the encomia which are everywhere delivered on friendship. Cicero, loc. cit.: 'But of all the societies and unions among men, there is none more excellent, or more closely knit, than when men of real virtue and honesty, from a certain agreement and likeness of their manners, contract a familiarity¹ and friendship one with another.' (C.) Homer, Odyssey, Bk. VIII [585-6]: 'For a friend with an understanding heart is no whit worse than a brother.' (B. & L.) Euripides, Orestes [805-6]:

He whose soul is knit with thine, although he be not of thy kin,
Better than a thousand kinsfold this is for thy friend to win. (W.)

Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. IV, chap. vii, at the beginning. It often happens also that we feel much more at ease with one who is not related to us than with a kinsman, and trust to the former's discretion and fidelity much that we conceal from the latter; and, indeed, we are more prompt to serve a friend than we are when a kinsman needs our help, because he also comes more promptly to our aid than does the latter.

Yet it does not follow from this that there is a general custom, approaching the force of a law, by which a friend is to be preferred to kinsmen, even though the deceased has shown more indications of affection for him than he has for them. For in transmitting an inheritance concern is paid not alone to mere kindness, but also to the question, 'Who is the person to whom our property should most fittingly pass?'² And since it is a common tendency among men to make the family, to which they owe their origin, as splendid as possible, it follows that the most appropriate thing is for our possessions to remain within its circle. Furthermore, it does not follow at once, that, because I was greatly delighted at this man's association, I therefore wanted to transmit to him my estate. For that friendship between people of different stocks usually extends no farther than to mutual display of goodwill, the interchange of counsel, and the offices of everyday life. But if I am to be understood to be uniting my house with that of another's by bequeathing my estate to him, there will be required a clear and attested expression of my will. Thus, although, as Gellius, Bk. V, chap. xiii, relates, according to the customs of the early Romans in the classification of their duties, after the duties between parents and children, the first place was given to wards, the second to clients, the third to guests, and the last to kinsmen by blood and marriage, yet in transferring inheritances no attention at all was paid to this order. Moreover, if friends were sometimes in the case of intestates to be preferred to kinsmen, the widest avenue would be opened to disputes, as much 435 between friends, if a man had more than one, as between them and kinsmen. For the fact that a man takes more pleasure in the company of a certain person, or speaks with him more openly, is by no means an infallible proof that he loves such a person above all others. For often charm or nimbleness of mind, equality of age, or good judgement, make the companionship of a friend more pleasing or profitable for us than that of a kinsman who lacks such qualities. Yet these considerations do not necessarily lead to the conclusion, that, when we must dispose of our property, we will be more favourable to the former than to the latter. In such a case the remark of Hesiod, Works and Days, Bk. II [707], will be to the point: 'Do not make a friend equal to a brother.' (E.-W.)

¹ [For familiaritate read familiaritate.—Tr.]

² [For transsire read transire.—Tr.]

A final point: It is easy to sum up the degrees of relationship, but who can arrange the degrees of friendship that there will remain no ground for dispute?

16. But it is still urged, and this with more reason, that at least friends through whose generosity, advice, or aid, property has been acquired, should in its division be preferred¹ to kinsmen, since it is right that it should return to the place from which it flowed. Yet even in such cases there will not be wanting the most plentiful matter for disputes, the elimination² of which should be the first end of all laws. For the reply will be made to a friend, that he did not confer a kindness, but only returned one, or that enough gratitude had already been shown him; that he gave it without hope of receiving anything in return, and with the purpose that he might help not only his friend but some of his family; that he gave it to secure renown, or for his own advantage; that we could have got out of our straits by other means; that it is not certain how much his assistance contributed to the amassing of that property; that a person whose valued assistance we used in securing a thing is not necessarily to be admitted at once to the common use of it; that the services of friends, furthermore, would become mere business transactions, matters for contract and usury, if they are to be rated before kinsmen in intestate estates, for in such cases it would be understood that a thing is given one person by another only for him to keep it for a while, and at his death return it with interest.

Therefore, when there is no express disposal which favours a friend, the kinsmen will fall heir to it, on condition, however, that, along with the property of the deceased, they also inherit an obligation of his toward such a benefactor, and must strive to the best of their ability to show gratitude toward him, for the fact that by his assistance they secured such a rich inheritance. Nor is it allowable for one to urge against this the statement of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. IX, chap. ii: 'One should repay a debt to a benefactor rather than make a present to a comrade, if he cannot do both' (W.); and of Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xv]: 'There is no duty more incumbent than to repay a kindness.' And again: 'Since there are two kinds of generosity, namely, to confer a kindness or to return one, it lies within ourselves whether or not we shall be the giver; and a good man cannot but make return, provided it is possible without injury to others.' (E.) Or the remark of Phocion, in Plutarch, Apophthegms [188 A]: 'The Athenians gathered a benevolence for a certain sacrifice; and when others contributed to it, he being often spoken to said: "I should be ashamed to give to you, and not to pay this man—pointing to a δαειστής [creditor]." ' (G.*) Add Digest, XXIX. v. 12.

¹ [For graeferendos read praeferendos.—Tr.]

² [For praeschindendam read praescindendam.—Tr.]

In fact the matter of successions to intestates neither can nor should be regulated in every respect by the rules which are observed in rendering and returning benefits. For benefits are directed by the virtue of humanity and liberality, and properly speaking are given merely to those who had a right to expect them of us only on the dictate of those virtues. But successions to intestates depend upon other foundations, namely, the obligation to look after the needs of others, nearness of blood, and the inclination, urged by nature, to increase and preserve one's own family. Isaeus, Orations, vi [vii. 30]: 'All persons when they approach death make careful provision about their posses- 436 sions, so as not to ruin their families.'

In affairs of this kind the first care should be to find some clear way which shall be as little as possible open to disputes. And nothing is more convenient, in case the will of the deceased is not known, than to have the succession pass according to the degree of nearness in blood, in which each person stood to the deceased. Therefore, it has been observed by still others, that, in successions to intestates, matters stand differently from what they do in the conferment of benefits; in the former case the first necessity being to confer a benefit, in the second to return one, since children, who surely ought to be bound¹ by ties of benefaction, are preferred to parents, to whom one is indebted most of all. Lucian, Abdicatus [18]: 'Yet surely nature requires of parents that they love their children more than of children that they love their parents.' (F.) Compare Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit. Yet what has been said is not to be taken to mean that a feeling of gratitude should be banished from one's final disposals, but only that it is improper to try to take simply the presumed will² of a deceased person, such presumption being based on the expression of gratitude, as a general rule by which inheritances of intestates are to be assigned.

17. Now that this much has been established, it is clear that of collateral heirs the nearest to the inheritance are brothers, because they are bound to us by the very deepest affection, and because, due to the fact that they have brothers, they have received smaller portions of the inheritance from their father. Quintilian, Declamations, cccxxi: 'What friendship can be so fortunate as that which imitates brotherly affection ?

¹ [For devinciendū read devinciendi.—Tr.]

² [For volontate read volumtate.—Tr.]

Certainly, when we wish to compliment those who act like friends no flattery can go farther than to call them "brothers".¹ Add also the words of Cyrus to his sons, Training of Cyrus, VIII; Valerius Maximus, V. v, at the beginning; Stobaeus, Anthology, LXXII [IV. xxvii]. Sisters are also to be admitted together with brothers, at least in the property of the mother and that lately acquired, but not so much in their fathers' goods, which are intended to uphold the position of the family, since women usually marry outside the father's line. Brothers with the same father exclude those by the same mother, in sharing property of the father, while the case is reversed in property of the mother. In the case of property acquired since the time when my father married the mother of my half-brothers, it is more fitting that I secure a larger portion, since the father usually contributes more than the mother to the building up of an estate. When no brothers survive, then their sons will inherit, although it appears that they should also admit the uncles of the deceased, since these also have received a lesser portion of their father's estate, because it had to be divided with the father of the deceased. The same order should be followed in the division of the mother's estate among the daughters of sisters and their great-uncles on her side.¹ And this order shall also be continued in all other cases, with the provision, however, that when there are no kinsmen on the father's side, those on the mother's side share in the father's estate, and vice versa.

18. But it should be carefully observed, that such rules of inheritance are called natural, not because they have been so defined by some precept of natural law that no different disposal can be made of them, but because they are in the highest degree agreeable with natural reason, and appear best fitted to avoid disputes in the failure of any express disposal by the deceased or of civil law. Yet, generally speaking, in scarcely any field of right are civil laws to be found so solicitous as in the disposal of inheritances, not only that they may eliminate disputes between kinsmen, but also because it is important that such matters be settled according to the needs of the state. Furthermore, in some places the making of wills is very free, in others it is more or less restricted. It was a law of the Twelve Tables² in Rome [V. iii, Bruns]: 'As the head of a family has ordained in his will concerning his money or his guardianship, let this be regarded as valid'; which was in turn taken from an Attic law made by Solon. Thus, Plutarch, in his Solon [xxi. 2], tells us, 437 that his law whereby he gave citizens the power, unknown before his time in the state, to make wills, was most eagerly received, and thought most just. His purpose in framing such a law was not that a person could cheat his nearest of kin of their right of relationship, but that by giving this advantage to all, he might bring it about that men might vie with one another in works of kindness, and kinsmen might be drawn all the more closely to one another, since, if they wanted to receive any of their relatives' possessions, they would have to outdo strangers in kindness. Demosthenes, Against Leptines [xx. 102]:

¹ [For defuncti read defunctae.—Tr.]

² [For tribularum read tabularum.—Tr.]

Solon passed a law empowering a man to give his property to whom he pleases, if he has no legitimate children, not that he might deprive the nearest relatives of succession, but that, by throwing the chance open to all, he might excite emulation to do mutual kindnesses. (K.)

At the same time it has seemed more consonant with liberty and fulness of dominion, that a man should not be forced to leave¹ his possessions to others than those whom he held dearest. A further point can be made that there often appears a more clear hope that a stranger will administer our estate for the advancement of virtue, than will some kinsman of ours whom the expectation of a rich inheritance not infrequently entices into luxury and ease. Theocritus, Idylls, x [xvi. 59]: 'Riches be wasted of their posterity after they are dead.' (E.) Moreover, it is a solace in the face of death, if one can leave his property, secured at such great labour, to those whom he loves best. Add Isocrates, Aegineticus. Yet Solon forbids those to make a will who had legitimate male children, to whom the father's estate was entirely due. It cannot be denied that because of this freedom of legacy there crept in among the Athenians as well as the Romans an enormous mass of cheating, flattery of old men and of those without close heirs, deceits, passing off of forgeries, and the like.

Among the provisions of Solon's laws on wills Bodinus, Bk. V, chap. ii, especially censures that article which allowed a man to convey land by will. His reason is, that when it was made possible for many estates to fall to one person, the result was a great inequality of wealth among citizens, and so the poor conceived a hatred for the wealthy, and the latter a corresponding haughtiness, evils quite capable of disturbing and destroying states. Especially since it is a rule, that where there are waters, waters love to gather. He also adds that it is to the interest of democracies that a few shall not excel² too greatly the rest in wealth. This was the reason for the Hebrew law that land could not be sold in perpetuity, and of the other that women who brought with them land as their dowry could marry only within their tribe, lest their marriage be the occasion of the estates passing to another tribe. See Numbers, xxxvi.

Such considerations as this led Aristotle, Politics, Bk. V, chap. viii [VIII. xii], to include this rule among those intended to preserve a democracy: 'Provision should be made that estates pass by inheritance and not by gift; for in this way properties will be equalized.' (J.) One may read in detail, in Plutarch, Agis [p. 797], what evil consequences to the Spartan state attended the liberty of wills, introduced in opposition to the constitution of Lycurgus by Epitades the ephor. Add Aristotle, Politics, Bk. II, chap. ix. Among other peoples, on the other hand, there was no freedom for a man to make a will as he pleased, or else it was greatly restricted. As for the Hebrew laws on this point, see Selden in his special work entitled De Successionibus ad Leges Ebraeorum, especially chap. xxiv; Grotius, On Numbers, xxvii. 8 ff. Tacitus [Germany, xx] thus describes the ancient Germans: 'A person's own children, however, are his heirs and successors, and no wills¹ are made. If there be no children, the next in order of inheritance are brothers, paternal and maternal uncles.' (O.) I see no reason why we should try, as one writer 438 does, to take this to mean that the Germans, as yet unlettered, did not use a form of wills and written record, in accordance with the custom of the Romans, which Tacitus probably has in mind in that passage. For the Romans permitted the use of nuncupative wills, which require no writing down. Therefore, if Tacitus wished to convey the impression that only written wills were unknown to the Germans, he should have expressed it more clearly. We should bear in mind, further, that special rights of kinship were observed by that people with a certain sanctity, as is shown by some remarks by the same author farther on: 'The more numerous are a man's relations and kinsmen, the more comfortable is his old age; nor is it here any advantage to be childless. [xxi] It is an indispensable duty to adopt the enmities of a father or relation, as well as their friendships.' (O.) Likewise, even to this day in many parts of Germany, when a son is born to a man the common expression is heard, 'He has gotten an heir'.

¹ [For relinquere read relinquere.—Tr.]

² [For excedunt read excedant.—Tr.]

Nor does it appear that there was any need for wills to be greatly prized by a people which did not yet know how to store up wealth, and was content with meagre furniture, which wanted of its crops, herds, and hunting no more than would meet their simple, everyday uses. People who lived such a life had no need to enlarge their holdings. Nor, indeed, is the making of a will so integral and necessary an accompaniment of dominion, but that the state can introduce a uniform manner of succeeding to intestates. Which was especially true of that people, since [xxvi] 'the lands they occupied by townships, in allotments proportional to the number of cultivators, and were afterwards parcelled out among the individuals of the district in shares according to the rank and condition of each person'. (O.) Yet for men to express their final commands to their family is not the same as to make a will. The Arabian impostor also laid down laws on successions, in the chapter of the Koran which concerns wives.

Now as this manner of succession is the most simple and the most highly agreeable to natural inclination, so it works to the preservation of equal wealth among citizens, to the maintenance of a proper number of citizens, to the prevention of the merging of great estates (see Bacon of Verulam, Henry VII, p. 127), and to the preservation of the standing and continuance of families. It is also believed that kinsmen are more closely drawn by such a bond to promote mutual love and advantages, since they realize that they are heirs one of another. To this thought applies the passage in Plato, Laws, Bk. XI, cited by Grotius, loc. cit., § 9, and explained by Boecler on the same passage in Grotius. Likewise, Pliny, Panegyric [xxxvii. 2], commends most highly the remission of the five per cent. inheritance tax to heirs in the family:

¹ [For testamentum read testamentum.—Tr.]

It was easy to imagine how painfully men would consent, or rather not consent at all, to have cut off and carried away some portion of the wealth which their blood, their clan, their common religious association, seemed to guarantee them; wealth which they had received not as coming from some alien source, and as something to be hoped for, but as their own property, which they had always had, and expected to transmit to their nearest kin.

Publius [Publilius] Syrus [222]: 'To know your heir is better than to look for one.'

Yet those peoples have apparently settled this point more wisely, who have granted unrestricted assignment by will of those possessions which a man has acquired by his own labour, and decreed that what has been acquired from fathers and ancestors should pass to the nearest of kin, for by this method the reasons adduced on both sides are excellently tempered and joined. Jodocus Schouten, Descriptio Regni Siam, recounts a custom very different from that of the Europeans. In that kingdom the estate of wealthy persons is usually divided into three parts, of which the king takes one, the priests another, from which the funeral expenses are also taken, and the third passes to the children. No less strange is the custom among the Ethiopians on the coast of Guinea, whereby the children receive nothing from the father's or mother's estate, but it all goes to the nearest of kin.

19. But those who come into an inheritance, both when there is, and when there is not, a will, have the common obligation to pay a debt of the deceased. And this follows not so much because they have tacitly obligated themselves to do so (which is the basis for the disposition made in the ancient Roman law, Digest, XXIX. ii. 8), as because that burden attends the property of the deceased like a tacit mortgage, for as Quintilian, Declamations, cclxxiii, says, 'The theory upon which an inheritance passes to another person is that the creditor must be satisfied first.' Furthermore, a man is worth only so much as remains after his debts have been paid. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. ii, § 11. Therefore, it is most highly agreeable with natural equity that an heir should not be held accountable for what exceeds his inheritance. Add Digest, III. vi. 5; XI. vii. 14, § 1; XVI. iii. 7, § 1;

XLIX. xiv. 11; Law of the Visigoths, Bk. VII, tit. ii, chap. 19. Yet we should not fail to note what Gabriel Sionita, De Moribus Orientalium, chap. xvi, tells of the Mohammedans,¹ namely, that when they make their will at the approach of death 'they are bound to restore according to the laws whatever had been seized or stolen, getting from the owners a receipt of payment; and if they do not know to whom the articles should go, then they must donate that money to public works, such as hospitals, mosques, and baths, or to charitable and religious purposes'. Add Luke, xix. 8. In Ferdinand Pinto, chap. xxi, a Chinese hermit advises Antonio de Faria, who was guilty of sacrilege, to do three things for the good of his soul: Restore what he had taken, seek forgiveness of his sin with tears, and give alms to the poor with a generous hand. Add Idem, chap. lx.

¹ [For Musselmanus read Musselmanos.—Tr.]

CHAPTER XII ON USUCAPION

- | | |
|---|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. How usucapion differs from prescription. 2. How the Roman laws defined usucapion and where they allowed it. 3. How far good faith is required in usucapion. 4. Continuous possession is a requirement. 5. The reasons for introducing usucapion. 6. Whether the law of usucapion is penal. 7. Many refer usucapion to civil law. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 8. Whether usucapion arises from a tacit relinquishment of dominion. 9. It appears to rest upon a tacit agreement of nations. 10. How far usucapion injures those yet unborn. 11. Usucapion obtains even among different nations. |
|---|--|

WE must now consider that method of acquisition whereby he who has secured possession of another's property in good faith and by just title, and has held it without challenge over a long space of time, obtains a full property right to it, the right and legal action of the former owner having ceased. This method¹ is called usucapion, because a thing is taken and acquired by use or continued possession. That special case, in which the former owner after a completed usucapion is repelled by the possessor, is properly called prescription, although the two are often confused. It will be worth while to offer a few preliminary observations on what the Roman law instituted in this connexion and its reasons, for in this way it will be clear what matter there is here for positive law as well as natural law.

2. In Digest, XLI. iii. 3, Modestinus defines usucapion as: 'The addition of dominion through continuation of possession for a period defined by law.' For our purpose we feel that it is the same whether we read 'addition' [adiectio], or, with Cujas and others, on the authority of Ulpian, 'acquisition' [adeptio]. For whoever has continued the possession of a thing for the period prescribed by law, such possession having been secured in good faith, has something 'added' to him which he had thus far lacked. And he to whom the law has added something can be said to have 'acquired' it. 440

Now just as a man can secure property by usucapion, if he is fitted to acquire dominion in any other way, so dominion can be acquired by usucapion over movable and immovable things, unless they are exempt by the laws. And free men are so exempted. For since liberty is so sweet a draught that it is presumed no man neglects an opportunity to recover it, the conclusion is just that a person who remained so long a time in servitude and did not claim his liberty, acted from ignorance of his status and not because he tacitly consented to his servitude.

¹ [For modo read modus.—Tr.]

Therefore, a continued submission should work pity for such a person rather than his detriment.

Sacred objects, and such as are connected with religion, also constitute an exception, as also the property of wards, so long as they remain such. For the neglect on their part, due to their tender age, to put in their claim, cannot be imputed to them to such an extent that they should therefore lose their property, while it would surely be too great a punishment for them to suffer for the negligence of their guardians. Exception is likewise made of stolen property, of fugitive slaves, and whatever has been possessed by force, even though a third party may have acquired possession of them in good faith. Thus, it is a rule of the Twelve Tables:¹ 'Let the authority over a thing stolen hold forever.' For as to the thief or robber himself, his own crime prevents him from acquiring a thing in this manner, while the third person, the possessor in good faith, is hindered by the fault of the theft or robbery, which is understood to accompany, as it were, the object itself. For although, properly speaking, there is no fault in the thing itself of its own nature, yet because it was taken from its former owner in a faulty manner and by means of a crime, it seemed just in the sight of the laws that this right be not extinguished, and that care be taken at the same time to keep a man's misdeed from being able to minister to his gain. For since movables can be acquired by a usucapion of three years, it would be easy for thieves to put stolen property in a place, and in other hands, where it could not be found by the former owner within that period.

Furthermore, among the other reasons for a law of usucapion is cited the negligence of the owner. And yet stolen property is as a general thing carefully concealed. Therefore, this consideration never held against those whose property had been taken from them by theft. But since later laws stipulated that all actions at law are extinguished by a continued silence of thirty or forty years (Code, VII. xxxix. 3 and 4), a prescription of so long a time will repel the owner if he then puts in his claim. And although some feel that this custom is opposed to equity, since it is absurd to build upon continued licence and injury as upon right and justice, yet it can be excused by reason of the general advantage which follows from it to the public. For it is of value to the public peace that disputes which would run on for ever should be finally closed, and that the dominions of things should not be in continued uncertainty. Moreover, it seemed inconvenient, in view of the fact that the human race is practically renewed every thirty years, for a following generation to be disturbed by quarrels on some slight occasion. And when a man had done without a thing for thirty years, it was justly felt that he had in good faith settled down to bear the loss, so that there was no need of so long a possession being disturbed on his account.

¹ [Rather the Lex Atinia, given in Gellius, XVII. vii.—Tr.]

And the same consideration can be applied also to the prescription of crimes, for surely it seems superfluous to call back to judgement, from another generation, misdeeds, the effect of which had been so completely effaced by the passage of a long period, that the ends for which punishments are instituted are no longer met. See Antonius Matthaëus, De Criminibus, XIX. iv and XX. iv. 14, on Digest XLVIII.

3. But for usucapion to proceed, it is required that when a man secures the possession of a thing, the former possessor of which was not the true owner, he must do so by a just title, that is, such a title as is otherwise held sufficient to transfer and acquire dominion. And therefore, that he act in good faith, that is, both that he be able to show sufficient reason why he holds it, and that he is convinced that dominion was actually turned over to him and he was constituted an owner. Libanius, Declamations, i [iii. 16]: 'Just possession is not secured by virtue of having acquired something, but by virtue of holding it without any grounds for criticism.' Therefore, Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIV [xviii], calls it a 'continued licentiousness and injustice' that the fields which had formerly belonged to the king Apion, and had been left to the Roman people, had been seized by any man who could get there first. According to Roman laws it is enough that this good faith have been present only at the outset of the possession, even if a man afterward discovers that he from whom he received the thing was not its owner. But by canon law good faith is required throughout the entire intermediate period (Decretals, II. xxvi. 5 and 20), so that if a man discovers, during that period, that the thing passed to him from one who was not its owner, he begins to be obligated in his conscience to restore the thing to its true owner, and his possession henceforward is in bad faith, at least if he undertakes by sharp practice to keep the thing from the knowledge of the true owner. Such a position seems to approach more nearly the sanctity of natural law, since, upon the introduction¹ of dominions of things, an obligation is understood to have been laid upon all men to strive in every way possible to enable a man to recover a thing which they hold without his consent. Add below, chap. xiii, § 2. But the Roman law thought it enough to establish the extrinsic innocence of men, and allowed the possessor who had secured a thing without fault to rest undisturbed in his possession, the task of finding the thing and establishing his claim to it being left to the owner.

4. It is, furthermore, required that possession be continuous and be not interrupted either naturally, that is, that it either pass in the meantime back to its true owner or be left at some time derelict or abandoned; or civilly, that is, if, for instance, the owner bring a suit against the possessor about the thing, or at least by formal protests preserve for himself an undiminished right. Add Boecler and Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iv, § 9, where they observe, however, that the time during which the first party possessed it, counts for his successor, provided¹ that both of them entered upon their possession in good faith and with just title. For otherwise there will be no addition or accession of time from the first party, and so, when he acted in bad faith, his time of possession is not added to that of his successor, although the latter possession be entirely lawful. And this principle applies as well in the case of a general successor,² such as an heir, as in the case of a particular one, such as a purchaser or receiver of a gift, &c. Yet although the fault of the first party is of no advantage to the latter kind of successor, who is consequently unable to add the first period to his own, it does not on the other hand work to his prejudice, provided he acted in good faith, and he can complete the usucapion by keeping possession in his own name. The situation is different, however, in the case of a general successor, for since he succeeds to every right of the deceased and represents him, he does not by his ignorance and good faith remove the fault of the deceased.³

¹ [For introducua read introducua.—Tr.]

A longer period of time is required for one to be able to effect prescription against a person who is absent than against one who is present.

Movables are subject to usucapion in a briefer time than immovables. The reason for such an institution appears to be partly because it is adjudged more grievous to lose immovables than movables, partly because the latter are open to sale more often⁴ than the former, while at the same time it is easier to secure possession in good faith of the movables of others than of their immovables, with the consequence that there is no need to fear so great a mass of disputes over the latter as over the former. Plato, Laws, Bk. XII [p. 954 c ff.], lays down the following rules on usucapion of movables:

If a man has any possessions which he has used and openly⁵ shown in the city [. . .] no one shall be permitted to claim them after the expiration of one year; [. . .] or if in the country [. . .] after five years. Or if he uses them in the city, but in his own house, then the appointed time of claiming the goods shall be three years, or ten years if he has them in the country in private. And if he has them in another land, there shall be no limit of time or prescription, and whenever⁶ any one finds them he may claim them. (J.*)

The laws which Plato set up for his ideal state take no cognizance of usucapion of immovables.

442 5. The chief causes adduced by the expositors of the Roman law for the introduction of usucapion are, that it would tend to avoid clashes and prevent disputes in a state, if dominions were fixed among

¹ [For dummodo read dummodo.—Tr.]

² [For defuncti read defuncti.—Tr.]

³ [For operere read operie re.—Tr.]

² [For insuccessori read in successori.—Tr.]

⁴ [For frequentibus read frequentius.—Tr.]

⁶ [For quando, cunque read quandocunque.—Tr.]

its citizens. This could not be done if the neglect of former owners were to be granted indulgence for ever, and if those who had recently been established in possession were left in constant fear that some day their property would be taken back from them.

Nor could there be business dealings among men without it. For who would want to contract with another, who would buy from another, if there were never such a thing as undisturbed possession of an object? Nor would there be enough relief from a suit of recovery, since an infinite number of things could prevent the first party from being able to make it good after so long a period. And what serious disturbances¹ would vex a state, if, after so long a lapse of time, so many contracts would have to be broken, so many successions annulled, so many possessors expelled! Add Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 8. In view of all this it has appeared to be enough to leave owners a reasonably long period of time for the recovery of their possessions. But when their indolence allowed this to slip away, the judge² was properly permitted afterwards to repulse their belated importunity. And although it is possible that one man or another may unwillingly fail to recover his property through no fault of his own, and because he could not find the possessor, yet the damage arising to a few by a general rule of this nature, is balanced by the advantage accruing to the state.

Yet it should be carefully noted, that, before there can be a presumption of negligence on the part of the original owner, he must have been allowed a convenient and sufficient period in which to do his part. And so it is most equitable that the time in which a state has suffered war within its borders shall not avail toward prescription. Thus, Honorius had a law passed: 'Whatever time should be spent by the Vandals in the Roman domain should not by any means be counted towards a demurrer.' (D.*) Procopius, History of the Vandals, Bk. I [iii. 3].

6. But it is not necessary for explaining the equity of civil laws in establishing usucapion, that with Hugo de Roy, De Eo Quod Justum Est, Bk. III, tit. iii, iv, we should by right have recourse to the power³ residing in the magistrates of states to punish guilty persons. As if actions are after a certain time denied those who fail to claim their property, on the ground that those who allow their property to be taken from them by usucapion can justly and properly be included among criminals; and that in thus neglecting their own affairs they sin not only to the common injury of society, but against their own nature, which everywhere favours the benefit and advantage of the state. And that just as Solon established a penalty for negligent persons, so in the case before us the neglect of owners is punished by the loss of dominion over the things in question.

¹ [For turbe read turbæ.—Tr.]

³ [For potostatem read potestatem.—Tr.]

² [For pretor read praetor.—Tr.]

But the fact is that the primary purpose of the law on usucapion is not to punish the guilty, but to prevent states from being disturbed by uncertain and unsettled dominion. Although ¹ it does follow that the man who is afterward denied action for a claim long neglected suffers some loss.

Moreover, the exclusion from some advantage which is open only to those who look after and give proper care to their affairs, does not have the nature of a punishment properly so called. For it is certainly a figurative expression when we say, 'The lazy are punished by their own character', or 'It is punishment enough for the slothful that they are kept out of every position of influence and forced to lead a life of obscurity'. Yet it is no more right to say that a man who allows his property to be lost through usucapion, sins against the state. For the public interest is injured rather by those who, it may be, misuse their property, or by merely sitting at ease upon it, as it were, in their ownership, allow it by their negligence to be of no service. But if a thing is appropriated by usucapion, it is at least looked after by some one, so that it is of use to the state. It is, indeed, of little concern to the state whether a piece of land is cared for by Gaius or Seius, provided it does not lie without a caretaker.

Consider, also, that when an individual secures some advantage from another's punishment, it must be that he had been greatly injured
443 by the offender. And yet he who receives dominion ² by usucapion has in no way been injured by the negligence of the owner.³ It is improper to apply to such cases the words of Digest, XVI. iii. 31: 'He who has deserved ill of the public ought to be left to struggle with poverty, so as to serve as an example to others to keep them from doing wrong.'

Since, therefore, the law of usucapion is not penal, it is idle to discuss why the negligence of the owner should best be curbed by the loss of the thing and not by some fine. Although it is quite certain that by a fine of this sort civil laws could not have secured their end, which was to avoid at their outset the disputes that would constantly arise, and to grant to possessors over a long period, who deserve great favour, an ultimate security in their holding. For in the first place the claim would have to be settled ⁴ before a court, where the decision would be all the more difficult the longer the thing had been in the possession of others; and then the possessor would have to be ejected from his holding, and his title and good faith would be of no value to him if the fine went to the judge. But if it went as a compensation to the possessor, even then not all the difficulty would be resolved. For if it is less than what the possessor would lose by giving up his holding, he is still a loser,

¹ [For Et si read Etsi.—Tr.]

² [For Atiquei . . . usucapionem dominum read Atiquei . . . usucapionem dominum.—Tr.]

³ [For domini read domini.—Tr.]

⁴ [For adendum read adeundum.—Tr.]

and if it is the same or more, little will result to the old owner. Therefore, there is in such cases no easier way to peace, than, after the period of usucapion is complete, to declare the right of the old owner extinct.

7. Scholars are not yet agreed on the question by what right usucapion was introduced. Most writers ascribe its beginnings to civil law, and distinguish its mode of acquisition from those which are commonly attributed to the law of nations. Indeed, Cujas on Digest, XLI. iii. 1, goes so far as to say that usucapion is opposed to the law of nations, because it takes dominion from a man against his will; and that it is opposed also to natural equity, even though it is for the public good, for it means a loss to owners although an advantage to the state. To this Hugo de Roy, loc. cit., replies that dominion, by reason of the fact that it subjects itself to civil laws which establish usucapion, agrees at least implicitly to such a transfer of dominion.

Another reason advanced by Cujas for usucapion not agreeing with the law of nations, is that he who secures a thing from a non-owner is by the law of nations not its owner; for in no manner is it possible by the law of nations for a non-owner to make another an owner, while by civil law he who receives a thing of a non-owner is made its owner, if he has held it for a certain number of years. To this Hugo de Roy, Bk. III, tit. iv, § 8, replied, that in usucapion the seller, or any other non-owner,¹ conveys only the title and possession in good faith, while the dominion is conferred by the law alone, or by him who holds by the law of nations legitimate power to pass laws, and to transfer dominions from one person to another on a sufficient plea of the public good, the actual owner by his negligence approving the transfer of ownership, or his consent being presumed from his long silence.

Some maintain that usucapion belongs to civil and positive law for the reason, that, when a man has not obtained a right originally on some other ground, time alone cannot confer it on him, since time in itself has no effective force; for nothing takes place from time, even though everything must take place in time. On that point this much is certain, that it depends entirely upon the determination of civil law, whether usucapion is completed at the tenth or twentieth year, rather than at the ninth or sixteenth; and yet it cannot be denied that the consent of nations, upon consideration of the peace of mankind, can assign some moral² force to a period of time, in so far, at least, that upon the passage of a certain period presumptions and considerations are held to have arisen from other causes, which strengthen the right of the possessor. For although bare natural reason and the agreement of all nations do not make the production of some right dependent upon the existence of some point of time, they have still been able to assign this effect to a space of time which embraces a considerable period. 444

¹ [For non dominum read non-dominum.—Tr.]

² [For motalem read moralem.—Tr.]

Others have preferred to deliver themselves on this point artfully and timidly. Since they recognized the great advantage to a state in the law of usucapion, they judged it probable from the nature of the custom, and its existence before all positive law, that it had the power to transfer dominion, since natural reason strictly commands the performance of whatever conduces to the public good and peace. They qualify this statement, however, by adding that the light of reason dictates it to be highly suitable and expedient, that usucapion be established by positive law, but that it is not so necessary that it be established by natural law itself.

Many acknowledge that prescription is not opposed to natural law, that it contains within itself natural equity and rests upon a most just right, and, as it were, a law of nature, but they hesitate to say in so many words that it is a part of natural law. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iv, § 9; Boecler and Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 1.

8. In order that he may show that usucapion belongs to natural law itself, and so may be properly appealed to by those who are under that law alone, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iv, bases it upon the tacit dereliction of the former owner. In order to prove this he assumes that it is in accordance with nature's law for a man to be able to relinquish a right of his whenever he prefers to hold it no longer. But in order that such a will to abdicate may have an effect in relation to others, it must show itself by means of certain signs, since it is not consistent with human nature to assign any extrinsic effectiveness to mere internal acts. Now included among signs are both words and acts, and, indeed, when the will has been signified by words there is no reason to wait upon the delays of usucapion, since a right passes at once to another. And this is the case as well, when a man has indicated his will by a positive act, when, for instance, he casts it away, or abandons it, unless the circumstance of the thing be such that it should be thought of as cast away or abandoned only for a time, with the intention of seeking and looking for it again. Add Digest, XLI. i. 9, § 8; XIV. ii. 8; XLVII. ii. 43, § 11; II. xiv. 2, § 1. So also if the owner of a thing knowingly treat of it with its possessor as though he were its owner, it will be proper to hold that he has given up his right, and that, indeed, his right ceases at the very moment the terms are completed. Therefore, usucapion applies only in the case of things to which the former owner has not renounced his right either by words or any express act, and yet such a will on his part is presumed from his failure to hunt them out and claim them. For even non-performances or omissions, considered with the circumstances due to them, are held in moral matters as acts which can work to the prejudice of the one who makes no sign. See Numbers, xxx. 5, 12; Digest, XXII. i. 17, § 1; XLI. i. 44.

But in order that a will or desire may be presumed from an omission, it must not have come from simple and innocent ignorance. Therefore, the possessors of things belonging to others secure dominion by the tacit consent of the owners, if the latter knew that the former were in possession of their property, and yet failed to claim it when they had a convenient opportunity to do so. For to such negligence and silence on the part of a man who was cognizant of the fact and free to act, no other cause can be assigned than that he had no further interest in the thing, and no longer wanted it among his possessions. Add Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 5, and Ziegler on the passage before us.

Furthermore, the passage of time affords a strong conjecture that a man may be assumed to have consciously neglected to claim his property. For it is scarcely possible that we should not have observed in the course of a long period that something of ours is being held by another, or that we should not have had an opportunity to open our claim to it, or at least to interrupt the other's title by denouncing and protesting it. So also any fear we may once have had usually passes 445 after a long time, while at the same time ways may be found whereby the holder of our property may not force us to fear any further.

To the presumption that no one may lightly be assumed to throw away his property, Grotius opposes another: That no one is assumed to want a thing to belong to him, in which he has for a very long time shown no evidence of interest.

Although all this is advanced in a plausible manner, it is, nevertheless, certain that prolonged silence does not always avail for a presumption of tacit dereliction. For it can also happen that a man has been ignorant of his right for a very long time, or has been hindered from asserting his claim through fear and inability (see Decretum, II. xvi. 3. 13, 14, in Gratian). And when a man claims his property, however long a period may have intervened, he cannot ever have abandoned it beforehand. Therefore, this basis for prescription will not hold good in all cases.

The further reason given by Grotius, namely, that dereliction is presumable also from the continued silence of the owner, because 'it ought not to be supposed that men have such a disposition that, out of consideration for a mere perishable thing, they would wish a fellow man to live in a continual state of sin' amounts to nothing. For not to mention the fact that it seems too great an assurance to promise ourselves so much upon the piety of mankind (add Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 8), such a possessor in good faith, whom we have described as being able to secure dominion by usucapion, is not in a state of sin, since the manner in which he came into his possession leads him to the firm conviction that he acquired dominion at the time that he took possession. Nor does it appear that a man is bound of his own accord to call his own right in question, when it has been based upon a legitimate and probable title. But if any sin whatsoever resides in the possession of another's property, it would have to be removed not by the silence of the owner, but by his express confession and the renunciation of his right, if he would actually have the fullest concern for the possessor's conscience. And yet in a case like this the possessor will secure his right not by usucapion but by the act of the owner himself.

9. Among such discordant opinions this much at least is clear, that just as dominions of things were introduced in the interest of peace, so it flows from the same consideration that possessors in good faith should at some time be made secure, and should not be allowed to be disturbed by an endless controversy over their possession. But we do not find that the length of time within which possession in good faith takes on the strength of dominion is precisely determined either by natural reason or the universal agreement of nations. It will have to be set with some latitude by the decision of upright men. Yet in such a way that we may not cavil at that latitude after the manner of Horace, Epistles, Bk. II, ep. i [34 ff.]:

If you say that poetry is like wine which improves by keeping, then I must ask you to tell me what the year is that gives writings their claim to a higher price. A writer who died a hundred years ago, should he be reckoned among the perfect and ancient, or among the worthless and new? Name a limit, to bar future quarrels. 'He is old,' you say, 'and excellet, who completes a hundred years.' What then of one who has been dead less by a single month or year—amongst which is he to be reckoned, the ancient poets, or those whom the present and all succeeding ages must hold in contempt? 'He certainly shall find place of honour among the ancients whose age is less by such a short space as a month or even a whole year.' I make the most of what you grant me; and like single hairs of the horse's tail, little by little I pull away one and then¹ another, &c. (W.)

Add Grotius, Florum Sparsio, on Digest, L. xvi. 177.

But in setting this period consideration will be given both to the former owner and to the new possessor. To the former in order that he may not too soon be cut off from the possibility of pursuing after and finding his property, in view of which it is naturally just that usucapion should not be concluded so quickly between persons absent as present. To the possessor in order that he may not receive an undeserved loss if 446 the thing is taken from him at a time when he is no longer able to look after his interests by a suit against the vendor of the thing, or when it has become, as it were, a cornerstone of his fortune. And so, since movables pass by sale to others more frequently than immovables, and it is much more difficult to find the original purveyors of the former than of the latter, it is reasonable that a longer period should be allowed for recovering immovables than for recovering movables; especially since the latter are more quickly worn out than the former. For it would be of little use to the former owner to recover his property after so long a time, when it had been worn out and ruined.

¹ [For domo read demo.—Tr.]

And although a man may have secured his title to a thing at a good bargain, it is still a hardship and cause for complaint, after so long a time to have a thing torn away which has, as it were, long since become an integral part of his estate. Especially since it is believed that a man will feel little annoyance if he is forced for all time to do without a thing which he has cheerfully done without for a large part of his life, during which he has been able to look out for himself satisfactorily enough by other means. To this can be applied the statement of Cicero, On Duties, Bk. II [xxii]: 'What justice is it that lands which have been pre-occupied for many years [. . .] he who was possessed of none should get, but he who was in possession should lose?' (E.) See ibidem a rather long passage discussing the action of Aratus of Sicyon.

And so in view of all these considerations it is easy for an honest man to find in particular cases a length of time for usucapion which is agreeable to natural equity. Although it is better in states, in order to lessen the intricacies of disputes, to set beforehand fixed and decisive universal limits for usucapion in accordance with the state of affairs. It seems to us, therefore, that according as usucapion derives from points of time designated by civil laws, it is a kind of appendix and consequent of the dominion of things; and so, when dominions of things were introduced, it also seemed best for the sake of peace, that whoever possessed something in his own name, neither by force, nor stealth, nor precariously, was presumed to be its owner, until¹ some one else proved the contrary, while a man who had in good faith kept possession of something for an extended length of time, during the whole of which no man, at all regardful of his property, is expected to neglect it, is surely able to repulse the belated petitioner because he did not undertake sooner to claim what was his.²

10. On these principles, and the understanding that the reason for usucapion does not lie entirely in the dereliction of the former owner, it is easier to solve the rather intricate question, whether, and in what manner, children still unborn can lose their right by the tacit dereliction of their parents and ancestors. This problem can be understood in two ways, as it concerns usucapion that was either completed before they were born, or that had begun only during the lifetime of the father and was not yet completed upon his death. If we take the negative side in the first case, the difficulty arises, that, on this score, there is no advantage to the tranquillity of empires and dominions, since the larger part of all property is such as can be transferred to posterity, and so it would serve no end to repel the father, if the son could renew the suit. Yet if we answer it in the affirmative, it will appear strange how silence and negligence can injure those who were unable to speak or institute an action, who, indeed, were not yet in existence; or how the deed of some people can become a damage to others.

¹ [For quo ad read quoad.—Tr.]

² [For citus read citius.—Tr.]

This problem¹ Grotius, loc. cit., § 10, solved as follows: There are no accidents of a thing not existing, and he who is not yet a part of the world has no right, and so nothing can be said to be taken from him. M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. I, cont. vi [3]: 'As long as we are not,² nature governs us, and sends us into any fortune she pleases; it is only when³ we are our own masters that any one has a right to pass judgment upon us.' Now by him who is not yet a part of the world we understand one who has not yet been conceived, not one who is still in the womb; for this latter is treated in many matters of law as a 447 member of society. See Digest, XXXVII. ix. 7 pr.; XXXVIII. xvi. 7; L. xvi. 231. A further consideration is that the property of parents commences to belong to their children only when the parents keep possession of it up to the time when it should pass to their children.

This may be a little further elaborated. No right can be acquired for a person not yet existing except mediately through another person already existing, from whom it will be derived to him yet to be born, yet in such a way that the right has no effect in relation to the one who is yet to be born, unless he is born afterwards. And this happens when something is acquired or passed on to a person, to be held⁴ in such a manner of possession that he may pass it on to his successors as well. Yet here a distinction is observable: Some things are conferred upon a person in such a way that it is of no interest to the one conferring them whether they can pass on to his descendants or not, although so far as he is concerned the person on whom something is conferred has the faculty to transmit it to his successors. Yet some things are conferred in such a way that the person conferring retains for himself a certain right over the manner of possession determined by himself, so that it cannot be changed without his consent. Now no matter in which of these ways a thing is held by a person antecedent to one yet unborn, to be passed on to the latter, if it is destroyed or alienated in any⁵ way before the successor is born, the latter suffers no injury whatsoever, unless some claim to it is left him after the manner of an inheritance. For since in the former case the thing itself, as well as the manner in which he is to hold it, are entirely in the hands of the possessor, even though he alienate it, or in whatsoever way it becomes no longer his, all of his right in it is at once extinguished, and so it cannot be passed on to one not yet born, who can advance no right to such property of his predecessors except what is actually turned over by them to him while alive and from hand to hand, as it were. See Digest, I. ix. 7, § 1. But

¹ [For nondum read nodum.—Tr.]

² [The text is highly uncertain.—Tr.]

³ [Reading tunc for hinc, which has no MS. authority.—Tr.]

⁴ [For optinendum read obtinendum.—Tr.]

⁵ [For quoconque read quocumque.—Tr.]

since in the latter case the person who bestows a thing upon another still has power over the manner of his holding it, the possessor certainly does nothing to the prejudice of his successors, if he alienates the thing or allows it to go as derelict, no matter in what way it was lost to him, unless the giver show his consent.

Although all this be as stated, Pisistratus thought otherwise, as appears from a letter of his to Solon, in Diogenes Laertius, Solon [I. 53], in which among other things he says:

I am not the only one of the Greeks who has seized the sovereignty of his country, nor am I one who had no right whatever to do so, since I am of the race of Codrus; for I have only recovered¹ what the Athenians swore that they would give to Codrus and all his family, and what they afterwards deprived them of. (Y.)

The question in the latter sense is denied by the Roman Jurisconsults, because, as they say, in the course of usucapion the time does not run on, but is checked during years of minority, and only on their completion commences again to run. But I should feel that cases can occur when the favour of possession would outweigh that of age, for instance, if I should lack but one or two months to complete my usucapion, and it were morally certain that the former owner would not question² my claim to it within that period, and yet he should happen to die, leaving an infant heir³ just born. In such a case it would be too hard for me to be removed by a protest from my possession of twenty-five years because of those two months. Especially if I can no longer secure from the owner damages, which⁴ could have been secured had the protest been made before the property passed to the heir. Surely in such a case an honest arbitrator, who recognized that considerations of equity in usucapion are not to be sought solely in the neglect⁵ of the former owner, will decide for me rather than for the other. Nor does it seem so hard that a right which in the lifetime of the father was drawing, as it were, its last breath, should finally perish in the minority of his son, especially since it is far more grievous to men to yield up a thing long possessed⁶ than to be cut off from what had not yet been secured.

II. It appears from these considerations, that they also who make 448 use of the mere law of nature and nations, can oppose to each other a possession which is of long standing, uninterrupted, and secured upon good faith, and this all the more as public possessions are distracted by more serious turmoils than private. Although it must be confessed, that it is often not so necessary in public disputes to have recourse to usucapion, since the right of the possessor is often able, or at least should be able, to be drawn from other considerations much more firm. And already Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 2, has observed: 'Those men frequently use a shorthand expression who in this matter of usucapion

¹ [For vendico read vindico.—Tr.]

³ [For herede read haerede.—Tr.]

⁵ [For negligntia read negligentia.—Tr.]

² [For litum read litum.—Tr.]

⁴ [For que read quae.—Tr.]

⁶ [For postesta read possessa.—Tr.]

specify merely the time. For there must be understood those elements which are combined with time, as for example, quitting the thing, the intention of quitting it, or tokens of the act of renouncing ownership. And since the plea of time is something that all are familiar with and is extremely plausible (as if, that is, a lapse of time supports the pleader who alleges other proofs), it is one of the devices of public pleading to urge this point in a non-technical fashion,¹ and to make frequent mention of time in a general way, purposely avoiding all explanations and additions which might be able to give some strength to a consideration which in itself is without effect; and instead of them to pile up examples of men who argue without discrimination, so as to give colour and fulness to the plea.' In Tacitus, Annals, Bk. VI [xxx. 3 and 4], it is called 'vainglory' for Artabanus to 'lay claim to territories formerly belonging to the Persians and Macedonians'. The same thing, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XVII, chap. v, was done by Sapor at a much later time, who was met with the following reply by Constantius, who opposed like with like: 'It was strange that he should forget how the Persians had become the servants of the Macedonians, and now that these latter had been conquered by the Romans, the slaves of the Macedonians had become subject to Rome.' Zonaras, Bk. III [XIII. ix]. See also Herodian, Bk. VI, chaps. ii, iv.

So also Suleiman often used to say that the sovereignty of Rome and the entire Occident belonged to him, because he was the legitimate successor of the Emperor Constantine, who made the capital of the empire Byzantium.

Yet in the most outstanding examples you may see in addition to length of possession a further title asserted capable of producing dominion. See Judges, xi. 15 ff. Thus, Isocrates, under the person of Archidamus, shows in the first place that the Lacedaemonians got control over Messene² by a just war. Then the length of their possession is called in as a subsidiary argument [26]: 'Further, you cannot be unaware that possessions, both public and private, if a long time has elapsed, are considered by all to be confirmed and hereditary.' (F.) He adds that when there had been a good opportunity to do so previously, no controversy was raised against him about Messene. Add Alberico Gentili, De Jure Belli, Bk. I, chap. xxii. And, indeed, in this kind of causes a great presumption for the right of the possessor is found in the fact that during so long a time it never occurred to any one to claim any right to that thing. For transactions of this kind are usually of such great importance, and are conducted in such a clear light, that if any right of a third party is concerned in the affair, it can neither long escape him, nor can he lack an opportunity to protect his right, at least by a protestation.

¹ [For Minirua read Minerva.—Tr.]

² [For Mestene read Messene.—Tr.]

Therefore, there can occur only very rare cases when dominion shall not finally have to follow upon usucapion, if a people has secured anything¹ by peaceful title. In the case of things acquired by war there is scarcely any need of recourse to usucapion, for so long as a state of war continues, the possession of all those things which have been taken from the enemy, rests only upon force, while one has always the right of using every means to recover one's losses, at least in case one is ready to give satisfaction when one's cause is unjust. And so, even if the war may continue more than fifty years, any man will be able, before the war is concluded by peace, to recover by force any place which he lost even at the outset of the conflict. In Livy, Bk. XXXIV, chap. lxii, the 449 Numidians in asserting against the Carthaginians usucapion to land near Emporia, use the following argument: 'As occasions offered, sometimes they, sometimes the kings of Numidia, had held the dominion of it; and the possession of it had always been held by the party which had the greatest armed force.' (E.)

Upon the conclusion of peace it is easy to observe what is left to each party, for whatever the enemy gives up is at once fully acquired, and there is no need to wait upon the time required for usucapion. If a third party lays claim to the same thing, he will signify it early, and, if it is at all possible, at the time when the treaties are being drawn up. For afterwards warriors will not easily restore what they have won in battle to those who remained passive and looked on. See Grotius, Bk. III, chap. vi, § 7.

¹ [For quam piam read quampiam.—Tr.]

CHAPTER XIII

ON THE OBLIGATIONS WHICH ARISE ON THEIR OWN ACCOUNT FROM DOMINION OF THINGS

- | | |
|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Every man is required to refrain from another's things. 2. Another man's things in our possession must be returned. 3. Proof of the foregoing. 4. Illustrations of it. 5. This obligation makes all subsequent contracts about such property void. 6. Any profit made from what belongs to another should be returned to him. 7. A possessor in good faith is not obligated to make restitution of a thing that has perished; 8. But he is obligated to restore any of its fruits still existing; 9. And their value if consumed, provided he would have had to consume the same amount anyway; | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 10. But not such as he neglected to use. 11. He is not obligated who has given away a thing given him; together with a distinction; 12. Nor if he has sold a thing bought; likewise together with a distinction. 13. How far he who has purchased in good faith another's property can recover what he paid. 14. Whether another's property, when purchased, may be restored to the vendor. 15. Can he who has something belonging to another and does not know its owner rightfully retain it? 16. Or should he restore what is given with a bad motive? |
|--|---|

Now that we have inquired into the origin and nature of dominion, and into the ways in which it is constituted, our next task is to consider the obligations which immediately and on their own account come to men upon the introduction of dominion over things. The first of these is that every man is obligated to allow every other, provided he is not at war with him, to dispose of his things and to enjoy them in peace, and cannot by force or deceit destroy, divert, or take them to himself. Hence it is clear that thievery, rapine, moving of boundary stones, and similar crimes are forbidden by the very law of nature. Euripides, Helena [903 ff.]:

For God abhorreth violence, bidding all
Not by the spoiler's rapine get them gain.
Away with wealth—the wealth amassed by wrong!
For common to all mortals is heaven's air,
And earth, whereon men ought to store their homes,
Nor keep nor wrest by violence others' goods. (W.)

2. In the next place, when another's thing comes into a man's 450 hands without any fault of his (and under ¹ the head of things falls in this connexion also a right over persons, such as that of an owner over a slave, in so far as it can be of use to us), the further point must be settled, as to whether or not that thing be still in existence. Regarding matters in existence, the obligation arises, that he who has a thing of ours in his power is obligated to make every possible effort to return it again into our power. This obligation, however, actually exerts its force only when the possessor is aware that the thing is ours. We say 'every possible effort', because he is not obligated when it is impossible for him to restore it. But he is not obliged to restore it at his own expense, and if he is put to any expense on that score, he can rightfully demand it of the owner, or else keep the article until it is paid him. And it is also enough for him to have given notice that another's belonging is with him, and that there will be no hindrance on his part to the owner's taking what is his. See Digest, XI. iv. 1, § 3, it being understood always that what is said concerns a possessor in good faith, for the obligation of a possessor in bad faith is treated in another place. And these considerations obtain so far that the Roman laws say that εὑρηρα [lost articles] are not properly claimed except upon a pact (see Digest, XLVII. ii. 43, § 9; XIX. v. 15; XII. v. 4, § 14), affirming also that he who picks up something of another's, to make a profit therefrom, is guilty of theft, whether or not he knows to whom it belongs (Digest, XLVII. ii. 43, §§ 4 ff.). Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. IV, chap. viii [29]: 'If any one find gold or silver on the road, let him inquire after him that lost it, and make proclamation of the place where he found it, and then restore it to him again, as not thinking it right to make his own profit by the loss of another.' (W.) But if I happen upon something by a just title and in good faith, I am not obligated myself to call my right into question and make a public announcement that such a thing is in my possession, in order that, if it happen to have belonged to another, he can claim it. For when the manner in which we secured possession contains nothing that carries taint or suspicion,¹ my good faith makes me free from every crime which can arise out of the detention of another's property.

¹ [For sub read (sub.—Tr.)]

This further restriction is understood: Provided the former owner has a probable reason to recover the thing. This we add so that the present obligation may not destroy the law of usucapion. Compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. x.

3. It is sufficiently clear that this obligation results from dominion itself. For since it may happen from a number of causes that a man will lose possession of a thing of his, our hold upon possessions, and especially movables, would be a slippery one indeed, if they could be hidden or restrained by the person into whose hands they had happened to stray. And all the more if he could openly retain such a thing, and repel him who wished to establish his claim to them. For just as it is a law in a state of community of things, that one person can enjoy the things which are held in common no more than another, so upon the introduction of proprietorship in things, when all the rest renounced, as it were, their right to things which had been assigned another, owners are understood to have agreed that whoever had in his power something belonging to another, should, upon his recognizing it as another's, cause its return to the owner. For the strength of dominion would be too feeble, and the safeguarding of things too replete with expenses and anxiety, if a thing did not have to be returned when the owner sought it, for he often could not be certain where his property had gone.

¹ [For vitosi, vitosi bona read vitosi, bona.—Tr.]

Now in order that a man shall be obligated to return a thing upon its being claimed by its owner, it makes no difference whether he secured possession of it in good or in bad faith. For this obligation of restitution does not arise from any fault or act of ours, or from any special pact entered into with the claimant, or owner of the thing, but from the thing itself, or rather a universal pact, which is understood to accompany the dominion of things. Therefore, whoever has secured a thing in good faith is simply obligated to the mere return of it, but whoever did so in bad faith, in addition to being bound to restore it, has also involved himself in a crime, on the score of which he is liable to 451 punishment. But good faith ceases,¹ so far at least as a man's conscience is concerned, when he is cognizant that the thing belongs to another. See Digest, V. iii. 25, § 3; XVI. iii. 1, § 47; XVI. iii. 2, 3, 4. Yet the good faith present at the very first, and the just title, make a man safe, at least from punishment by his fellows.

4. These principles are confirmed as well as illustrated by the divine law itself in Deuteronomy, xxii. 1-3; add Digest, XLVII. ii. 43, §§ 4 ff. And that² no one may believe that this duty is owed to friendship alone, it is expressly stated in Exodus, xxii. 4, that it should also be performed in the case of things belonging to our enemy. This law Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. IV [viii], explains as follows:

If any one find gold or silver on the road, let him inquire after him that lost it, and make proclamation of the place where he found it, and then restore it to him again, as not thinking it right to make his own profit by the loss of another. And the same rule is to be observed in cattle found to have wandered away into a lonely place. If the owner be not presently discovered, let him that is the finder keep it with himself, and appeal to God that he has not purloined what belongs to another. (W.)

Yet the great hatred of the Jewish race toward all other peoples, afterwards converted this natural law into a civil one, and ruled that it should be observed only toward people of their own race. See Selden, Bk. VI, chap. iv, and the notes of Grotius on the same passage, § 1. Add Polybius, Bk. VI, chap. xxxi pr.

A noteworthy example is that of the Emperor Theophilus, who, as he was once riding along upon a horse, was met by a woman who cried out that the horse belonged to her, and when he found out that Eparchus had taken the horse by extortion and presented it to the emperor as his own, he at once restored it to the woman. And because the emperor had no other horses at hand he finished his ride with the first one that he happened to find. Hence came the custom, according to Curopalates, De Officialibus [Palatii] Constantinopolitani [v, p. 61 c], and Cedrenus [p. 424 ed. Xylander], that several horses always are taken along with the emperor on his rides, so that if a similar thing should happen again there would be some for him to ride on.

¹ [For Definit read Desinit.—Tr.]

² [For Acne read Ac ne.—Tr.]

The instance of the Spartans condemning Phoebidas for occupying the Cadmea, and yet retaining the citadel, as given by Plutarch and Nepos in their lives of Pelopidas, does not properly square with the point before us. For the possessors themselves were in bad faith and so by another principle were bound to make restitution. Nor are we concerned with the example of M. Crassus and Q. Hortensius as given in Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xviii]:

Some persons brought from Greece to Rome a forged will of Lucius Minucius Basilus, a rich man. That they might the more easily obtain their object, they put down as legatees along with themselves, Marcus Crassus and Quintus Hortensius, the most powerful men of that day; who, though they suspected that it was a forgery, but were conscious of no crime themselves, did not reject the paltry gift of other men's villainy. What then? Was this enough, that they should not be thought to have been culpable? To me, indeed, it seems otherwise. For he who does not keep off an injury, nor repel it if he can from another, acts unjustly. (E.)

For they shared as much in the crime of forgery as do receivers of stolen goods, since they were aware that they had been written in as heirs merely in order that they by their influence might make safe the forgers.

From the same fount of injustice can be shown to flow the custom which awards the property from shipwrecks to the imperial treasury. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 1, and the comments of Boecler; Jacques Godefroy, De Imperio Maris, chap. xi; Ioannes Loccenius, De Jure Maritimo, Bk. I, chap. vii, § 9; Bodin, On the Republic, I. x; Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. XVI; and others. For the same reason one concludes it to be highly absurd that in some countries stolen property, when recovered, is not restored to its owner, but claimed for the state. See Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus, I. iv. 4, on Digest XLVII.

5. Now since this obligation to restore another's property arises from a universal convention among men, it thereupon follows that special agreements concerned with a thing taken in some way or other from its true owner, are therefore subject to an exception; and so if the thing is known to belong to another, agreements are void which are concerned with the transfer of that thing to a third party. This is the basis of that famous saying of Diogenes the Cynic, as given by Diogenes 452 Laertius, Bk. VI [54], when he remarked upon two thieves, one of whom had despoiled the other, 'One of them has committed theft, yet the other has lost nothing'. Nor is this reasoning opposed by Digest, IV. ix. 1, § 7, which is advanced by Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 1, to show that a subsequent contract does not always admit of an exception because of dominion. For in the case referred to it is of greater interest to the creditor, that the pledge be safe, than to the debtor, its owner, while the debtor cannot claim his pledge until he has paid the debt. An excellent instance of that position is to be found in Digest, XVI. iii. 31, § 1.

But the statement of Tryphoninus, at the beginning of the same passage, is not satisfactory to us:

A man accused of capital crime has deposited with you one hundred units of value; he is afterwards deported and his property confiscated. The question is, whether the hundred units are to be returned to the man who deposited them or to be turned into the public treasury. Now if we regard only the law of nature and nations, they are to be returned to the man who deposited them; but if we regard the civil code and the method of positive law, they ought rather to be turned into the public treasury. For he who has deserved ill of the state, ought also to struggle with poverty, that by this example he may deter¹ others from wrongdoing.

But since by the law of nations as well sovereigns are accorded such a power that they can punish criminals in their property, therefore, when such a penalty is duly meted out to a malefactor, it is agreeable also with the law of nature, that all the property of the condemned person pass to the public treasury. Yet it is due to positive law that the penalty of confiscation of property is established for this particular crime. And a consideration of the advantage that will follow a penalty, made for the approval of that penal sanction, yet not properly for the approval of the preference accorded the treasury, before the condemned person, in taking back the deposit. For by the sentence of the court dominion over his property was taken from the condemned person and assigned to the treasury, and therefore deposits once made by him will have to be returned not to him but to the treasury.

Now all dominion, whether it arises from civil law or the law of nations, has this effect among others, that every possessor is obligated to restore the thing so held to him who is its present owner. What exception the law on the restoration of a deposit otherwise allows because of certain circumstances, is set forth in many writers. See Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxv]; Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. x; Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. I, last chapter. To the last reference should be added the account given by Polybius, in Excerpta Peiresciana [XXXIII. xii], of how King Ariarathes of Cappadocia, upon recovering his kingdom from Orophernes, demanded of the citizens of Priene the forty talents which his foe had deposited with them, and when they kept the sum for Orophernes, he fell upon them with fire and sword,

¹ [For addeterrenda read ad deterrenda.—Tr.]

'unjustly', in the opinion of Polybius. Yet the deed of Ariarathes can be defended, if it is understood that he was unjustly expelled from his kingdom by Orophernes.

The Roman Jurisconsults base a number of other rules upon this obligation to restore what belongs to another. See Digest, XXV. ii. 25; XLVII. ii. 43, § 4. On the same ground also rests a man's right to lay formal claim to a thing, and other actions like it; also in a certain sense the formal claim for restitution of a debt, both that for some reason which has not been fulfilled, and that for no reason. Although these last are said to depend also upon a kind of contract. For when a thing has not been given for the mere sake of giving, it is understood to have been given and received on the condition that it be restored when the reason for the gift is not at hand.

What is said on the restoration of a thing should also be extended to the fruits of the same so far as they are still in existence, with the understanding, however, that all expenses are withheld which were met either in their production, collection, or preservation.

6. Regarding things belonging to another which were acquired and consumed in good faith, it seems most agreeable with natural equity, that he who consumed them should not return to the owner their entire value, but only so much of it as he used to increase his wealth, provided the owner has not been recompensed for them in some other way. For suppose a thing of yours has been stolen, which I acquired and consumed in good faith, but you have already received its value from the thief; you will not be able to claim anything of me, although I¹ am the richer therefrom. The reason for this statement is not so much the fact that dominions are introduced to maintain such an equality, so that each one may have what is his, while in so far as another profits from what is mine, he has more while I have less; as that a thing, dominion over which I have lost neither by my consent nor by my misdeed or right of war, still belongs to me, as does also whatever comes of it. Therefore, when it has fallen into the hands of another, and he has profited by its consumption, his good faith, of course, renders him justly immune in person, yet he can on no excuse retain the profit which he has made, when I demand it, since that is a part, as it were, or the fruit still remaining, of a thing that belongs to me. Therefore, nothing is more common than the saying that no one should profit by another's loss, that is, by such a loss as he caused neither by his own consent nor his own fault, so that he is not the cause of the other's loss, that is, the loss cannot be imputed to him; for it is not forbidden me to find an opportunity for some gain from another's loss, when I myself had no part in it. See Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xxi. Cicero, On Duties,² Bk. III [v]: 'It is contrary to nature to advance one's own interests by the disadvantage of another man' (E.), which is drawn from Terence, Andria, Act IV, sc. i [625-8]: 'Is it credible, is it conceivable, that any man should be so black-hearted¹ as to gloat over misfortunes and buy his own happiness at the cost of another's misery?' (S.) Add Digest, L. xvii. 206; V. iii. 22. So also all through the Roman law many things, which did not otherwise square so exactly with the exact demands of the law, are settled on the equity of this principle. See Digest, XIV. iii. 10, 17, § 4; XVI. i. 7 (yet add Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 2); Digest, XXIV. i. 55; XIX. i. 30; XIII. vi. 3 pr.; XX. v. 12, § 1; XII. i. 32. On the same principle seems to be based also the action termed de in rem verso.

¹ [For ego read ego.—Tr.]

² [For Cic. Off. read Cic. Off.—Tr.]

7. On these rules depends the decision of many questions which are so often raised by lawyers and moralists, and which it seems as well to take from the passage of Grotius mentioned above. I. [Grotius, II. x. 3]: A possessor in good faith (only with such are we concerned, since a possessor in bad faith is obligated not only by reason of the thing, but because of his own act), so long as he remains such (compare Ziegler on this passage of Grotius), does not have to make restitution if the thing has perished. In such a case the thing itself is not in his possession, and he has not received gain from it. See Digest, V. iii. 40; VI. i. 12, 13. I add that he is not bound, even though the thing perish by his own fault, for his good faith was for him the equivalent of dominion. Now if a thing has perished by the fault of its owner, it is enough loss for him to be deprived of it, and he is no further obligated on that account. But a different reply must be made, if, when he found out that a thing belonged to another, he wilfully lost it, in order that he might not be forced to restore it.

8. II. [Grotius I. x. 4]: A possessor in good faith is bound to restore not only the thing, but also any income of the property that still remains. For the person who is the owner of a thing is likewise naturally the owner of the income derived from it. Add Digest, VI. i. 20, 50. Yet they distinguish between the fruits of the thing itself, and the fruits of a man's labour. Grotius, indeed, feels that only the fruits of the thing itself should be restored, and not the fruits of a man's labour, because, although they are not possible without the thing, they are still not caused by it. Yet others hold that the fruits still remaining of the labour should be restored, citing in their favour, Code, III. xxxii. 22. This opinion appears to come closer to humanity, provided it is added that the possessor in good faith can withhold all expenses incurred on the thing, as well as the value of his labour (see Digest, V. iii. 36, § 5; V. iii. 38, 39; VI. i. 27, § 4; VI. i. 31, 48, 65); and that, if the way is not² to be opened for troublesome disputes, the owner in claiming what is 454 his own should not sweep up every grain of dust with his profit. If this is observed there will rarely arise a case when the possessor in good faith will have much to restore from the fruits of his labour.

¹ [For vecordiani nata read vecordi innata.—Tr.]

² [For de read ne.—Tr.]

9. III. [Grotius, II. x. 5]: The possessor in good faith is bound to make restitution for the property and its income that have been used up, provided that he would have used just as much under other conditions. See Digest, V. iii. 25, §§ 8, 9; VI. i. 52. For he is judged to be so much the richer as he saved his own possessions by using another's. Add Digest, XLVI. iii. 47, § 1. But in such a case I should judge, that, in addition to the limitations added to this definition, consideration should also be given to the question as to whether the possessor in good faith can recover as much as¹ he now loses, when the thing passes from him, of the one from whom he received it with a faulty title. For if this is impossible the possessor in good faith is no longer richer after restoring another's thing for which he cannot recover the purchase price from the vendor. Regarding the example of Caligula as it is taken from Suetonius, Caligula, chap. xvi: 'Whenever he restored kings to their thrones, he allowed them all the arrears of their taxes and their revenues for the meantime' (R.), it can be observed that he concluded that they had been unjustly deprived of their kingdoms, and so he was the heir of a possessor in bad faith. Or if he did not condemn the act of his predecessor, it is still open to question whether he restored those fruits of the intermediate period out of pure generosity, or because of an actual obligation. Therefore, I should consider it a truer judgement to hold that a possessor in good faith is not obligated to restore the value of the thing consumed, if his claim for compensation cannot be met by the one who turned over to him another's property. For thus he cannot be judged to have been made richer, while it seems more severe to restore the value of a thing consumed than the thing itself, so long as it is still existing.

10. IV. A possessor in good faith is not liable for fruits which he neglected to collect; because he neither has the thing, nor anything in its place. And a man's neglect of his own property, or what is practically his own, is held to be enough punishment. See Digest, VI. i. 78.

11. V. If a possessor in good faith has given another a thing which was given to himself, he is not liable for it, unless he would have given the same amount in any case, if he had not had this; for in that case the sparing of his own property will be considered as a gain. This statement appears to presuppose a distinction between donations arising from some duty and out of pure generosity, so that only the former must be accounted for but not the latter. Because it is regularly presumed that no man gives unless he has in abundance, and so the motive for his giving is held to have come from a consideration of that thing belonging to another as something more than he needed. But that obligation which arises in the recipient because of gifts and kindnesses is by no means included among such things as can be reckoned at a set value, and so he who expects avridapa [counter-gifts] from another seems by no means the richer for that hope. See Digest, V. iii. 25, § 8; compare Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 7.

¹ [For good read quod.—Tr.]

But it is to be considered further, whether or not the gift still exists in the hands of the recipient. If it does, the owner shall claim it of the holder without bothering the intermediary in the case. If it does not, the obligation will be upon him who either possesses it or is made the richer by it. An intermediary, however, shall come in for a share of it only in so far as he is perhaps the richer for the transaction. Add Struvius, Exercitationes, Bk. XI, § 13.

12. VI. If a possessor in good faith has in any way alienated another's property, which he had bought, he will not be bound to make restitution, except in so far as he may have sold it at a profit. But if he has sold something which cost him nothing, he shall then have to give up the price he received, in case the owner cannot recover the thing itself from its present possessor, unless he may, in view of his good fortune, have squandered the amount which he would not otherwise have wasted. But he who has received for a thing only so much as he gave,
455 makes no profit, since he is considered to have recovered only what was his. Nor can it be said in such a case that the price took the place of the thing, unless it happen that a man parted with his possession out of evil design. In case this is not so, the thing must be reclaimed from the last possessor.

Appeal is made to Digest, XLVII. ii. 48, § 7:

If the rightful owner forces a thief to give up the money which he has received for the sale of something that he has stolen, it appears that the owner has stolen money, and is held under the law to an action for stolen property. For there is no doubt but the sum which the theft brings in is not itself stolen.

But this law properly applies to states, for those who live in natural liberty may with equal right use force to recover either the thing stolen from them, or else its value.

13. VII. A possessor in good faith is obligated to restore another's property, even though he purchased it, nor can he require what he paid of the owner but only of him from whom he received it. For otherwise the right of challenge would amount to nothing, if the challenger had to return the price paid. And he who buys a thing of another, whose ownership he might have suspected, should have looked out for himself, with regard to whether the thing would be claimed, although that matter is otherwise naturally understood in every sale. Here also belong Digest, V. iii. 22, 25 pr., and § 1; XII. i. 23; Code, III. xxxii. 3 and 23; Digest, XVIII. i. 16; XXI. ii. 1; XIV. ii. 2, § 3; Code, VIII. xlv. 16; VI. ii. 2. But the exception is to be added: Except in so far as the owner of the thing was probably not able to recover his possession without some expense, for instance, should it be in the hands of pirates or robbers. For in such a case it will be possible to deduct as much as the owner would have been willing unconstrained to pay. For the very possession, especially when the recovery is attended with difficulties, is capable of being valued, and in this respect the owner, upon the recovery of the lost thing, is held to have been made richer. For this reason it very often happens that those who have lost something promise the finder μίσθνρον [a reward]. See Moschus, Idylls, i, which is imitated by Apuleius, Metamorphoses, Bk. VI [viii]. Therefore, according to the lawyer Paulus in Digest, XVIII. i. 34, § 4, even though the purchase of such a thing is disregarded in ordinary law, it is valid if it is agreed at the outset that the possession which is held by some one other than the owner may be purchased.

But will the man who buys a thing that he may return it to its owner, be permitted to demand a price from him? Some answer this in the negative, for the reason that the right belonging to an owner cannot be annulled by a profession of this sort. See Digest, L. xvii. 11. Yet if such a buyer foresaw it to be likely that the owner would have difficulty in recovering his property in any other way, and the price which he gave is not more than that at which the actual possession can be settled, it will surely have to be returned to him. But whether the purchaser is allowed an action against the owner for 'business transacted', is a point for the more subtle inquiry of the expositors of the Roman law. Grotius omits any answer to this question, for the reason that such an action arises from civil law, since it has none of the foundations from which nature produces an obligation. Yet although it is not the task of the law of nature to inquire and designate to what kind of action, as defined by the Roman law, the present case can or should be reduced, it cannot be denied that even the action of 'business transacted' has its foundation in natural equity and a tacit pact. For on no basis can a man demand that by my own labour of love I should preserve and improve another's property gratis, and receive no compensation for my labour. Add Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 9.

It would be the simplest way out, therefore, to understand that the thing which has been brought back, or on which labour and money have been spent, is a temporary pledge for the purchaser or any transactor of such business, which he may hold until the amount expended has been met. But if there remains no result of his labour for such a person to hold on to, and the other party disgracefully refuses to pay for that service, I should not feel that the former can use such means of asserting his right as are possible with something that grows out of contracts. The owner shall only be held up to detestation as ungrateful and unworthy of any kind of benefaction. See 1 Samuel, 456

xxv. 7, 15, 21, although in this passage David seems to have wished first of all to take vengeance for a verbal affront. Yet the Roman law has considered the equity of such restitution in similar cases as well. See Digest, XI. vii. 14, § 13; III. v. 6, § 3; XIV. ii. 1. And in general in a similar class of cases it is well to observe the remark of Terence, The Self-Tormentor, Act IV, sc. v [796]:

Strictest law, worst mischief. (S.)

14. VIII. According to the view of Grotius, the person who from one man has bought property belonging to another, cannot return it to the seller, in order to save the purchase price; for the obligation of restoring it to the owner commenced at the moment when the object came into his possession. But on this point we are of the opposite opinion. For surely I am not obligated to buy a thing which I know belongs to another, in order that the owner may recover it and I lose what I paid. Therefore, if I have found out that the article belongs to another, and am unwilling that it be claimed at my hands, either in order that I may avoid the inconvenience of a dispute, or because I have no hope of recovering its price, it would be my feeling that I may properly withdraw from the contract, so long as there is opportunity for me to do so, so that I may not be drawn into a dispute against my will; provided, however, that I am obligated to disclose to the owner, upon his request, where his property is, so that he can lay claim to it. See Digest, VI. i. 17 pr., and Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 10.

15. IX. The man who in good faith has in his possession property of unknown ownership, is not obligated by the law of nature to give it to the poor, although states might rightly establish this as a law. The reason is, because, by the institution of property, no one has a right over it save the owner. But the fact that there is none at present, and that no one ever puts in his appearance, is equivalent to the same thing with him who cannot find the owner. Therefore, in such a case, there will be no one to whom a thing of this sort better belongs than to the possessor in good faith.

16. X. The assertion of Grotius that what has been accepted for a base service, or for a worthy one, but such as a man should have performed gratis, need not be restored, we allow, provided the cause for restitution is solely to be sought in the dominion of things as such. For he to whom a thing passed with the consent of the former owner, cannot on this score be obligated to return it. But when a blemish lay in the very ground for accepting it, such as extortion, the obligation to restore it flows from another principle. Under extortion should be gathered methods, provided they are not violent, of cheating others out of their money, for example, if a judge refuses to administer justice unless his palms are first greased. See 1 Samuel, xii. 3-4, where it does not appear that Samuel wished to parade in any special way his sanctity, but that he called to witness that he had in no way transgressed the common duty of judges, and that for this reason he did not deserve, for any shortcoming of his own, to be removed from his office by the creation of a king. See above, Bk. III, chap. vii, § 9.

[457]
SAMUEL PUFENDORF
ON THE LAW OF NATURE AND NATIONS
BOOK V

CHAPTER I

ON PRICE

- | | |
|---|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. After dominion a measure of things had to be introduced. 2. What is the moral quantity of things? 3. How many kinds of price are there? 4. What is the basis of ordinary price? 5. The fact and reason why many useful things have no price. 6. Why do the prices of things rise? 7. On the price of fancy. 8. On legitimate price. 9. On common price. 10. Causes which raise or lower common price. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 11. Ordinary price did not suffice for human life. 12. Therefore an eminent price was set in money. 13. This usually consists of metals. 14. How far the directors of states can determine the value of money. 15. On this point consideration should also be taken of land. 16. The value of money is likewise subject to change. |
|---|---|
-

IN view of the fact that things subject to proprietorship differed in nature and did not afford the same service to human necessities, and because it also frequently happened that either the same things, whose parts were not in all respects alike, began to belong to several people, or that things of different nature had to be exchanged for each other, therefore, by the agreement of men some measure had to be set upon things, according to which measure things of different nature could be compared to and made equal with each other. Now since things are compared with each other and equalized on the basis of quantities, for equality is a coincidence of quantities, we shall, therefore, have to consider at this time the quantity of things and actions, in so far as they are of use in the life of men, the bases of quantity, and the common measure.

2. Now we observe that in common life things are called mutually equal, not only as they coincide in the three dimensions, but also in a certain other respect. For thus, honours, labours, and wages are called equal or unequal on another score than by virtue of the coincidence of their dimensions. Therefore, there must be some quantity, other than physical and mathematical, about which alone philosophers thus far seem to have concerned themselves. This will appear more clearly if we observe, that the formal basis of quantity taken universally, consists not in the extension of substance but in the fact that a value can be put upon it, that is, for this reason a measure is first put upon things, in so far as they can be estimated and as a consequence compared with each other, as to whether they are equal or unequal. But since things can be valued not only according to their physical substance, but also by virtue of a certain moral consideration, it follows that in addition to a physical quantity there is also a moral quantity, by which, of course, things are valued morally. Yet that physical quantity also makes for the value of things of the same nature and goodness, for example, a large diamond, everything else being equal, is more valuable than a small one, although it is not always true in regard to the value of things of a different kind or goodness. Thus, a large dog is not always more valuable than a smaller one, nor a large piece of lead more valuable than a smaller one of gold.

How persons are morally valued according to their standing, and their moral actions according to their power to produce merit and demerit, is treated in its proper place. At this time I must investigate only the moral quantity of things and actions, in so far as they are understood to serve some purpose in common life, and as they are compared with each other so that they may be able to serve the ends of commerce. This quantity of things and actions is called price, which is a moral quality or value of things and actions, as they enter into exchange, according to which they are usually compared with each other.

3. Price can be divided into ordinary and eminent. The former is found in things and actions or labours, which enter into exchange, in so far as they afford service and pleasure to men. The latter is found in money and whatever serves in its place, in so far as that is understood virtually to contain the prices of all things and labours, and to furnish a common standard for their measurement.

4. The correct understanding of the nature of ordinary price is markedly aided by considering as separate things, first, its foundation in itself, and then why the same rises or falls. The foundation of price in itself is the aptitude of a thing or action, by which it can either mediately or immediately contribute something to the necessity of human life, or to making it more advantageous and pleasant. This is the reason why in ordinary speech things of no use are said to be of no value, just as we also usually call men that are useless burdens upon the earth, persons of no value. So in the fable the cock regarded the pearl, which he had found, of no value, because it was of no use to him [Phaedrus, III. xii].

Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 14, says: 'The most natural measure of the value of each thing is the need of it.' If he means that the foundation of price in itself is want, or that a thing is valued by men merely because they need it, his statement will not hold true universally. For on this theory the price would be taken from things which serve idle pleasure, and yet the boundless luxury of mankind often bestows a price upon such. But we are said actually to need only things without the use of which we must suffer serious inconvenience. See Matthew, ix. 12. But if he means that the need of the purchaser makes for the raising of price, we confess that such is commonly the case, yet no one of discernment would grant that this is the natural measure of price, so that the more one is straitened by want, the higher the price that can be extorted from him. Nor does the passage from Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. viii, advanced by Grotius, suit his purpose. For that χρεία or need 'which, as it were, holds together all things' and supports them, is not the sole foundation of price, but of exchange or of commerce. For if men had need of nothing, or of another thing no more than what they have, there would be no commerce and no exchange, since each man would keep what was his own and enjoy that. For 459 Aristotle expressly says in the same passage: 'The fact that it is demand which is like a principle of unity binding society together, is evident because, if there is no mutual demand on the part of two persons, if neither of them or one only needs the services of the other, they do not effect an exchange.' (W.) The same point is illustrated by the same writer in his Politics, Bk. I, chap. vi (9): 'The art of exchange extends to all <possessions> and it arises at first in a natural manner from the circumstance that some have too little, others too much. For they were forced to use exchange until they had enough.' (J.)

5. Yet it is to be observed that there are some things concerned with the life of men, most useful as well, on which it is understood that no price has been set, either because they are and should be exempt from dominion, or because they are removed from man's use in commerce, or finally, because in business relations they are considered as nothing more than an appendage of another thing. Furthermore, since the law has placed many actions beyond the pale of commerce, it is likewise understood to have exempted them from all price or valuation. Thus, since the upper reaches of the air, the sky, the celestial bodies, and the open ocean are removed from human dominion, no one can properly put any price upon them, although they serve the greatest use for the life of man. Likewise, the Roman laws in excluding hallowed and sacred places from commerce, deprived them of any price, although many of them intrinsically have nothing that would prevent the fixing of a price. Thus, there is no price upon a free man's head, for it is a contradiction for a person to be free and also subject to barter, for so soon as any man is made an object of sale, he is no longer free. Therefore, it is also on this consideration that liberty is called a thing priceless, not alone for the reason that its advantages are so great that they seem to surpass all efforts at valuation.

In this connexion, however, we should note what is observed by Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [II. viii]:

In the case of those persons who have vowed not merely their own property or some part of it, but also their own selves, the law has affixed a price to their vows, not having a regard to their beauty, or their importance, or to anything of that kind, but with reference to the number of the individuals, separating the men from the women, and the infants from those who are full grown. For the law [Leviticus, xxvii. 3] ordains that from twenty years of age to sixty the price of a man shall be two hundred drachmas of solid silver money, and of a woman a hundred and twenty drachmas. And from five years of age to twenty, the price of a male child is eighty, and of a female child forty drachmas. And from infancy to five years old, the price of a male is twenty, of a female child, twelve drachmas. And in the case of men who have lived beyond sixty years of age, the ransom of the old men is sixty, and of the women forty drachmas. And the law has regulated this ransom with reference to the same age both in men and women, on account of three most important considerations. First of all, because the importance of their vow is equal and similar, whether it be made by a person of great or of little importance. Secondly, because it is fitting that those who have made a vow should not be exposed to the treatment of slaves; for they are valued at a high or at a low price, according to the good condition and beauty of their bodies, or the contrary. Thirdly, which, indeed, is the most important consideration of all, because inequality is valued among men, but equality is honoured by God. (Y.)¹

Many other things are also held to lack a price, in so far as they cannot be held separately, although they considerably increase the price of the thing to which they are accessory, just as their absence or deterioration reduce it not a little. Thus, no price can be set upon the warm light of the sun, pure and wholesome air, a beautiful landscape in so far as it only delights the eye, or upon wind, shade, and similar things in themselves or considered apart, since men cannot enjoy them without the use of the land; yet every one realizes how important such things are in influencing the price of districts, farms, and estates. Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XII, chap. i [6], says of the plane tree: 'It occupies even tributary soil; in return for which those nations have to pay a tax for the enjoyment of its shade.' (B. & R.) Thus in Belgium an annual tax is laid upon those who use windmills, on the ground that the wind belongs to the state. On which ground, we may observe, it is easy to give an answer to that dispute presented by Demosthenes before the judges, on the shadow of the ass. For he who hired the ass could not 460 prevent the owner from lying down where the shadow of the beast fell, although he could take away the shadow by moving the ass to another place.

Finally, whatever actions laws of God or of men either ordain to be performed freely, or forbid entirely, and so take them from the field of exchange, can obviously have no price put upon them by men, nor should they be performed for a remuneration. In this class are those holy acts which have had some supernatural effect assigned them by divine institution, such as remission of sins by priestly absolution, the bestowal of spiritual benefits by the performance of sacraments, and the like. If a man performs these for a price he is said to practise simony, while to measure such things in money is held an act of impiety and irreverence towards God. See Acts, viii. 20. Here also belong those who for money endow unworthy persons with holy offices, since such places should be bestowed freely upon the most worthy. Add Gratian,

¹ [Pufendorf's version differs in a number of small details from the original Greek.—Tr.]

Decretum, II. i. 1, 2, 3. Neither should rewards and recommendations for character and learning be given the unworthy for money, not merely because in this way such things are cheapened, but also because often such men for the sake of a high-sounding title are advanced to public offices, to the serious injury of the state. And surely it is a disgrace to the calling of letters that in some places men take such a freedom as the lawyer Fabius Benevoglientes illustrated in a jest. According to Ianus Nicias Erythraeus, Pinacotheca, Bk. II, chap. xxix, when he was on his way to make some nobody a Doctor, he happened to meet an ass along the way, which opened its mouth as if it were laughing. Turning upon it he said, 'Why do you laugh, you fool? We can induct you also into the number and rank of Doctors, if the money is forthcoming.' But of course, 'He who says, whenever he pleases, "Accept this", has a genius of his own.' (R.) Ovid, Art of Love, Bk. II [163].

The Chinese had different rules, on whose examinations and promotions see Neuhoof, Generalis Descriptio Sinae, chap. iii. A passage from Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XVI, chap. iv [7, 14], illustrates our point:

Our civic crown is the most glorious reward that can be bestowed on military valour, and, for this long time past, the emblem of the imperial clemency; since the time, in fact, when, after the impiety of civil war, it was first deemed a meritorious action not to shed the blood of a fellow-citizen. [. . .][14] Times these, right worthy of our everlasting admiration, which accorded honour alone as the reward of exploits so mighty, which, while other crowns were recommended as being made of gold, disdained to set a price upon the safety of a citizen, and loudly proclaimed thereby that it is unrighteous to save the life of a man for motives of lucre. (B. & R.)

Thus a judge cannot rightfully dispense for a price the justice which he should administer freely. Ovid, Amores, Bk. I, el. x [37 ff.]:

'It is not honour for witnesses to make false oaths for gain, nor for the chosen juror's purse to lie open for the bribe. 'Tis base to defend the wretched culprit with purchased eloquence; the court that makes great gains is base; 'tis base to swell a patrimony with a revenue from love, and to offer one's own beauty for a price.' (S.)

Plutarch, Romulus [xiii. 6], in discussing the duty of patrons towards clients, adds: 'The taking of money by those of high degree from the more lowly was held to be disgraceful and ungenerous.' (P.) From this source came later the Cincian law. Seneca, Hercules Raging [172 f.]:

The noisy mart
Still others claim, who meanly deal
In quarrelsome suits, and profit make
Of wrath and empty words. (M.)

Compare Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. XII, chap. ix. Thus, the Roman laws hold it unworthy to measure philosophy and the wisdom required for civil life by setting a price upon them. See Digest, L. xiii. 1, §§ 4, 5, and the remarks thereon by Grotius, Florum Sparsio. Add Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. XII, chap. vii [8], where, in discussing whether a price should be put upon eloquence, he says among other things: 'Many things seem worthless in the eyes of the world, for no other reason than that they can be purchased.' (W.) So it is not right for an assassin or poisoner to hire out his services at a price for the murder of a man, as a scholar should not sell his pen and learning to spread abroad lies to the injury of others, nor an honest man his reputation in undertaking to aid unjust actions or to subvert just ones by false witness, and others of the same stamp.

6. There are various reasons why the price of one and the same 461 thing rises or falls, and why, therefore, one thing is preferred to another, although the latter apparently affords as much or greater service in the life of men. For here the need of the article, or the distinction of its use, does not always form the first consideration, and so we observe that those things are the cheapest which men are least able to do without, and this for the reason that by a special provision of God nature bestows them in great abundance. Vitruvius, De Architectura, Bk. VIII, Preface [iii]:

Whatever is necessary for mankind the divine providence has not made difficult and expensive, like pearls, gold, silver, and other things, which neither our body nor our nature requires; but those things which the life of mortals cannot safely do without, providence has scattered abroad ready to hand all over the world.

Therefore, the chief factor in high price is scarcity, the maintenance of which is considered by some to be one of the secrets of business. Strabo, Bk. XVII [i. 15], writes of the Egyptians: 'They do not permit the papyrus plant to grow in many places; they thus raise the price because of scarcity and increase their own revenues, but interfere with the extensive use of the product.' As also the Dutch destroy the clove and nutmeg plants in many sections of India in order to prevent an over-supply of those spices. Furthermore, scarcity is not a little increased when things are imported from far distant places. Plato, Euthydemus [p. 304 B]: 'Only what is rare is valuable, and water, which is the best of all things [. . .] is also the cheapest.' (J.) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhoneiae, Bk. I, chap. xiv [143]:

Things that are scarce are regarded as valuable, but those which grow amongst us and are easily secured, not at all. Now if we imagine water as scarce, how much more valuable would it appear than all the things now regarded as valuable? Or, if we picture to ourselves great quantities of gold simply scattered around on the ground like stones, who, may we suppose, would regard it as valuable and lock it up under such circumstances?

Mamertinus, Panegyric of Julian [xi. 3]: 'The most valued banquets have their worth estimated not by the way they taste, but by the difficulties overcome.' Add the account of Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VII, chap. xii, of two boys who bore a great resemblance to one another, one born in Asia, the other in Gaul, upon whom a slave-dealer set a perfectly outrageous price, while a certain Antony held nothing in his entire possessions of greater value than were they. For the ambition of men especially values what they have in common with but a few others, while on the other hand whatever is seen in almost any one's house, is of little worth in their eyes. Nay, men are often so perverted that a thing is rated highly because its use has been forbidden, the mere proscription serving to whet their curiosity. And so Lucian, Nigrinus [xxx], rightfully ridicules those 'Who glut themselves with roses in midwinter, loving their rarity and unseasonableness, and despising what is seasonable and natural because of its cheapness'. (H.)

So also in general men scarcely ever consider a thing valuable which does not yield to the holder some distinction and position above that held by the rest of men, and by reason of which they cannot vaunt themselves above others. This is the reason why honours are especially valued because of their scarcity. See Cornelius Nepos, Miltiades, chap. vi; Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xxxix]:

Rewards for virtue and eminent services ought to be considered serious and holy things, and they ought not to be conferred on worthless men, or to be made common by being bestowed on men of no particular eminence. [...] for those things which are scarce and difficult of attainment appear honourable and acceptable to men. (Y.*)

Although it is in fact due to the depravity and corruption of human nature that possessions of intrinsic worth are valued by their scarcity or the number of possessors, since my possession of a thing is not impaired because others also have the same thing, nor enhanced, if they are without it. So, for instance, my health is no less valuable to me because others also are well, or more so because they are ill. In the same way 462 knowledge of the truth is not of less worth because others also have it, nor does the price of wisdom rise because others are fools. Therefore, whoever prides himself on the fact that others lack the good things in which he abounds, appears in fact to delight in the ills of others, while whoever holds his goods of less value because others also enjoy them, is moved by envy of them.

But, of course, as in many other things, so also in this, the general inclination of men deviates from right reason. See Numbers, xi. 28-9; Mark, ix. 38-9. Consequently, the overweening luxury of men has set enormous values upon things which they could very easily do without. There are those who think that this has been done to the end that some use might be found for enormously great riches. Who is not acquainted with the enormous prices of single pearls, of which the 'fine points are whiteness, size, smoothness, and weight, qualities so difficult to match that no two pearls are found to be exactly alike' [Pliny, Natural History, IX. xxv]? On which Pliny [Natural History], Bk. IX, chap. xxxv, again says:

The first rank, then, and the very highest position among all valuables, belongs to the pearl. [...] After the surrender of Alexandria, pearls came into common, and, indeed, universal use at Rome; but they first began to be used about the time of Sulla, and later became so common, that even poor women affected their use, saying: 'A pearl worn by a woman in public is as good as a lictor.'¹ (B. & R.) Some precious stones are held above all price and more valuable than any product of man's hands (as the same writer says, XXXVII. pr.; and XXXII. ii [21]): In the same degree as people in our part of the world set a value upon the pearls of India [. . .] do the people of India prize coral: it being the prevailing taste in each nation respectively that constitutes the value of things. (B. & R.)

Add Idem, Bk. IX, chap. xvii, at the end, and chap. xxxiv; Bk. X, chap. xxix; Bk. XII, chaps. xiv, xvii, xix; Bk. XIII, chap. xv; Bk. XXXVII, chap. iv. The same writer, Bk. VI, chap. xvii [20], says of silk: 'So manifold is the labour, and so distant are the regions which are thus ransacked to supply a dress through which our ladies may in public display their charms.' (B. & R.) Nay, the folly of men fancies that some great value lies in anything that has had a high value placed upon it. Lampridius, Elagabalus [xxix at the end]: 'He loved to hear the price of the food served at his table exaggerated, asserting it was an appetizer for the banquet.' (M.) Juvenal, Satires, XI [16]: 'Those please the more which are bought for more.' (E.) Curtius, Bk. VIII, chap. ix [19]: 'These excretions of the foaming sea are appreciated at whatever luxury will give.' (A.) Seneca, On Consolation to Helvia, chap. xi: 'Plate which boasts the signature of antique artists, bronze which the mania of a small clique has rendered costly.' (S.) At the present time amber in our lands is very cheap, but in the Orient enormously expensive.

Ianus Nicius Erythraeus², Pinacotheca, Bk. III, chap. xvii, in recounting the life of John Barclay, who was a great fancier of tulips, says that in his day, some thirty years ago, they grew on the tops of the Alps, without receiving any cultivation or attention; then upon being brought into cities their price so increased because of the desire of men for their novelty, that single bulbs sold for as much as one hundred gold pieces and even more. But that after they had become abundant, their price fell so greatly that scarcely anything was considered more cheap. Add Idem, loc. cit., chap. xxiv. That is, in the case of objects like that, 'The only limit to the valuation of such things is the desire which any one has for them, for it is difficult to set bounds to the price unless you first set bounds to the wish'. (Y.) Cicero, Against Verres, Bk. IV [V. vii]. We should refer here to Pliny, Bk. XXXIII, Preface [v]:

From this same earth we have extracted vessels of myrrhine and vases of crystal, objects the very fragility of which is considered to enhance their value. In fact, it has come to be looked upon as a proof of opulence, and as quite the glory of luxury, to possess that which may be irremediably destroyed in an instant. (B. & R.)

Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. ix: 'I see crystal vessels, whose price is enhanced by their fragility, for among the ignorant the risk of losing things increases their value instead of lowering it, as it ought.' (S.) And surely not one of the least foibles of mankind at which 'the philosopher Ariston was most astonished, was that those possessed of the superfluities of life should be counted happy, rather than those well provided with life's necessary and useful things' (P.), as it is given in Plutarch, Cato the Elder [xviii]. And Strabo, Bk. II [v. 26], is correct in his judgement of precious stones which are valued so highly, 'things, that make the life of persons who have only a scarcity of them fully as happy as that of persons who have them in abundance'. (J.) Therefore, it is proper to reckon also among the silly ideas of the common sort that 463 of valuing things by their novelty, or rarity, or difficulty, or their foreign abstraction, unless these qualities are enhanced by goodness and usefulness. See Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxix, n. 11; Bk. II, chap. x, n. 2. On this point bears the statement of Agatharchides, De Mari Rubro, chap. xlix, about the Alilaei and Casandrini, who live in a region that abounds in gold:

¹ [For lictorum read lictorem.—Tr.]

² [For Erythraeus read Erythraeus.—Tr.]

They exchange gold for three times as much bronze, and for iron they give twice as much gold, while silver is worth ten times what gold is. Their method of fixing value is based on abundance and scarcity. In these things the whole life of men considers not so much the nature of the thing as the necessity of its use.

But things of daily use and such as concern primarily food, clothing, and arms, experience the greatest rise in price when scarcity of them is joined with necessity, such as is seen in times of famine, and in sieges, and delayed voyages, when hunger and thirst must be appeased and life preserved at any price. Quintilian, Declamations, XII [xxi]: 'In great want anything that can be bought is cheap.' Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VIII, chap. lvii: 'At the siege of Casilinum by Hannibal, a mouse was sold for two hundred denarii, and the person who sold it perished with hunger, while the purchaser survived.' (B. & R.) The price of manufactured articles is usually raised not only by their rareness but because of their workmanship. Velleius Paterculus, Bk. I, chap. xiii, tells us that L. Mummius was so unskilled in estimating this 'that when, on the taking of Corinth, he was hiring persons to carry pictures and statutes, finished by the hands of the greatest masters, into Italy, he ordered notice to be given to the contractors, that, if they lost any of them, they must find new ones'. (W.) Considerable store is set upon some objects by reason of the reputation of the workman, while some are of great worth from the character of the former possessor. Thus Lucian, Adversus Indoctum [xiii], tells that a man paid three hundred denarii for the lamp of Epictetus: 'He thought, I suppose, that if he should read by that lamp at night, he would forthwith acquire the wisdom of Epictetus in his dreams.' (H.) Among the Peruvians the city of Cusco was formerly in such repute that even seeds that had come from near it, although no better than those from other places, were valued more highly than all others. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. III, chap. xx.

Other factors working to the same end are the difficulty of the work, the abundance or scarcity of workmen, and the like. Cicero, Brutus [lxxiii]:

It was of more consequence to the Athenians, that their houses should be securely roofed, than to have their city graced with a most beautiful statue of Minerva; and yet, notwithstanding this, I would much rather have been a Phidias, than the most skilful joiner in Athens. In the present case, therefore, we are not to consider a man's usefulness but the strength of his abilities; especially as the number of painters and sculptors who have excelled in their profession is very small; whereas there can never be any want of joiners and mechanical labourers. (W.)

Thus Nicias is said to have paid a talent for a slave to superintend his silver mines. Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. II [v].

Finally, the price of labours and actions is raised by their difficulty, the dexterity required in them, their usefulness, necessity, the scarcity of workers, their renown or position, their freedom to work when they choose, and similar considerations. Here belongs also the passage in Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. vii [I. xi]:

Those occupations are most truly arts in which there is the least element of chance; they are the meanest in which the body is most deteriorated, the most servile in which there is the greatest use of the body, and the most illiberal in which there is the least need of excellence. (J.) (Idem, Politics, Bk. VIII, chap. ii): And any occupation, art, or science, which makes the body or soul or mind of the freeman less fit for the practice or exercise of virtue, is vulgar. (J.)

Again, the nature of the art has the greatest influence on the value and the service. What is said by Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VI, chap. xv, on the more noble services deserves notice:

Some things are of greater value than the price which we pay for them. You buy of a physician life and good health, the value of which cannot be estimated in money; from a teacher of the liberal sciences you buy the education of a gentleman and mental culture; 464 therefore you pay these persons the price, not of what they give us, but of their trouble in giving it; you pay them for devoting their attention to us, for disregarding their own affairs to attend to us; they receive the price not of their services but of the expenditure of their time. (S.)

Add Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. XII, chap. vii.

7. But it also happens frequently that certain things are highly valued, not by all the world, but by certain individuals and for some particular quality, which is usually called the price of fancy. This is illustrated by the remark of a certain Arab, given in Leo of Africa, Bk. III: 'Whatever is dear¹, no matter how dear, if it be beautiful, is not too dear; for nothing should be said to cost too much, if I have a fancy for it.' Libanius, Declamations, xli [xlvi. 29]²: 'The true value of every gift is measured by the pleasure of the recipient.' That is due, particularly in the case of animals, to a certain familiarity with them, or because they know how to adapt themselves in some way to our whims; because we have escaped some great danger by their aid; or because they serve to recall some great event. Many things also are recommended by the one from whose possession they passed into ours, so that we are unwilling to exchange them for several others as good as they. Catullus [Poems, xii. 11-13]: 'Send me back my napkin—which does not concern me for what it is worth, but because it is a keepsake from my old friend.' (C.) Ovid, Heroides, xvi [xvii. 71-2]: 'Those gifts are ever most welcome whose giver makes them precious.' (S.)

¹ [For charum read carum.—Tr.]

² [Barbeyrac says '870 D', but that is wrong.—Tr.]

Many people also value things highly because they see them valued by great individuals, whom they are extremely desirous of pleasing. Thus the price of a certain kind of food or clothing rises because the king fancies it. In this connexion, however, some observe that in sale and purchase the price of a thing should not rise because of the fancy of the purchaser, unless there are other causes contributing to the same end. So the Roman laws allow no consideration of the price of fancy in the restitution of a damage caused without evil intent. See Digest, IX. ii. 63. Yet merchants not infrequently raise the price because of the fancy and liking of those who are intent upon buying. Thus Diodorus Siculus, Bk. V, chap. xxvi, says:

Many Italian merchants, to gratify their own covetousness, make use of the drunkenness of the Gauls to advance their own profit and gain. For they convey wine to them both by navigable rivers, and by land in carts, and bring back an incredible price; for in lieu of a hogshead of wine, they receive a boy, giving drink in truck for a servant. (B.)

The same writer (loc. cit., xvii) observes that the inhabitants of the Balearic Isles valued one woman as the equivalent of four men, because these islanders were so highly sexed. Yet the price can be raised because of the fancy of the seller, provided he make it known to the purchaser, for it is a matter of some consideration for a man to restrain his desire for something that he holds dear, out of favour to a purchaser. Add Digest, XXXV. ii. 62, § 1; XXXV. ii. 63.

Finally, the prices of things or services are greatly raised by some evil habit of mind, such as vainglory, cruelty, and the like. What store the ancient Gauls set upon the heads of their enemies is to be gathered from Diodorus Siculus, Bk. V, chap. xxix; Strabo, Bk. IV [iv. 5].

8. Now such considerations as these regularly raise the prices of things, just as their opposites lower them. Yet in the determination on the spot of the prices of special articles, and in adjusting them to a fair standard, other considerations regularly enter in.

And at the outset it should be observed that among those who live in natural liberty each man is allowed to fix the price of an article of his at his own pleasure, since every man in such a state is the final arbiter of his possessions and actions. For however much another may want to set a price upon a thing of mine, it will still be within my power to accept or reject his valuation, and therefore I myself will be the one to set the actual price. And even if I should set an outrageous price upon a thing of mine, no one can complain about it, since it is no one's else affair how wealthy my fancy makes me, while others who feel my price too high, have the very simple course left them of leaving me in possession of what is mine. Therefore, if a man wants to have anything of mine, he must give the price I have decided upon, just as, on the other hand, if I want to force my wares upon some one else, I have to take whatever price a fastidious purchaser chooses to give. There can, therefore, be just cause for complaint only when a man, through inhumanity or out of hatred and envy, either refuses to sell to one in need, things of which he enjoys a superfluity, or else is willing to part with them only upon very hard terms. From this it follows that in a state of nature the prices of all things are fixed by agreement between the parties concerned, and that a man cannot be charged with a sin against the rules¹ of commerce, if he does not overlook a chance for profit, provided he show no inhumanity toward the needy. See Genesis, xli. 49; xlvii. 13 ff. 465

Yet in organized states prices are fixed in two ways: One way is by a decree or law of those in authority, the other by the general valuation and judgement of men, with the further consent of those who are the parties to the bargain. Some are accustomed to call the former legal, the latter common or natural price. Legal price is regularly assumed to agree with justice and equity, unless the opposite is manifestly true. For even here gross ignorance may now and then intervene, more often hatred or favour toward buyers or sellers, or even some other corruption or regard for one's own profit. Besides, the legal price stands at a στυγμή, or definite point, and admits of no latitude, so that any variation whatsoever constitutes injustice. And although the seller cannot demand more, when, as frequently happens, the price is set in favour of the purchaser, yet the buyer will be permitted, with the consent of the seller, to give less, provided he does not touch the lowest degree in natural price; while the seller will be allowed to accept less, provided it does not work to the injury of other merchants. But if the price is set in favour of the seller, the buyer will not rightfully be able to prevail upon the seller to accept less, although the latter may, if he chooses, accept less, since every man has the right to renounce what is to his advantage. And yet the seller can rightfully accept more, provided he does not exceed the highest degree in natural price. It appears, however, that the price of labour is more generally fixed in favour of those who give their services than that of merchandise in favour of the merchant. Yet it should be observed, in this connexion, that in some places a more subtle procedure is adopted, so that the prices of certain things may not become too high. Thus, in the states of Greece, it was a rule that the vendors of fish should not sit but stand, so that worn out by the monotony and strain of standing they would sell their fish while fresh and at a fair price.

¹ [For morem read morem.—Tr.]

9. But common price, being that not fixed by laws, has some latitude within which more or less can be demanded and given. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VI, chap. xv, must be understood as referring to this price when he says: 'What does their real value matter¹, since the buyer and seller have settled the price between them? [. . .] The price of everything varies according to circumstances; after you have well praised your wares, they are worth only the highest price at which you can sell them.' (S.) And Digest, XXXV. ii. 63: 'The prices of things are not fixed by fancy, nor by their utility to individuals, but by their common utility'; that is, they are worth as much as all would value them. Compare Digest, IX. ii. 33. Applicable here is a passage in Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. IX, chap. i:

In some states there are laws prohibiting such actions as arise out of voluntary contracts, on the ground, that, if a person has once trusted another, he ought to conclude his contract with him in the same spirit in which he originally made it. The idea is that he who received credit has a better right to settle the value of the service done than he who gave it; for as a rule people who possess a thing do not set the same value on it as people who wish to acquire it, since we always look upon the things which we call our own and which we give away, as being exceedingly valuable. Nevertheless the amount of the exchange must be regulated by the value which the recipient sets upon the gifts received. Still perhaps it ought not to be fixed at the value which he sets upon it when it is in his hands, but at the value which he set upon it before he had it. (W.)

Now because of the above-mentioned latitude they commonly 466 make three degrees, as it were, of common price, a lowest or generous, a middle or moderate, and a highest or rigorous. A thing can be bought and sold more dearly or more cheaply, provided it is kept within this latitude. But no general definition can be made so accurate as to establish the limits of this latitude. You might express it in no more convenient way than that it is a just price which is commonly set by those who are sufficiently acquainted with both the merchandise and the market. Here you may refer the definition of Varro, On the Latin Language, Bk. IV [V. clxxvii]: 'Price is determined for the purpose of fixing value and for the sake of purchase; the word (pretium) is derived from periti (skilled), because only the skilled can properly make that.' Although Salmasius, De Usuris, scoffs at such a derivation.

10. Now in fixing common price consideration is to be given to the labour and expense which merchants undergo in importing and handling their wares, for this is the principal reason why a merchant is allowed to sell his goods for more than the purchase price. But this consideration must be understood only of those expenses as are commonly to be met, since unusual conditions are considered as of no concern in the matter. Therefore, a tradesman will receive no attention

¹ [For inter est read interest.—Tr.]

if he tries to place a higher price upon his merchandise because he broke his leg, or became seriously ill while bringing them into the country, or because he lost a part of them by shipwreck or at the hands of thieves; provided, of course, such accidents did not contribute to the scarcity of the wares. Much less will he be heeded if he tries to shift to the purchasers such expenses as he encountered unnecessarily and in opposition to the laws of wise business. But merchants can include in their estimation the time they have spent, the plans they have formed, and the troubles they have met in acquiring, preserving, or distributing their merchandise, as well as all necessary expenses for the labour of their servants. And it would surely be inhuman¹, and likely to destroy the industry of men, to try to allow a man for his business, or any other sort of occupation, no more profit than barely permits him to meet his necessities by frugality and hardships.

In the valuation can also be included the difficulty, length, and peril of the way, as well as a different value of money and goods in different places. Furthermore, common value varies according to the manner of buying and selling. For those who sell goods by retail, that is, in small amounts, can demand a somewhat larger price than those who sell wholesale, since the former experience more trouble, and it is more profitable to receive payments in large sums than to collect it in small amounts. But it is also well known how subject a market is to sudden and frequent changes from the plenty or scarcity of purchasers, money, and commodities. For a scarcity of purchasers and money, due to some particular reason, with an abundance of commodities decreases the price. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. VI [xvii. 4]: 'The quantity for sale brought about a fall of price.' (R.) On the other hand plenty of buyers and a scarcity of goods increase their price. See Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. III, chap. xv, at the beginning.² So also it makes for a lower price if the seller hunts out purchasers and offers them his wares, that is, when the merchandise seeks a purchaser. Especially is this true when that rule of economy of Cato the Elder is observed, as given in his life by Plutarch [iv. 4]: 'He thought nothing cheap that one could do without, but that what one did not need, even if it cost but a penny, was dear.' (P.) This has passed into the proverb, 'Proffered wares stink.' The reason they allege for this is that in such a mode of selling there is a scarcity of purchasers, which lowers the price. A further consideration is that there is often but little necessity of buying a thing sold in this way, and it would scarcely be purchased at all were it not possible to do so at a low price. Nay, a man often purchases a thing under such circumstances, not so much to please himself 467 as the seller. This is the reason why things sold at auction, or under the hammer, are often knocked down for far less than they would otherwise bring, since the terms of that mode of sale specify that the article goes to the highest bidder. Although the ardour and competition of the bidders sometimes rise above the common price, because even without these a large number of purchasers regularly raises the price.

¹ [For in humanum read inhumanum.—Tr.]

² [In the edition of 1744 the following apposite sentence appears at this point: 'The price is also raised, when one who had no intention of selling an article, is asked to do so.'—Tr.]

Finally, there can be included in the common price any loss ensuing, or foregoing of profit, which befalls the seller by virtue of such a sale, especially when the buyer puts in his bid of his own accord. For it would be folly for me to sell a thing of mine, except upon the condition that I suffer no loss from so doing. But that loss or increase of profit which follows upon delayed or prompt payment can be, and usually is, taken into consideration under every circumstance. For surely the day as well is a part of price, and it is of more consequence to pay on the spot than after some time, since some further profit can be made of the money in the meantime. See Martial, Bk. VI, ep. xxx. Therefore, Polybius, Excerpta Peiresciana [XXXII. xiii. 10 f.], praises in warm terms the generosity of the younger Scipio, for immediately paying what he owed his sisters in the way of a dowry, although it was to be paid in instalments at the end of two and three years, and that at Rome, 'a city where no man ever gives another anything of his own accord',¹ and where 'no one will pay a single talent before the appointed day; so excessively particular are they about money, and so profitable do they consider time'. (S.) Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 14. We should add that, when Themistocles was selling a farm, he ordered the crier to state: 'It had a good neighbour.' Plutarch, Apophthegms [p. 185 E]. Sadi, Persian Rosegarden, chap. iv: 'A house that has a neighbour like you'—he refers to a worthless Jew—'is worth ten drachmas of bad money. But the hope may be entertained that when you are dead it will be worth a thousand.' Therefore, a good neighbour raises the price of a farm, especially whenever the custom of the Spartans, given by Plutarch, Instituta Laconica [p. 238 E], obtains:

It was permitted to use the servants, dogs, and horses of one's neighbour, unless he had need of them, as one's own. And out in the country, if any one had to have something, he used to open his neighbour's storehouse and take out food, seal up the storehouse again, and leave.

But the reason for raising the price of slaves, as given by Justin, Bk. XI, chap. iv, is both unusual, and caused largely by cruelty: 'The price set upon the Theban prisoners is raised not in consideration of the advantage of the purchasers but because of the hatred of their enemies.'

II. Now after most nations had given up their primitive simplicity they easily appreciated the fact that the old ordinary price no longer sufficed to carry on the business and commerce of men as these increased from day to day. For commerce used to consist only in the exchange of goods, and the work of others could be paid for only in work or in kind. Yet when our luxurious desires led to a lack of so many things, in that we no longer were content with what was produced at home, but yearned for the delights of other climes, it was not easy for a man to secure such things as another would be willing to exchange for what we wanted, or which were equivalent to another's goods. And in civilized states where citizens are divided into different social orders, there must needs be several classes of men who cannot subsist at all, or else with the utmost difficulty, if this simple exchange of commodities and labour persists. It is perfectly plain that those nations which are unacquainted with the use of currency have no part in the advances of civilization. See Busbecq, Letters, iii, on the manners of the Colchi; add Digest, XVIII. i. 1 pr. And so Maximus of Tyre, Dissertations, xxxvi [xxxv. 2], is only sweetly dreaming when he says:

¹ [This sentence is not in Polybius at this point.—Tr.]

Food and drink and clothing and everything else that the body needs, men secure by exchange and mutual compensation with bronze and iron, and, in the case of the more important articles, gold and silver. And yet that is a mistake; for they might dispense with the device of metals, and receive these things from one another for nothing, using a perfectly fair standard of exchange. And that is: Let the man who needs something borrow it from the owner, and the man who has enough to spare lend it to him, expecting to get it back some time from the recipient; for the exchange of such things will not be criticized. 468

12. Therefore, it has seemed best to most nations, which have enjoyed a higher level of culture, to set by agreement an eminent price on a particular thing, which would serve as a measure for the proper prices of other things, and in which they would be fully contained, so that by it as a medium a man could secure for himself anything that was for sale and carry on all commerce and fulfil every agreement with perfect convenience.

On this point Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. viii [V. v. 14], writes as follows: When need introduced the exchange of commodities, of course the immediate need could be met by their exchange, when it was simple. But since we cannot know at the present what we will want in the future and how much of it, νόμισμα, or money, was introduced in order that we might be sure in advance that we would have thereafter the means to secure what we should need in the future; and this money is a sort of ἐγγυητής, sponsor or surety, and so, by means of this agreement between men, every individual is endowed with such a power that when he presents this he can get anything that is for sale. ('Now money serves as a guarantee of exchange in the future: supposing we need nothing at the moment, it ensures that exchange shall be possible when a need arises, for it meets the requirement of something we can produce in payment so as to obtain the thing we need.' (R.)) Therefore, idem, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. IX, chap. i: 'A common measure has been provided by the currency, to which everything is referred, and by which everything is measured.' (W.) Idem, Politics, Bk. I, chap. vi (9):

When the inhabitants of one country became more dependent on those of another, and they imported what they needed, and exported the surplus, money necessarily came into use. For the various necessities of life are not easily carried about, and hence men agreed to employ in their dealings with each other something which was intrinsically useful and easily applicable to the purposes of life, for example, iron, silver, and the like. Of this the value was at first measured by size and weight, but in process of time they put a stamp upon it to save the trouble of weighing and to mark the value. (J.)

Idem, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. viii:

Such things as are the subjects of exchange must in some sense be comparable. This is the reason for the invention of money. Money is a sort of medium (μέτρον) or mean; for it measures everything. Money is a sort of recognized representation of demand. That is the reason why it is called money (νόμισμα), because it has not a natural but a conventional (νόμῳ) existence, and because it is in our power to change it, and make it useless. All things must have a pecuniary value, as this will always facilitate exchange and so will facilitate association (κοινωνία). Money, therefore, is like a measure that equates things, by making them commensurable; for association would be impossible without exchange, exchange without equality, and equality without commensurability. (W.)

Here also belongs a passage of the same author, Magna moralia, Bk. I, chap. xxxiv [xxxiii]:

But since the work which the housebuilder produces is of more value than that of the shoemaker, and the shoemaker had¹ to exchange his work with the housebuilder, but it was not possible to get a house for shoes; under these circumstances they had recourse to using something for which all these things are purchasable, to wit silver, which they called money, and to effecting their mutual exchanges by each paying the worth of each product, and thereby holding the political communion together. (S.)

Idem, Rhetoric, Bk. II, chap. xvi [1]: 'Wealth is a sort of measure of the worth of all else, so that it seems to command all things.' (J.)

13. To attain this end it seemed the most convenient thing to the 469 majority of nations to take the more noble and comparatively rare metals, such as gold (why this should have the first place is shown by Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XXXIII, chap. iii, towards the end), silver, and bronze. For just as only a person of tried credit and wealth is accepted as a bondsman, while little security is placed in a common man, so no one will exchange a thing of his which he has secured by great and persistent labour, for something that may be picked up everywhere, such as a handful of dirt or sand. Therefore, money had to be of a substance which was convenient to carry, and into which, because of its scarcity, could be compressed, as it were, the values of many things. A further consideration is that metals have a substance so closely compacted that they are not easily worn out by usage and can be formed into small bodies, which qualities are most convenient in a thing that is to serve men as a measure for their commerce.

¹ [Pufendorf's version would run 'and it was difficult for the shoemaker', &c.—Tr.]

But since this function of money is not given it by any necessity arising from its nature, but by the imposition and agreement of men (add Philostratus, *Life of Apollonius*¹ of Tyana, Bk. II, chap. iii), it is obvious that other materials can be and are used under stress of circumstances or by preference. Thus leather, paper, and similar material, when stamped in some way, not infrequently serve the purpose of money in cases of great necessity, which currency, however, after the stress is past, can be exchanged for the current coinage. See Polyænus, Strategemata, Bk. III [x. 1], about Timotheus and Demetrius; Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. V, chap. xiv, at the end. Thus the inhabitants of the kingdom of Congo and Tombutto in Africa (see Leo of Africa, Bk. VII) and many peoples of North America use a certain kind of sea-shell for money, and the Apalachites of Florida black and white grains, see Rochefort, Descriptio Antillarum, Pt. II, chap. viii, n. 8. Paul of Venice [Paolo Sarpi], Bk. II, chap. xxxviii, reports that the inhabitants of the province of Caniclu use grains of salt for their small money, and the same is true in the kingdom of Abyssinia, according to Francisco Alvarez, chap. xlvi; yet articles of that kind are suitable only for commerce on a small scale. In the kingdom of Siam larger pieces of money are of pure silver, while for the smaller pieces they use a kind of shell. See Jodocus Schouten, Descriptio Regni Siam. Add Polydorus Virgilius, De Rerum Inventoribus, Bk. II, chap. xx; Alexander of Naples,² Bk. IV, chap. xv; Budæus on Digest, XVIII. i. 1. In this connexion we may note, in passing, that the people of the Congo held iron the noblest of the metals, and gold and silver more cheap, because the last two were of little use, while from the first could be made instruments of the greatest service to the advancement of life.

Herodotus, Bk. II, tells us that among the Ethiopians the rarest and most precious of all metals was bronze. And indeed, if you disregard their use for money, the human race can better do without gold and silver than iron. Thus Garcilaso [de la Vega], Comentarios Reales, Bk. I, chap. xi, writes that the Peruvians held it a stroke of fortune that the Europeans had brought them iron instruments, and that one of their nobles could not give adequate expression to his admiration at the sight of scissors brought in by the Spaniards, saying that if the Spaniards had brought in nothing but razors, scissors, combs, and mirrors, these alone would have been enough to obligate them of their own accord to give in return all their gold and silver. For before that time they had used flint knives for shaving, and this had caused them great distress. And the same people gave their kings their gold, silver, and jewels, not as tribute but as gifts. Ibid., Bk. V, chap. vii. Add Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. II. Also in a section of Arabia bronze and iron were exchanged for equal quantities of gold, since the inhabitants had an abundance of the latter, but lacked the former. Diodorus Siculus, 470 Bk. III, chap. xlv; add Strabo, Bk. XVI [iv. 18, p. 778]. Lucian, Charon, claims that iron is more precious than gold, on the score that the latter is defended by the former. Also Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XXXIV, chap. xiv.

¹ [For Appollonius read Apollonius.—Tr.]

² [The reference is to his Genialium Dierum Libri Sex, first published at Rome 1522, as verified by the edition, Paris 1539.—Tr.]

It was the old custom to measure these metals by weight (see Pliny, Bk. XXXIII, chap. iii), and therefore even to this day among many nations words¹ signifying weight are applied to money. But since this method seemed rather inconvenient, it came to be the general rule that the sovereigns of each state should issue coins of a certain size, bearing the stamp of the state, which set their value. Hence the line of Juvenal, Satires, xiv [291]: 'Silver cut up into pretty legends and minute portraits.' (E.) In this connexion we should note in passing the account given by Lampridius [xxxix] of Alexander Severus:

He also melted down the pieces of two, three, four, and ten aurei, and the coins of larger denominations even up to the value of a pound and of a hundred aurei—which had been introduced by Elagabalus—and so withdrew them from circulation. The coins made therefrom were designated only by the name of the metal itself, for, as he himself said, it would result in the emperor's giving too generous largesses, if, when² it were possible for him to bestow many pieces of smaller value, he should be compelled to bestow thirty or fifty or a hundred by giving the value of ten or more in a single piece. (M.)

14. But although the value of gold and silver, and of money, depends upon the imposition and agreement of men, the governors of states have not the freedom to change that value at their will, but must bear in mind certain considerations. In the first place, among all nations with which we are acquainted, it is a general rule that bronze is of less value than silver and the latter of less value than gold, and that silver bears a certain ratio to gold. Plato, Hipparchus [p. 231 D], fixes this ratio: 'If a man having put out half a certain weight of gold gets back twice as much silver [. . .] he receives only twice the measure of his gold instead of twelve times the measure.' According to Polybius in Selections on Embassies, Bk. XXVIII, chap. v, the Romans in a treaty with the Aetolians agreed to give them one mina of gold for ten of silver. Add Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. VI, chap. iii, p. 1071 ff.

In the next place, money is created the better to aid commerce, not merely between citizens of the same state, but between those of different states. Therefore, if the sovereign of a state has set an outrageous value on his own coinage, he makes it of no use for the trade of his citizens with foreigners. For with regard to citizens of the same state the statement of Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. iii, holds good: 'Neither the banker nor the greengrocer can refuse the Emperor's currency, but, if you show it, he must part, willy-nilly, with what the coin will buy.' (M.) But when the size and value of metal coins is not properly fixed, so that it is at least not inferior to the coinage of foreigners with whom we are trading, it will surely check the trade between citizens and foreigners, since it must needs be confined entirely to exchange of wares. And this alone will not sustain commerce, except in so far as we export more than we import, and those whose wares we on our part do not need, still stand in need of ours. See also Polybius, Bk. VI, chap. xlvii, at the end. And inasmuch as after immovable goods are counted, the basis of an estate consists of money, it is clear that this will be seriously undermined, if so much alloy is mixed with coins, at least those of larger denominations, that the very coins themselves are forced to blush at their own baseness. Therefore, the story given by Polyaeus, Bk. VI [xlvii, at end], of Leuco:

¹ [For vacabula read vocabula.—Tr.]

² [For cummultos read cum multis.—Tr.]

Leuco, when he was in need of cash, ordered all his citizens to bring in their coin to him, to be revalued when stamped in another form. Then he coined it with a new device and gave orders that each piece should have twice its former value, thus profiting himself to the extent of one-half of the amount, without at the same time injuring his citizens, can, indeed, be excused on the plea of necessity, provided that the wrong is righted after the necessity has been removed. Add Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. VI, chap. iii; Gregorius Tholosanus, Syntagma Juris Universi, Bk. XXXVI, chap. ii. But no excuse can be found for what Zonaras and others recount of Nicephoros Phocas, namely, that he struck off a lighter currency in addition to the heavier which was in 471 circulation, and then demanded that all payments into the treasury be made in the heavier, while his own disbursements were made in the lighter. Add Juan Mariana, History of Spain, Bk. XV, chap. ix. And yet some legislators have undertaken to root out avarice, luxury, and other vices, by the introduction of a debased coinage. According to Plutarch, Lycurgus [ix], Lycurgus at Sparta withdrew all gold and silver money from currency, and ordained the use of iron money only. Then to a great weight and mass of this he gave a trifling value, so that ten minas' worth required a large store-room in the house, and a yoke of cattle to transport it. When this money obtained currency many sorts of iniquity went into exile from Lacedaemon. For who would steal, or receive as a bribe, or rob, or plunder that which could neither be concealed, nor possessed with satisfaction, nay, nor even cut to pieces with any profit? For vinegar was used, we are told, to quench the red-hot iron, robbing it of its temper and making it worthless for any other purpose, when once it had become brittle and hard to work. (P.)

By this device an end was put to all useless arts, since no opportunity was to be found in them for profit¹. And since iron money was not received in the rest of Greece, the Spartans could not import the exotic pleasures of their neighbours, which cut the very sinews of luxury.

¹ [For lucrandsi read lucrandi.—Tr.]

Add the same author's account of the life of Lysander, who introduced again into Sparta gold and silver, and in their train, avarice.

But it is certain that among other nations as well, avarice increased with the use of money. For so long as wealth lay only in stores of grain, herds, and the like, the desire for unlimited gain was ultimately quenched by the work involved in such things, the difficulty of handling and keeping them, and the further fact that they were easily destroyed. But now, upon the introduction of gold and silver money, it is easy for avarice to amass even millions. Thus even Plato, Laws, Bk. V [p. 742 A], in order to divert the citizens of his state from too eager a pursuit of wealth, forbids any private man being allowed to possess gold and silver, but only coin for daily use [. . .] which passes current among themselves, but is worthless among the rest of mankind; with a view, however, to expeditions and journeys to other lands—for embassies, or for any other occasion which may arise of sending out a herald, the state must also possess a common Hellenic currency [. . .] and if, when a man returns, he has any foreign money remaining, let him give the surplus back to the treasury, and receive a corresponding sum in the local currency. (J.*)

Also Paul of Venice, Bk. II, chap. xxi, writes that the Great Cham in his city of Cambalu struck off an immense amount of money from the bark of the mulberry tree, by putting the royal stamp upon it, and that no one in his kingdom was allowed upon pain of death to refuse it, or to make and pass another kind; also that the foreigners who wanted to trade in that kingdom exchanged the gold and silver, pearls and precious stones, which they brought in for that kind of money, and then upon their departure used it to purchase goods which they exported. He adds that in this way the ruler stored up a great quantity of gold and silver. The Persians called the leather money which a certain evil king forced upon his citizens Schebreva, as much as to say: 'Money imposed upon his subjects by a king. Hence also the memory of that money has remained so vivid, that when they wish to censure the wrongdoing of any king they say of him that he is imposing leather money on his subjects.' G. Gentius on Sadi, Persian Rosegarden, chap. iii. Add Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. XII, p. 450.

On the other hand, the interest shown by the Senate of Venice for their subjects deserves every commendation. For when a great number of smaller debased coins had slipped in and could in no way be gotten rid of, a decree of the Senate was finally passed, that those who brought such to the treasury at an appointed time would receive their equivalent in silver or gold. To meet this there was drawn from the treasury over five hundred thousand crowns. Andrea Maurocenus, Historia Veneta, Bk. XIV, p. 641. We should add in passing the story in Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VI, chap. xxii:

The king of Taprobane was more particularly struck with surprise at the Romans'

rigid notions of justice, on ascertaining that among the money found on the captive, the denarii were all of equal weight, although the different figures on them plainly showed that they had been struck in the reigns of several emperors.' (B. & R.)

Compare Solinus, chap. lxvi.

15. Since money is the measure of the price of other things, it is 472 easy to see that there should be no change in its value, unless the highest interest of the state advise it, and then the slighter this change the less it will disturb the business affairs of the citizens. Therefore, Paulus in Digest, XVIII. i. 1, says that for the promotion of commerce a substance is selected, the public and abiding value of which would, by maintaining a constant amount, obviate the difficulties of exchange. Add Mornay on the passage in question. And yet on the abiding value of money attention should be given to the observation of Grotius, loc. cit., § 17: 'Money acquires its function naturally, not by reason of its material alone, nor by reason of a special name or form, but because it has a more general character by which it is compared either with all things, or with the things that are most necessary.' (K.) The meaning of which passage is this: When a certain coin is worth so much here and now and is equal to a certain thing (for this is the function of money, namely, that a single coin should not only be able to take the place of another coin of the same quality and size—a characteristic of all things which are called usable—but that it may also fully contain the prices of other things), this is due not to its material alone, whether, for instance, it be of gold or silver, nor to any special name or form, whether it be called a ducat, crown, thaler, florin, or because it bears a certain stamp (Digest, XVIII. i. 1: 'Money is of use not so much for its substance as for its quantity'; Digest, XLVI. iii. 94, § 1: 'In money consideration is given not so much to the kind as the quantity'); but it results from the comparison of it as to scarcity and abundance with other things, and especially with those which are the most necessary for life.

Now land meets this end best of all, since from it comes, mediately or immediately, most of the things by which human life is sustained. And since its products are sufficiently fixed by a full year compensating for a lean one, these are understood to have a fairly stable price, on which the prices of everything else, which has so far not received a valuation from the luxury or foolishness of men, are based. For it is highly agreeable that the prices of things which come from or are supported by land, should in general be raised or lowered according to the price of the land itself. Since, therefore, in these days, when in nearly every nation the land is in the hands of private individuals, land is the general basis of all wealth, it is fair that the value of money should rise or fall according as it is found to be scarce or plentiful in respect to land. For since in the more civilized states there are in general two classes of men, that which devotes itself to cultivating the soil, and that which in different occupations looks after the conveniences of life, if in a time of great abundance of money the price of land and its products should be low, the cultivators of the soil must needs be ruined, while if money is scarce and the price of land high, the other class of men must labour in want. This we see happen when there is a good harvest and so a low price of food, but the labour of the artisans and of all others who live upon the work of their own hands, remains at the same scale as prevailed in less productive years. For under such circumstances the farmers find little help from the bountiful harvest on their lands. And the same hardship rests upon the artisans, when, with food high, their labour draws the old price. Since, therefore, in years of moderate yield the trade of artisans and farmers seems capable of the best comparison, and then the minimum of recrimination is heard between them, it is clear that in fixing the price of money the greatest regard should be given to land, especially in case some district subsists not on trade alone but chiefly upon its own products.

- 473 16. On the basis of what has been said, the question can be answered, whether a farm which some two hundred years ago was rated at one hundred pieces of gold should not to-day be rated at more, everything else being equal; and whether the wages which were at that time comfortable enough are not now evidently too low. Here ¹ it is not enough to reply that our present currency is ² in weight and fineness equal to the old, and bears the same name and stamp. The further point must by all means be borne in mind, that in the course of some two hundred years so great a quantity of gold and silver has been brought into Europe from Africa and the Indies, and the old mines of Europe have produced such a quantity of silver, that little by little the value of money has notably fallen. Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. VI, chap. ii, p. 1028, concludes therefore, that, because of the abundance of gold and silver, the prices of things are now ten times as high as they were. Therefore, everything else being equal, the old prices of land and salaries would have to be increased in the same proportion. Add also Valerius Maximus, Bk. IV, chap. iii, § 12. For let us suppose that commerce is carried on merely by exchange, in a district where there is a small production of wine, but a large one of grain; under such conditions a man will receive a great deal of grain for a small amount of wine. But should it happen that the culture of the vine should be increased, with a consequent large production of wine, surely more wine than before would have to be given for the same amount of grain. On the same principle, when there is a general scarcity of money in comparison with other things, many things will have to be given for a small sum of money. On the other hand, when money increases in volume, more of it will have to be given for the same things. For since bullion can and does come into trade, just like other merchandise, according to ordinary price, its value will rise or fall with its scarcity or abundance. Moreover, the eminent value of money necessarily follows the ordinary¹ price of metals, for it is improper that the same amount of silver, for instance, should in the same country have one value as bullion and another when coined, and so the same thing taken as a measure of itself would be more than when taken as a thing to be measured. This is the reason why, although the prices of practically all other things have advanced because of the increase of money, the value of gold as well as silver has remained the same as formerly, in that an ounce of silver, for instance, is still to-day the equal as before of the crown. For if the price of silver bullion were, for instance, about fourfold, like that of other things, then four crowns would have to be given for an ounce of silver bullion, in which case, it is clear, there would be little profit in coining money.

¹ [For Neic read Heic.—Tr.]

² [For usse read esse.—Tr.]

Therefore, when the price of one and the same thing is said to be changed, a careful distinction must be drawn as to whether the value of the thing itself is changed, or the value of money. For it is the former case when the thing itself begins to be found in greater or less abundance than usual, while the supply of money remains the same; but the latter when the coinage in general increases or decreases, while the supply of things remains as usual. Therefore, for example, if in a year of plenty a peck of wheat can be bought for a crown, and in one of scarcity for not less than three, the reason is not that money has depreciated but that the price of wheat has risen. But when land which a century before sold for 100 crowns now sells for 200, it is not the value of the ground but of money which has changed. Suetonius, Augustus, chap. xlii [xli]: 'By bringing the royal treasures to Rome in his Alexandrian triumph he made ready money so abundant, that the rate of interest fell, and the value of real estate rose greatly' (R.) (Orosius says 'twofold'). Add Josephus, Jewish War, Bk. VI, chap. xxxii; Francisco Lopez de Gomara, Historia Generalis Indiae, chap. cxvii. Money can none the less still serve as a measure, since it should not otherwise be an unstable thing. For the change found in money is not so sudden and abrupt as in other things, 474 which are often seriously affected by the uncertainty of seasons or a combination of situations, while its price is lowered by slow and inappreciable degrees, as it were, so that we do not appreciate the decrease as it occurs, but observe it first after some time. Add Jacques Godefroy, Dissertatio de Mutatione et Augmento Monetae Aureae.

¹ [For vulgari read vulgare.—Tr.]

CHAPTER II

ON CONTRACTS IN GENERAL WHICH PRESUPPOSE PRICES OF THINGS

- | | |
|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The difference according to Hobbes between pacts and contracts;2. And according to the expounders of the Roman law.3. Some remarks about their position on this point.4. Our own position on this distinction. | <ol style="list-style-type: none">5. Contracts are divided into μονόπλευροι [unilateral], and δίπλευροι [bilateral];6. Intoreal, consensual, verbal, and written;7. Into named and nameless;8. Into gainful and onerous.9. Enumeration of onerous contracts.10. Mixed contracts. |
|--|---|

OUR next task is to consider contracts which are not understood without dominion and price of things. Here the first duty is to inquire into the difference which is alleged to exist between simple pacts and contracts. According to Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 9, a contract is called 'an act of two or more, mutually conveying their rights'. But since 'in every contract, either both parties instantly perform what they contract for, insomuch as there is no trust had from either to other; or the one performs, the other is trusted; or, finally, neither perform, but each trusts the other', contracts of the first class, he feels, should bear that name; but the other two, namely, where one person is the object of trust, or where both are trusted and the one trusted promises that he will perform something later, he feels should be designated by the term pact. Yet this distinction concerns not so much the nature of the contracts and pacts themselves, as only their execution. And it is contrary to common usage that a purchase, for instance, which is concluded in Greek faith [that is, for cash], should be called a contract, while one where the goods are delivered at the time, but the payment is put off until later, should be called a pact.

2. The expositors of the Roman law agree for the most part in assigning the general class to the term pact, and define it on the whole as the consent or agreement of two or more parties to one and the same thing. Then they divide the pact into 'a pact specially so called, and a contract'. The former is, to their mind, 'an agreement, without name and cause, of two or more parties to the same end', or, what amounts to the same thing, 'with no intrinsic force to obligate one before the law'. This again they divide into simple and non-simple, the latter being further divided into legal and additional.

Here it should be observed, in passing, that the wiser writers rightly refrain from the term 'clothed pacts'. For the use of the phrases 'of naked favour', and 'naked goodwill', is no reason why one should speak of 'clothed favour'.

They say further: That agreements pass beyond the limits of a simple or naked pact, either by their own nature, or because of the external confirmation of civil law, that is, by its extrinsic assistance, for it is by their resting upon civil law that they are given the special designation of legal pacts. That this intrinsic nature is due to a twofold reason, to wit: Some of them do not pass under the general name of conventions, but fall under the special name of contracts; while some, although lacking a special name and distinctive form, still rest upon an underlying cause, that is, the fulfilment of a promise, the giving of a thing, or the performance of a deed. That these are properly called contracts, which of their own force produce an effective obligation, and because of which it appears just and equitable for an action to be forthcoming. Yet they add that simple pacts may carry the power to produce an action by stipulation, and pacts which are added to contracts in good faith partake of the power and nature of contracts. 475

3. But since pacts can lead to no action in a civil court, and it is our task to explain the force which they have by their own nature, we may, therefore, not follow this division so closely in this connexion. For it is clear that the civil law may deny action in a civil court even to agreements with cause. For Strabo, Bk. XV[i. 53], says: 'The Hindus have no actions for mortgage or deposit, nor do they use witnesses or seals, but simply trust one another.' And Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. III, chap. xv, expresses the wish that no action be allowed on what has been promised, but that it stand only on a man's word. With regard to the precept of Roman law, that 'no action is allowed because of simple pacts', a distinction must be drawn between affirmative and negative pacts. The force of negative pacts in both natural and civil law, or such as embody an agreement not to press a matter, is that they do not give rise to an action but merely preclude one. For since the only advantage they offer to the defendant is that nothing can be required of him by the other party, they can be of no use but to forestall the petition of the plaintiff, that is, to preclude an action. But simple affirmative pacts of themselves are not so wanting in the power to give rise to an obligation, as is shown above, Bk. III, chap. v, §§ 9-11. Yet the Roman law took from them the power of giving rise to an action, primarily for the purpose of cutting at the roots of a great mass of law-suits. And they quite properly felt that some of them had been made with too little consideration (for otherwise they could easily have used the legal form), while others were of no service, by reason of their being concerned with no cause, that is, a matter which would return some advantage to another. For that this is the meaning of the word causa, found so generally among the Jurisconsults, is clear from Plautus, Asinaria, Act III, sc. i[519-20]: 'If I once stay by myself resting in the rowers' room, the progress [causa] of this whole household stops short, you see.' (N.) Thus, for example, if some persons agree that they will go a certain length of time without washing their hands, or combing their hair, or changing their clothes—and we have found that some profligates have done so—what use is there in a judge being bothered when some such agreement is broken? And in fact such pacts have little standing even in natural law.

4. It is our purpose to seek the distinction between pacts and contracts, first of all in their object, so that we give the name of contracts to what have to do with things and actions which are used in commerce and presuppose dominions and prices of things, and the general name of pacts to all agreements entered into regarding other matters. On this principle pacts strictly understood will include all negative conventions by which we agree that we will not do or claim something, which we might have done or claimed. So also those conventions which have as their object the exercise of our natural faculties, in so far as they work only for a mutual benefit or advantage, and as they are considered by themselves and not compared with others or measured by them. In brief, when the agreement is concerned with 476 doing some work where no money is involved. Although there are not a few conventions not concerned with things, which are called without distinction both pacts and contracts, such as that entered into in marriage.

5. Contracts are divided into μονόπλευροι, unilateral, δίπλευροι, bilateral, and such as appear midway between them. The first obligate the performance of something from the outset on one side only, and allow no condition ex post facto, such as a loan and stipulation. The second obligate both parties to some performance and require an equal consideration of both parties to the agreement, as buying and selling, letting and hiring, and partnership. To the third and intermediate class belongs a contract for a loan, a deposit, and a pledge. These naturally are made only for the one to be obligated, him, that is, who is the recipient, as is shown by the chief end of the parties concerned, and lay no similar obligation upon the giver. Yet it often happens, from some subsequent event and accident, that the giver as well is obligated to the recipient; if, for instance, the latter has been put to some necessary expense on the thing, or has because of it suffered some loss which can be charged to the owner. In such a case it is equitable for the expenses to be refunded and the loss made good.

6. A division of contracts was commonly made by the Roman Jurisconsults into real, consensual, written, and verbal. The term real is applied to them not because they are concerned with a thing, for that is true of the other contracts as well, but because if that thing, for the sake of which they are given such a name, can be required, there must have preceded an actual transfer of a thing. See Digest, II. xiv. 17. This is on the principle that I must have received something that is usable, if I am to be obligated by a loan. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VIII, chap. ii, § 2. Thus no man can demand a deposit and loan of me before he has delivered a thing to me. Yet a contract for loan is one thing, a pact or promise to give a usable thing in the future as a loan is another; a trust or deposit is one thing, a promise to receive a trust or a deposit is another.

They are called consensual not because other contracts are performed without consent, but because they produce at once an obligation to give or perform, when each party has by sufficient signs shown its consent, while it is not necessary for a thing first to have been delivered, or for a service to have been performed.

A verbal contract or stipulation is unknown to the law of nature, in so far as it consists of certain customary formulae of questions and answers.

It is equally opposed to the same law, for a man who has received nothing, to be as much obligated by a mere piece of writing as if he had received it. The reason for such a case under the Roman law is clear. For since a judge cannot be certain of the truth of a deposit by other means than instruments and other proofs of that sort, it follows that when writings are existent which prove the fact, he cannot but assume its verity until the contrary has been proved. Although all contracts have this point in common, that they can be put down in writing, which may be done in two ways. For either the contract may be in writing, that is, the agreement is declared only in writing, in which case the contract is closed only when the writing has been completed in every detail, this occurring most of all in consensual contracts and their like; or the writing is but the evidence of a contract already closed. In a matter of doubt the latter is presumed. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvi, § 10.

7. Another division of contracts is into named and nameless. The first class includes those which, because of their common use, have acquired a distinctive and special name and one which expresses the form and contents of the transaction, or in other words, which allows a person at once to recognize what was done. (For although bartering, which is listed among nameless contracts, does not appear to lack a name, yet it is a general one, and a person cannot tell from it whether there is meant a contract of goods for goods, buying, selling, or something similar.) For this reason the Roman legal procedure fixed certain permanent formulae for actions in such cases, since in all other less common contracts only so much was understood as was expressly stated, and so no common and accepted formula was set forth, but only such as met the particular case. Therefore, the actions they called for were designated in formal terms. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiii, § 3.

8. The division of contracts into gainful and onerous best suits our purpose. The former bring some advantage gratis to one of the parties, such as a loan, commission, or charge. The latter lay an equal burden upon both parties, for by them a man does or gives something upon condition that he receives as much himself. On this distinction appears to rest¹ the other whereby some contracts are called contracts of good faith, and others of the letter of the law. The effect of these in Roman law was that the former gave rise to an action of good faith, in which the judge enjoyed a somewhat free power to decide and weigh the matter in accordance with equity and fairness, the latter to an action of strict law, where the judge was bound to a strict formula, from which he could not deviate². Yet natural reason itself shows that onerous contracts also are of good faith, that is, allow a more generous interpretation in accordance with equity and fairness, for the reason that, since they imply an equal burden, neither of the parties should be burdened. On the other hand gainful contracts appear to be of the letter of the law, and allow no free interpretation of this kind, or that a man is bound to more than he has expressly declared, so that a person's kindness should not be made too burdensome to him. Add Arnold Vinnius on Institutes, IV. vi. 28.

9. Onerous contracts are very easily grouped under these four heads: Goods for goods, work for work, goods for work, work for goods. Here the word 'work' is taken in a broad enough sense so as to include even the act of a man not a party to the contract. Grotius, in the passage cited above, makes only three divisions, and omits 'goods for work', because he felt that it was identical with the reverse, 'work for goods'. And it must be confessed that there is no real difference between them, since in both cases work is given for goods and goods for work. Yet a goods for work contract begins, as it were, with the delivery of a thing, upon which follows the performance of a work, while in the second case the performance of a work comes first and the giving of a thing follows; and so in the one the doer is the author, as it were, of the contract, and in the other the giver. For some δίπλευροι [bilateral] contracts have this character, namely, that although there is an equal obligation upon both parties, it is understood to take its rise from one person as the author of the contract. So a contract of purchase regularly commences with the purchaser, one of renting with the tenant, &c.

Now to the first class belong those contracts in which one article is given for another, as in bartering in the strict sense of the term. Here a rather subtle distinction should be observed between a general contract of goods for goods, and bartering strictly speaking. For the former is when an indefinite thing is exchanged for the same, as some ox for some mule, or an indefinite thing for a definite, as some horse for this particular ox, or a definite for an indefinite, as oil for some kind of grain. But when one definite thing is given for another, such as, for example, this particular ox for this particular horse, it is bartering. See Mornay on Digest, XIX. v. 5. Here also belongs that contract where money is given for money, either of a different species or in different places, which is called to-day exchange (cambium), in Greek, collybus. Sometimes money is given for money, so that it becomes buying and selling; as Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XXXIII, chap. iii, gives an account of how once money stamped with a figure of Victory, in being brought over from Illyricum, was bought and sold as merchandise. When a thing is purchased for money it is called buying and selling. Also the use of a thing is given for another thing, as suppose I should give another my horse for a few days in return for a book. Or the use of a thing for the use of a thing, as if I should allow you to live in my house and you permit me to use your field. Or the use of a thing for money, which is properly called letting and renting. Finally, a thing is given on condition that, after a time, another of the same quantity and kind may be given in exchange. 478¹

¹ [For institi read institi.—Tr.]

² [For discere read discedere.—Tr.]

The second class, work for work, can have innumerable kinds, according as there is an infinite variety of actions, useful or pleasing to all kinds of men, which can be bartered, as it were, and one kind performed in exchange for others. In Ammianus Marcellinus², Bk. XVI, chap. x, this kind of contract is called 'a pact to effect an interchange'; in Apuleius, Apologia [17], it is 'to make exchanges of services with your neighbours'.

To the third class, goods for work, belong the letting and renting for money of labours or services of everyday utility. So also that contract by which in return for money indemnity is furnished those who transport goods to others, which is commonly called insurance or avoidance of danger. And finally, a contract whereby a thing, either consumable or non-consumable, is given in return for some performance.

To the fourth class, work for goods, are assigned those contracts whereby some work is performed, on condition that another gives some thing or the use of a thing, and others of a like sort. See Digest, XIX. v. 5.

A contract may be conceived which can be assigned to none of these classes because it includes a disjunction, such as a contract of estimation (see Digest, XIX. iii. 1). Add Plautus, Captives, Act II, sc. iii, l. 18 [378 ff.]. Approximately this kind of a contract resembles the giving of marriage gifts among the Muscovites, of which Sigismund, Baron of Herberstein, gives an account. 'The wedding guests send presents to the bride, each of which the groom carefully marks and lays to one side. After³ the wedding he inspects them all one after the other, and, if he likes any of them, he sends them to the market with the request that the merchants, who handle the various articles, make an estimate of their value, while he returns all the rest to the donors with an expression of his thanks. Within a year's time he compensates the donors of the gifts that he kept, either with the sums of money at which they were estimated, or some article of equal value. If any guest places a higher value on his present, the groom returns to the sworn appraisers, and forces the objector to abide by their decision. If the groom has not within a year's time either satisfied the donors or returned their gifts, he is fined twofold. If he has failed to have the gift valued by sworn appraisers, he must repay it at the value set by the donor. And this custom the common people regularly observe on every occasion calling for gifts.' The same thing is told by Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. II, ep. i, of the presents which the Persians are accustomed so generously to give strangers. If a more valuable gift is not returned for them, the donor not only complains, but also asks the return either of the gift or of its value.

¹ [For '458' read '478'.—Tr.]

³ [For cinitis read finitis.—Tr.]

² [For Mareellino read Marcellino.—Tr.]

But these contracts have the common characteristic, that, when they have been met by both parties, these have no further concern with the business on that score. For this reason Grotius, loc. cit., calls them 'diremptory', opposing them to contracts which he calls 'communicatory'¹, which bind the parties by a common tie, and whose fulfilment consists, therefore, in a continued business relation between the parties. Of this nature is a contract of partnership, when two or more men share either in work or goods, or work from the one and goods from the other, the purpose of such a company being the mutual advantage of both. And these contracts, along with those called gainful, are usually simple contracts.

- 479 10. But some contracts are also mixed and composed, as it were, of two transactions; for instance, if I knowingly buy a thing for a higher price and present the seller with that margin in the price; or, if I knowingly sell a thing for a lower price and present the buyer with that margin, it will be partly giving and partly buying and selling. Thus Caesar as Dictator sold at auction to Servilia great estates for a song. Suetonius, Julius Caesar, chap. l. So also, if I set a man's salary at more than the work involved warrants, it will be partly giving and partly hiring. This is what great men sometimes do in order to add to their renown, believing that it accords with their position to pay men more generously for their services than they deserve, and in this way adding to their contract a character of generosity. Add Matthew, xx. 9; Digest, XXVI. vii. 12, § 3.

It is a case in kind if I allow payment for only a part of my labour and make a present of the rest. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. V, chap. ii, § 10. If I promise to pay a goldsmith for making me some rings of his own material, it will be partly buying and partly hiring, as Grotius, loc. cit., § 5, concludes. Although others consider this buying, on the ground that the latter includes not only the price of the material but also that of the workmanship, and it makes little difference whether the particular form has been already made by the worker or is still to be agreed upon. Yet it cannot be called letting and hiring when the person contracted with does not offer his person. See Digest, XVIII. i. 20; Institutes, III. xxiv. 4. So also even the contract of emphyteusis appears to be a mixed one of buying and selling, and hiring and letting, even though a law of Zeno assigned it to a class to itself. In a feudal contract, likewise, the allotment of a fief is an act of gratuity, in so far as the land is of much more value than the military service which must be given for it; yet in so far as military service is required in return for wardship exercised by the lord for his vassal, it partakes somewhat of the contract of work for work, while the principle involved in that contract pertains to goods for work. But if there is attached to the concession of a fief the burden of a fixed sum of money, it is to that extent involved with emphyteusis.

¹ [For commutatoris read communicatoris, from the text of Grotius, II. xii. 4, and the obvious context here.—Tr.]

And finally, bottomry, which in general far surpasses all other forms of usury, is a mixed contract, composed of a contract of lending and a contract of avoidance of danger, that is, insurance. Yet although it is usual in a partnership for one party to furnish the money and work, and the other only money, yet it does not for that reason appear to be made a mixed contract. For a contract does not properly become mixed because of the different contributions (for example, should I hire a man to dig in my vineyard, sow my field, and plant my garden, it would still be a simple contract of letting and hiring), but because by one and the same agreement several undertakings of different natures are entered into.

Grotius, loc. cit., § 6, feels that a mixed contract also arises 'by an accession of one act to another', as in the giving of a bond and pledge. This does not appear sufficiently accurate, since from a mixture properly so called there results a third species, while a suretyship is not mixed with the principal contract, but is only joined to it as a kind of external assurance. Thus a debt is not altered by the addition of bondsman and the giving of security, but the creditor¹ is only given some protection in case the debt cannot be required of the original debtor. Yet in the offering of security there are properly speaking two contracts, which have the appearance only of one, for the reason that it includes a transaction of the same bondsman with both the creditor and the debtor. For between the bondsman and the creditor there appears to be a mere promise to intervene, yet accurately speaking that promise is merely the 480 reason why he owes it, not the cause for his obligation. For the cause of his obligation is the principal contract from which a bondsman by his promise has laid upon himself an obligation that serves to strengthen the contract. And therefore this promise is understood to take on the nature of that contract to which it is added as a surety. Nor has this suretyship the nature of a beneficent action with relation to the creditor, since the latter gets no profit from the bondsman, but only finds a proper way to secure what is his. Although this takes care of his interests, yet it obligates the debtor and not the creditor to feel grateful to the bondsman, for the latter would not have entered into the contract, had no security been offered.

¹ [For creditori read creditori.—Tr.]

But when the bondsman has paid the debt, there appears to arise an account between the former and the debtor, on the fiction that the bondsman gave the debtor a sum of money which he in turn used to pay the creditor. Although it is in effect the same if we say that the debtor ordered the bondsman to pay the debt, and must, therefore, restore the amount to him. Nor is the giving of a pledge in itself an act of generosity, since no gain accrues from it to the debtor, nor can he impute anything to the creditor for it, since the latter would not have made him the loan without the security.

CHAPTER III

ON THE EQUALITY TO BE OBSERVED IN ONEROUS CONTRACTS

- | | |
|---|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. There should be equality in onerous contracts. 2. Therefore the faults of a thing should be indicated; 3. Which the very nature of a contract requires. 4. Whether faults which do not of themselves touch the thing should be indicated. 5. Faults known to both parties need not be indicated. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 6. No one should be intimidated into making a contract. 7. Gainful contracts have no place for equality. 8. In an onerous contract it is presumed that nothing is given. 9. How far an inequality¹ that arises should be corrected. 10. Whether nature allows fraud in buying. |
|---|---|

ALL onerous contracts and such as yield no benefit, which are usually entered into when the prices of things are established as defined by law or the custom of the market, have this point in common, namely, that equality should be observed in them, that is, that each party to them should receive the same amount, and when inequality is found, the one who has received less acquires the right to demand that what he lacks be made up to him. And this is easily gathered from the purpose of such contracts. For they are entered into to the end that I receive from another some equivalent to a thing or labour that I have contributed, which for certain reasons I prefer to have, rather than to keep my goods or reserve my labour.

Although we are not in want of a more accurate demonstration. For since I have need of contracts to obtain things which I could not by law require of another, and so it is for him to decide whether or not he will give them to me, and since it is assumed that what a man finally gives me by contract he is unwilling to give me gratis, it follows that no one is believed to want to transfer anything to another by a contract, save in so far as he feels that he will, in return for his contribution, receive as much for his part.² And it furthermore follows, that a man, by a contract, can receive no right to what belongs to another, except in so far as that person believes his goods to be equal to what he receives for them. See Deuteronomy, xxv. 13 ff.; Digest, XLVII. ii. 52, § 22; XLVII. xi. 6, §§ 1, 2; XLVIII. x. 32, § 1.

2. Now in order to discover and determine this equality, it is 481 required that both parties know equally well the matter itself and its qualities, in so far as they are of consequence.³ Euripides, Cyclops, line

¹ [For In aequalitas read Inaequalitas.—Tr.]

² [For quipollens read aequipollens.—Tr.]

³ [This last clause was very properly added here by Barbeyrac from Pufendorf's revised statement of this principle in the De Officio Hominis et Civis, I. xv. 3.—Tr.]

137: 'The light of day accords with contracts.' Ovid, Art of Love, Bk. I [250-1]: 'Consult the daylight about jewels, about woof steeped in purple; consult the daylight about the figure and the proportion.' (R.) It follows from this that he who by contract wills to transfer a thing to another, should indicate not only its qualities that can be estimated, but also its shortcomings or faults, in so far as they are known to him; for unless this is done, it is impossible to fix clearly a just price. And here belong Digest, XIX. i. 1, § 1; XVIII. i. 43, § 2; as well as the whole section Digest, XXI. i, where are listed one after another the faults which should be indicated in the sale of cattle and slaves, and which give reason for refund in case they are concealed. Add Gellius, Bk. IV, chap. ii. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xvi]:

And with respect to the law of landed estates, it is ordained among us by the civil law, that in selling them, the faults should be declared which were known to the seller. For though by the Twelve Tables it was sufficient to be answerable for those defects which were expressly mentioned, yet he who denied, suffered a penalty of double the value; yet a penalty for silence was established also by the lawyers. For they determined, that, if the seller knew whatever defect there was in an estate, he ought to make it good, unless it was expressly mentioned. (E.)

Add the illustration which follows at this point. Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. III, chap. x: 'In contracts the defects of those things which are for sale are ordered to be recorded, which contracts, unless the vendor has mentioned the defects, are rendered void by an action for fraud' (R.) (although what he says about an action for fraud does not exactly square with the Roman laws). Lactantius, Bk. V, chap. xvii:

He who does not point out the error of the man who is offering something for sale (for example, if through an oversight he turns over a more valuable article than the agreement specified), in order that he may buy it for a smaller sum, or he who does not avow that he is offering for sale a runaway slave or an infected house, having an eye to his own gain and advantage, is not a wise man, as Carneades wished it to appear, but crafty and cunning. (C.*)

Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [p. 916 A, B]:

If a man sells a slave who is in a consumption,¹ or who has the disease of the stone, or of strangury, or epilepsy, or some other tedious and incurable disorder of body or mind which is not discernible to the ordinary man, if the purchaser be a physician or trainer, he shall have no right of restitution; nor shall there be any right of restitution if the seller has told the truth beforehand to the buyer. But if a skilled person sells to another who is not skilled, [...] if he loses the suit let him pay double the price at which he sold. If a private person sells to another private person, he shall have the right of restitution, and the decision shall be given as before, but he who loses the suit shall only pay back the price of the slave. (J.*)

And the same author makes this excellent observation in the same passage [p. 917 c]: 'Let no commendation or oath attend the sale of any article.'²

¹ [Pufendorf's reading, 'mental disorder', is incorrect.—Tr.]

² [This thought is in Plato at this point, but not in just these words.—Tr.]

3. The necessity to indicate these faults arises from the nature of the action, and from the fact, that, without it, a just price cannot be set, not because that bond of humanity, by which all men are joined, is properly more tightly drawn by the closing of contracts, or because a certain new relation is established between the contracting parties binding them to some duties over and above those required by the nature of a contract. For the two parties to a contract do not feel, after they have performed it, that they are any more indebted to each other than to any other man, except that the relationships in such a contract may often lead to friendship. Therefore, it is incorrect to use the fact that we can omit a thing without injury to the common law of humanity, as the basis for the statement that we can do the same thing when we enter upon contracts. So also it does not follow, that, because no man is bound by the sole law of humanity to disclose to every one the condition of his affairs, or to communicate to another all his knowledge, we are not bound in a contract to point out to another the defects of our possessions. For if I am not under contract I have certainly the 482 right to hide many things from others, even though I may be the only one to enjoy some profit from my silence, which would be shared by another, if I acquainted him with it. For instance, if I know that gems are found in a deserted place belonging to no one, I am not obligated to tell this to another that he also may share with me in the profit. See Matthew, xiii. 44, where the buyer would not have secured the field at so low a price, if he had told about the treasure. Compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 7. Here belongs the story of the farmer, Anicas, the discoverer of the Samajedi, as given in Londorpius, Continuatio Sleidani, for the year 1607. And Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [x], is right in saying:

Yet our own interests should not be neglected by us, nor given up to others when we ourselves want them; but each should serve his own interests, as far as it can be done without injustice to another:—Chrysippus has judiciously made this remark like many others: ‘He who runs a race, ought to make exertions, and struggle as much as he can to be victor; but he ought by no means to trip up or push with his hand the person with whom he is contesting. Thus in life it is not unjust that each should seek for himself what may pertain to his advantage—it is not just that he should take from another.’ (E.)

Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. III, chap. iv, has also repeated this passage.

Applicable to contracts is the statement of Valerius Maximus, Bk. VIII, chap. ii, n. 1: ‘An honest dealer ought not to exaggerate the expectation of good points, nor to obscure the consideration of bad ones.’ Under this head also comes the statement of Plato, Law, Bk. XI [p. 921 A B]:

When a man undertakes a work, the law gives him the same¹ advice which was given to the seller, that he should not attempt to raise the price, but simply ask the value; this

¹ [For idipsum read id ipsum.—Tr.]

the law enjoins also on the contractor; for the craftsman assuredly borrows the value of his work. Wherefore, in free states the man of art ought not to attempt to impose upon private individuals by the help of his art, which is by nature a true thing. (J.)

You may also apply to this principle what Socrates says that he learned from Aspasia, Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. II [vi. 36]: 'Good matchmakers have to consult truth when reporting favourably of any one: then indeed they are terribly clever at bringing people together: whereas false flatterers do no good; their dupes ended by hating each other and the go-betweens as well.' (D.)

4. But just as there is no doubt that notice should be given of those faults which properly concern a thing that is being contracted, so it was a frequent subject of discussion among the ancients, whether other things as well, which did not concern the actual matter at hand, and yet have some bearing on its value, should be indicated as much by the buyer as the seller. On this point Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xii], has this to say:

If (he observes) an honest man has brought from Alexandria to Rhodes a great quantity of grain during the scarcity and famine of the Rhodians, and the very high price of provisions; if this same man should know that many merchants had sailed from Alexandria, and should have seen their vessels on the way laden with corn, and bound for Rhodes, should he tell that to the Rhodians, or keeping silence, should he sell his own corn at as high a price as possible? In this case it seemed right to Antipater that everything should be disclosed, so that the buyer should not be ignorant of anything at all (no matter how it concerned the affair) that the seller knew. To Diogenes the Babylonian it appears that the seller ought, just as far as it is established by the municipal laws, to declare the faults, to act in other respects without fraud; and since he is selling, to wish to sell (to his own profit) at as good a price as possible. I have brought my corn—I have set it up for sale—I am selling it, not at a higher rate than others, perhaps even for less, since the supply is increased. The argument of Antipater proceeds on the other side. 'What do you say? When you ought to consult for the good of mankind, and to benefit human society, and were born under this law, that your interest should be the common interest, and reciprocally the common interest yours—will you conceal from men what advantage and plenty is near them?' Diogenes will answer, perhaps, in this manner: 'It is one thing to conceal, another thing to be silent. I do not conceal from you now, if I do not tell you what is the nature of the gods, or what is the supreme good; things, the knowledge of which would be more beneficial to you than the low price of wheat.' 'Yes indeed,' Antipater replies, 'it is necessary, that is, if you remember that there is a social tie established between men by nature.' 483 'I remember that,' he will answer, 'but is that social tie such that each has nothing of his own? for if it be so, we should not even sell anything, but make a present of it.'

In that matter Cicero [xiii] seems to incline toward the opinion of Antipater, in that he says that the concealment of the merchant is that 'not of an open, single-minded, ingenuous, just, good man; but rather of a wily, close, artful, deceitful, knavish, crafty, double-dealing, evasive fellow'. (E.)

And yet Cicero himself appears to free the merchant from the charge of deliberate deceit, when he says a little later, that deliberate deceit is 'when one thing is simulated and another done', which definition does not accord with the question before us. Therefore, it may rightly be said that the merchant did not commit an act of injustice in saying nothing about the ships behind him. For justice only requires that those things be indicated which of themselves concern the matter at hand, for instance, whether a house be infected with disease, or whether the magistrate has ordered it razed, both being instances used by Cicero in the passage before us. But in the case at hand nothing like this was concealed. The quality of the grain was quite apparent, and at the time when the contract was made, it was actually worth as much as it was being sold for, although it would have been worth less a short time afterwards. Nor did the Rhodians have a right, in the proper sense of the word, to learn this from the merchant, since they had no pact with him on that point.

Whether he acted against the law of beneficence and humanity is another question, which I would not hasten to answer in the affirmative. For if I am to be bound by humanity to do another a kindness, he should be in great need of having it done him gratis. Now the Rhodians needed grain and not money, since their wealth was a by-word among the ancients. Moreover, I am not obligated to do a kindness when the giver loses more than the receiver gains; and the merchant would have lost more profit by telling of the coming fleet, than the buyers would have gained in grain. For if it had been sold in small quantities at the market price, each of the purchasers would have lost but little, while if one man had taken it all, he might have laid it to his own avarice that he chose so poor a time to grasp at great profits. And, in truth, the general custom of life is not to stick to a too close observance of duties in transactions of this nature. We can easily overlook the necessity of beneficence in the case of merchants, provided they will not try to deceive us by their greed for profit.

5. But there is no need to mention faults of a thing already known to the buyer, for the equal knowledge of both parties to the contract makes them also equal. In the same way, when faults have been made known by the seller, the purchase cannot be recalled, since it is clear that the purchaser had already agreed to them. Here belongs the following passage from Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xvi]:

Gratidianus sold to Sergius Orata that house which he had himself purchased from the same man a few years before. This house was subject to a service to Sergius, but Marius <Gratidianus> had not mentioned this in the conditions of conveyance. The matter was brought to trial. Crassus was counsel for Orata; Antonius defended Gratidianus: Crassus relied on the law—whatever defect a seller who knows it had not disclosed, it is fit that he should make good: Antonius relied on the equity—that since that defect could not have been unknown to Sergius, who had formerly sold the house, there was no necessity that it should be disclosed; neither could he be deceived, who was aware under what liability that which he had bought was placed. (E.)

Or, as it is stated by Ulpian in Digest, XIX. i. 1, § 1: 'He does not appear to have had something concealed from him, who knew about it; nor did he need to be advertised of it, who was not ignorant.' Add Digest, XVIII. i. 43, § 1, 57, § 3; XXI. i. 65. A passage in Horace, Epistles, Bk. II, ep. ii [13], bears on this point, where he introduces a slave dealer, who, when about to sell to another man one of his slaves, after having detailed his good points, had this to add: 'He had a lazy fit once, and hid himself, as boys will, in fear no doubt of the lash that hangs on the staircase.' (Add Digest, XXIX. v. 1, § 33; XXI. i. 17) 'Pay your money, unless you find a difficulty in the escapade of which I have duly warned you: He would be on the right side of the law I trow, in taking his price. The goods are damaged, but you bought them with your eyes open: the conditions of sale were told you.' (W.) On the same basis rests the conclusion of Marius in Plutarch, Marius 484 [xxxviii, p. 427 E], and Valerius Maximus, Bk. VIII, chap. ii, § 3:

Fannia had been married to Tinnius, but after divorce she demanded the return of her dowry, which was considerable. Tinnius brought a countercharge of adultery, and the case was brought before the consul Marius. In the hearing it was ascertained that Fannia had been immodest, and yet that her husband, who knew the fact, had married her and lived a long time with her. Marius censured both parties; he ordered the man to restore the dowry, and the woman he fined the sum of four asses for her disreputable conduct.

Compare Digest, XLVIII. v. 13, §§ 9, 10.

6.¹ Furthermore, what is true of all pacts is especially true of contracts, namely, that neither of the parties may use unjust fear upon the other to make the contract. Therefore, the Lacedaemonians were right in deciding that the purchase of the land which the Eleans extorted from the owners by fear should be declared null, 'deciding that it was no more just to get property from the weaker by a forced purchase than by a forcible seizure.' (B.) Xenophon, Greek History, Bk. III [ii. 31]. Here belongs the passage in Cicero, Against Verres, Bk. IV [V. v], where he speaks of the statues and paintings brought by Verres from Sicily. This accusation Verres thought he could meet by simply saying, 'I purchased them'. But Cicero replies:

Our ancestors wisely provided that any men sent into provinces as governors should not be allowed to make any manner of purchase. For that reason they were supplied with silver and raiment out of the state funds. But slaves were not given them by the state, because there was no one in Rome of any position who did not already have some. Yet they made a law 'that no one should buy a slave except in the room of a slave who had died'. For they held it a robbery, not a purchase, when the seller was not allowed to sell on his own terms. And they were aware, that, in the provinces, if he who was there with the command and power of a governor wished to purchase what was in any one's possession, and was allowed to do so, it would come to pass that he would get whatever he chose, whether it was to be sold or not, at whatever price he pleased. (Y.)

Add Digest, XVIII. i. 46, 62; XLVIII. xi. 9, § 1; Code, IX. xxvii. 6; II. xix. 11; Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. I, tit. lxxxviii, § 1. Tacitus,

¹ [For 'g' read 'G'.—Tr.]

Annals, Bk. XIV [xiv, towards the end]: 'When the pay comes from one who can command, it bears the character of compulsion.' (R.) On this point bears what Dio Cassius, Bk. XLII [1], says of Caesar:

After his victory over Pompey he applied the term 'borrowing' to those levies of money for which there was no other reasonable excuse; for he exacted these sums also in a high-handed way and no less by force than he collected money actually due him, and it was his intention never to repay them. (C.)

Yet it happens rather often that perpetual or temporary subjects are forced by the government to undertake contracts which are usually of sale or hire, when, for instance, merchants are compelled to sell something of which the state is in great need, or to let their services, wagons, and ships. This is entirely proper when the public service or necessity requires it, and the price of the conveyance and merchandise is justly met. It is not uncommon also for states to require that a man must buy from one person and from no one else, if he wishes some particular kind of things.

7. But it is clear enough that this equality does not belong to gainful contracts, for when the reward is made equal to the work, it becomes a different kind of transaction. See Institutes, III. xxvi. 13; Digest, XVI. iii. 1, § 9. Upon the addition of a fee or reward, a contract takes on the character of hiring. Yet in a charge and trust, although indirectly and circumstantially, an equality will be observed, so that if any expense beyond the actual service necessary has been incurred regarding the affairs or the property of another, it is fully met, since the agreement in such contracts concerned only free service, and any expense will have to be repaid as by a tacit contract of loan. See Digest, XVI. iii. 12 pr.

8. But in onerous contracts this equality must be observed, that, 485 what a man has received in excess of his proper share, he cannot excuse on the claim of a presumed donation. For those who enter such contracts are not generally supposed to have any intention of making the other party a present. And so no mixture of a contract with a gift is presumed, unless the other party has expressly stated it, or unless it appear that he knew that the object or work was under-estimated. An instance is found in Pliny, Letters, Bk. VII, ep. xiv: 'He had, for friendship's sake, sold that estate at a low price.' (B.) In general the act of Scaevola, as given in Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xv], is praiseworthy: 'When he required that a price of a property of which he was about to become a purchaser should be named to him once for all, and the seller had done so, he said that he valued it at more, and added a hundred thousand¹ sesterces.' (E.)*

9. It follows from what has been said, that even though all the recognized faults of a thing have been pointed out, and no more has been required than was felt to be due, yet in case some inequality in the thing is afterwards discovered without the fault of the contracting parties (suppose some fault was overlooked or there was an error in the price), it also must be corrected, and we must take from him that has more and give to him that has less. Add Digest, XVIII. i. 13 pr., §§ 1-4; XXI. i. 1, § 2. Nor does the law of nature require that this inequality exceed one-half of the just price. For that famous law in Code, IV. xliv. 2, where it is stated that an action may be brought to break a contract or make up the just price, 'provided one-half of the just price has not been paid,' is only positive, and is based primarily upon the argument that the courts would be unable to meet the demands made upon them, if the judge could be appealed to for even the very slightest injury. A further argument is that the nature of business requires him who would not be deceived, to keep his eyes open. Especially since no matter how highly the merchant values his wares, the final determination of the price rests upon the will of the buyer. Here may also be applied the saying of Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xv]: 'The laws abolish iniquities, as far as they can lay hold of them by the hand, the philosophers, as far as they can check them by reason and intelligence.' (E.*) Although, as a matter of fact, this law of the Code is too severe to be just. For granting that the judge is not to be worn out with matters of little importance, yet there is no reason for him to refuse his aid when a man has been grossly injured, even though not to one-half of the price. For instance, if I have sold a house for 600 something or other, when it was worth 900, why should I be denied all aid of the law to recover my 300, since an action is allowed for far smaller sums? Therefore, just as among those who are only under the law of nature and nations, a small injury received through no malice of the contracting parties does not give sufficient cause to break the contract or enter complaint, so when it is of a graver nature, even though it may not reach one-half of the just price, it is right to demand, either that the contract be broken, or else that the amount by which it falls short of the just price, be made good. And the gravity of an injury is measured either by the greatness of the price, or by the slender means of the injured party, which are sometimes seriously embarrassed by a loss that could be overlooked by a more wealthy person. Nay, even in states where the aforesaid law is observed, a buyer must with good conscience make good for a serious injury, although it may be less than one-half, since the purpose of that law was not so much to confirm a profit made at the expense of another, as to relieve the judge of a mass of litigation. Yet the same law provides that no right or action is allowed for such an injury against a fellow citizen. But the lawyers were right in maintaining that the benefit of this law should be allowed not only to the buyer but also to the seller, and should be extended to other contracts as well. Selden, Bk. VI, chap. v, observes:

¹ [Following the better reading centum, 'hundred', instead of decem, 'ten' in Pufendorf.—Tr.]

If any Jew had cheated another Jew, in a purchase or sale in good faith, of a sixth part of the price, he had to restore it, whether he be purchaser or seller, but not if it was less than a sixth part. If the loss was more than a sixth part, the purchaser could break the contract and reclaim his purchase price by an action for recovery, either on the spot or so long as the transaction had not been closed. But if the loss fell upon the seller, he could reclaim his article any time thereafter. This rule applied also in the sale of usable articles, such as fruits, seeds, and the like. But only a Jew could make use of this law when injured, not a Gentile when cheated by a Jew. 486

10. The expositors of Roman law have laboured hard to reconcile with what has been said, a passage in Digest, IV. iv. 6, § 4 [IV. iv. 16. 4]: 'In purchase and sale the contracting parties are free to take advantage of one another about the price, upon principles of natural law.' (M.) Add Digest, XIX. ii. 22, § 3. We are in entire agreement with the explanation of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 26, where he shows that 'may' and 'must' do not always denote what is lawful but only what is merely permitted, so that no relief is offered against the man who wishes to defend himself by citing a pact, who, that is, on being addressed upon the subject of his unjust price, vouchsafes no other reply, than that those were the terms of the agreement, and that he who will not open his eyes, may, as the proverb runs, open his purse. Add Law of the Bavarians, tit. XV, chap. ix, § 1, and Capitularies of Charles, Bk. V, chap. ccx. So also the following rule is given in Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. II [x. 4]: 'Good economists tell us that when a precious article can be got at a low price we ought to buy.' (D.) Add the witty remark of Cicero in Gellius, Bk. XII, chap. xii. See also Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VI, chap. xxxviii, where he questions whether it was proper of Demades 'at Athens to obtain a verdict against one who sold furniture for funerals, by proving that he had prayed for great gains, which he could not obtain without the death of many persons.' (S.) Add *Capitularies of Charles*¹, Bk. I, chap. cxxxi.

Regarding the stratagem of Jacob in Genesis, xxx. 37, it may be observed that his shrewdness deserves our sympathy more for the reason that he was dealing with a wicked man who was trying to outdo him by every means at his disposal, and who, furthermore, had made the hard terms with him that he should receive no other pay for his tending of the cattle than a part of the young, and yet should make good all accidents. Genesis, xxxi. 39. So also the word 'naturally' does not always signify what should be done or what agrees with natural law, but also what is customary, as in I Corinthians, xi. 14. Although in this passage the phrase τὸ κομᾶν [to have long hair] may be taken also to mean too great care in arranging the hair, which women lay claim to, in a way, as their right, but among men savours of effeminacy, according to the saying [Ovid, Heroides, IV. 75]: 'Away from me with your young men arrayed like women!' (S.) Although, in all truth, natural reason dictates that it is unworthy of a man to assume that manner of dress which immemorial custom uses to distinguish the female sex from the male.

¹ [For Carolil. read Caroli.—Tr.]

A further law on this matter is in Code, IV. xlv. 8:

The substance (that is, universal custom) in purchase and sale¹ is that the purchaser and the seller come to the business, one hoping to get it more cheaply, the other to sell it more dearly; and finally, after a great deal of argument, as the seller comes down a little in the price asked, and the buyer adds something to his first offer, they agree upon a fixed price.

Not absurdly does Anacharsis, in Diogenes Laertius [I. 105], call a market-place 'an established place for men to cheat one another, and behave covetously', and where it is considered fair 'for any one to be cunning to his own profit'. Add, however, Digest, XXI. i. 18, 19. Indeed, men are by natural instinct urged on to secure their own advantage, and for this reason it has been felt that trade could scarcely be carried on in a state, were not some place left for business shrewdness. See Digest, XVIII. i. 71. Nay, according to Pliny, Letters, Bk. I, chap. xxiv, a man who allows himself to be imposed upon deserves to be laughed at: 'A dear bargain is always a disagreeable thing, particularly 487 as it reflects upon the buyer's judgement.' (B.) Horace, Satires, Bk. I, sat. ii [103-5]: 'Or would you rather have a trick played on you and your money taken away before the merchandise is shown?' (W.)

A further consideration seems to lie in a tacit indulgence of the parties to the contract who appear to allow each other a slight variation from that precise equality, in view of the fact that they are scarcely able to define it with precision. Therefore, it is a kind of general law of the market, that every one be free to buy or sell on the best possible terms, provided there be no deception in the article itself. Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xxi. For if there is such deception, there will be place for the statement of Fulgentius, Mythology, Bk. I [xviii], that Mercury presides over trade and thievery: 'Because there is no difference between the stealing and lying of a tradesman and the perjury and robbery of a thief.' We may note, in passing, that, according to Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. XIV, chap. xlv, the Ephors fined a young man because he had bought a farm too cheap, giving as their reason that for a young man he was too much inclined to drive a good bargain.

Mornay in his remarks on this law explains the word 'naturally' as εὐφύως, 'cleverly', which is quite wrong, for the word goes not with circumvenire (circumvent) but with licet (is permissible).

¹ [For venditionis read venditionis.—Tr.]

CHAPTER IV

ON GAINFUL CONTRACTS IN PARTICULAR

- | | |
|---|---|
| 1. The definition of a mandate. | 5. Whether a mandate may be fulfilled by an equivalent. |
| 2. The singular veneration for it among the Romans. | 6. On a loan and how it differs from a voluntary grant. |
| 3. The agent commissioned should show the utmost diligence. | 7. On a deposit. |
| 4. How far he should be reimbursed. | |
-

OUR next task is to consider more closely some points regarding the more important contracts. Now although they have been fully treated by the expositors of the Roman law, yet in view of the fact that most of them have been derived from the law of nature and nations, it is fitting that they be claimed for their proper source.

Now we assign the first place among gainful contracts to a mandate, whereby a man undertakes to care for another's business gratis at his request and upon his mandate. And yet this contract does not presuppose the dominions and prices of things directly and of itself, but only as a secondary consideration, in so far as the principal must repay the expenses which the agent has been put to, in addition to the work promised gratis on the business transacted. But if a man has undertaken another's business without his knowledge, and has conducted it with profit, the Roman laws allowed him an action 'for services rendered', the basis of which we can conveniently call an implied mandate, which is the same basis also for that obligation which lies between guardian and ward. See Digest, XLIV. vii. 5 pr., § 1.

2. The ancient Romans accorded a special reverence and sanctity, as it were, to a mandate, on the ground that it derived its source from humanity and friendship, which are the strongest bonds between men, while he who shelters himself beneath them in working deceit upon a person who thinks too highly of his honesty, is justly regarded as an object of detestation. See Digest, III. ii. 1; XVII. i. 1, § 4. Cicero, For Sextus Roscius [xxxviii, xxxix]:

In private affairs if any one had managed a business entrusted to him, I will not say maliciously for the sake of his own gain, but even carelessly, our ancestors thought that he had incurred the greatest disgrace. Therefore, legal proceedings for betrayal of a mandate are established, involving penalties no less disgraceful than those for theft. I suppose because, in cases where we ourselves cannot be present, the vicarious faith of friends is substituted; and he who impairs that confidence, attacks the common bulwark of all men, and as far as depends on him, disturbs the bonds of society. For we cannot do everything ourselves; different people are more capable in different affairs. On that account friendships are formed, that the common advantage of all may be secured by mutual good offices. Why do you undertake a mandate, if you are either going to neglect it, or turn it to your own advantage? Why do you offer yourself to me, and by feigned service hinder and prevent my advantage? Get out of the way, I will do my business by means of some one else. You undertake the burden of a duty which you think you are able to support; a burden which does not appear very heavy to those who are not very worthless themselves. This fault, therefore, is very base, because it violates two most holy things, friendship and confidence; for men commonly do not entrust anything except to a friend, and do not trust any one except one whom they think faithful. It is therefore the part of a most abandoned man, at the same time to dissolve friendship and to deceive him who would not have been injured unless he had trusted him. (Y.*)

Plautus, Mercator, Act II, sc. iii [376]: '[. . .] All sensible men should give a mandate their very first attention.' (N.*)

3. For the same reason the Roman laws require the most exacting diligence in fulfilling a mandate, even though it has been undertaken purely for the sake of the person who has entrusted it. See Jacques Godefroy on Digest, L. xvii. 23. A perfect example of this is Atticus, as he is portrayed in his life by Cornelius Nepos, chap. xv:

Whatever he was asked to do, he did not promise without solemnity (that is, with great caution and circumspection), for he thought it the part, not of a liberal, but of a light-minded man, to promise what he would be unable to perform. (Compare Terence, Andria, Act IV, sc. i, line 5 [629 f.]): But in striving to effect what he had once engaged to do, he used to take so much pains, that he seemed to be engaged, not in an affair entrusted to him, but in his own. Of a matter which he had once taken in hand, he was never weary; for he thought his reputation, than which he held nothing more dear, concerned in the accomplishment of it. (W.)

Yet it appears that in such a contract one should consider what kind of presumption on a man's industry and diligence may be gathered by his former deeds and the general tenor of his life. For whoever has entrusted his affairs to a careless man has only himself to blame, unless the latter undertakes to show the diligence which belongs to careful men, and was in the first place fitted to show such diligence. A story found in Sadi, Persian Rosegarden, chap. vii, can serve to illustrate this. A man suffering with his eyes came to a veterinary¹ for a cure. The latter anointed his eyes with the same salve which he used upon beasts, but the patient goes blind. When the case is brought before the judge he says, 'You have no case for damages against the doctor, for if the patient had not been an ass, he would never have gone to a veterinary.'

4. On the other hand the agent should be reimbursed for expenses incurred on a thing entrusted to him. For in undertaking such a matter a pact is tacitly understood, whereby he promised nothing save his labour, industry, and good faith; and it would be scarcely fair to make a man's willingness burdensome to him. The same is also to be said of damage which a man experiences by reason of a mandate, but not of that which he incurs merely on the occasion of one. And so the principal will have only to meet the losses which flow directly from the business itself, but not those which arise on the side, as it were, while the business is being undertaken. Here applies Digest, XVII. i. 26, § 6:

¹ [For mulo medicum read mulomedicum.—Tr.]

The agent shall not charge against his principal everything that he would not have spent had he not accepted the agency; as if he was robbed by highwaymen, or lost his property by shipwreck, or was put to expense because of his own illness or that of some of his party. For these things should be charged to the account of chance occurrences rather than to the agency which was undertaken.

This means that whoever undertakes the management of another's affairs of his own accord and good will, is supposed to recognize that all chance happenings which are wont to come upon us unawares, are at his own risk. But we must rule otherwise, in case a man uses his authority to make another man undertake his business, for here a greater necessity lies upon him who gives the order, to save from loss him who was unable to resist the command. But if a man undertakes some perilous business, it is understood that he accepted also the risks which regularly accompany such a business, unless he has expressed himself to the contrary. Compare Mornay on this law, Digest, XVII. i. 26, § 6. Another law to the same purpose is in Digest, XVII. ii. 52, § 4. 489¹

5. It is a moot question whether a mandate can be fulfilled by an equivalent, and we find it excellently debated in Gellius, Bk. I, chap. xiii:

It has been a subject of inquiry, [...] whether an office being given you, and what you are to do clearly defined, you may be allowed to depart from this, if by so doing the affair shall promise a more fortunate issue, with respect to the advantage of the person employing you. (Those who say no assert): There are not a few, who, having decidedly fixed their opinion, that a matter being reflected upon, and determined by him whose business and concern it might be, this could by no means be departed from, although some unexpected event might promise a more fortunate issue, lest, if their hopes should be disappointed, the fault of disobedience be incurred, and a penalty not to be deprecated. If accidentally the thing should turn out better, the gods indeed are to be thanked; but an example should seem to be introduced, by which counsels carefully resolved upon, should be corrupted, the obligation of a trust being broken. (Others on the contrary) have thought, that the inconvenience to be apprehended from the affair's being done contrary to what had been commanded, should first be weighed with the advantages expected; and if the former appeared comparatively light and trifling, and the advantage greater and more important from a well-grounded expectation, then the command might be departed from, lest a providential opportunity of successful enterprise should be passed by. Nor did they think the example of disobedience at all to be feared, if similar reasons could not be urged. (There follow then some precepts of prudence:) A particular regard should be paid to the genius and disposition of the person whose office was undertaken, lest he should prove ferocious, without sensibility, unimpressible, and implacable. (B.*)

Such was the case of Cn. Piso in Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. xvi, for if a reason must be returned to one who gives such an order, it will be the safest course to do nothing other than has been commanded.

Gellius adds an illustration from the case of P. Crassus Mutianus, who sent an engineer to bring the larger of two beams for use upon a battering-ram. When the latter brought the smaller judging it to be better fitted to the work, he had him scourged, 'because he felt that the entire function of a commanding officer was ruined and destroyed, if a man should obey an order that had been issued¹ to him, not in the spirit of the obedience which was due, but upon his own counsel which had not been asked for.' Yet it can be said for the engineer that when Crassus sends a man skilled in that science and tells him what use he has for the beam, it appears that he is thereby admitted in a sense to his counsel. Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xxvi.

¹ [For CAPUT III read CAPUT IV.—Tr.]

On the other hand, among instances of mildness there is one in Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio's History, and Zonaras, Bk. II, of the emperor Hadrian, who, when the crowd was furiously demanding something, ordered the herald to proclaim silence. But the latter fearing the effect of such a harsh and bold command secured quiet by stretching forth his hand and then announced, 'The emperor wills this same thing'; nor did the emperor take offence at his act. Lampridius, Commodus [i]: 'When it happened that his bath was drawn too cool, he ordered the bathkeeper to be cast into the furnace; whereupon the slave who had been ordered to do this burned a sheep skin in the furnace, in order to make him believe by the stench of the vapour that the punishment had been carried out.' (M.) Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvi, § 21, feels that a mandate can be fulfilled by something equally useful, if it is established that what was commanded was not done so under its own special form, but under the general consideration or understanding of some advantage which can be secured as well in some other way.

- 490 Now the matter resolves itself into this. Sometimes the mere business to be performed is declared in the mandate, while the manner of the performance is left to the judgement and skill of the agent, as is expressed in the saying, 'Send a skilled person, but give him no orders.' Sometimes the manner is stipulated, but more in the way of advice, and how the principal feels the matter can best be accomplished, while the agent is not forbidden to use his own skill, provided some other method appears more expeditious, when he has come to apply himself to the task. Sometimes, finally, the manner is prescribed in such a way that a man may not depart from it at all, no matter how the thing may turn out. It is quite clear, then, that a mandate can be fulfilled by an equivalent not in the last case but only in the second. In defence of this there is a case in Digest, XVII. i. 62, § 1, which runs as follows: 'I commissioned you to go surety for Titius with Sempronius; you, however, did not do so but commissioned Sempronius to trust Titius. If you have been to any expense on that account, the question is whether you can bring action against me.' The answer is given in the affirmative. For I gained my end, which was that Sempronius would make a loan to Titius; and it is all the same to me whether that was done by your going surety, or giving a mandate, since I am bound by the one as well as the other to pay you what you were out of pocket on that score.

¹ [Fox russus read iussus.—Tr.]

Yet, as has been observed by Boecler, Dissertatio de Religione Mandati, a careful distinction is to be made between the mandate under orders and that on commission, or, in other words, between a mandate undertaken on the command of one with authority, and that undertaken of one's own free will. These two are entirely distinct and have nothing in common but the name; and so a man versed in these matters will not apply to the commands of superiors the legal tradition regarding the undertaking of a commission between citizens. For in private undertakings it is easy to presume that the manner of conducting a matter has been prescribed to another only by way of advice, and that room has been left for the agent to use his judgement in altering it. But whoever lays some mandate upon another by virtue of his authority is understood to have ordered its bare execution, and so no deviation will be allowed from the manner prescribed, unless, as frequently happens, the agent have received by an express statement permission to add to or change it as conditions and circumstances warrant, or unless such a course be warranted by an interpretation of the words that is appropriate to the purpose of the principal and the end of his order, and is framed according to the form of right reason and the rules commonly accepted by sane men. For the true will of a man is held to be that which a lawful interpretation has suggested. Yet this liberty must by no means be indulged in save by necessity, for otherwise every force of authority would vanish and a commonwealth would often come to disaster, if a minister should try to arrogate to his own initiative the functions belonging to the supreme sovereign. Otho in Tacitus, Histories, Bk. I, chap. lxxxiii: 'If every subaltern may discuss the reasons for his orders, discipline is at an end, and the authority of the commander falls to the ground.' (O.) And in the same author, Histories, Bk. II, chap. xxxix, evil fame belongs to the soldier who is 'more disposed to scan than to execute his general's orders'. (O.) Add Digest, XLIX. xvi. 3, § 15; and Livy, Bk. XLIV, chap. xxxiv. Yet in some cases ministers vested with great authority are right in neglecting foolish commands of princes. See 2 Kings, xviii. 14; xix. 6; Valerius Maximus, Bk. III, chap. viii, § 1; Cornelius Nepos, Epaminondas, chaps. vii, viii; Bussièrès, Historia Francica, Bk. XI, p. 391, on Bavalan postponing the murder of Clisson, which his Duke had enjoined upon him. There is also a noteworthy passage on this point in Hieronymus Osorius, De Gestis Emanuel., Bk. XI, where the Viceroy of India did not seize the city of Aden when he had the chance, because it was against the command of the king; and yet acquisition of that city would have been of untold advantage.

6. A loan, which consists in our giving another the free use of a 491 thing of ours, is governed by the following laws: That a man protect it with all forethought and show toward it the care that the most diligent men observe in their own affairs. Digest, XIII. vi. 5, § 5. In the second place, the article lent should not be put to other uses, nor appropriated any further than the lender agreed to. See Valerius Maximus, Bk. VIII, chap. ii, § 4; Gellius, Bk. VII, chap. xv; Digest, XIII. vi. 5, § 8 at end; XLVII. ii. 45, § 1. And, lastly, it must be returned uninjured and as it was received (see Digest, XIII. vi. 3, § 1), save that the lender is understood to have granted gratis what it has lost by ordinary use. Add Digest, XIII. vi. 23. But if I have lent a thing for a certain time, and meanwhile I begin to be in serious need of it for some reason not foreseen at the time of the loan, the other must return it at once upon my demand without hesitation. For it is presumed that no one lends another his things gratis, save in so far as he can himself do without them and suffer no inconvenience; and that only a careless man and one who would make a mockery of others would lend something of his for a time when he himself will need it. Therefore, a loan which has a set time added to it, carries this tacit exception: Provided in the meanwhile I have no real need of it. Save for this exception the withdrawal of a loan should not be made before the time. See Digest, XIII. vi. 17, §§ 3, 4.

We should add, at this point, in what respect a loan agrees with and differs from a voluntary grant. They agree with respect to the things and their use, for things which allow a loan also allow a voluntary grant, and in both cases the use is given gratis. They differ in that a loan is a contract, a voluntary grant is not, the former is δύπλευρον, 'obligatory on both parties', the latter¹ only μονόπλευρον [on one]. In a loan a thing is given for a certain time or end, a voluntary grant only so long as the giver desires. The recipient of a loan makes good every loss, he who is allowed a voluntary grant only what is due to his knavery or negligence. See Wissenbach's² remarks in his Disputationes [Juris Civilis], xxiv. 19.

It is questioned whether the recipient of a loan is obligated to make good the value of the thing, or any other loss connected with it, provided it was caused by some chance accident and one which he was unable to prevent. This is commonly denied. See Digest, XLIV. vii. 1, § 4. But I feel that a distinction should be drawn as to whether or not the thing would have perished in the possession of the owner, had he not given it to the recipient. If this is so, there need be no restitution. But if not, equity seems in every case to advise that it be made, since otherwise my kindness would be too dear, if, in addition to granting its free use, I had to go without the thing itself, which I would not have lost had it not been for the other party. Nor does there appear any reason why I should meet a misfortune any more than the other, since he, in sooth, is the one who furnished the occasion that made it possible for misfortune to overtake my possession. In Digest, XIII. vi. 21, 22, it is stated that the value must be paid of a loan that has been stolen, although some thefts take place without any fault whatsoever on the part of the victims. And yet, when, for example, a man has lost all at once by fire everything that he had, and has been reduced to poverty, it would be hard to demand from him the value of a loan. And in cases where such accidents are wont to occur with some frequency, as shipwreck for those who sail the sea, it may be presumed that the lender was willing to take the risk of them upon himself. And I should venture that we ought to limit in this way the law given in Digest, XIII. vi. 18 pr., 5, §§ 4 and 7. Likewise, I cannot approve Digest, XIII. vi. 19, with which Digest, XIII. vi. 12, § 1, does not appear to be in entire agreement.

¹ [For hoc read hoc.—Tr.]

² [For Wissenbach read Wissenbach.—Tr.]

But the recipient of a loan will be held all the more responsible when he could have saved what was lent him from some disaster, such as a fire or shipwreck, but preferred to save his own as more valuable. For although it cannot be held against him as a fault, that he preferred to have a thing of less value lost, yet, since it could have been saved, and he allowed it to perish for his own gain, there is no reason why the lender should be the one to feel the loss. Digest, XIII. vi. 5, § 4. See also Exodus, xxii. 13-15, and Digest, XIII. vi. 18 pr., 1, § 35 [XVI. iii. 18 pr., 1, § 35]. On the other hand, it is no less fair, that, if any advantageous or necessary expenses have been incurred on a thing lent, beyond those which ordinarily attend the use of it, they should be met by the owner. Add Digest, XIII. vi. 18, § 2. 492

7. In the case of a deposit, where we commit to another's trust something that is ours or concerns us in some way or other, for him to guard it gratis, it is the first requirement that the thing entrusted be guarded with all diligence and be restored to the owner whenever he calls for it. See Digest, XVI. iii. 12, § 3. Although sometimes, under certain circumstances, a deposit need not be restored immediately upon demand. Philo Judaeus, On Noah's Planting [xxiii]:

Having taken a deposit from a man while he is sober, you must not restore it to him while he is drunk, or intemperate, or mad. For in such a case although he may have received the advantage of having his own back again, he will have no opportunity of being benefited by it. Again, you must not restore a deposit to debtors or to slaves, while their creditors or the masters are present; for that is betraying, and not a restoration of a deposit. (Y.*)

Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxv]:

If any man in sound mind should have entrusted a sword to you, and having gone mad, should ask it back, to restore would be a crime; not to restore, a duty. What, if he who may have deposited money with you, should levy war against your country, ought you to restore the deposit? I think not. For you would be acting against your country, which ought to be most dear to you. (E.*)

Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. x:

To restore what has been entrusted to one is desirable in itself; yet I shall not always restore it, nor shall I do so in any place or at any time you please. Sometimes it makes no difference whether I deny that I have received it, or return it openly. I shall consider the interests of the person to whom I am to return it, and shall deny that I have received a deposit which would injure him if returned. (S.)

Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. I, last chapter [1], offers these illustrations:

When a man demands back his money as an open enemy, to use it against his country, and to offer his wealth to barbarians. Or if you should have to restore it, whilst another stood by to extort it from him by force. If you restore money to a raving lunatic when he cannot keep it; if you give up to a madman a sword once put by him with you, whereby he may kill himself, is it not an act contrary to duty to pay the debt? Is it not contrary to duty to take knowingly what has been got by a thief, so that he who has lost it is cheated out of it? (R.*)

But even if it has been agreed that a thing be restored at a certain time, a man may change his mind and ask it back before the expiration of the time. See Digest, XVI. iii. 1, §§ 45, 46. This appears to be opposed by a passage in Quintilian, Declamations, ccxlv:

One deposit is made to be returned upon demand; another for a fixed term. How was this thing deposited? To be paid you when you quit your extravagance. When you called for it you were still extravagant. Therefore, it was not due, and he cannot be regarded as having betrayed his trust because he refused it to you at a time when he could not have been forced to turn it over, even if he had admitted that the deposit was in his possession.

In this case, as it appears to me, we must say that if the man who demanded it is the person who made the deposit, it cannot be denied him. But if another deposited it, and someone else, for instance, his heir, called for it before the time has elapsed, the holder of the deposit was not required to restore it before the heir had complied with the requirement by laying aside his luxurious style of living. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. iii, § 5.

As for the degree of diligence required in guarding a deposit, it is in general stated that common diligence, which excludes fraud and criminal negligence, is sufficient, and this because, in the first place, such a contract is entered into only for the sake of the depositor, and there is no advantage in such cases for the trustee; and because, in the second place, that man is not free from fault who has entrusted his property to an untrustworthy person. And for this reason no blame attaches to a man who in guarding a deposit has shown his customary degree of care, or such as he regularly observes in his own affairs, however little that may be. See Digest, XLIV. vii. 1, § 5. But since some degree of friendship regularly intervenes in a deposit (for practically no one ever deposits a thing save with a friend or one of whose probity he is convinced), I should hold in general that in guarding a charge such care should be used as diligent men commonly are wont to show regarding their own property. Yet the greatest care is to be shown at times, not only when it has been expressly agreed upon, but also when the nature of the charge demands it, as when it is a thing of great value, or all of a man's fortune depends upon it. Add Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. II, chap. xxix. 493

Now this diligence consists not in one's watching it like a sentry night and day, but in keeping it in the safest place that he has, and where it is the least likely to suffer injury. Therefore, although I have satisfied the laws of friendship if I guard the goods of a friend as carefully as I do my own, and no one can rightfully demand that I neglect my own in comparison with another's, if they are both of equal value, yet it will be but just, that, if both cannot be saved, I should abandon a cheaper thing of my own and save a more valuable deposit; for instance, who would not feel, that, when a fire breaks out, a chest filled with gold or other precious things, or of documents and writings of great importance, should not be saved before some cheap furniture? Yet the depositor is required to pay me the price of those things of mine which were lost when I undertook to save his goods before my own, as well as other expenses incurred on the deposit or losses which I suffered because of it. But if a man preferred some less valuable possession of his to a more valuable deposit, when there was no agreement on such diligence and care, he will be judged only to have broken the laws of friendship and humanity, and to have no responsibility to make good the value of the thing lost. For he is made no richer by such conduct, and the fact that he neglected the offices of simple friendship and humanity does not obligate him to make up the consequent loss. The reason for the Roman laws requiring a less degree of diligence in a deposit than in a mandate, is that the latter is managed by our own special act, which we can also direct, in every circumstance that concerns it, by our own judgement, while in the case of a charge no one wants me obligated to keep watch over it without ever closing my eyes. Therefore, it is enough if I have put it in a proper place and examine it only when some special reason impels me, just as we usually do with such things of our own as may not be injured by storing and are not necessary to our use. On the law of Exodus, xxii. 12, Grotius adds this comment: 'Provided there was criminal negligence, which is not far removed from knavery.'

But the further question is often raised, whether the recipient of a charge may make use of it. Clearly he may not without the consent of the depositor, in case it is injured by any kind of use. In Gellius, Bk. VII, chap. xv [VI. xv], Scaevola says: 'Whoever applied to his own use that which was entrusted to his care, or, receiving anything for a particular purpose, applied it to a different one, was liable to the charge of theft.' (B.) Add Institutes, IV. i, § 6. But if the article is none the worse for the use, for instance, if a silver cup is set out to ornament a dining-hall, or is used for the service of an honoured guest, I see no reason why the trustee may not so use it, provided it is not a special point with the owner that the deposit be not seen by others, and the trustee recognizes that he must make good any risk that it may run in such use. But on no account may the charge be taken from the wrappings or box in which the owner has put it. Add Digest, XVI. iii. 1, § 36. But if a consumable thing has been given over, neither wrapped nor sealed, the trustee will not be able to use it up unless he is in the position to restore an article of the same kind, and of the same quantity and quality, whenever the owner may desire it, for we often are in such need of articles of this kind that we are unwilling to accept others in their place.

494 Finally, the Roman laws rightfully established that whoever denies or knavishly refuses to restore a charge given him by a poor man, or because of impending civil tumult, fire, some catastrophe, or shipwreck, shall be fined twofold, since those who do not scruple to make ill-gotten gains out of the loss of men who are deserving of pity, surely deserve punishment for their inhuman wickedness. See Digest, XVI. iii. 1, §§ 1, 2, 4. Quintilian, Declamations, ccxlv, adds: 'A deposit ought to be restored all the more faithfully, because they are generally made secretly and without evidence.' Add Exodus, xxii. 7-9; Leviticus, vi. 2 ff. Nay, it is my opinion that it is a baser crime to deny or make away with a deposit than to steal it, for by the latter only justice and the right of dominion are violated, but, by the former, friendship and humanity as well. Nicolaus of Damascus [frag. 103 l Jakoby]: 'Among the Pisidians the worst crime is that involving a deposit; if a man is convicted of making away with one he is put to death.' For there is no force in the view that when a deposit has been placed, as it were, in another's hands, an opportunity, which ordinarily is some incentive to sin, is furnished him to make away with it, while a thief carefully makes the opportunity to fall upon the property of others, and furthermore offers violence to that bond of common sacredness by which every man regards his home as the place of greatest safety. For surely a guardian who has violated a ward committed to his care and received into his home, is not judged to have committed a less serious offence. Add Aristotle, Problems, Sect. xxix, qu. 2 and 6; Digest, XLVII. ii. 1, § 2; XLVII. ii. 67.

It is clear, of course, that since the custody of a charge is given gratis, any expense incurred on it should be repaid. For this reason the decision is correct of Digest, XVI. iii. 12 pr.: 'If the deposit is made in Asia to be repaid in Rome, the result of such a transaction appears to be that the depositor is to meet the expense involved, and not the man with whom the deposit is made.'

CHAPTER V

ON ONEROUS CONTRACTS IN PARTICULAR, AND FIRSTLY, ON BARTERING, BUYING, AND SELLING

-
- | | |
|---|---|
| 1. On bartering. | 5. What the buyer should perform for the seller and the seller for the buyer. |
| 2. When is a contract of buying and selling closed? | 6. On the buying of prospects. |
| 3. On the risk and gain of a thing sold. | 7. On monopolies. |
| 4. On pacts commonly added to selling. | |
-

THE first place among onerous contracts is properly accorded to bartering, since in the earliest times before the introduction of money commerce was carried on in that way alone. Tacitus, Germany [v]: 'The remoter inhabitants continue the more simple and ancient usage of bartering commodities.' (O.) But it should be observed that bartering is carried on in two ways: First, when the commodities are valued in money and are exchanged as if in place of money; second, when they are merely compared with each other. The first manner is practically the equivalent of buying and selling, for the thing is measured by the price on both sides, and this manner of bartering is much used to this day. Therefore, it is not certain that only bartering was in use at the time of the Trojan war, as most men have concluded from Iliad, Bk. VII, 482 ff. [472 ff.]: 'So the flowing-haired Achaïans bought them wine thence, some for bronze and some for gleaming iron, and some with hides and some with whole kine, and some with captives.' (L.L. & M.) For thus Pliny, Bk. XXXIII, chap. i, writes:

495

Would that gold could have been banished for ever from the earth, accused by universal report, as some of the most celebrated writers have expressed themselves, reviled by the reproaches of the best of men, and looked upon as discovered only for the ruin of mankind. How much more happy the age when things themselves were bartered for one another; as was the case in the times of the Trojan war, if we are to believe what Homer says. For in this way, in my opinion, was commerce then carried on for the supply of the necessities of life. Some, he tells us, would make their purchases by bartering ox-hides, and others by bartering iron or the spoil which they had taken from the enemy: and yet he himself, already an admirer of gold, was so far aware of the relative value of things, that Glaucus, he informs us, exchanged his arms of gold, valued at one hundred oxen, for those of Diomedes, which were worth but nine. Proceeding upon the same system of barter, many of the fines imposed by ancient laws, at Rome even, were levied in cattle. (B. & R.)

Yet even to-day nothing is more common than for soldiers to exchange their booty for other things, since it does not always consist of money, and they do not scruple to take also other things. And so it does not follow from the fact that soldiers got wine in exchange for booty, that money was not used at the time of the Trojan war. For assuredly talents of gold are mentioned several times in Homer; for instance in the Iliad, Bk. IX [122], Agamemnon promises to give Achilles 'ten talents of gold'. In the Odyssey, Bk. VIII [393], each of the princes of the Phaeacians gives Ulysses a 'talent of fine gold'. And even though gold in the Odyssey, Bk. XIII [11], is called 'much wrought', and a talent is properly a term of weight, yet it is not likely that all their gold was then wrought or used only for cups and similar vessels. Nor does it appear how Homer should accord such τιμή [veneration] to gold, if the agreement of nations had not given it an eminent value, while 'much wrought' can also signify a substance from which many things can be worked. And doubtless the reason why Homer [Iliad, VI. 236] calls the gold arms of Glaucus 'worth a hundred oxen', and the bronze ones of Diomedes 'worth nine oxen', is because in the earliest times great wealth lay in herds, of which oxen held the first place as the most essential aid in agriculture, and so it was customary for the price of other things to be compared with them. And this common habit of speech did not at once die out when all things began to be measured by money. Therefore, Didymus remarks on the Iliad, Bk. VI, line 236, that maidens, who, because of their beauty, were given many wedding presents by their former suitors, were called 'gainers of oxen'. Yet even if there was at that time among the Greeks no use of coined money, the use of gold and silver by weight could have obtained in commerce. Still that many peoples used money before the Trojan war is shown, if you please, by sacred history.

The passage in Homer reminds one of the argument once held between Sabinus and Cassius in Digest, XVIII. i. 1, on the question, whether, before the use of money, and to-day after it has come into use, it can be called selling, if I have given my tunic in exchange for a toga. Sabinus maintained that it was, according to the passage of Homer, mentioned above, on the claim that the Greek army bought wine with their bronze, iron, and captives. Yet as a matter of fact οἰνίζεισθαι does not really mean to 'buy wine', but to secure it in any way whatsoever, just as in Latin pabulari, lignari, and frumentari only mean to gather food, wood, and grain, in any manner possible. But the opposite opinion seems the better, that it is one thing to buy, another to sell, one person is the buyer, another the seller, the price is one thing, the commodity another, none of these combinations being discernible in bartering; and that it appears absurd for both persons to have been buyer and seller, and for both articles to be called the price and the commodity. But to this a reply can be made on the basis of what we said just above regarding the two modes of bartering: When things already estimated in money are bartered, it appears to be a purchase on 496 both sides, and so there is no absurdity in the same person in a different respect being both buyer and seller.

It should also be observed that under the name of bartering sometimes falls a reciprocal donation which is extremely common among friends, and which, by reason of its not being a contract, does not require equality. To this is to be referred the exchange of arms between Glaucus and Diomedes in the Iliad, Bk. VI, which, because of its inequality, can perhaps lay a charge of folly upon Glaucus, but none of injustice upon Diomedes. So also Maximus of Tyre, Dissertations, xxiii [xxxix. I c], says that Glaucus 'measured the value of the exchange by the psychological moment, not the price of the armour itself'. And again, Dissertations, xxiv [xl. I c], of the same transaction: 'Gold was not worth more to the man who received it, nor bronze less to the man who gave the gold away in exchange; but both men were well treated, for the inequality in the material was balanced by the equality in the purpose.' Add Isocrates, To Nicocles, at the beginning. Among the Russians there is a market for sacred images which they say they do not 'buy but exchange for money'. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. I, chap. i.

2. But after the introduction of the use of money, a contract of buying and selling began to be the most common means of effecting exchange, in which the procedure is, that, in exchange for a certain amount of money, there is acquired the dominion over a thing, or some equivalent right. Here the first point of inquiry is: When is such a contract so completed that nothing remains further than for the seller to hand over clear possession of the article and for the buyer to take it. According to Roman law this kind of contract is considered completed as soon as both parties have fully agreed upon the sale price, and at that time the buyer is entitled to an action against the seller to hand over the article, and the seller against the buyer to take it and pay the price, either at once, or at a time agreed upon. Add Digest, XVIII. i. 19, 34, §§ 5, 6; XVIII. i. 35, §§ 1, 5, 6, 7.

A purchase is held incomplete, and one which gives rise to no action, either for a general or a special reason. It is the first when the buyer and seller are not yet agreed but are still labouring to secure an agreement, or when the bargaining is still going on within limits, as they say. Then it is still possible to draw back from and break off the bargaining, no obligation as yet having been assumed, provided there has been no fraud or any intent of one party to deceive the other, as is true of all contracts. In the latter case the efficacy of an obligation will be in suspense when a condition has been added to the contract, whether express or understood, for instance, when it must be seen whether the commodity suits the eye or taste. For in this case a tacit condition is understood to underlie the negotiations, to the effect that the article will be found to be as the seller described it, or that we will like it when we see it. For in every case the knowledge of a thing is absolutely necessary for determining its price, and it is thought to be careless of you to buy what you have not inspected, when you cannot depend upon the word of the salesman.

But the determining of the commodity by weight, measure, or number does not properly imply a condition, unless it be that the thing so rated be useless to me, save in a certain quantity. However, a specifying of the measure, number, or weight always is required to execute a contract, since only in this way can such things be specified, as it were, and separated from the rest of their kind. Likewise, only after the use of such measuring is it understood that a transfer is made, or dominion given over, since without it I do not know what belongs to me and what to the seller. Although a sale is sometimes made in the bulk, and then measurement, or any other rating of quantity is added by way of testing and not of fixing the amount, for under such circumstances measuring 497 does not necessarily precede the actual exchange. It is one thing, for instance, for me to sell you wine in this ten gallon container, and to sell you ten gallons of wine from this container.

Finally, it will be an incomplete sale, if the parties make a special agreement that the terms shall be expressed in writing and the document is not yet executed. But it is another matter if the sale is put in writing merely as an aid to the memory and for evidence. Selden, Bk. VI, chaps. i and iv, has very carefully noted the observance of the Hebrews on this kind of contract. Add a passage of Theophrastus in Stobaeus, Anthology, xlii.

3. But in this matter we must distinguish, first of all, between the contract itself and its execution. The contract itself will be completed, when an agreement is reached on the commodity and price, without any condition which suspends the obligation, and if nothing is added which will allow either party to withdraw. But the execution of a contract consists of the buyer actually giving over the price and the seller the article. The simplest course is for the execution of a contract to follow immediately upon its completion, that is, for the buyer to pay over the price as soon as it is agreed upon, and to accept the commodity. This used to be called 'doing business with Greek faith'. See Plautus, Asinaria, Act I, sc. vi [199]. So also Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [p. 915 D E], made the following regulation in his state: 'When goods are exchanged by selling and buying, a man shall deliver them, and receive the price of them, at a fixed place in the agora, and have done with the matter; but he shall not buy or sell anywhere else, nor give credit.' (J.)

But when an interval of time transpires between the completion of a contract and its execution on the part of the seller, that is, for the commodity to change hands, the question commonly arises as to whom the risk and advantage of the article in this period concerns, the buyer or the seller. It is well known that the Roman law in such case lays the risk of the article sold upon the buyer as soon as the purchase is completed, even though it is not yet delivered and the seller is still its owner. By risk is understood some accident that befalls the commodity which thus perishes¹ entirely or in part, whether due to natural causes, or supposing it be unjustly taken from the other. See² Digest, XVIII. xvi. Yet here the difficulty arises: How can the buyer assume the risk for an article of which he is not yet the owner, since otherwise a thing perishes for its owner, that is, such losses as befall a thing held by another without that other's fault, belong to the owner. To this some reply that the old proverb, 'a thing perishes for its owner,' holds good only in those contracts by which an article belonging to one party to the contract is in the hands of the other, and not in those contracts when a certain thing is owed the other party. Some advance this statement on the following argument: The saying is true, when the owner is opposed to those who have the simple use and custody of the thing, not to those who have a right in it and the power of an owner, as it were, to claim it. Among other reasons for this distinction they maintain that the buyer could and should have claimed the thing and paid the price, whereupon the thing would have perished in his hands; and therefore his delay and negligence cannot work against the seller. Some say that the risk before transfer belongs to the buyer not because he is the owner, but because, after a contract has been completed, the seller is not considered with respect to the buyer so much an owner as a debtor, and that of a certain kind of thing, for the loss of which, provided it happen without his connivance and fault, he is free from all responsibility.

Yet there appears no clear reason in these arguments why, in view of the fact that it devolves upon the seller to give the buyer full possession, it should not be he rather than the buyer who should have to stand the risk before he has fulfilled his part. Nor does the statement that the promisor of a certain kind of thing does not meet its loss, concern the matter before us (as it runs in Digest, L. xvi. 33, 83, § 7; XXXV. ii. 30, § 4; IV. iii. 18 at end), for the person promised was going to acquire the thing at a profit. In such a case it would be absurd and unjust for a man who had promised a certain kind of thing to have to make good its value, when it is lost. Even the nature of business which requires strict interpretation makes no such demand. But why should the buyer, in such a case, who has not yet received his article from the seller, although entitled to it by contract, be without it and still have to pay the seller its price? Add Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 15.

In our opinion the best way to establish natural equity in such a case is to distinguish, whether the delay between the completion of the contract and the transfer of the commodity, is necessary for the delivery of the article, or is due to the slowness of the seller, or, finally, whether the buyer is the one at fault for his not having it in his possession. The first case may be like this: If I have bought some cattle which are pasturing at a distance, and while the seller is bringing them to me they become the prey of robbers or wolves, or some similar mishap befalls them, there is no doubt that reason orders the loss to fall upon the seller. The loss will likewise be upon the seller if he has failed to deliver the article owed at the proper time.

¹ [For pareat read pereat.—Tr.]

² [For Vib. l. i. de read Vid. l. i. D. de.—Tr.]

But when delay in receiving the delivery of the article lay with the buyer, it would be but just that its loss be upon him. For at the very moment when by the contract the article was due to be delivered, and it was not the fault of the seller that delivery did not take place, dominion, in so far as it denotes mere right and a moral faculty, passed to the buyer, and the thing commenced to belong to him alone (see above, Bk. IV, chap. ix, § 5). When the seller, out of humanity only, kept custody of the thing which was not formally left to his care, it would be too much to require of him also a guarantee against any accidents. But if the buyer has left the commodity for a while in the care of the seller, it is understood to be in his hands, yet not as though he were the owner but only the receiver, from whom one cannot demand a guarantee against accidents. In this case the delivery will be held to have been made by the fiction of the short hand, exactly opposite to what prevails in the handing over of a thing lent or let. For in the former case it is understood that the feigned delivery has made what was ours another's, while in the latter what was another's has been made ours.

Furthermore, what is said here about the risk of an article sold, should be applied also to any gain derived from it.

4. It is also a common thing for such a contract to be qualified by the addition of different pacts, whether at the desire of the contracting parties, or by the requirement of civil laws. On this matter the law of nature requires nothing other than that the will of the parties be observed, provided it contains nothing absurd or unfair, and that every citizen observe the civil laws, if he is really desirous that his contract be valid in the eyes of a court. Thus nothing is more common than to agree to pay the price at some time after delivery of the goods; and no less frequent is the agreement that delivery shall take place on a certain day, the dominion as well as the risk and profit remaining meanwhile with the seller.

Frequent use is made also of the 'assignment with a time-limit' (addictio in diem), whereby a sale is made with an understanding that the seller may accept a better offer if made by another within a certain time. This may be done in two ways: Either the purchase is completed, yet on the condition that it is void if a better offer is made, or, if it has been agreed that, in case nothing comes up to oppose it, the contract shall be closed. Digest, XVIII. ii. 2. In the former case dominion passes to the buyer, in the latter it remains with the seller, until the contract is completed.

It is called a 'conditional sale' (lex commissoria), when it is agreed that, if the purchase price is not paid on a certain day the sale is void. Although this can be agreed upon in two ways: Either the seller may deliver the article at once, and upon non-payment receive it back with full right (see Digest, XVIII. iii. 5); or he may not be bound to deliver the article unless payment is made. The latter appears to be much the safer course, for as a general thing the seller adds such an agreement in order that he may not be put to a great deal of trouble in collecting the price, and the trouble would be the same, if he had delivered the article and had to recover it, instead of the payment, from a sullen debtor. See Digest, XVIII. iii. 2, 3.

It is no less common for the contracting parties themselves, or 499 civil laws in the case of certain bargains, to add a pact allowing a rescission or withdrawal (retractus) from the sale, which is done in several ways. Sometimes there is added to the deed of sale a clause to the effect, that, if the purchase price is offered at some time, or within a certain time, the buyer is obligated to restore the article purchased to the seller or his heirs. And this time, again, is set with different purposes; either as a limit after which it is permissible to take back the article, or as a limit beyond which it need not be returned. Here it should be observed, that, as the right of repurchase is introduced in favour of the seller, who is sometimes by outward circumstances forced to alienate a thing which he is unwilling to part with for all time (Julius Capitolinus, Marcus [xvii], tells us that the Emperor Marcus [Aurelius] when in dire need of money sold the royal furniture: 'Afterwards he gave the buyers to understand that if any of them wished to return his purchases and recover his money, he could do so' (M.)), so the fixing of a limit for that right is of advantage to the buyer, who finds his advantage in the fact, that, if he is not obligated to part with a thing within a short time, he may be certain ultimately of the permanent possession of it. Sometimes, also, when a purchase is made, out of consideration for the seller it is agreed that the buyer may, whenever he wishes, or at some particular time, return the commodity to the seller, who is obligated to refund its price. Add Livy, Bk. XXXI, chap. xiii.

Another and less onerous kind of withdrawal is what is called πρωτίμυσις [the right of preference], when to a contract of sale a clause is added to the effect, that, if the buyer decide to dispose of what he has bought, he must do so to the seller rather than to another at the same price that the latter would pay. In many places certain persons enjoy this πρωτίμυσις (right of preference), such as the real owners in emphyteutic property, creditors in the property of a debtor which has been sold at auction, neighbours in the sale of their neighbour's property, associates in a thing held in common, and relatives in the property of their kin, which last is given the special title of family redemption (retractus gentilitius).

It is no less common for one to reserve out of the sale of land some small spot or its use. Thus in antiquity prodigals upon selling their lands were wont to reserve a place for their burial. This is the explanation which many feel should be given to the passage in Vergil, Eclogues, III [104-5]: 'Tell me in what land—and you shall be my great Apollo—heaven's space is but three ells broad.' (F.) When Menius sold his home to the censors, Cato and Flaccus, for the erection of a basilica upon the spot, he reserved the right of one column on which to build a box from the projecting eaves, whence he and his posterity could view the gladiatorial displays¹ which were held at that time in the forum. This was the reason, so it is believed, for the name Meniana being applied to such projections ([Pseudo-] Asconius Pedianus, on Cicero, Against Verres [Divinatio in Q. Caecilium, 50.]).

The disposal of the divine law on the redemption of land can be read in Leviticus, xxv. 14 ff., the reason for which institution is to be drawn from the form of that state as established by Moses. This was to promote the existence of an equal degree of liberty, which end was secured by preventing a few from gathering to themselves the land, which formed the principal basis of their wealth, and from making the 500 rest of their nation, thus deprived of their estates, subject to them, and so gradually introducing the domination and tyranny of a few. For I cannot approve of the reason advanced by Grotius on line 29 of this passage, that 'it is easier to find a dwelling somewhere than the necessities of life'.

Lycurgus had the same end in mind when he divided all the land of the Spartans into 39,000 equal parts, and after they had been assigned by lot, forbade that they be increased, diminished, subdivided, or sold. Heraclides, De Politiis [in Aristotle's Fragments, DCXI. xx]: 'It is regarded as disgraceful among the Lacedaemonians to sell land, and in the case of one's ancestral portion it is not even permitted.'

A further type of sale frequently used is what they call 'in the gross' (per aversionem), when several things of different values are not estimated separately but are valued as a mass and sold in that way.

Finally, it is not unusual for a thing to be purchased for a period of time, at the expiration of which it returns to the seller without his having to refund the price given. Thus in England great families often sell their ground for a term of thirty or thirty-five years, on the condition that the buyers shall build upon it in a certain manner. But this contract is related to emphyteusis.

¹ [For spectare munus read spectare munus.—Tr.]

5. It is, furthermore, easy to gather from the nature of the contract and the pacts specially added, what obligations the buyer and seller should mutually undertake. It falls to the buyer to give the price agreed upon at the specified time, and this in such a way that he makes the sum actually belong to the receiver of it, that is, that he pays over his own and not another's money. If he pays with another's money and it has been claimed, he shall pay as much again, and whatever loss the seller suffered by having the price claimed from him. It falls to the seller to deliver the thing agreed upon with such qualities as are required by the general nature of the contract or a special agreement, and this at the time designated. Add Digest, XIX. i. 11, §§ 1 ff. But if, upon the completion of the sale but before he has delivered the article, he be led to change his mind, and wish to restore the price with compensation for any loss, the buyer is not required to accept this against his will, but will be able to force him to deliver the article, unless it happen that considerations of humanity persuade him to take a more lenient course. But when the knavery or fault of the seller prevents delivery, both the price and the loss he suffered must be paid to the buyer. As to what is the law in case no blame is to be laid at the door of the seller, we have discussed above.

But when a man sells the same thing to two persons, and has as yet delivered it to neither of them, the buyer who was the first to close the contract will certainly have the stronger case, and the same will be true if he has already received the article. Yet the fraudulent¹ seller will have to pay the second buyer for the loss he received by being deceived with an empty contract. But when delivery has been made to him who made the second contract, it is clear that, on the basis of civil law, he is to be preferred to the first party, because he accepted the article from its owner on a just title. And the first buyer enjoys no right for action against the second, either a real right, for he was at no time its owner, or a personal right, because the two never met in the transaction. Nor has the seller any excuse for calling back the article from him. Add Digest, VI. ii. 9, § 4.

Also Grotius, loc. cit., § 15, feels that the second buyer is to be favoured in comparison with the first, for the reason that by the present transfer or delivery of dominion every moral faculty passes from the seller into the thing, which is not the case in a promise to sell. Yet I am not convinced that he is consistent. It is true that a promise to sell is not selling. Yet Grotius himself had said, in the same passage, that transfer of dominion can take place at the very moment of contract, without actual delivery. When, therefore, such a sale is completed, 501 there remains to the seller no moral faculty or power over the article, except in so far as what tends to seeing that the article comes into the hands of the buyer. And consequently, any later acts of the seller touching the thing will rest upon no right, and so will not work to the prejudice of him who had acquired a prior right in the article.

¹ [For frandulentus read fraudentus.—Tr.]

For these reasons it is very questionable whether the favour of a possession which has been improperly acquired can always work to the prejudice of the first purchaser. Furthermore, since a right in a thing is not extinguished by the mere loss of possession, and it is possible for a man to hold in good faith what belongs to another, such a possessor, by selling a thing to a third person, does not extinguish the right of the owner, nor can he transfer to the buyer more right than he had himself. Therefore, although it is the intention of the buyer to acquire dominion of the thing, yet because the property thus sold either in fraud or ignorance belongs to another, it is enough if the seller gives the buyer free possession of the thing, makes it possible for him to use it, and allows him reimbursement in case it has been claimed. Add Plautus, The Persian, Act IV, sc. iv [549 ff.]; Digest, XXI. ii.

6. It is a special kind of purchase when not a special article but only a plausible prospect is purchased, upon which a price is set by agreement of the contracting parties. Nor is such a sale made void when it turns out that the article surpasses or falls far below the price. This happens both in purchases 'in the gross' and in auctions¹, because in such purchases and sales there is an added element of chance. See Digest, VI. ii. 9 pr.; add, however, Pliny, Letters, Bk. VIII, ep. ii. Here belongs the amusing kind of sale made by Augustus at his banquets, as described by Suetonius, Augustus, chap. lxxv, at the end. On the purchase from fishermen of the cast of a net, see Digest, XVIII. i. 8, § 1; XIX. i. 11, § 40; XIX. i. 12. From this arises that famous dispute of antiquity between some fishermen of Miletus and the purchaser of a cast of their net; Plutarch, Solon [p. 80], gives it as between fishermen of Cos and a stranger of Miletus, while Diogenes Laertius, Thales [II. 28], between some Ionian youths and fishermen of Miletus. When a gold tablet was taken from the net the buyer claimed that by right of purchase it belonged to him, for he had purchased, as he claimed, all the haul, that is the chance of the cast. The fishermen contended on their side that the agreement concerned only the haul of fishes. And they were right. For in the interpretation of every contract regard must be had to the intent of the contracting parties; and in this case no consideration had been given to the landing of gold, but only to the landing of fishes. Nor does it make any difference that the case is one of chance. For that is extended only to the amount of the draught of fishes and not to any kind of thing that may by some chance or other fall into the net. Therefore, the tablet of gold followed the law of treasures.

And the decision of the oracle in the matter which allotted the

¹ [For actionibus read auktionibus.—Tr.]

find to the wisest quite clearly smacks of the shrewd avarice of priests. They undertook in this way to gain so fair a prize for themselves, in accordance with the judgement of Sophocles, Antigone [1055]: 'The race of seers is ever fond of money.' What mortal, indeed, would wish to claim the title of the first in wisdom? See Valerius Maximus, Bk. IV, chap. i, § 7, inter externa; Mornay on Digest, XIX. i. 12.

7. In this connexion something is usually said about monopolies, as to whether or not all such are opposed to the law of nature, for both the name itself is odious and the laws of many states censure the practice severely. But many things should be exempted from the reproach of monopolies, inasmuch as they are not truly such. For surely no law forbids it, nor can it be termed a monopoly, for a single citizen in some city to be the only one to know how to make a certain commodity, or for some farmer alone to have a certain kind of fruit on his farm; or for a certain thing to be obtainable in but one district. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. V, chap. x: 'For since alum exists in no other part of the world, and is yet very useful, the Liparians upon good reason have the sole vending of this commodity, and by setting what rate they please on it, they grow prodigiously rich.' (B.) For a monopoly means that if one man has secured for himself alone the power to sell certain goods, no others may have the same power. But a man who is the only one to import certain merchandise from some remote region does not exercise a monopoly, provided no other men are forbidden to secure the same merchandise from that place. Just as it can also be lawful for a nation which has a large supply of some commodity to agree with another to sell to it alone that kind of merchandise. For every one is free to sell his own goods when and to whom he pleases; unless it happens that we have a superfluity and another cannot do without it; for in that case the law of humanity requires that the condition of others be not made worse by such a pact. But if a man would dare to clear for himself the way to a monopoly, apart from any such pact with the proper owner of the commodity, and to prevent by force or secret machinations others from coming to that place, in order that all other men would have to purchase it of him, it is clear that he both sins against the law of humanity, and malevolently infringes upon the liberty of the rest of mankind.

Regarding monopolies which are exercised against citizens, it should be observed that it is not illegal that not just any person be allowed to follow a certain trade, but only those who have secured, in accordance with the rules of the state, a right to do so. Thus, in most of the states of Europe, a man who wishes to open a store or produce some commodity must fulfil certain conditions, for it is not enough for him to know the mere art of the trade.

But it is also possible for the final authority in the state to grant a single citizen or a guild of merchants, to the exclusion of all others, the privilege of importing a certain kind of goods from certain places. There may be different reasons for doing this; for commercial relations with distant places involve a great expense before they are firmly established, and at the outset are open to risk. Therefore, the first adventurers in such trade must have security that what they have undertaken at great risk and expense, may not fall gratis into the hands of others. Furthermore, such privileged companies can by their wealth be of more assistance to the state in time of need than separate individuals. It appears also that by this means trade is carried on in greater confidence and a larger supply of commodities imported. Nor do those men whose profit, when brought into a common treasury, as it were, is distributed in equal portions, have to worry about so many chances of chicanery and so much expense.

But, in granting such privileges, a prudent government should see to it that they are allowed only in the case of commodities which are imported from very remote places, and over paths fraught with danger, and which concern not so much the necessities of life as its adornment and ease. Nor should the merchants be so indulged that they can raise the prices of such things to suit themselves, for it is against reason to give a few citizens the opportunity to amass great wealth at the expense of the rest, when no special advantage derives therefrom to the state.

Finally, injustice apparently¹ attends those monopolies where artificers or farmers are forced to sell the products of their industry or the fruits of their ground to certain men who then distribute them among others, and, first of all, among their fellow citizens, for it is clear that in this way the wealth of a state flows into the hands of a few to the oppression of the rest.

503 We may observe, in passing, that Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 16, in discussing monopolies, was not justified in introducing the illustration of Joseph when viceroy of Egypt. For the king had not forbidden others to lay up grain in the fruitful years, and no one was prevented from selling any of his surplus supply. So also it was not a special privilege, but their situation, that gave the Alexandrians a monopoly, as Strabo, Bk. XVII [xiii, p. 798], calls it, over the trade with the Indians and Ethiopians.

But a monopoly in the proper sense of the term cannot be established by private citizens, because it has the force of a privilege. For how can a private citizen who has no right to command and cannot use force, directly forbid others, who are also citizens, to deal in a certain kind of merchandise? They can, therefore, only carry on spurious monopolies which do not have the force of a right or privilege, but are generally maintained by clandestine frauds and conspiracies. For instance, some men may by trickery prevent all other citizens from approaching the spot where they get their wares, or hinder others from bringing their wares to our market, or form an association and buy up all such wares and then suppress them, so that they cause a scarcity, and then finally sell the wares at an unjust price. To such men may be applied the old saying of Apollonius of Tyana, in Philostratus, Bk. I, chap. xii [I. xv]: 'The earth is mother of us all, for she is just, but you, because you are unjust, have pretended that she is your mother alone.' (C.) The wickedness of such men should be restrained no less than that of those who, in the oil-sellers' market, act together to raise the price of things too high by secretly agreeing among themselves not to sell their wares below a certain price [Plautus, Captives, 489], which evil course is sometimes followed by labourers and artisans. Add Pliny, Bk. VIII, chap. xxxvii, on the hedgehog; Code, IV. lix. 1; Digest, XLVII. xi. 6; and Cujas, Bk. X, obs. xix. Although one can scarcely censure the shrewdness of Thales in leasing all the oil-mills when he foresaw by his study of the heavens that there would be a great harvest of olives the following year. Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. vii (xi); Diogenes Laertius, Bk. I [26].

¹ [For videntur read videntur.—Tr.]

CHAPTER VI

ON LETTING AND HIRING

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1. In what respects letting coincides with buying.
2. An interruption in the definite use of a thing works to the loss of the lessor; | 3. In the uncertain use, regularly to the loss of the lessee.
4. Can the same work be let to several at the same time? |
|--|---|

LETTING and hiring, whereby the use of an article or labour is furnished another for a price, is similar to buying and selling and is governed by practically the same rules. For the rent or wages correspond to the price, and the dominion secured by buying, to the power to use the thing; and just as a purchase is completed when the price has been agreed upon, so also is hiring when the wages have been fixed. Digest, XIX. ii. 2. Yet the wages may be extended in some way and tacitly. See Digest, XIX. ii. 13, § 11; XIX. ii. 14. And just as an article if bought to oblige the seller, is commonly purchased more cheaply, and if sold to oblige the buyer, more dearly; so in letting and hiring, whoever is hired when out of work must be content with a modest 504 wage, while he whose services are solicited can value them more highly. Finally, as in buying, it is the business of the seller to set the price (Plautus, The Persian [586]: 'She's your goods, you're the one to put a price on her.' (N.)), while the buyer ultimately decides upon it, such also is the case in letting. This is shown by Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. IX, chap. i:

Who is the proper person to settle the value of a benefaction? Is it he who was in the first instance the author, or he who was in the first instance the recipient of the benefaction? It seems as if the author leaves it to the recipient to settle the value. This, they say, was the practice of Protagoras, who, whenever he taught any subject, would tell his pupils to estimate the value of the knowledge in their own eyes, and would take just so much payment and no more. (W.)

Although on the custom of Protagoras, the philosopher in person delivers himself as follows in the Dialogue of Plato which goes by that name [p. 328 B C]: 'When a man has been my pupil, if he likes he pays my price, but there is no compulsion; and if he does not like, he has only to go into a temple and take an oath of the value of the instructions, and he pays no more than he declares to be their value.' (J.)

But just as he who purchases merchandise is understood to have obligated himself to pay the common price for them, when no set price has been agreed upon, so also whoever places his services at the disposal of another before the wage has been determined, leaves it thereby to the equity of his employer, it being understood, of course, that no less shall be paid than the common wage. See Matthew, xx. 4, 7. But the manner of paying a labour of pleasure, mention of which is made by Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. IX, chap. i, and Plutarch, On Listening to Lectures [p. 41 D E], and On the Fortune of Alexander [ii, pp. 333-4], is but a cavil. A certain man had promised a harpist that the better he played the more he would pay him; but next day when the harpist asked him to fulfil his promise, he said he had given him one pleasure in payment for another. But Aristotle rightly says: 'It is as if nothing is done, when a person does not get what he is intent upon.' More correctly did Bocchoris make use of a similar cavil in Plutarch, Demetrius [xxvii, p. 901 D]:

When a certain Egyptian was in love with Thonis, the courtesan, she demanded a great sum of money for her favours. Then the youth dreamed that he enjoyed those favours, and ceased from his desires. Thereupon Thonis brought an action against him for payment due, and Bocchoris, on hearing the case, ordered the man to bring into court in its coffer the sum total demanded of him, and to move it hither and thither with his hand, and the courtesan was to grasp its shadow. Although Lamia thought this judgement to be unfair. 'For', she said, 'although the dream put an end to the young man's passion, the shadow of the money did not set the courtesan free from her desire for it.' (P.)

A further point of resemblance in a contract of letting is, that, if a labourer meets with some loss while engaged in his work, it falls upon him and not upon his employer. See Digest, XIV. ii. 2, § 1; XIV. ii. 6. Although a law once in force among the Ephesians, and mentioned by Vitruvius, De Architectura, Bk. X, preface, is worth noticing, for according to it an architect had to bear the expense if a building cost above a fourth more than his estimate.

2. The next point to be settled is, whether accidents which interfere with or depreciate the use of a thing, fall to the expense of the tenant, or the landlord, and can be taken from the rent. Some give the succinct answer, that, as the thing perishes for its owner, so any natural sterility and such as is not exempted in special agreements, and other mishaps which interfere with the use of the thing, lie upon the tenant; and that the landlord has a right to demand of the tenant the rent agreed upon, even though the latter has perhaps received a lower return from his lease than he expected. For the landlord gave the tenant the faculty to use his property, the prospect of the fruits of which was reckoned at so much at the time when the contract was drawn up, and since he has done his part, it is right that the other also do his part and pay the rent.

Yet it appears that this question should be gone into a little more fully, it being certain that when a thing perishes by no fault of the renter, he is not only free from having to make it good, but his rent 505 ceases at that moment. For if the entire sum can be demanded, it is presupposed that the thing be in existence during all the term of the contract; and so, when it no longer exists, the contract expires. See Digest, XIX. ii. 9, § 4. This agrees with the decision of Sesostris, king of Egypt, that, if the river took away some of the land apportioned to a man, his rent was decreased in proportion. Herodotus, Bk. II [cix]. In the next place a distinction should be drawn between things, the fixed and definite use of which can and should be afforded by a landlord, and those the use of which is as regards quantity uncertain and subject to chance, and so may not and should not be afforded by him in a fixed quantity. To the former kind belongs, for instance, a house rented as a dwelling, which the landlord should make fit for such use. Therefore, if it has been blown down, or damaged by a neighbouring fire, the tenant deducts from the rent in proportion to the amount of the damage done to it as a dwelling. For the rent or hire was determined by the use which the house, in the condition in which it was at the time of the bargain, was able to afford during the whole period of the lease. Therefore, when that use is lessened through no fault of the tenant, it is fair that the rent be lowered in proportion, unless the house is immediately restored to its former condition without any notable inconvenience and loss to the tenant. See Digest, XIX. ii. 15, § 1; XIX. ii. 30. Thus, if a renter has been driven by force from his dwelling, or a tenant from his farm, they owe no rent for the same, because in this case the property has morally perished to the owner until such time as the enemy is forced out. But if the produce of the land had been gathered and was carried away by the enemy, the loss lies upon the lessee.

Regarding the hiring of labour it should be observed that, if a man engages the temporary, and, as it were, transient services of a person, he does not have to pay him when some accident has prevented him from being able to furnish the services agreed upon. But if he has engaged his permanent services, it is only human, in case the latter has been incapacitated by disease or some other mischance from performing his tasks for a short time, not to take from him his position or cut off his salary, especially when there is hope that he can make up for the services lost by showing diligence later, or when his former record has been such as to merit this humanity.

3. But regarding those things which yield an uncertain return, such as farms, gardens, vineyards, fishing rights, and the like, just as an abundant yield goes to the profit of the renter, so he must face the loss from a poor crop, nor by strict right should he hold back any rent for a poor harvest, especially since that of one year is usually compensated by the good harvest of another. For a wise husbandman does not rent or lease such things for only one year. See Digest, XIX. ii. 16, § 4. Nor can one oppose in this case the old saying, that no one should profit by another's loss. For the landlord could raise the same plea, upon a good harvest, to raise the rent, although no attention would be paid him. Moreover, because the return of different years is usually unequal, the landlord prefers a fixed and small amount to depending on the uncertain prosperity of the years. On the other hand, the renter is willing to lay out a fixed sum in the hope of an uncertain gain, realizing that, if it disappoints him, he has himself to blame. Yet it is proper to mitigate this judgement by the principle set forth in Digest, XIX. ii. 15, § 2, where it is stated that the loss falls upon the landlord, 'if the produce is lost by river floods, or jackdaws, or starlings, or by a raid of the enemy, or a blight spoils the olives, or unusual heat of the sun.' The reason is given: 'Lest the tenant, in addition to the loss of the seed which is gone, may not have to pay rent for the land too,' and so bear a double mis- 506 fortune. 'But if the faults are due to the very nature of the case, or if nothing unusual happened, the tenant bears the loss.' Here it appears that a tempering of equity consists in a division of the mishaps, whereby fruits can be destroyed, into more frequent and more rare. Add to this Digest, XIX. ii. 25, § 6, where it is rightly appended: 'A moderate loss the renter ought to take with resignation, unless an immoderate profit is being made off him.' For if some part of the rent could be withheld for every kind of loss, the result would be an enormous crop of perplexing suits. And so the rent of farms is determined by the yield of average years, lest the tenants should find cause for complaint in every little loss. Yet the fixing of the precise amount of the loss for which some part of the rent should be remitted, will better be left to the judgement of an honest arbitrator, who will consider the circumstances of each case, rather than to a general rule.

It should also be observed, regarding tenants, that farms are sometimes rented to them on the condition that they pay as rent everything in excess of the labour they put in. In such cases the tenant, who is no more than a hireling, withholds at the first the price of his labour, and so the failure of the crop falls for the most part only upon the owner.

But if it should be the renter who is first hindered by some mishap in the use of the leased property, and the landlord thereupon lets it to another, or in some way receives that use of it which was otherwise owed to the first renter, he shall have to return to the latter whatever he has gained therefrom, or else keep it as payment, provided the tenant is ready to pay his lessee. As to the respective obligations of the tenant in the thing leased and of the lessor in the work agreed upon, they are set forth in Digest, XIX. ii. 9, §§ 2, 3, 5; XIX. ii. 11, 12, 13, 25, §§ 3, 4, 7, 8; XIX. ii. 27, 30, § 4; XIX. ii. 38, 55, §§ 1, 2; XIX. ii. 60, § 2; XIX. ii. 61 pr.

Here belongs the law of the Egyptians on physicians who were free from blame if their patient died, provided they had prescribed for him in accordance with the direction of the public code; if, however, their prescription was contrary to the code, they were tried for their lives. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxxii. We may also note, in passing, a form of contract with physicians followed in the kingdom of Tonquin, as given by Alexander of Rhodes, Divers Voyages, Pt. II, chap. xxx, where the patient at the beginning of his illness agrees with the physician on his fee, which the latter accepts only if he effects a cure, but gives his service gratis in case the patient dies. They feel that in this way the physician will give closer attention to the case. In the same passage the writer cites an instance of a physician who said when called in to a case, and while they were discussing his fee, 'If the patient were a youth I would not undertake to cure him for less than 100 scudi, but since he is old I will be satisfied with twenty, for the life which I may give him cannot last long.'

4. The further question is raised, in this connexion, whether, if the same services of mine can be useful to several persons, as on a journey, and I have already promised them to one of the party for a fair and equitable price, I can demand as great a price from one or several more. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 19, feels that I can rightfully do so, provided the civil law does not forbid it, maintaining that the fact that my services are also of use to another, has nothing to do with the contract entered into with the first person, nor are they made thereby of any less value to him. Yet it scarcely seems that such a contract squares with equity and humanity, even though it may not be opposed to the letter of the law. For when one man pays another as much as his services are actually worth, with respect to the rest who profit from them at the same time, while they are, notwithstanding, made no more onerous than if they were proffered only to one person, they are considered a thing of innocent utility, which is no burden to the performer and yet of 507 advantage to the recipient. Yet since it seems a hardship for the one who promised the entire price to bear the burden by himself, while the others get off, it will be only fair for them to contribute their share of the sum. Thus, to cite a common practice, when I have chartered a vessel, the owner cannot take others on board without my permission, and, if I wish to receive a few, it works to my advantage.

Yet in the higher studies, which receive their value from the small number of teachers, and the scarcity of those who are acquainted with them, a man may rightfully require the entire fee of each student, although he can teach several with the same outlay of effort. For such knowledge loses in value as it is imparted to many. Therefore, even though my effort is made no greater when directed to several, I can still rightfully charge against it the loss my knowledge suffers in being imparted to many. Yet there are those who deny that the salary which a man receives for teaching the liberal arts falls under hiring and letting, since they feel that learning is not measurable in money; and so they put it under the nameless contract, work for goods. Digest, L. xiii. 1;

yet compare Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VI, chap. xv. The manner in which poor schoolmasters are often cheated in these matters is set forth by Lucian, De Mercede Conductis.

However this may be, such a contract holds something in common with the letting out of one's services, wherein only good faith and industry can be guaranteed, but no results, so that even if one's labour goes for naught, the fee agreed upon can still be required. Juvenal, Satires, VII [159 ff.]: 'Pay indeed? Why, what have I learnt?' asks the scholar. It is the teacher's fault, of course, that the Arcadian youth feels no flutter in his left breast.' (R.) Or sometimes there can be applied to him the remark made by Pliny, Bk. VIII, chap. xxxiii, of the tarandrus¹: 'Although it might have had its own colour, it resembles an ass.' And it is an excellent remark of Euripides, Hippolytus [921-2]:

A cunning sophist hast thou named, of power

Them to constrain to sense who sense have none. (W.)

Libanius, Declamations, xxix [i. 143]: 'Nature is more violent and powerful than discipline.' Although in some cases the remarks of Lucian, Hermotimus, Bk. II, p. 293,² may well be used in reply. Also worthy of notice is the statement once made by the Grand Mogul Aureng Zebe to one of his teachers, as given by Bernier, De Rebus in Regno Mogolis Gestis, last part, p. 57.

Yet the very opposite kind of a contract was made by Aeschines, who, according to Diogenes Laertius [II. 62], 'hired his audience',³ a custom which was afterwards followed at Rome by ambitious writers, who gathered auditors for their readings by invitations, rewards, and doles. Nor should we fail to mention the custom of Socrates, who, as we are informed by Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. I [vi], never required any fee from his auditors. In fact he used to express his surprise that a man who claims to be a teacher of virtue should demand pay, and should not feel that he would find his highest reward in securing a good friend; that he should be afraid that a pupil who had been made a good and honest man by him, would not be supremely grateful to the one who had so befriended him.

¹ [For tarando read tarandro.—Tr.]

² [The reference is to no standard edition and is hard to identify. Barbeyrac seems to have supposed that the treatise De Mercede Conductis was actually meant. Yet there is an excellent retort by a teacher of philosophy in the Hermotimus, lxxxii, and this is probably the passage meant.—Tr.]

³ [The Greek words quoted mean precisely the opposite.—Tr.]

CHAPTER VII

ON THE LOAN OF CONSUMABLE COMMODITIES (MUTUUM)

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. The definition of a mutuum and of consumable commodities. 2. The twofold use of such. 3. What things are we usually given credit for? 4. On a tacit mutuum. 5. May a mutuum be alienation? 6. Suppose some change takes place in the intrinsic value of money; 508 7. Or in its extrinsic value. | 8. The laws of the Hebrews on usury. 9. It is shown that usury is not opposed to the law of nature. 10. A reply is made to arguments on the other side. 11. Approval is given to contracts that amount to usury. 12. The makeshifts frequently employed to avoid the infamy of usury. |
|--|--|

IN a mutuum a consumable thing is given a person on condition that he return the same kind in the same quantity and quality. Digest, XII. i. 3. The things given in a mutuum are called consumable, or such as are capable of use in their kind, because a thing of that kind serves the use or takes the place of another, so that whoever has received another thing of the same kind, in the same quality and quantity, is held to have received the original. This is the way in which such a mutuum differs from the loan of a non-consumable thing (commodatum), and that of a thing put out for hire (locatum), for in the last two the very thing lent must be returned, and nothing else can be taken for it without the consent of the creditor. And this must be observed, not merely because things of that nature are usually of different value, but also because it was expressly stated that I should get back my exact article. But if I receive another's bushel of wheat, for example, of the same grade as the one which I had lent a person, it is held that I have received what is mine.

Such things are said, furthermore, to consist of weight, number, and measure, as the things by which they are determined and specified, while all other things have their quantity determined by nature. For this reason consumable things go under the special name of quantities, while other things, for which we are not credited, pass under the name of species. Yet here we should observe that oxen, for example, are not called consumable things, simply because I can buy 100 or 50, and because they are sold by number; for they are not actually specified by the number, but this only shows the quantity of the species. Add Jacques Godefroy, Dissertatio de Aequalitate et Functione¹ in Mutuo.

2. Now the use offered by such things is either ordinary or extraordinary. The latter use of such things can be as follows: In order that a man may appear wealthy to another and richly endowed in the things of this world, because, for instance, a reputation for wealth is a great help to aged suitors in securing the love of maidens, a man of little wealth may temporarily borrow a bit of money from another to exhibit in his chest while he shows his loved one around his house. Since in this case the money has been taken simply as a non-consumable loan, on no score does it belong to the recipient, and should be returned as it was received, that is in species. But the ordinary use of such things consists in their loss, that is, I cannot apply them directly to my own uses without consuming them, so that so far as I am concerned they perish and are lost from the number of my possessions. This is plain in the case of grain, wine, and other things which maintain the body. But I am also unable to use money to purchase other things, or to pay my debts, unless I renounce and part with it. When this has been done, the substance of the money may endure with another, but so far as I am concerned, it is held to be consumed. Therefore, when things of that kind must be transferred to another for ordinary use, not with any intention to exchange it, but to have the same returned, the restitution must necessarily be made in kind, because the species which was delivered has been consumed.

¹ [For functione read functione.—Tr.]

3. Consumable things are the most common of all and are usually measured by number, such as money; by weight, as gold and silver in bullion, and bread; by measure, as grain, salt, wine, beer, olive oil (see 509 Digest, XII. i. 2, § 1), and in general all kinds of food, such as meat, eggs, milk, and even live animals on the foot in so far as they are considered as food. For if, by way of example, I had to prepare a banquet, and there was not enough food in the house or any money to buy it with, I shall be able to collect from my neighbour by way of a loan not only eggs and some cuts of meat, but also fish, lobsters, hares, chickens, geese, and even sheep and calves, on the condition that I return the same in kind. Add Pliny, Natural History, Bk. IX, chap. lv. Under this head can sometimes come blank paper, which is consumed by use, since when it is once written upon it cannot be used again; and, indeed, any kind of commodity capable of being determined by a certain measure, which is found everywhere in equal quality, and which cannot be restored exactly to its original condition, after it has been put to its proper and principal use. For although such things are as a rule sold, yet sometimes it happens that they are credited to us. For instance, if I have collected some cloth for my future use, and a friend suddenly finds himself in need of such cloth and has no opportunity to purchase it, I can give him my cloth on condition that he return it to me in the same quality and quantity.

4. Furthermore, a mutuum is contracted not only expressly, but also tacitly if for instance I by mistake pay something to a man to whom I was not in debt, or if I have given a person something in consideration of something else which then does not follow. From these two conditions there arise in Roman law 'a suit of recovery for a thing not owed' and 'a suit of recovery for a consideration which did not follow'. For since the thing is not given with the intention of making a present, but because it was supposed to be a debt, or that its equivalent might be secured, and yet what is so given has been made to belong to the recipient, it is looked upon as if those things were given as a loan, and can be recalled in the manner of such. And so the foundation of those suits of recovery may conveniently be denominated a tacit mutuum, to which, however, the Jurisconsults give the name 'quasi-contracts'. It is related in Paulus Warnefridus [Paulus Diaconus], History of the Lombards, that the Emperor Mauritius, after he had concluded peace with the Lombards, called for the return of the money which he had given Childebert, king of the Franks, to drive them out of Italy. Yet 'the latter, relying on his superior strength, would not give him an answer to his request'. We should, in passing, also note in this connexion the remark of Plutarch, Greek Questions [liii]: 'What was the reason of the custom amongst the Cnossians, that those who borrowed money upon usury should snatch it and run away? Was it that, in case they should attempt to defraud the usurers, they might be liable for the violence, and thereby receive further punishment?' (G.) And so, in this way, there would be an evasion of the law against usury, with the result that, if the other did not return with interest what he had taken, he could be sued for theft.

5. A dispute was carried on some years ago between Salmasius and certain lawyers, as to whether a loan of a consumable commodity was an alienation. It is plain on this point, that, since the regular use of things lent in this way consists of their consumption, the transfer of them from the creditor to the debtor should be made on the condition that the latter receives the fullest power over the disposal of them, and therefore dominion itself, without which one cannot understand the power to consume a thing. But since the creditor gives on the condition that he receive the same in return, and the debtor accepts it upon the condition that he makes return, it cannot be felt that the wealth of the former has diminished, nor that of the latter increased, unless it be that the former, in place of what was his property, has only an action against the latter, which is judged to be of less value than what passed between them, because of the trouble involved and the uncertainty of full recovery. Therefore, just as debts are considered part of a man's estate, so a person is understood to be worth only so much as will be left 510 when his debts are subtracted and paid. And so it would not be absurd for you to say that the man who owes more than his estate is worth has less than nothing. This is the basis for the saying of Caesar in Appian, Civil Wars, Bk. II [ii], that he needed twenty-five¹ million sesterces to be worth nothing. And so a debt is called 'another's money' (aes alienum), not because a man does not hold it as his own, but because it is received from another on the condition that as much be returned. On the other hand he who is burdened with no debts can say, 'I am rich in my own money'. In a word, he who lends money to another actually alienates it, yet in such a way that he neither takes from his own wealth, nor adds to that of his debtor.

6. It is a question of greater moment, whether, when the exchange value of money varies during the time between the contraction of the debt and its payment, the value of the money should be considered as at the time when the debt was contracted, or as the time of payment. Most authorities feel that a distinction should be drawn between the intrinsic and extrinsic value of money, where the former lies in a certain quantity of a certain material, and the latter in the public assessment or value set by the state. They feel that if the change is in the intrinsic value, that is, if something has been taken from the material or weight (and in practically every change in money it becomes debased), the money should be reduced to the value it bore at the time of the loan. For it is felt that the contract was drawn up on the consideration that the same thing should be returned, not only in its kind but also in its value, for otherwise the same quantity is not given back. For instance, if a recent issue of money has been reduced in its intrinsic value 25 per cent., then for 100 units by the old reckoning 125 by the new will have to be returned. Likewise, if I have lent a man 100 pieces, of which one-half is alloy, only 50 will have to be paid, should that issue be recalled and silver take the place of the alloy. For although it be within the power of the state to raise or lower the value of money of the same metal, yet when the extrinsic value of coinage varies materially from its intrinsic goodness, and because consideration must always be given to foreigners, unless we are willing to see our commerce with them reduced to mere barter, the prices of commodities will be determined more by the intrinsic goodness of money than by its extrinsic value and denomination. And so if one-fourth of the bullion has been taken out, I shall have to pay 125 pieces for an article which before I could have bought for 100, while if a man who had formerly borrowed 100 pieces of the old coinage should pay me the same sum in this new coinage, he would in fact pay me one-fourth less.

7. But if, while the intrinsic goodness is unchanged, the external value of money rises or falls, it is then felt that the value of the money should be considered as it was at the time when the contract was drawn up, so that the increase or decrease in its value may turn to the profit or loss of the debtor. For example, if I should lend a man 100 imperials in specie, as they say, when the imperial was worth 48 white pieces, and its value should later rise to 52 white pieces, I should not have to pay at the rate of more than 48 white pieces for each imperial, if the payment is made in the lower denomination. But if the payment be made in imperials in specie, I can deduct 4 white pieces for each imperial, and so pay no more than 92 imperials. And, vice versa, if the value had fallen to 44 white pieces, and the payment is to be in that denomination, it would have to be made at the rate of 48 white pieces to the imperial. But if the imperials be repaid in specie, 4 white pieces would have to be added to each imperial, so that 108 imperials in specie would have to be repaid.

¹ [Pufendorf's translation would make it two-hundred-and-fifty million.—Tr.]

Yet even by this reckoning the affair is not entirely clear. For the creditor may raise the point in the first case, that, if he had kept his imperials the increase in value would have gone to him, and, if he is now 511 forced to lose it, another man is profiting by his loss. And the debtor will raise the same complaint in the second case.

Therefore, the situation will have to be canvassed more thoroughly, as to whether (1) a certain kind of money was paid, for instance, imperials in specie, that the same might be returned in specie and not in other money; or (2) whether they were given as common and current money, as they say; and (3) whether all the money was changed in this way; or (4) only that particular kind. In the first case payment must without doubt be made in the very same denomination. In the second the decision already given has force, and therefore, in such a loan, the value of imperials is to be referred to some other kind of money, that is, so many imperials at 48 white pieces. The third case, where the variation affects all money in comparison with the plenty or scarcity of other things, is to be decided by the principles set forth above in Bk. V, chap. i, § 16. Although that such a general variation of money should affect the payment of old debts, is scarcely sanctioned by general usage.

With regard to the fourth case, it should be observed that, when one kind of money has increased in value while retaining its intrinsic goodness, all other money must have been debased. So, for instance, when the value of imperials, which was before 48 white pieces, has risen to 52 white pieces, without changing its intrinsic goodness, it is proof that the smaller denomination has fallen in intrinsic goodness. Therefore, if under these circumstances imperials have been used in the loan and the payment must be made in white pieces, for each of the former not 48 but 52 will have to be reckoned. But when the loan was made in common or current money, the change will turn to the gain of the debtor, unless the great size of the loan or of the variation persuades to the contrary.

Now regarding other consumable things no attention is paid as to whether their price has risen or fallen in the meantime, provided they are paid at the time and place agreed upon, but the advantage from the increase, or the loss from the decrease, belongs to the creditor, unless there has been a different agreement. But if the debtor is in arrears in his payment, and the price of the thing changes in the meantime, the expositors of Roman law are solicitous to define the time and place by which the valuation should be made, an instance in the case of wine appearing in Digest, XII. i. 22. In such a case the fairest thing appears to be to take the valuation at the time and place of payment, but if the price changes while the debtor is contriving delays, he should bear the loss. Add Digest, XIII. iii. 4; XIII. iv. 3.

8. The question is also seriously discussed in connexion with a mutuum, whether usury, which is commonly given for it, is opposed to natural and divine law. This question should be canvassed the more thoroughly because most men have passed beyond the view held by the Persians, as given by Plutarch, De Vitando Aere Alieno [v, p. 829 c]: 'The Persians repute lying to be a sin only in a second degree, but to be in debt they repute to be in the first; forasmuch as lying frequently attends those that owe.' (G.) Although Herodotus, Bk. I [cxxxviii], more correctly, I feel, gives the first place to lying and the second to owing money. It is along this line, as Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, 6, 9, elaborately sets forth, that the ancient Hebrews explained the divine law on usury, as it is found in Exodus, xxii. 25; Leviticus, xxv. 37; xix. 14; Deuteronomy, xxiii. 19. They held that it was unlawful between their own people not only to receive usury but to pay it as well, and that the scribes, actuaries, and witnesses, who participated in a contract for usury, as well as the agents, were guilty in the eyes of the law. But interest on the money of orphans could legally be collected of a wealthy man, on condition that he gave the interest to the orphan and bore the loss himself.

Now they distinguish between two kinds of usury, of which one 512 was usury properly so called, that was agreed upon and received at the time when the contract was entered into or projected; and this they held was forbidden by divine law. The other was called the 'dust of usury' and was illegal only by the decrees of the elders.

Usury properly so called was held a crime, not only if a man received back consumable things together with an increase, but also if he, for instance, in return for a loan, lived gratis in another's country-house or town-house, until it was paid, or if he rented it for less than it would otherwise have brought, or if he got any advantage from a pledge left with him to secure a loan. And yet it was their custom that no one was ever punished in court for accepting usury, as he regularly was for breaking other divine laws, but he was merely required to restore it. But if the man who had received usury were dead, his heirs were not required to restore the interest which they had gained, nor any consumable things, but only the plate, clothing, utensils, and live animals which they had received by way of usury, this being done out of honour for the dead man and to keep his memory inviolate; and if it appeared that he repented of his action and had thought of restoring it before his death. If such did not appear to be the case, the heirs were not obligated to make restitution. Private citizens were also forbidden to receive the slightest kind of a gift from a debtor during the period of the loan. But lawyers might, because it was presumed that they had no intention of breaking the law of usury, but had accepted the article merely as a simple gift, not taking the place of usury.

Under the 'dust of usury' they were forbidden to accept any favour and acknowledgement of the benefit, which could come to the creditor outside the contract of the loan, or after the time for its payment, with any respect to the loan except the right to pay it before it was due. And they found two kinds of such usury, the first of which concerns the difference of time in which something is done by a debtor in the way of profit or advantage to the creditor, while the second has to do with the difference in contract. The first of these they divided into antecedent and consequent. By the former they understood some gift, made by the one who intended to raise a loan, to him of whom he would ask it, and this with the hope that the debtor might thereby more easily secure the granting of the loan. By the latter they understood anything given by the debtor to the creditor, after the consummation of the loan, by way of a present, in order that the time for payment might be extended. They even opposed all the duties of humanity from the debtor to the creditor save such as were in use between them before the negotiation of the loan.

The second kind of dust of usury was held to apply in such a contract as when the seller would say, 'If you buy to-day I will sell it for 90 shekels, but if you will not pay before to-morrow, it will be 100.' For in such a contract the delay in conjunction with the increase in price, appears to suggest that the ten shekels had to be paid on the score of usury. Yet this kind of usury did not have to be restored, nor did it allow¹ an action to be brought in a court of law, although whoever had violated these decisions of their elders might be punished with rods or in some other fashion. Likewise, he who had taken a farm in pledge could not rent it again to the owner for a consideration, because that consideration appeared to resemble usury.

But these rules obtained only between Hebrews, for they felt that the law of Deuteronomy, xxiii. 19, allowed them to require usury of the Gentiles; nay, they held that this passage required it, in order that nations already condemned by God to destruction should be drained of their wealth and weakened. Although Leo of Modena, De Ritibus Hebraicis, Pt. II, chap. v, says that this injunction is to be understood only of the seven peoples which inhabited Canaan, and not of other nations from which it is forbidden to take usury. Yet because of the miseries of their long captivity and their being denied possession of their lands and of a more worthy way of securing a means of livelihood, many of them degenerated from the strict observance of their law. But he maintains that the statement is false, which some spread about, namely, that the Jews take a daily oath that they will do what they can to cheat Christians; this, he says, was invented to inflame hatred against them. 513

¹ [For rita read rite.—Tr.]

9. We must now inquire whether these rules on usury, so diligently observed by the Hebrews, belong to natural law, or to the positive divine law, and that which was laid down not for the Jewish nation alone but for all peoples. Certainly it is clear that the additions made by the rulers of the Jews belong to positive law, and were contrived to preclude the evasions which sharp-witted men devised to evade the law. But our feeling in general about usury is, that, provided that it does not unjustly oppress and grind the poor, but corresponds to the gain which either we would have made in the meantime, or the debtor receives from the use of our money, especially when he has negotiated the loan not so much out of necessity as to make some profit, it is neither a natural nor a divine law to which all nations are obligated, but a positive one, such as was peculiar to the Jewish people, and rested almost entirely on political considerations. And according to Selden, loc. cit., the Rabbis themselves felt the same thing, namely, that neither was interest opposed to natural law, nor did it constitute a theft, since it rests upon the free consent and agreement of men.

And it seems that this can be shown clearly enough by mere reason. For although the Hebrews were by command of God bound together by a relatively close tie of affection, yet they were required to observe the common duties of natural law towards all other peoples. Therefore, Juvenal, Satires, XIV [103-4], justly censures the following: 'Never to show the road except to one that worships the same sacred rites—to conduct to the spring they are in search of, the circumcised alone.' (E.) Moreover, if all usury is opposed to natural law, I do not see how a most holy God expressly allowed it to a people which he wished to be especially holy, and, as it were, charged them to violate a precept of natural law against men who had done them no manner of injury, provided Deuteronomy [xxiii. 19], is to be taken as applying not alone to the Canaanites but to all peoples.

But the reason for that law seems to have been twofold, the one to be sought in the genius of the people, the other in the form of their state and the condition of those times. No less at that time than to-day did an insatiable thirst for wealth vex that nation, and it was held the highest felicity to abound in riches. Therefore, God wished by that law to guard against that craving for gain which leads to the oppression of the poor by the rich, while He allowed them to exercise all their skill against strangers, lest He offer too great violence to their native disposition. And it is clear enough, in the next place, that Moses wished to establish a democratic form of government (nor is this inconsistent with a single headship) among the rules of which one of the first is that so far as possible equality of wealth be preserved among its citizens. This was the purpose for the establishment of laws on the Year of Jubilee and of Remission, in Leviticus, xxv. 14, 31; Deuteronomy, xv. 2, and on not alienating land in perpetuity. Add Numbers, xxxvi, which finds a parallel in the law of Solon, that an ἐπίκληρος [heiress] who had inherited land was bound to marry the nearest relative on her father's side.

But also the conditions of those times furnish a reason for the law on usury. At that period this nation found its livelihood in grazing and agriculture, or else in manual labour. Its trade was likewise simple and modest, while the devices of commerce as well as of navigation were unknown to them. When such is the economy of states no one negotiates a loan unless driven to it by want. Therefore, Deuteronomy, xxviii. 12, mentions as a proof of the highest felicity, 'And thou shalt lend unto 514 many nations and shalt not borrow.' Add Deuteronomy, xv. 7-8. Now since the profits in such cases cannot help but be very small, it follows that even the slightest usury would seriously embarrass debtors. And since money so lent is consumed on bodily necessities, it cannot be recovered without the greatest difficulty, since you were unable beforehand, even by your own labour, to avoid being driven to secure a loan. The same reasons led to Athens once being involved in such disorders by interest charges that relief could be given her in no other way than by Solon's σεισάχθεια [shaking-off of burdens]; see Plutarch, Solon [xv]. And this evil Rome also felt in her early days.

Grotius on Luke, vi. 35, advances this reason among others for the law of Deuteronomy, xxix. 13: 'The chief wealth of the Hebrew people lay in agriculture and money. Therefore, the very best reason suggested that usury be not allowed between Hebrews, although since most of their neighbours acquired the larger part of their wealth by trade, the taking of interest from them was permitted. For other peoples also hold it oppressive to take interest from farmers.' The further point may be noted, that Moses hoped to draw the Jews closer to one another by this law, which was employed all the more often because at that time only modest sums were lent, and these to men who had little means and were engaged in a struggle with poverty. So also Philo Judaeus, De Caritate [pp. 701-2], feels that such a law increases love and banishes sordid avarice among fellow citizens, and this virtue the great legislator favoured by many other laws, such as Exodus, xxi. 10-11; xxii. 22, 23, 25-7; xxiii. 4-5, 9, 11, 12; Leviticus, xix. 9-10, 13, 33; xxiii. 22; xxv. 6, 10, 11, 35, 36, 37, 39 ff.; Deuteronomy, xiv. 28, 29; xv. 2, 4, 7-11; xxiii. 24-5; xxiv. 10-15, 19-21; xxvi. 12-13.

But loans are made these days most commonly for another purpose, namely, that we may secure the means to increase our wealth in some notable degree, or to get something that can bring us profit. When a man negotiates a loan for this end there is no reason why a person should accommodate him gratis. Nay rather, it would be impudent of you to make some considerable gain by the use of my money, and yet to be unwilling to allow me a share in your profit, for in the meantime I myself am shut out of that gain which my money could have brought me, if I had turned it to my own uses. Moreover, on the principle that an action at law is of less value than possession, a transfer of actual value has taken place, and one which should be compensated for by some interest charge, since the place of possession is taken by a personal action which always implies some trouble. Not all men hold with Martial, Bk. II, ep.¹ xiii:

The judge wants money, and the counsel wants money.
Pay your creditor, Sextus, I should advise. (A.)

Moreover, many accidents can arise to make my debt perish. Pindar, Olympian Odes, x [9 ff.]: 'Lo, the lingering hours have come from afar, and have made me ashamed of my deep debt. Yet payment with usurance hath power to do away with the bitter rebuke of mortal men.' (S.) Sometimes, indeed, a debtor must be carefully courted, so that the loan be not lost, while some men render others dependent upon them by making them their creditors. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIX, chap. xxiv; Plutarch, Eumenes [xiii], p. 591 c. In Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. V, the Mareschal de Roquelaure urges as an excuse for his rebellion: 'I followed not the Duke of Mayenne but my money. My debtor would become a bad debt if he were not followed close by his creditor.' Bad debts are not infrequent, as is shown by the saying of Martial, Bk. I, ep. lxxvi [I. lxxv]: 'He who prefers to give Linus the half of what he wishes to borrow, rather than to lend him the whole, prefers to lose only the half.' (A.)

This line of reasoning closely accords with the feeling of those who hold that it is to the advantage of a state for money to be let at interest to none but merchants, on the ground that in this way the industry of the poor is increased, while those who do not hesitate to go into debt for luxuries are forced to live frugally. And men of means, being un- 515 willing for their money to lie idle, will either take up business themselves, or lend their money to those who will, whereby commerce will be quickened to the great advantage of the state. Add Ludovicus

¹ [For epist. read epigr.—Tr.]

Septalius, De Ratione Status, Bk. II, chap. xv. Grotius on Luke, vi. 35, holds that the rate of lawful usury should be set, not by the profit which the borrower makes, but by the loss sustained by the lender, just as in buying and other contracts the valuation must never be based on what profit accrues to the recipient, but on the loss to the seller or giver. And as much is lost as a man does and can gain from his money in accordance with his manner of life, deduction being made for the risk, which is greater in some cases and less in others.

This I admit, in so far as no one who has lent his money can complain of wrong, if the borrower has made some great and unforeseen gain from the loan. Yet I can unquestionably demand with full right a higher rate of usury from him who will profit greatly by the transaction, than from him who gains but little.

10. It is easy to answer the arguments advanced against usury. There is no point to the statement that the loan of a consumable thing (mutuum) should by its nature be gratuitous, since that of a non-consumable thing (commodatum) is also of that nature. But the reply is, that just as I can allow another the use of my property in two ways, either gratis or at a rent, of which the first is a loan, and the second a letting, so what prevents me from lending my money to another gratis or for a fixed charge? But if a man would still maintain that it is only properly a loan (mutuum), when money is lent gratis, that will only mean that when we stipulate a return for our money, the contract should be given some other name, not that it is unlawful.

The further objection is also of no value, namely, that money is a barren thing (compare Matthew, xxv. 24), and of no such use to life as clothing, dwellings, and cattle¹, and that it is therefore improper to demand anything in return for its use. For although money does not reproduce its kind, yet after an eminent price has been set upon money, it is, by the aid of men's industry, made most productive in securing for itself things that are fruitful both in nature and for the state. Therefore, usury is listed not among natural but among civil fruits. On them Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. x, passes this severe stricture:

I see there letters of credit, promissory notes, and bonds, empty phantoms of property, ghosts of sick avarice, with which she deceives our minds, which delight in unreal fancies; for what are these things, and what are interest, and account-books, and usury, except the names of unnatural developments of human covetousness? [. . .] What are your documents, your sale of time, your blood-sucking 12 per cent. interest? These are evils which we owe to our own will, which flow merely from our perverted habit, having nothing about them which can be seen or handled, mere dreams of empty avarice. (S.)

Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. vii [I. x], is also quite unfair to usury:

The most hated sort <of money-making>, (he says), and with the greatest reason, is usury, which makes a gain out of money itself, and not from the natural use of it. For money was intended to be used in exchange, but not to increase at interest. And this term usury,

¹ [For instrumenta read iumenta.—Tr.]

which means the birth of money from money, is applied to the breeding of money because the offspring resembles the parent. Wherefore of all modes of making money this is the most unnatural. (J.)

But the reply can be made to this theory, that for money to be put out at interest is not at all contrary to its use. For he who borrows money surely does it μεταβολῆς χάριν (for the purpose of bartering), and dominion was introduced at the outset, so that each man's property might be of immediate service to himself. Nor is it contrary to nature to rent one's own property to others.

It is a little more subtle when some say that in consumable commodities dominion is not distinguished from use, and so the use of 516 a thing cannot be allowed a man without dominion over it as well, and, vice versa, it is vain to grant dominion without use. For example, just as the substance of grain, meat, and wine is destroyed when they are taken over for the uses of men, so money perishes morally, when I claim it for my uses, inasmuch as it is removed from my estate. And so, they argue, since in usury the use cannot be distinguished from the thing itself, nothing can properly be required for the use, but it is enough if the things themselves are returned in their kind. The reply to this is that it is conceded that the usufruct of consumable things is not distinct from their substance. See Digest, VII. v. 1 and 2. Yet it does not follow from this fact that therefore the right to use up a consumable thing, with the obligation to return it in its kind after a time, is an act that cannot have a price placed upon it. For every loan has this condition, that it need not be returned save after a time; and yet if money is lent for a time, I can for that period spend it for other fruitful things, or make a profit from it in some other way. Thus, if I have to restore some necessities of life after a period, the advantage to me lies in the fact that I am not forced to exchange or sell my things on bad terms, for instance, to secure food, and that my money, which would have been spent on such things, I can in the meantime invest in a more lucrative way.

In this connexion we should mention, in passing, what Aristotle, Economics, Bk. II, chap. i, says to the effect that, when Cypselus vowed all his possessions to the gods of Corinth, he paid a tenth the first year and so on for ten successive years. Although he did not in fact meet the letter of his vow unless one be allowed the favour of lightening a rash promise by some qualifying interpretation. The saying of Cato, in Cicero, On Duties, Bk. II, at the end, that he regarded usury a crime equal to brigandage or homicide, is to be understood as of that extortionate usury, whereby citizens of slender means are reduced to extremities, and fuel is fed to an unquenchable avarice. The same Cato, On Farming [preface], says: 'Our ancestors considered, and so ordained in their laws, that, while the thief should be cast in double damages, the usurer should make fourfold restitution.' (H.) Yet he himself, as we are informed by Plutarch, Cato the Elder [xxi], dealt in bottomry not without considerable shrewdness. Thus Augustus justly censured some Roman knights because they had borrowed at a low rate of interest, and let the money out at a high rate. Suetonius, Augustus, chap. xxxix. Appian, Civil Wars, Bk. I [liv], says that the early Greeks and Romans abhorred usury: 'It seems that the ancient Romans, like the Greeks, abhorred the taking of interest on loans as something knavish,¹ and hard on the poor, and leading to contention and enmity; and by the same kind of reasoning the Persians considered lending as having a tendency to deceit and lying.' (W.) And we also feel it unworthy of a Christian to take anything as interest on small sums from those whose need we ought to meet as an act of charity. See Ecclesiasticus, xxix. 1 ff.; Psalms, xv. Nay, the manner in which the Greeks aided their poor friends deserves especial commendation. Friends formed associations, which had a common chest to which individuals made a contribution every month. From this they lent money without usury in case one of their number fell into adverse fortune, which he was to pay back when his affairs took a turn for the better. This contribution was called ἐρανος [a loan of kindness].

11. What we have said is further confirmed by the fact, that even those who attack usury approve some contracts which in effect amount to usury. Thus let us suppose that Gaius is given money to buy a farm. Seius wants the same farm but has no money. At his request Gaius 517 purchases the farm and then rents it to Seius. No one denies the justice of such a contract. But if Gaius should lend Seius the money to buy the same farm, and the latter should pay as much in rent as he would give in interest on the loan, there appears no wrong in such a transaction. Nay, the latter contract is more to the advantage of Seius than the former, since by it he has secured the ownership of the farm. Likewise, if a person lends his money to an upright man, on the arrangement that he will not demand a fixed sum as usury, but will be satisfied to receive an equal share of the profits made from that money, no one will hold that there is any injustice in this contract. But, so far as equity is concerned, it is the same, if, in place of an uncertain profit, he stipulates for a fixed and moderate usury charge.

Among the Mohammedans also usury is forbidden by the laws of the Koran, although the Moors have a kind of pact whereby a man who has taken a loan to carry on some transaction and make a profit, gives the creditor one-half of the gain, while if the loan has been lost, he is obliged to return to him only the principal. If but a part of the loan has been lost, the balance is made up from the gain on what is left. Likewise, no fault is held to attach to the case of anticresis [reciprocal usage], whereby a man gathers the fruits from a pledge in return for a loan. Add Digest, XX. ii. 8. Why, then, is it not permissible in exchange for a loan which has no pledge attached, to accept something which corresponds to the fruits of a pledge? Usury was forbidden among the Persians, but reciprocal usage was lawful, even under a commissory clause. Add Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. V, chap. xxxvi.

¹ [For κατηλέειν read κατηλίκον.—Tr.]

Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 21, rejects the term usury, but retains the thing itself, when he writes:

There are certain advantages which approach the character of interest, and commonly seem to be interest, although they are agreements of another kind; such are agreements for making good the loss which one who lends money suffers because he misses the use of the money for a long time; and likewise the loss of gain on account of a loan, with a deduction, of course, in view of the uncertainty of expectations (that is, because such expected profit may be lost or decreased by a number of causes), and of the effort which it would have been necessary to put forth (if the person himself had handled the money). So again it is not, in fact, usury if something is demanded for the expenses of the man who lends to many and keeps cash on hand for this purpose, as well as for the danger of losing the principal, in case proper security is not taken. (K.)

And yet the moderate usury which we take for a loan not to a poor man but to one who will make a profit from it, we demand for the most part because our gain from that money ceases when it leaves us, and because it is worth some compensation for us to have in place of the thing only an action for it; and so we come in for some share in the profit made from our money, which we were not obligated to lend to another either on grounds of justice or on grounds of humanity. And so what wise man would quarrel over words? And who will not laugh at those who claim that they do not require usury but only what the loan costs them?

Furthermore, this superstitious subtlety does not square with the laws of jurisprudence; for according to these that which is agreed upon beforehand is fixed usury, while any other loss is regularly required under other causes, such as delay, or the fact that the thing owed us was not returned at the proper time. The measure of this loss is the actual damage done to us, however it may be, although, because its amount can be fixed only with difficulty, it is often reduced to regular rates of usury. See Digest, XXII. i. 17, § 3. And yet if it be permissible to require compensation for delay, or because the gain ceases for us and a loss follows, when money is not paid at the time agreed upon, why is it not permissible to fix in advance some charge, for the reason that our money is for the while in the hands of another, when we were under no circumstances obligated, out of favour to him, to suffer a loss or forgo a profit. Add Bacon, Essays, chap. xxxix.

12. Finally, since it is obvious that men cannot be found who are 518 willing to lend gratis as much money as the general standard of living, and trade, as it is now carried on between most civilized nations, demand, different devices are worked out or allowed by which the decrees of canon law upon usury have been evaded. Among these should be classed the 'purchase of yearly income', where in return for money some immovable thing is made over to me in its acknowledgement, from which I can receive a payment in money or fruits, and this either for ever, or for a fixed or unlimited period, or for the lifetime of the creditor. Some of these incomes can be recovered by the debtor upon payment of the loan, and some cannot. Nay, sometimes when the thing whereby the income was guaranteed has been lost, the obligation to pay it still lies upon the person of the debtor. But no one can fail to see that this purchase of a yearly income differs from usury only in name and appearance. Add François Hotman, Observations, Bk. II, chap. i; Ioannes Labardaeus, Historiae de Rebus Gallicis, Bk. VI, p. 393.

Even the popes themselves observed the value of low charges of usury, and permitted it under the high sounding name of 'mountains of piety', as they call it, the rules for which are in general that as much as three scudi shall be given poor persons without pledge and usury, but pledges may be taken for larger sums, and a little paid each month. If the pledge is not redeemed within one year, it is sold at auction, and anything in excess of the debt is returned to its owner. Yet according to Lampridius, Alexander Severus [xxi], Alexander Severus was no less pious in his exaction of usury: 'He loaned out public money at four per cent., but to many of the poor he even advanced money without interest for the purchase of lands, the loans to be repaid from their profits.' (M.) A similar practice, save that nothing is given without a pledge and gratis, prevails in what is called 'Lombardy', a name derived from the fact that those who used to charge interest in France were for the most part Lombards and Jews, whom public hatred afterward expelled from the kingdom. See Henri Estienne [Henricus Stephanus], Apology for Herodotus, Bk. I, chap. vi. After long discussion usury was finally approved in Belgium as being advantageous to the state and legal, and those who exacted it were even admitted to the priesthood.

To what extent the law of usury is evaded by merchants, through what they call cambia sicca [dry exchange], is known to those who follow that calling. Here belongs also the contract which they designate by the Spanish word Mohatra, whereby a man in need of money buys goods of a merchant at a very high price, to be paid at another time, and immediately sells them back to the same man at a low price, paid at once. See Montaltius [Pascal], Lettres Provinciales, viii, and the remarks thereon by Wendrock, n. 3. More tolerable is that contract where goods are purchased dearly, although a fair length of time is agreed upon for the payment of the price, and then they are immediately sold more cheaply to a third party for immediate payment. With this money a man can either avoid a loan upon hard terms, or make such profits in the meanwhile, that, at the expiration of the period, the debt can be paid with no inconvenience. This kind of contract, as Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. III, chap. vii, records, is common in Muscovy.

Yet those civil laws are worthy of entire commendation, which do not allow men free play in the exaction of usury, but set for them a fixed rate, save that it does not appear unjust to exact a little higher interest when a loan is required for but a short period. See Leo, Novels, lxxxiv. Among these laws should be listed one of Egypt, in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxix, which forbade increasing the principal by usury more than twofold, and allowed a creditor to exact payment only from the property of his debtors, but on no account to enslave them. The law held that goods belonged to those who had either gathered them by their labour or had acquired them on some other just title, but that the bodies of men were owed to the state, to be used in the services of war and peace, as they were best fitted.

CHAPTER VIII

ON PARTNERSHIP

- | | |
|---|---|
| 1. The ways in which a partnership is formed.
2. Money and labour may be balanced in several ways. | 3. Irregular partnership.
4. Partnership in all goods. |
|---|---|

It is a contract of partnership when two or more men unite their money, property, or labours, to the end that any profits made therefrom may be divided between the individuals pro rata. See Digest, XVII. ii. 83. Any loss also, that may result, is borne by the individuals pro rata. See Digest, XVII. ii. 52, §§ 3-4; XVII. ii. 60, § 1. Therefore, if all contributed an equal amount of money, the individual shares in loss and profit will simply be equal, but when they have contributed unequally, each will receive his share pro rata, according to the laws of geometric proportion. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, chap. xvi: 'In a commercial association the larger contributors are the larger recipients.' (W.) In the same sense is to be explained Digest, XVII. ii. 29. The same will obtain if two or more men only contribute equal labours, or if one contributes labour and the other money, or if each contributes both.

2. Now if, upon dissolving partnership, each partner has contributed only money, it is clear that each will receive upon division as much as he had contributed. But when labour and money have been contributed, it is a matter for inquiry to determine on what basis the balancing is to be made. For when labour is contributed on the one side, and only the mere use of money on the other, he who contributes the money does by no means admit his partner to a share in the ownership of that money, but only divides with him pro rata the profit which results from the union of the money and the labour. And just as in this case he who contributed only labour receives nothing upon the dissolution of the partnership, so it is for the other as the owner that his investment is preserved or lost. In such a partnership it is not the investment which is compared with the labour, but the risk of losing it, and the profit which could with some reason be expected from it. And so, when profits are to be distributed no comparison is to be drawn between labour and investment in such a way, for example, that if one contributed labour worth 100 units of value, and the other an investment of 1,000 such units, the former shall receive but one-tenth of the profits. But the labour is to be compared with the amount of risk to which the money is exposed, and with the gain which could have been expected with some probability; and when these last are valued at 100 units, they shall share equally in the profits. Although the easiest way is to reckon the risk and hope of profit in terms of the common rate of usury which is usually given for money lent. Thus, if we reckon the interest at six per cent., they will share equally in the profits in case one has contributed labour worth 60 units and the other 1,000 units in capital.

But the method is different when labour is contributed along with money in such a way, that he who contributed labour also secures a share in the dominion of the money as well. In such a case the price of the labour is held to be something added to the investment, and the partner contributing labour is understood to have a share in the total investment in accordance with the worth of his labour, since the money and labour have united, as it were, into one mass. It is presumed that the money of one partner has been spent on raw material, and the labour of the other on handling and working it up. Let us suppose, for example, that I give a weaver 100 units of value with which he buys wool from which he weaves cloth, and his labour is likewise worth 100 520 of the same units. It is generally recognized that we have equal shares in the cloth, and when it is sold the money received will be divided equally, nor will I be able first to withdraw the money contributed at the outset, and then divide with him only what is left over. Compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 24.

3. It should also be noted that it is not unjust to form a partnership in which one of the members shares in the profits but not in the losses. See Digest, XVII. ii. 29, § 1. To be sure, such will be an irregular partnership, and a contract of partnership combined with insurance against risk. Equality will be preserved in it, if he who has assumed the whole risk will draw a greater share in the profits, in proportion as he has insured the other members entirely or in part against the uncertainties of chance. But that a man should bear the loss without the gain is contrary to the nature of partnerships, since they are never entered into but for some advantage. See Digest, XVII. ii. 29, § 2.

4. But it also happens that men form a partnership of all their possessions. Such a partnership continues for so long as each member, in accordance with his status and the laws of frugal economy, can take from the common store what is required for the reasonable needs of himself and his dependants. But in view of the fact that many things may arise to make the members unwilling to remain for any length of time in such a partnership (see Digest, XVII. ii. 70), it is well to determine at the outset what share in the profits each member should receive upon its dissolution. In this connexion Grotius, loc. cit., observes, that regard should be had not to what has actually come from this or that man's contribution, but to what could with some probability be expected, that is, that the shares in the profits are usually set according to whether it is hoped that much or little will result from each man's investment or its accessions, but not that each person shall receive his original investment plus its earnings. For the purpose in several men pooling their property is that they may share in the profit which comes from another's goods.

Now although the interests of peace require that no man should be forced to remain in a partnership against his will, yet in view of the fact that a high degree of mutual good faith is required between partners, a man should not dissolve a partnership hastily and to the prejudice of his associates. See Digest, XVII. ii. 65, §§ 3 ff. Cicero, For Sextus Roscius [xl], makes some weighty remarks on the maintenance of good faith among partners:

In less important matters, to deceive one's partner is a most shameful thing. And rightly; because he who has communicated an affair to another thinks that he has procured assistance for himself. To whose good faith, then, shall a man have recourse who is injured by the want of faith in the man whom he has trusted? But those offences are to be punished with the greatest severity which are guarded against with the greatest difficulty. We can be reserved towards strangers; intimate friends must see things more openly; but how can we guard against a companion? for even to be afraid of him is to do violence to the rights of duty. Our ancestors therefore rightly thought that he who had deceived his companion ought not to be considered in the number of good men. (Y.)

Add Quintilian, Declamations, cccxx.

CHAPTER IX

ON CONTRACTS SUBJECT TO CHANCE

- | | |
|-----------------------------|--------------------------------|
| 1. Pacts mixed with chance. | 5. A contract in games. |
| 2. They are found in peace, | 6. On a contract of lottery. |
| 3. As well as in war. | 7. On the 'pot of fortune'. |
| 4. A contract of wager. | 8. On a contract of insurance. |

WE turn now to those contracts in which an agreement is entered 521 into on an uncertain outcome, and which depend upon some unknown chance, or in which the parties agree to, and, as it were, stand by some uncertain eventuality by the outcome of which they agree that they will abide. Now although some of them can be understood without reference to price, yet since most of them are entered into about things that have been valued, it has seemed best to bring them into this part of our discussion.

2. These pacts, mixed with chance or fortune, are used publicly and privately. They occur publicly in war as well as in peace. In peace many nations use a divisory chance, in selecting judges, in assigning provinces, and in distributing offices, when the candidates are equal both as regards right and the qualities or abilities necessary for the exercise of that function; for otherwise, if they have unequal rights, those who have the better are wronged, while if they differ in abilities it is the state that suffers. For, as Isocrates, Areopagiticus [23], says: 'In appointing by lot, chance has the decision.' (F.*) And Callimachus, Hymn to Zeus [62-3]: 'For equal chances should one cast lots.' (M.) Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. III, chap. ix [30]: 'The lot has no discernment, for a worse man might be as easily chosen by lot as a better one.' (C.) All these ways of choosing presuppose a pact or promise on the part of those who have voluntarily had recourse to them, that they are willing to abide without complaint by whatever chance may decide. See Justin, Bk. I, chap. x; Bk. XVIII, chap. iii. But when a superior uses the lot in a matter which he could have settled by virtue of his authority, he voluntarily agrees to give up this prerogative and submit to the decision of the lot.

Now the purpose of lots is not and should not be the use of an unusual method in order to find out the will of God, except where by His law He has strictly commanded their use (Proverbs, xvi. 33), but to put an end to disputes and discords (see Proverbs, xviii. 18), and that he, who could otherwise by his authority make an end of wranglers, may avoid the odium of the party who is disappointed in his hope, and stop complaints about the injustice of a decision or the motives of a superior.

Yet it is absurd to use a lot, or anything allied to it, in disputes where punishment awaits the loser, since punishments should follow only upon a wicked deed, and one that has been established by clear proofs; and no matter how a lot falls it cannot show that a thing was or was not done by a certain party, and vice versa, nor is it suited to the actual truth of a question. But in case a number are equally guilty and it is not desirable to punish them all, there is nothing to prevent choosing by lot those who shall bear the guilt.

Also in private transactions the lot is used most often to assign the parts of an inheritance as well as to apportion some indivisible benefit or burden upon one of several who have an equal right or obligation. Add Numbers, xxxiv. 13; Joshua, xiv. 2; Psalms, xvi. 6.

3. Such pacts are used no less in war, not only when the decision of a whole war is made to depend on the result of a contest between entire armies, or two or more champions from each side (see Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xx, § 42), but also when some leader must be assigned a dangerous post, which several are qualified to undertake, and no one of them has a legitimate reason to avoid. See Homer, Iliad, Bk. VII, line 171. Nay more, practically all formal wars, certainly those where a peaceful agreement has been rejected by both sides, and the gage of battle taken up, appear to suppose an agreement that he upon whose side the fortune of war has rested can impose his entire will upon the conquered. And this is the real reason why pacts of peace cannot have thrown up to 522 them the exception of fear; for whoever resolved to take up war against another, when he could have settled the controversy by peaceful negotiations, is understood to have left the decision of the issue to the dice of Mars, and it is, therefore, idle for him to complain of any terms which the fortunes of war have meted out to him. And this is the further reason why the custom of nations holds that the belligerents mutually in a formal war are upon an equal footing so far as concerns the justice of the war, when they come to make peace, and why the damage caused by either side is forgiven, as if it had been done upon agreement.

A similar agreement is entered into by those who leave the decision of their disputes to the outcome of duels. Among the results of this covenant is the circumstance that the slayer is not obligated to make amends to the wife and children of his opponent for the loss caused by the latter's death, inasmuch as each of them, willingly and by agreement, entered a combat the law of which was either to kill or be killed. But since these combats, when entered into by individuals out of boldness, are directly opposed to the purpose of civil judgements, they are justly restrained by the most severe penalties. Yet quite absurdly, and contrary to the genius of civil judgements, duels were formerly permitted, either to clear one of the accusation of a crime, or to prove one's right which had been put in question. See *Decretals*¹, V. xxxv; Lindenbrog, Codex Legum Antiquarum, passim, and his Glossary under the words campio and duellum. So formerly in Germany there was unjustly left to the decision of a duel the question of right, as to whether an uncle, or a nephew by an elder brother now deceased, should be first in an inheritance. In Sigebert of Gembloux, on the year 942.

4. Among contracts of chance are also included wagers when some future event, or the outcome of some event already past but not known to either of the parties, or of another thing, is affirmed by one party and denied by the other, each of them putting up a pledge, which shall go to him whose claim is found to agree with the event or thing. These wagers appear to be reciprocal promises or conditional bargains, which have an element of chance, because it does not depend upon the contracting parties whether or not the event takes place. The riddle proposed by Samson in Judges, xiv. 12 ff., appears to belong more to a jest than a wager, since it was a contest of wits, to decide whether he could state the case more obscurely, or the others solve it more cleverly. But Samson's comrades used trickery, since they solved his riddle not by their own wits but with the connivance of his wife. Although it is perhaps contrary to the nature of such contests to make a riddle out of some private fact, and not on some thing or event of common knowledge, for it is almost impossible to ascertain such particular facts by conjecture.

5. Here belong all kinds of games in which a prize is played for, and which involve an agreement that partakes more or less of chance. And, indeed, there is little chance in plays which involve a challenge of wit, dexterity, cunning, or strength, inasmuch as they are uncertain only because it is not yet entirely clear what strength or cunning is on each side, and because something unforeseen frequently interposes (see Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. V, line 328), or, finally, because the wit and strength of men are not always put forth with the same vigour. Many are compounded of chance and wit, as games of cards and the like. Other games are ruled almost entirely by chance, like that of dice. All of these have in them nothing that is naturally unfair, for people play them with mutual consent, each person exposes his wager to an equal risk, and the play is for our own property, which we have a perfect right to dispose of. 523

Yet since it is to the interest of the state that a man shall not misuse his property, and a man can easily run through his wealth by such agreements and games, when the play is for large sums, 'when men go to the hazard of the gaming-table not simply with their purses, but play with their whole chest staked' (E.) [Juvenal, Satires, I. 89 f.]; because also 'other games are wont to waste that precious thing, our time' (W.), Ovid, Tristia, Bk. II [483-4]; and since many other misfortunes can arise therefrom, it lies, therefore, within the province of the governors of states to ascertain how far games should be allowed, and what sums should be wagered. See Digest, XI. v, together with the comments by the expositors of the Roman law; Photius, Nomocanon, Tit. XIII, chap. xxix; Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VI, chap. xi. It should, however, be noted in general, that it is right to grant more favour to games which allow less chance and more skill, and vice versa. The Koran, in the Chapter on the Table, forbids, along with wine, games that involve chance, on the ground that they contain the seeds of quarrels. But in every kind of game and contest the words of Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. III, chap. iv, hold good: 'For those who run in a race are, as one hears, instructed and warned each one to win the race by swiftness of foot and not by any foul play, and to hasten on to victory by running as hard as they can, but not to dare to trip up another, or push him aside with their hand.' (R.*) This is drawn from the saying of Chrysippus in Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [x. 42].

¹ [For it. read it.—Tr.]

6. There is also a common game of chance which they call lottery, in which several persons contribute to the purchase of a thing, and then decide by lot to which one it shall belong. Here there is a combination of two contracts, for with respect to him who thus lays out his property for those casting for it, it is a kind of sale, while with respect to the others it is a contract of divisory chance, in that it is agreed between them that the lucky one shall alone have the thing and the rest shall lose what they contributed. The rule under which this contract operates is that the entire sum contributed shall equal and not exceed the value of the reward, and that all who cast the lot shall be exposed to an equal chance of gain or loss.

7. It is called a pot of fortune when a certain number of tokens or tickets, some inscribed and some blank, are cast into a bowl, and one is charged for the privilege of drawing them out, the drawer receiving what the writing describes. This contract is very similar to buying in hope, although it clearly includes an element of chance. The rule for it is that the value of all the tickets together should not greatly exceed that of the things described on them. I say 'not greatly', for there must be some expense, and it is possible that some very valuable articles are drawn at the first, and, since most of the rest of the tickets are then blank, no one comes to draw them. Such pots of fortune are sometimes employed to collect money for use upon public works, or to relieve those in want, in view of which the price of all the tickets is usually much greater than that of the things there exposed. This excess bears the character of a kind of voluntary contribution or alms, given in a cheerful manner. Add Martin Delrio, Essay on Magic, Bk. IV, chap. iv.

But in general the equity of games requires not only that the things exposed to risk on each side should be equal, but that the risk of loss and the hope of gain should likewise be in proportion to the thing for which they contend. For instance, in a game which depends on physical or mental skill, it is right for one whose skill is twice as great as that of the other to hazard twice as much. So, for example, there are ten men who each hazard one gold piece, and play on the terms that the highest thrower shall win all. It may appear unfair that he who has risked one piece should gain the other nine. Yet it should be borne in mind that he ran nine chances of loss to one of gain. For this reason some have said that it is foolish to fear lightning, for not even one out of 2,000,000 men is struck by lightning; and so regard should be had not merely to the greatness of the evil but also to the likelihood of it happening. 524

8. Related to these contracts is insurance, or a contract to avoid risk, whereby a man upon the receipt of a certain sum takes upon his own shoulders and guarantees the risk which goods will undergo in being transported to other places, and that chiefly by sea, and, if they happen to perish, the insurer is obligated to make good their value to the owner. This contract is null if either party had prior knowledge, the insurer that the thing insured had already reached its destination, the insuree that it had already been lost, for the substance of this contract is a loss considered to be uncertain, or an uncertain risk; but if the insurer knew that the thing had arrived safely in port he undertakes no risk. Yet when the owner of the merchandise knew that it had already been lost, a risk cannot be assumed by the other, for a thing not existing is not subject to a risk.

The price to be paid for assuming such a risk must be fixed on the common rate, or by agreement between the two parties. It is clear that the more numerous and serious the risks to which a thing is subjected, the higher the price that can be required. Thus more can be demanded if the sea is infested with enemies or pirates, than if only the uncertainties of storms are feared, and on the same score, more in winter than in summer. Add Loccenius, De Jure Maritimo, Bk. II, chap. v.

We have mentioned that contract in this connexion for the reason that, on the part of the insurer, it is chiefly concerned with chance. An instance of insurance, although gratuitous, is given by Livy, Bk. XXIII, chap. xlix, where those who take the contract for transporting clothing and food to Spain demand 'that the state should bear all losses of the goods they shipped, which might arise either from the attacks of the enemy or from storms'. (S.) The fraud that entered into this transaction is set forth by the same author, Bk. XXV, chap. iii.

CHAPTER X

ON ACCESSORY PACTS

1. The two kinds of accessory pacts.
2. The variety of added pacts.
3. If an accessory pact is base, it is invalid.
4. Sometimes it disorganizes business.
5. When added at once¹ it is valid, provided other things are equal.
6. When added after the time a negative pact causes exception.
7. Its force when affirmative.
8. On a trust.
9. A surety cannot be held for more than the principal debt;
10. But he can be held more securely.
11. What benefits of law belong to a surety.
12. On bail.
13. The use of pledges.
14. A pledge is either fruitful or barren.
15. Whether a pledge can be secured by usucapion.
16. How a mortgage differs from a pledge.

525 AFTER principal contracts, which subsist by themselves, we must now turn to accessory pacts, which are not entered into of themselves and alone, but are only added to others. They can be conveniently divided into two classes. Some are added to other contracts so that they affect their simple nature in several ways, by adding something which they did not otherwise contain, or by subtracting something which was naturally in them. These are usually called by the lawyers additional pacts. Others contribute some stability and security to contracts already determined and defined.

2. The expositors of the Roman law on Digest, II. xiv. 7, § 5, are accustomed to distinguish in additional pacts between those which are added before the contract was finished, or else immediately thereafter, with the result that they seem to merge, as it were, with the principal contract; and those which are added after an interval. Then they inquire whether they are added to contracts made in good faith, or to those of strict law. And lastly, whether they affect the essentials of a contract; or what is natural, or, finally, what is accidental to it. The first are those without which a contract is in no way intelligible; the second regularly attend a contract, even though not expressed, although the essence of it can be expressed without them; the last do not flow from the essence of a contract, but can be included or not at the pleasure of the parties concerned. Nay, they feel that it makes some difference as to whether they are added to increase or to diminish the obligation.

3. On all these the following conclusions can be formed. I. A pact which so affects the essentials of a contract as to make it contrary to laws and good morals is invalid. For we have shown above that shameful agreements have no force. Thus it would be an invalid pact if a bride should want to add to the marriage contract that she be allowed to receive other men as well; or if a steward should try to add to his engagement the privilege of fraudulently making away with his master's property. So it would be absurd for those who make a pact to wish to make a declaration that they did so because of unjust coercion and fear; or for a person in any kind of contract whatsoever to proclaim that he is not at all to answer for any fraud. Add Digest, XVI. iii. 1, §§ 7, 35.

¹ [For contenti read continenti.—Tr.]

4. II. If a pact so affects the essentials of a contract that it passes fully into another form of business, inquiry must be made into what was the intention of the parties to it. For if they really wanted to do what they expressed in their words, it is clear that the added pact is null, since no one can at the same time desire things mutually destructive and inconsistent. Thus men would be foolish if they claimed that they really would complete a sale and yet would at the same time add a clause to the contract that the buyer is obligated never to part with the price, or the seller with the article; or if they would let a house with the pact that the tenant should have dominion of it; or if they should form a partnership on the condition that neither any profit nor any loss would come to them from their common undertaking.

But if the contracting parties made the change in all seriousness, but either erred in the wording through inexperience or for certain considerations preferred to speak incorrectly, what is done will stand, provided the whole undertaking be not opposed to the laws, nor will the action be null because of some impropriety in the wording. Here belong Digest, XVIII. i. 80, § 3; XIX. v. 4 and 6¹; XVII. ii. 5, § 1; XVI. iii. 1, § 8; Institutes, III. xiv, § 2 at end.

5. III. Pacts which are added at once to any contracts, whether 526 they lie outside the essence of the contract, or have some effect on what is natural to it, or invest the contract with some features incidental to it, are valid, provided they are not in opposition to the laws. For since it is understood that the parties have the power to dispose of such things, they will be held to that to which they freely consented. Here belong, Digest, XVI. iii. 1, § 6; [ibid.] 24 and 26, § 1. Institutes, III. xxv, §§ 1, 2; Digest, XVIII. i. 7, § 1; XVIII. i. 79; XIX. i. 11, § 1; II. xiv. 7, § 5. Thus although the delivery of the article is otherwise natural in buying and selling, the contracting parties can agree otherwise in an added pact. So also the remedying of a defect can be either increased or diminished beyond what the common nature of every contract otherwise requires. And the same will obtain in consensual contracts, if even after their completion, but before their execution, a pact is added, since the result is as if a new contract were entered into. See Digest, II. xiv. 7, § 6; II. xiv. 58; XVIII. i. 72; XVIII. v. 2, 3; Code, IV. xlv. 1.

On pacts immediately added, which concern the natural qualities of contracts or their basic principles, further information can be gained from Code [Digest,] II. xiv. 11, 13; XIX. i. 6, § 1; Code, IV. xlv. 2. Here belongs also everything that is said in the sections, Digest, XVIII. iii, and XVIII. ii; likewise the pact on selling back in Code, XIV. xlv. 2; and the privilege of returning a purchase if unsatisfactory in Code, XIV. xlv. 7. Here can be referred that kind of loan whereby a certain sum of money is placed at interest, on condition that the interest be paid a certain man so long as he live, while upon his death the principal shall be his who took the loan, since otherwise the nature of a loan is that it can be recovered by the original lender or his heirs.

¹ [For '46' read '4. 6'.—Tr.]

6. IV. Pacts added after an interval to any contracts, provided they be negative, and detract somewhat from the obligation, and so are to the favour of the debtor or defendant, are valid when other considerations are equal, and aid the defendant by way of exception. Thus some time after the actual contraction of a loan, the creditor and debtor can agree on postponing the payment, changing its place, on the kind of money in payment, on foregoing interest, &c. Digest, XVIII. i. 72; II. xiv. 7, § 5.

7. V. By natural law, in so far as an action is allowed by a bare pact, even pacts added to contracts after an interval, when they increase an obligation and so benefit the plaintiff, can be valid. For the reason why the Roman law in the passages just cited denies this, is because an action is not allowed by a mere affirmative pact, which principle the law of nature does not recognize. Thus, if we suppose that I have bought something to be delivered at a certain time, and it be agreed later that the delivery shall be made sooner, nothing prevents the delivery being required by the later pact. Thus suppose I have rented you my dwelling for two years, and we afterwards agree that the lease shall expire after one year, surely the tenant will have to leave the house at the end of that time, although the rent for the second year cannot be required. Likewise, I do not see why, if a pact on a loan can defer the time of payment, it cannot also hasten it. See Digest, XIII. v. 3, § 2. Nay, even if the debtor loses the advantage gained in making an earlier payment, still no injury will be done him if he made the pact of his own accord. Yet it is clear that his obligation cannot be increased against his will, and so whatever is naturally added to his obligation by the later pact, must be subtracted somewhere else. Thus, if my creditor wants me to pay at some other place than the one agreed upon, I can 527 for my part rightly demand that I be permitted to deduct as much from the payment as it meant to me to have settled with him at the former place.

But it is also clear that it is opposed to the nature of onerous and bartering contracts, that at the outset or later a pact be added to them, which so increases the obligation of one of the parties that an inequality thereupon arises in the contract. This would happen if a buyer and seller should have agreed at the first on a price as being a fair one for an article, and then afterwards agree that the buyer pay more than it is worth. Unless it be a mixed contract of buying and selling, there seems to be no way in which the additional charge can be required as from the purchase. Compare Arnoldus, Vinnius, Tractatus de Pactis, chaps. ix ff.

8. Under this head I think can conveniently be referred a trust, whereby we make over to a person some thing as his own, on the condition that he return it to us. This I should put among additional pacts rather than among principal contracts, for the reason that it is always added to a transfer already made of something to another. And it appears that the word trust is given to this pact for the reason that, although he who otherwise has the dominion of some thing made over to him can dispose of it as he pleases, and therefore either keep it indefinitely for his own use or turn it over to some one else, still, by the addition of such a pact, we place such trust in his honour and fidelity as to feel that he will not use his dominion otherwise than agreed upon, and will be quite willing to return it to us. And so among the Romans the regular formula for that pact ran: 'That among honest men there be fair dealing, and without fraud'; in Cicero, Topics [x] and [Letters] to his Friends, Bk. VII, ep. xii, and On Duties, Bk. III [xvii. 70]. And since so much faith, as it were, was concerned in such a relation, by the Roman laws infamy attended the man who had been judged guilty of a breach of trust. Cicero, For Roscius the Comic Actor [vi]: 'If there are any private actions of the greatest, I may almost say, of capital importance, there are these three—the actions about trust, about guardianship, and about partnership.' (Y.) Idem, Topics [x]: 'If a guardian is bound to behave with good faith, and a partner, and any one to whom you have entrusted anything, and any one who has taken a trust.' (Y.) Idem, For Caecina [iii]: 'If any one, when he has given security, has defrauded a person, he is condemned by the natural course of justice.' (Y.) In what negotiations a trust was interposed among the Romans is shown very fully by the expositors on the Roman law. On a father who receives in trust (pater fiduciarius) see Gaius, Institutes, Bk. VI. So also a trust was contracted in connexion with the emancipation of children touching the property of their fathers. See Institutes, III. ii, § 8; Code, VIII. xlviii. 6. On a possession in trust see Budaëus on Digest, I. ii. 2; Gregorius Tholosanus, Syntagma Juris Universi, Bk. XXIII, chap. v, § 2. On a guardianship in trust (tutela fiduciaria) see Bachovius on Institutes, III. ii. On a trust concerned with a pledge see Isidore, Etymologies, Bk. V, chap. xxv; Cujas, on Paulus, Receptarum Sententiarum, Bk. II, tit. xiii. So also a kind of trust is involved in things given on faith (fideicommissa). See Institutes, II. xxiii pr., and the remarks thereon of Bachovius and other expositors. Other examples of a trust are to be found everywhere. Livy, Bk. XXXII, chap. xxxviii:

When Philip now perceived that he must decide the matter in the field, and collect his strength about him from all quarters, being particularly uneasy in respect to the cities of Achaia, a country so distant from him, and also of Argos, even more, indeed, than of Corinth, he resolved, as the most advisable method, to put the former into the hands of Nabis, tyrant of Lacedaemon, in trust, as it were, on the terms that, if he should prove successful in the war, Nabis should re-deliver it to him; if any misfortune should happen, he should keep it himself. (E.)

So also in Paulus Warnefridus [Paulus Diaconus], History of the Lombards, Bk. II, chap. vii: 'Alboin turned over Pannonia to his friends the Huns on this understanding, that, if ever the Langobards might have to come back, they should return to their own land.' In Curtius, Bk. V, chap. ix, Nabarzanes urges Darius to make over his kingdom to Bessus for a time: 'At the happy termination of our perplexities he will retransfer to you, his liege sovereign, the chief authority assigned to him on trust.' (A.) Diodorus Siculus, Bk. IV, chap. xxxiii: 'Hercules took Sparta by storm, and restored Tyndareus, the father of the Dioscuri, to the kingdom upon this condition, that, inasmuch as he had gained it by conquest, he should keep it, and thereafter deliver it up entire to Hercules' posterity.' (B.) Boethius, On Cicero's Topics, gives the following example: 'If a man, fearing the uncertainties of the time, should entrust his farm to a more powerful friend, on the agreement that he was to restore it when that period of uncertainty was past.'

Likewise, if any one among the Turks has made an oath that he will divorce his wife, he is still bound to do so even if he afterward repent. But in order to take her back he enters into a trust with a friend of his whereby the latter will marry her and immediately after the ceremony divorce her. For a woman cannot return to her former husband unless after her divorce she has married another man. Monconys, Voyages, Bk. I, p. 465; compare Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. V, chap. xxiii.

Yet it will not be proper to make a trust so as to evade the law; for instance, if a man who does not pay taxes should be willing for another's goods to be made over to him for a time, so as to avoid the tax-collectors.

9. Now in pacts which add security and stability to other pacts already fixed and completed, the most common is that one man may take upon himself an obligation of another by way of security, so that in case the principal debtor does not pay, he will. Now men usually obligate themselves in behalf of others in three chief ways: (1) In obligations that concern things and actions which can be valued, and this chiefly between private citizens; (2) in cases of crime, that the defendant will meet the charge against him, which is properly called bail; (3) in public obligations where guaranty is made by sponsors and hostages.

Some remarks have already been made (Bk. V, chap. ii, § 10) which will help to the understanding of suretyship. To what has been said we add that by suretyship, we assume the obligation of another as a kind of security, so that in case some negotiable thing which is owed in some transaction is not paid by him, it is met by us ourselves; yet we have recourse to the principal debtor and may require of him our cost and loss. But since suretyship is only an addition to another contract, the surety can naturally not be obligated for more than was the principal debtor. And so if the latter owes conditionally, the former cannot owe anything until the condition has been fulfilled, nor can he be obligated more in time and place than the latter. It is also fair that whatever exceptions the debtor had, as proceeding from the transaction, also hold for the surety. See Digest, II. xi. 6; II. xiv. 32; III. iii. 51; XIV. vi. 9, § 3; XVI. ii. 4, 5.

Those who order a man to give credit to another are the same as sureties, for in so doing they are understood to interpose their own faith. But in case a man orders a second to credit a third with 1,000 units of value and the last would take only 500, the first is not obligated to the second for more than the third received. For the force of such an order is, 'You may credit him on my guaranty up to 1,000 units of value'. Yet nothing in such a case prevents the surety from being obligated for less than the principal debtor; so he may, for example, come in for only a part of the debt, or go surety for all of it, but under a condition, or postpone the time of payment, or designate a place more convenient for himself.

The end of suretyship forces the further conclusion that the surety should be a man of means and one worthy of confidence, whom the creditor can easily be quit of in his suit, which, indeed, is implied by the creditor's having accepted him. So in Homer, Odyssey, Bk. VIII [351 ff.], when Neptune offers to go sponsor for Mars, Vulcan rejoins: 'Evil are evil folk's pledges to hold. How could I keep thee bound among the deathless gods, if Ares were to depart, avoiding the debt and the bond?' (B. & L.)

10. Yet it is not unreasonable that the surety should be obligated more efficaciously and, as it were, more securely than the principal debtor. For of his own accord he offered himself so as to give greater security to the principal contract, and without him the other party would not have agreed to it. And often necessity forces a man to enter a contract, while in the case of a surety it is only his liberality of spirit, his display of kindness, and confidence in his wealth, that engage him in another's business. Therefore, it is not without reason that creditors are sometimes more incensed at sureties than at principal debtors. For the former were the cause of their crediting the latter, and that man is not without blame who unnecessarily shouldered a burden which he should have known he could not bear. And so wise men everywhere warn those who would avoid unnecessary evils, against too lightly entering upon suretyships. Proverbs, vi. 1 ff.; xi. 15; xvii. 18; xxii. 26-7; xxvii. 13; Ecclesiasticus, xxix. 24, 27. 'Go surety, but ruin is by thy side' is a saying of Chilon [Diogenes Laertius, I. 73]. Nay, the Roman laws kindly undertook, by the SC. Velleianum, to protect the tendency of women in this respect. Here belongs the fact, that, by the same laws, a debtor was allowed to clear himself of the entire debt by giving over his property, although it might be less than he owed, while this was not allowed to sureties, since they are accepted to the end that, if the debtor should be insolvent, the creditor can recover his property from them. Although otherwise this method of freeing oneself from a debt by parting with one's possessions is unknown to natural law, unless it be that humanity orders, if a man is unable to pay his debts because of some blow of fortune and not because of luxury or slothfulness, that it should be enough if he is stripped of his possessions and not be forced to pay the balance in his person.

But the obligation of a surety becomes more binding than that of a principal debtor, if what the latter has merely promised, the former has taken upon himself by an oath or under a stated penalty. Thus it is the custom in some places that, if the payment is not made at the appointed time, the sureties must appear at a certain place and not leave it until the creditor has been satisfied; and this they call obstagium. Yet this pact is in general forbidden because of abuses that have arisen.

11. But since suretyship is an addition to another's debt, it is natural that the principal debtor should first be approached, and only when the debt cannot be secured from him should recourse be had to the surety. Quintilian, Declamations, cclxxiii: 'The danger in which a guarantor is makes him deserve our pity; kindness hurts him, good nature ruins him. [. . .] The creditor cannot in any decency apply to the guarantor, unless he cannot recover from the debtor.' The Roman laws call this the 'benefaction of release and posteriority' (beneficium excussionis et ordinis). But where the debt must be paid by the surety, the creditor will transfer to him all the right which he had against the debtor, that is, he will cede to the surety his claims to action, if these may perhaps be more efficacious or favourable than what the surety can urge in his own name against the defaulter; and the creditor will by all means turn over pledges left as partial security, for these also must be transferred to the surety.

But if several men have acted together as sureties for one man, and no one of them has guaranteed the whole amount, it appears that they can naturally be called upon to divide it and each pay only his share, unless it happens that one of them cannot do so. In that case his share will fall upon the rest, since the prime reason for calling upon several is that in case one or more of them come up wanting, the creditor may be satisfied by the rest. Add also Phaedrus, Bk. I, fable xvii.

Expromissores, or those who assume the entire obligation of another and undertake to pay it in their own name, are different from sureties, and so are looked upon by him to whom something is owed as principal 530 debtors. Whether they can recover from the other what is thus required, and how they can go about it, must be decided by the nature of the negotiations which they have with the person for whom they paid, for this is sometimes a free donation, sometimes a commission, a loan, a compensation, or something of this nature.

It is not unusual for a surety also to protect himself by another surety, that he will recover, by means of the latter, what he pays out to the creditor, when the principal debtor proves insolvent. This second person is called a surety of indemnity. His obligation toward the first surety and his right or action against the principal debtor is the same as that of the first surety against the principal debtor and the creditor.

12. It should be noted regarding bail, which intervenes on behalf of the offences of others and the obligations resulting therefrom, that many of the ancient writers held a man to be so far the master of his own life that, by his own consent alone, he could pledge it for the life of another, with the effect that he could even lay it down for another's crime. Andocides, On the Mysteries [Orations, I. xlv], relates that Mantitheus¹ and Asephion sat by the altar humbly praying that they be not tortured, and that they be tried upon giving bail, and that scarcely had they been granted this, and bail secured, before they leaped upon their horses and fled to the enemy, 'leaving behind their sureties who were under obligation to undergo the same suffering which the men whose surety they had gone ought to have suffered'. The story of Damon and Pythias (who is called Phintias by Diodorus Siculus in Excerpta Peiresciana, p. 244 [X. iv]) as given in Cicero, De Senectute [On Duties, III. x], is known to all. Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. II [vv. 586-8], says of them: 'Two only have availed to follow the bail furnished for the engagement.² Once only has ever surety prayed that the accused might fail to return, once only has the accused feared lest his surety should set him free.' (G.*) The same is related of Maerus and Selinuntius, by Hyginus, Fables, cclvii, and a similar story is to be found in Martinus, Historia Sinica, Bk. IV, chap. xi. Add Quintilian, Declamations, xvi, which is entitled Amici vades.

Yet it does not square with the rules of vindictive justice, as it should be carried out in society, for men to furnish bail to the end that they may of their own consent meet the corporal punishment which should otherwise be inflicted upon the guilty person, unless it happen that a man has taken another's place in guile, so that the latter may be enabled to flee from justice. For in that case it is just that he pay as much as it would have meant to the magistrate for the criminal not to have escaped punishment¹, and the penalty sometimes can be set at death, especially when the fugitive from justice is likely to commit many crimes thereafter. See 1 Kings, xx. 39.

¹ [For Mantitheum read Mantitheum.—Tr.]

² [Modern texts have a very different reading here.—Tr.]

But in general such a vicarious death is illegal in a civil court, both because no man is granted such great power over his life that he can throw it away by his own consent, and with no benefit to the state, in order that another may not suffer what he deserves, and because such a practice defeats the purpose of penalties, which is to cure the guilty or to deter others. For he who gave bail was not himself guilty nor did he by so doing take the guilt upon his own head. Nor will he who sees an innocent man suffer be deterred from sin, but he will either be touched with pity, or lost in admiration of a love and constancy that did not forbear to face death for another. Add Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus, XIV. ii. 13 ff. on Digest XLVIII.

It appears, therefore, that bail can properly be furnished in crimes, either to assure the judge before whom the case is tried that the damage done by the crime will be met and the fine paid, or to guarantee the presence of the defendant, in case he is not present, so that no decision shall be made against him when absent and undefended, as though he were already guilty, or when he is present and in prison, to prevent him pleading his case in chains. Yet in any case it would be best for the 531 magistrate to fix in advance the sum of money which the surety must pay in case the defendant escape the trial by flight, so that he may consider whether his resources will allow him to lay so great a sum on the fidelity of the accused.

The obligation of hostages, in view of the fact that it is scarcely ever taken cognizance of apart from treaties and civil government, will be treated more conveniently in a later connexion.

13. It also happens frequently that some thing, by way of a pledge or pawn, is handed over or assigned to the creditor, as security for the debt until it has been paid. The purpose in this is not only that the debtor may be induced to pay his debt from a desire to recover his property (see Code, IV. xxiv. 35, § 1), but also that the creditor may have some means of recovering his loan when it is not paid, and that by holding fast to the pledge he may be able to avoid the troubles involved in recovering his loan at law. Therefore, it has been customary for the pledge to be of equal or greater value than the loan. Moreover, since pledges are invented for the security of debts which have an ordinary or eminent price, it is fitting that the pledges be of the same character as the debts. And so we cannot approve the custom of the Egyptians who were in the habit of using as pledges the mummies of their parents, despite the fact that he who failed to redeem them was under the greatest disgrace and was denied burial after death. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xciii. It seems inhuman as well to forbid the burial of debtors, and by that disgrace to force their kinsmen to pay what they were otherwise not obligated to.

¹ For poene read poenas.—Tr.]

It may be observed, in passing, that in the kingdom of Pegu wife and children can be pledged to creditors. But if the creditor has lain with the wife or daughter thus pledged, he forfeits his loan and is forced to restore the pledge, although liable to no further penalty. Caspar Balbus, Viaggi.

14. Things given in pledge are either fruitful or barren. Regarding the former it often happens that there is added a pact of ἀντίχρησις [reciprocal usage], that is, the creditor may receive all the fruits of it in lieu of interest, or but a part of them, anything over and above the interest being restored to the owner. Regarding barren pledges it is customary for an agreement to be added that, if they are not redeemed within a certain time, they belong to the creditor. And this is not unfair by the law of nature, especially when the pledge is not worth more than the debt and the interest for the time, or if any additional value is returned to the owner. Although the Roman laws forbade this practice, because poor people and debtors under stress of necessity may easily be stripped of their possessions by avaricious creditors, for they might pledge things worth much more than their debt. It is proper also to agree, that, when the money is not paid on the appointed day, the pledge should be sold, as it were, at a fair price set at that time, or already agreed upon by an honest man, or even that the pledge properly valued at that time should be given in payment.

In general, just as the creditor should return a pledge upon payment of the loan, so in the meantime he owes it no less care than his own things, and unless there is an added pact of reciprocal usage, and the thing be made worse by use, he cannot avail himself of it against the owner's wish. Therefore, if it receives any hurt, or should perish by any fraud of his or lack of at least common diligence, the risk and loss lie upon the holder.

15. The view is generally held that pledges cannot be appropriated by usucapion, the reason being that the redemption of a pledge is an action which cannot be exercised often, but only once, when it was proper. A further consideration is that usucapions are mostly introduced to put a stop to the bringing of endless suits, and to prevent dominions of things from remaining undetermined. But there need be no fear of this in regard to pledges, for no question can arise regarding their owner, inasmuch as they are merely held for a time as belonging to another; and since it is obvious why their owner leaves them with the creditor, it cannot be presumed that he is abandoning them.

Nevertheless, it appears that there are cases when the debtor is fairly prevented from redeeming his pledge. Such an instance is given by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xx, last section [60], where a man wished to pay but was prevented at the time and has passed the matter by in silence for a period long enough to lead to the conclusion that he has consented to the loss. Moreover, if an indefinite delay in payment will bring loss to the creditor, it is not unfair for him to keep the pledge as payment¹, especially when a long passage of time brings about a change in the value of his money. And this happens when the creditor receives far less than he gave, in case the redemption of the pledge takes place at a much later time. For instance, when a man has lent another 1,000 units of value a hundred years ago, receiving in pledge, with a pact of reciprocal usage, a farm worth that amount, and in the meantime the value of money has depreciated one-half, in case the 1,000 units of value are returned, the creditor receives a sum with which he can now purchase scarcely half the farm, although at the time of the contract he could have purchased it all.

16. The Roman law regularly draws a distinction between a pledge, properly so called, and a mortgage, the former of which is the actual transfer of a thing, while the latter is the mere assignment of some property, usually immovable, from which the creditor can recover his loan in case payment is not made. For it is not convenient for movable things to be obligated by a mere mortgage, since they can easily be removed and thus can offer no security to the creditor.

Regarding this distinction it should be observed that a mortgage can have a useful place among citizens of the same state. For since the necessity frequently arises of securing a loan, the payment of which is often put off for some time, and since there are never enough movable things that can constitute a sufficient pledge, it would be too great a hardship to be forced to hand over immediately immovable things such as houses or farms. (Compare also Exodus, xxii. 26-7; Deuteronomy, xxiv. 6; Job, xxii. 6; xxiv. 3; Proverbs, xx. 16; Digest, XX. i. 6, 7; Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxix; Code, VIII. xvi. 8 thereon.) Therefore, it was enough for an immovable thing to be designated to serve as a guarantee to the creditor, which cannot be carried off, and of which the judge can always offer immediate possession.

But for those who live in natural liberty mere mortgages are of no value. For when a debtor refuses to pay his loan the possession of the mortgage will have to be claimed by force and arms. And yet those who live in such a state were always permitted to lay hands on any property of a debtor, even without the assignment of a mortgage.

¹ [For solitum read solutum.—Tr.]

CHAPTER XI

THE MEANS BY WHICH OBLIGATIONS ARISING FROM PACTS MAY BE MET

- | | |
|---|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The most natural way of meeting an obligation is to fulfil what was agreed upon.2. What if a man pays a debt for one who knows nothing about it?3. To whom must it be paid?4. What must be paid?5. To whom and by whom may compensation be made?6. Where such a thing may take place.7. A debt is discharged by a release. | <ol style="list-style-type: none">8. To what extent an obligation is discharged by mutual dissent.9. A breach of faith by one party releases the other from his obligation;10. Also a change of the status on which an obligation was based. 53311. To what extent an obligation is made void by time.12. The obligations which cease with death.13. On delegation.14. On confusion.15. On renewal. |
|---|--|

It remains for us to see in what ways obligations arising from pacts are met. Among these the most natural is the fulfilment of what was agreed upon, for when that is performed there is no further business of concern to the parties. But it should be observed that some obligations so inhere in a person that they cannot rightfully be fulfilled by another, and that others allow a vicarious labour, so that it is of no consequence to him to whom something is owed what person performs it. These last are for the most part contracts in which an agreement is made on the performance of some things by hired and common labour, and such as can be furnished by one man as well as another; and also those on the furnishing of consumable things and any others about the provenience of which we are unconcerned, so long as they come into our hands. Therefore, although in such contracts it is of course the natural thing for the debtors themselves, or those whom they have commanded to do so, to pay or deliver what was agreed upon, the creditor should nevertheless raise no objection if some one else wishes to pay in the name of the debtor ('for what a man pays in his own name and not that of the debtor, does not release the debtor,' Digest, V. iii. 3), and if he accepts it he will be able to demand nothing further of the other.

In this connexion we should note regarding a surety that, if the principal debtor has paid, he as well as the surety is released. But if the surety has paid, the principal debtor is released from the creditor, but he becomes at once indebted to the surety, even though the latter may have made the payment without his knowledge.

2. But when the question is raised as to whether and how far a man, who is neither the surety for another nor his agent, can recover what he pays for him, it is customary to distinguish between a payment made against the other's will and actual orders, and one made only without his knowledge. In the former case he certainly has no right of recovery. For how can a man lay upon me against my will an obligation which arises from consent? Yet since it is presumed that no one rashly throws his money away, it must be seen, further, whether or not he wished to make the creditor a present of what he paid. If he did, the debtor is in no way concerned with it. If he did not, nothing is left for us than to say that he did it in order to transfer to himself the right and action of the creditor against the debtor. And although the creditor may chance not to have known at first that the payer was doing this, and to have accepted the money as if paid in the name of the debtor, yet when the payer cannot of himself recover from the debtor what he paid for him, equity demands that the creditor should either return to him what he accepted, keeping meanwhile entire his action against the debtor, or yield to him such action; especially since it is presumed that he who 534 made payment for another believed that his payment would be acceptable to the debtor. This was the reason why the Roman laws accorded such a person an 'action for business transacted', Digest, III. v. 43, 48. Yet since the debtor can raise the exception that it was not agreeable to him for another to pay in his name, and that he is unwilling to owe him for this kindness, the simplest thing for him is to infer that his creditor yielded his action to the one who paid for him against his will.¹ But if a man has been at expense to the advantage of another's property without his knowledge, or has put some labour upon it, it is right for him to keep his hands upon that property as a pledge until he has been recompensed for his outlay, unless the improvement is such as can be taken back.

3. Now the payment and any fulfilment of an obligation should be made to the very one to whom it is owed, or to one whom he has delegated to receive the debt in his name. But if a man has by mistake made payment to another, he in no way ceases to be indebted to his creditor on that score, but he will be able to recover what he has paid, on the ground that it was not owed. It is likewise presumed that he who receives a payment has the handling of his own property and knows what is being done. For otherwise it would be held a rash throwing away of money rather than a payment, if one gave what was intended to serve a man's use, to a person who either carelessly neglected that end, or was entirely ignorant of it.

4. Furthermore, payment must be made of the very thing agreed upon, not of another in its place (add Digest, XLVI. iii. 99); in its entirety, not mutilated, not merely a part of it, without division; at the place and time agreed upon, especially when it is to the creditor's interest that it be paid or performed here and not elsewhere, now and not at another time, for the time is also a part of the price. See Martial,

¹ [Reading with Barbeyrac 'pro invito' instead of 'pro ignorante'.—Tr.]

Bk. VI, ep. xxx. Although it may be that by a new agreement another thing can be substituted for that which is owed, or some change made as to place and time. Creditors often find it necessary to agree to such substitution or change, when, because of the inability or knavery of the debtor, they feel it better to get something rather than nothing, somewhere else rather than nowhere, after a time rather than never. Although equity sometimes requires that either the time be deferred for the debtor, or his payment be made in instalments, when the debt cannot be paid at the time or all at once. So when the Athenians once vowed to Diana that they would offer up to her as many she-goats as they killed of the enemy, and were unable to collect so many victims from the whole land, they decided to offer up 500 annually. Xenophon, Anabasis, Bk. III [ii. 7]. On other common observances as to the time of payment, see Digest, XLVI. iii. 105. Often, also, when the matter has been brought before a judge, there appears no other way of ending the suit than for the debtor to be ordered to pay some equivalent in place of the thing agreed upon.

It is also quite obvious that only he who is owed something can make a reduction in the debt or dispose of it, and that this power does not belong to the creditor's steward or agent without his authority. But when the debtor's steward has treated with the creditor and satisfied him with a smaller sum than was actually owed, the profit will go not to the steward but to his master; and it is a form of theft or speculation if a debtor's steward who has arranged with the creditor for a smaller sum tries to enter the full amount on his report and pocket the difference.

A debt is regarded as paid if the pledge has either itself been accepted as payment, or been taken in trust by an added agreement, or if it has been sold and the price taken in lieu of the debt. But if a man, being hard pressed by several notes, has paid a part, it is held in his favour that the more pressing burden is met by that payment. See 535 Digest, XLVI. iii. 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8; XLVI. iii. 89, § 2; XLVI. iii. 97. But the method of payment which Vitellius is said to have used, and which is mentioned in Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio, is clearly without precedent. When he was setting out for Germany his creditors scarcely let him go even when he furnished sureties, but upon his succeeding to the purple and returning to Rome they went into hiding. But he had them hunted out, and saying, 'I have brought you safety in return for your loans,' he demanded back the instruments of his contracts.

5. Another very common manner of terminating obligations is by compensation, which takes the form of a mutual contribution between a debtor and the creditor (Digest, XVI. ii. 1), that is, when a debtor ceases to owe anything because the creditor himself on his part clearly owes him a thing of the same kind and value. For since, in consumable articles especially, 'as much' means 'the same', and when it is a mutual debt I must at once return as much as I received, the most convenient way of reducing useless payments is for each to make the payment by keeping what is already his. Especially since some inconvenience attends practically every collection, and it is surely thoughtless for me by an unnecessary payment to render it all the more easy for another to make some delay in paying what he owes me. See Digest, XVI. ii. 2, 3.

But it is obvious that compensation can take place only between those who are mutual creditors and debtors, and I cannot as payment foist off on another against his will what is owed me by some third party, unless there happen to be such a partnership between certain men that their obligations and rights are held in common. Thus, if there is a partnership between two men in all their possessions, and I owe one of them the same amount of money as the other owes me, I can properly offer compensation to him when he requires of me my debt; for their possessions are held as a unit. Nay, if there is a partnership between men in one thing only, compensation will take place if both the credit and debit be concerned with the same matter upon which they formed a partnership, because with regard to it they are understood to stand as one person. So also what I owe the heir of my debtor and, vice versa, what the creditor of him whose heir I am owes me, can be paid by compensation. It is clear that compensation can be opposed¹ in the case of a creditor even against his will, since it is surely bold of you to demand of another what you refuse to turn over to him.

Now since compensation has no place among those who are not mutually indebted to each other, it follows that, if I owe another something, I cannot force upon him the credit of him whose agent I am, so long as that credit has not been transferred to me. For although a man puts me in charge of his affairs, I cannot thereupon number his things among my own, and with them release myself from my own debts; especially since a creditor often prefers to have as his debtor some one other than myself. Nor do I, in committing my affairs to a man, want at once to take upon myself his burdens and obligations as well. For example, if Gaius has ordered me to require his loans of Seius to whom I myself am in debt, neither will Seius be able to hold up compensation of my debt to Gaius, against his will, and for that reason refuse to pay—for what has Gaius to do with my debts?—nor can I substitute myself for Seius as debtor to Gaius. Thus the debtor of a ward cannot claim for compensation what the ward's guardian owes him, nor can the guardian pay his debt by offering to his creditor in compensation what the latter owes the ward. See Digest, XVI. ii. 23.

On the other hand, those are right who say that, if a surety by reason of his suretyship is called upon by the creditor to pay, he can use in compensation not only what the creditor owes him, but also what he owes the principal debtor, even without the latter's knowledge and consent. For if the principal debtor had himself paid, the creditor 536 would have been obliged to allow compensation for what he owed him, and why, therefore, may not the surety have the same advantage? And a debtor would be held lacking in honesty if he wanted to prevent his surety from enjoying compensation for his debt, since he is obligated anyway to return to him what was paid on his behalf.

¹ [That is, one debt can be set off against another.—Tr.]

6. Compensation regularly takes place in consumable commodities of the same kind, the time for the payment of which is now at hand or is past, but not of those owed in the future (see Digest, XVI. ii. 7). Therefore, there can properly be no compensation of quantities with quantities of a different kind or quality, for instance, a bushel of wheat for a bushel of oats, a jar of Rhine wine for a jar of Spanish; nor of a different species, as this horse for this ox. Nor can things of a different kind be used in compensation, as a sheep for a goose; nor species with a kind or quantity, such as Bucephalus for an ordinary nag, or a jar of oil. Yet the expositors of Roman law allow compensation between bodies owed in general, that is, when the same kind of thing of the same quality is owed on each side; for instance, if I have promised you a horse in general, and you have been made heir of one who willed me a horse in general, compensation will take place between us. Yet it is possible, in the other cases, for each debtor to agree to have a value put upon different things, and then to square their debts by compensation. Although it often happens, even in reciprocal debts, that an obligation is not so much removed as suspended by retention, whereby I keep to myself what I should have given another, until he has paid what he first owed me. But no compensation can be effected in work for work, or work for goods, when the actual time has arrived in which these must be exchanged, for such a thing is opposed to the scheme of the agreements, and renders them entirely useless.

But if each party releases the other from the work or the goods that he owes, the obligation ceases on another basis, that, namely, of mutual disagreement. Just as the fact that I am not obligated to do something when the other party, who should have done it first, has failed in his part, is not to be referred to compensation, but to the consideration that the condition upon which I was obligated to do it does not exist. But if works have not been performed at the appointed time through neglect, it appears that they can have a value put upon them, and then be equalized by compensation. But I can also oppose an equivalent damage done to me by the creditor to my debt, as well as a fine to be paid me, which the judge has imposed upon my creditor for an injury done to me. Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xix, § 19, well observes, also, that, if two litigants strike a bargain while their suit is still being tried, neither the action on which the suit was based nor the damages and costs of the suit can be opposed or struck off against what the bargain is about. For instance, I am at law with a man over a will, and while the trial is on I sell him my house. He cannot use the inheritance against me in payment nor his expenses in claiming it, since it is not yet established that the inheritance is his, while the nature of the transaction shows that we agreed with no thought of the suit, for otherwise nothing would have been done.

On that kind of compensation whereby a debt of gratitude for a kindness is cancelled by a subsequent injury done by the same party, see Seneca, Letters, lxxxix; On Benefits, Bk. VI, chap. iv ff. In the same way equal injuries committed by both parties can properly be squared by compensation, provided the interest of the magistrate in them is in no way affected.

7. An obligation is also fulfilled when it is forgiven by him to 537 whom something was owed, and to whose interest it is that the obligation be met, for it is an accepted thing for a man to be able to yield his own right. And whatever right from the obligation has been transferred to another is understood to return again to us by reason of his forgiving it. And just as no obligation is contracted at the outset, if the other to whom a thing is offered rejects it, so it does no longer bind me when the other of his own accord has loosened the bond by which I was held. Yet it should be added that the obligation is fulfilled, provided no third person is concerned, for if one is, the other cannot alone remit it, although the obligation be immediately concerned only with him.

Such a release is made either expressly or tacitly. To the first manner belonged, according to the laws of the Romans, acceptilatio [discharge], whereby a man acknowledged that he had received what he in truth had not; and also the 'stipulation of Aquileius', whereby, through a kind of novation, the obligation of some things was first reduced to an agreement, and then removed by a discharge. All these niceties are entirely unknown to the law of nature, by which, no matter how a thing has been contracted, an obligation ceases upon the mere consent of the other, properly expressed.

It is held a sign that I have made a present of an obligation, if I knowingly turn over to the debtor (not for the sake of a deposit or the like) instruments or writings without which debts cannot be proven. Digest, II. xiv. 2. But if there exist other instruments by which the debt can be equally well proven, the debt is not held to be forgiven by the relinquishment of only one. But the teaching of the Roman laws, that the return of an instrument is considered the conclusion of a tacit pact with the debtor not to seek recovery of the debt, is a subtlety likewise unknown to natural law, according to which an obligation, even when a thing has been contracted, can be removed not only by actual payment but also by the mere remission of it.

An obligation is held to be tacitly discharged if the creditor prevents or hinders the debt from being possible of fulfilment. Thus when I have agreed with a man to let him know when he is to do some work for me, I shall be held to have rescinded the undertaking if I fail to tell him, and also when I get another to do the work in his stead.

8. Just as obligations in which only one of the parties is obligated are met in the former ways, so those that involve both parties are dissolved by mutual dissent, provided the matter has not been begun. For it appears in the highest degree natural that if something was by itself able to produce an obligation, its opposite can also dissolve it, when another thing has not intervened which forbids an obligation once contracted from being broken off. For there is no doubt that in a certain kind of transaction a positive law can forbid any going back on what was once decided, even when nothing has yet been performed on it. But if the performance has already been begun, and one party has contributed something, then mere disagreement does not appear sufficient to destroy an obligation (see Digest, XVIII. v. 2, 3), but for the obligation to be dissolved it is necessary for him who has already performed some of his share, and for whom something had to be done by the other party, to remit the other's share, or have his contribution balanced in some other way. See Digest, II. xiv. 58.

9. Furthermore, an obligation is not so much paid by the faithlessness of another party as broken off, and so when one party does not perform what is agreed upon, the other is not obligated to perform what he agreed to in exchange and in consideration of the other's performance. For whoever promises another something by a pact, does so not absolutely and gratis, but in consideration of what the other has undertaken to perform; and so the performances of each for the other take on the form of a condition, as if it had been said, 'I will perform 538 my part, if you perform yours first.' But it is fixed that whatever is built upon a condition falls to the ground when the condition does not appear. Thucydides, Bk. I [cxxxiii]: 'It is not those who fight in self-defence that break a treaty, but those who attack others unprovoked.' (S.) Hence the scrupulousness of the Hindu, in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. III [xx], if it is not a mere tale, was more than he owed: 'Although that other had violated every law and principle of morality by carrying off his wife, he yet did not break his oath, and so noble, he said, was his pledged word, that, in spite of the injury he had suffered, he would not do anything to harm that other.' (C.) See Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xix, § 14. But what has been mentioned has place, if he who should have performed first, or at least simultaneously with the other, has not done his part. For the question whether and how far the mere fear that, when I have performed my part, the other will play me false, can free me from my obligation, has been discussed before.

But what right will attach to the parts of things already performed, when a contract has been broken off before it is fully completed? This question will have to be answered in accordance with the different cases. For if I have what I owed first, and the other man undertakes to evade his share, I will have the right to use every lawful means to force him to fulfil the contract. But if, after I have met part of my obligation, I am loath to keep on to its conclusion, I cannot require the other to return to me what I have done, or to pay me for it; but unless I am willing to finish what I agreed to do, he will be able to keep without hindrance what he received of me. Nor can the old saying be applied here: 'One should not grow rich to the loss of another'; for no consideration is taken of a man's loss which he has brought upon himself by his own guile. And so often as he to whose interest it was that the terms be carried out is to blame for their not being fulfilled, it is the same to the other as if they had been fulfilled. Nor if I later repent of my breach of faith and wish to continue my agreement is the other forced to accept it, since the single violation of the pact has broken it off and has freed the other from any obligation attaching to it, while it can only be renewed by a new convention. Thus, for example, should I engage the services of a man for a year, paying him in advance, and before the end of the year dismiss him through no fault of his, he is not required to return to me the wages of his services for the balance of the time. But if what has been performed by both parties is equal, neither of them, even then, will be allowed to break the pact before the time agreed upon, and if one does, the other will be able either to require him to finish his part, or to exact of him what it was worth to have the pact exactly carried out.

10. Obligations also expire when the person, whether of the agent or the recipient, changes the status¹ upon which alone they were based. Thus a magistrate who undertakes the defence of subjects is no longer bound, if he has left his office, and he who has promised a magistrate obedience is no longer bound, if he has ceased to be a subject, or the other is no longer a magistrate. But the power of destroying an obligation is not to be attributed to a change in the matter of the undertaking, which would have prevented the obligation being undertaken, if it had existed at the time when the contract was made, and if it does not so exactly square with the present state of the subject; provided it does not make such matter incapable of being performed. For unless such a change was inserted at the first as a condition of the pact, the right thus irrevocably acquired will hold fast, even though it may mean some trouble to the other party. For whoever entered a contract without compulsion and of his own accord, may blame himself for not taking precautions at the outset for eventualities which could probably have been foreseen. Thus when a people absolutely subjects itself to a king, even though it afterward reverse its decision and have a greater leaning toward another form of government, it cannot on that score release 539 itself from obedience to the king. In the same way many men would have chosen to go unmarried, if they had known beforehand the inconveniences of married life, but when some chance has induced them once to assume that bond it must be endured.

¹ [For status read statum.—Tr.]

11. Obligations, the duration of which extends over a certain length of time, expire with its passage, and if it is desirable that they be extended, a new agreement is required, which is not always understood to have been made expressly, but sometimes only tacitly. See Digest, XIX. ii. 13, § 11; XIX. ii. 14. Still for an obligation to cease after a certain period of time, and yet not exert its force within that period, is absurd. Therefore, an obligation amounts to nothing, whereby I shall owe you 100 pieces of gold during a period of three years, and yet you can demand the sum of me neither during that period nor at its end.

But it is another matter if I say, 'Unless you require the debt within three years I shall owe you nothing,' for that is a condition added to an obligation, whereby the latter vanishes if the former does not appear. So also it is customary for a surety to obligate himself only for a certain period, to the end that the creditor shall press the debtor early, and while he can still pay, and that he be not involved for ever.

12. Finally, obligations which are rooted in a man's person are dissolved at his death, since when the subject is removed the accidents also must be extinguished, and performance is rendered impossible by nature. Yet see Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. vi, § 10; and Pomponius Mela, Bk. III, chap. ii [3], in speaking of the ancient Gauls says: 'Reports upon business and demands for the collection of debts used to be taken to the dead.'¹ Thus in Japan the Buddhist priests persuade their devotees that whoever gives them money in this world will receive tenfold hereafter, and for this reason give their creditors receipts which the latter carefully preserve and command to be buried with them. See Bernhard Varenius, De Religione Japoniae, p. 35. Yet it commonly happens that the obligations of deceased persons are continued communicable through their survivors, so that the latter take their place. And this is so either because the survivor voluntarily takes upon himself the fulfilment of such an obligation, either out of consideration of the dead man's reputation, or for other reasons, or because some obligation from the dead man's property had to be satisfied, which passes to the heir together with that property, burdened, as it were, with a natural mortgage.

¹ [So from the correct reading deferabatur. Pufendorf with differabatur has the meaning 'were put off until death'.—Tr.]

But if a man dies and does not leave behind as much as he owes, it appears that the action of the creditor against him goes into the same grave. For what can a man do with a lifeless corpse? Here belongs the law of Solon given by Plutarch, Solon [p. 189 E], which forbids the heaping of insults upon the dead. Add Digest, XLVII. x. 1, §§ 4, 6; XLVII. x. 27. Although it was a custom among the Egyptians for the bodies of debtors to be buried in the dwellings of their creditors, which were afterwards redeemed by their heirs and accorded honourable burial. It was also customary for children to pledge the bodies of their parents, but those who did not redeem them were objects of the deepest scorn and upon death were forbidden burial. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chaps. xcii-xciii; Lucian, De Luctu; Herodotus, Bk. II.

13. By delegation I substitute my debtor to my creditor with the latter's consent, so that the former pays the debt in my place, that is, he pays what he owed me to my creditor. In this case the consent of the creditor is required, but not that of the third person, the debtor, whom I can delegate to the other even without his knowledge and consent. For it is of no consequence to whom a man pays a debt, but of great concern from whom he demands a debt.

540 14. We need add little on confusion, for since the same man cannot be his own creditor and debtor, it is clear that if a man becomes the heir of his debtor his action perishes, since it cannot find an object against which it may exert itself.

15. Now a novation appears to be peculiar to positive civil law, and to have nothing to do with the law of nature and nations. For old obligations can, indeed, be remade by agreement of the parties concerned, so that, for instance, the loss of a thing because of delay on the part of the debtor need not be charged to him, that a fine or interest because of delay need not be owed, that pledges be returned or sureties released, since the creditor declares that he will henceforward be satisfied with the mere faith of the debtor, &c. But those who dwell in the simplicity of the law of nature need not imagine that in this case another obligation has taken the place of a former obligation that has ceased, for, as a matter of fact, nothing has been done here other than that either the creditor has renounced a part of his right, or different claims are blended into one. But that one action should by some privilege take precedence over another is a creation of positive law; since by natural law the things that are owed with equal efficacy can also be required with equal efficacy.

But what the Roman laws record upon a novation which takes place by a test at law (which they call 'necessary', and the former kind 'voluntary'), can after a manner be applied to natural law. That is, as in a court of law he who has won his case has an action of judgement against his opponent, whereby he requires what the judge has allowed him, however his former right may have stood; so when a controversy on some matters is left to the arbitrament of war, not only can that first claim over which the war arose be taken up again, but also whatever, at the conclusion of the war, was included in the terms of peace.

CHAPTER XII

ON INTERPRETATION

- | | |
|--|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The reason of this order. 2. The necessity of right interpretation. 3. Words are regularly to be understood in their common usage, 4. And words applying to an art according to that art. 5. The sense is sought by conjecture if the words are ambiguous, 6. Or contradictory, or apparently so. 7. Conjectures are sought from the matter at hand; 8. From their effect; 9. From allied considerations, origin, or even place. 10. How the sense may be gathered from the reason of the law. 11. Some words have a broad and a strict significance. 12. Some things are favourable, and some odious. 13. Rules are formed from such distinctions. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 14. An example of two who arrived together at a goal. 15. How the statement that a man may not wage war without permission of another is to be interpreted. 16. On the words, 'Carthage will be free'. 17. A conjecture which means an extension of a law. 18. On such as are made in evasion of a law. 19. A conjecture because of which a law is restricted, and that either because of an original defect of the will of the lawgiver; 20. (An observation on such a conjecture.) 21. Or because of some case arising that opposes his will, being either unlawful; 22. Or too severe, considering the reason of the act. 23. What if different laws seem in some case to be opposed to one another? |
|--|--|

541 AFTER a discussion of pacts in general, and partly in particular, we will now turn to their interpretation. For since in all obligations which are sought by men from one another, certain signs are used, indicative both of the intent of the contracting parties and of the laws and sections of the pacts, and since such signs can sometimes be taken in different senses, it is highly necessary to have in mind definite rules, in accordance with which their true sense is arrived at. And although we must discuss further on such particular pacts as presuppose civil government, and most of what must be said belongs to laws, yet since it does not appear convenient either to divide this material or to postpone it to the end, we will not be judged to have sinned too wantonly against the rules of method, if we discuss the whole subject at this point, following almost κατὰ πόδα [in the very footsteps] of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvi, who has handled the presentation of this subject most precisely.

2. Now if we consider the end for which obligations are contracted, every man who has voluntarily bound himself is obligated for what he had in mind. For it is presupposed that he undertook the obligation freely and of his own accord, and on a matter which he was under no necessity beforehand of performing. Therefore, there seems no way in which a man can be obligated for any more than he himself wished. This is the sense in which is to be taken the statement of Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xiii]: 'In a promise, what you thought, and not what you said, is always to be considered.' (E.)

Moreover, the nature of man is such that his inner acts are in themselves not open to the gaze of another, and can differ from his outer acts and signs. And yet it must be clearly established what every man is bound to, or what can lawfully be required of him. For otherwise an obligation will be made void, if every man could free himself by inventing for his own use the sense he wishes and by maintaining that his idea was different from that which another understood. Therefore, reason dictates that he to whom a promise is made had the right to force the promisor to what the right interpretation of his signs suggests; for a man's thoughts are primarily for his own use, while signs are for the use of others. Otherwise the matter would serve no end and have no result, which in moral matters is held absurd. Here belongs the old formula regularly found in treaties, as given in Livy, Bk. I, chap. xxiv: 'Without fraud, as they have been this day clearly understood.' (F.) The norm and measure of proper interpretation is the inferring of what is in a man's mind by means of the most probable signs; and signs are of two kinds, exact words, and other words of conjecture, which are considered either separately or jointly.

3. About words the rule is as follows: If there is no sufficient conjecture which leads in any other direction, words are to be understood in their proper and so-called accepted meaning, one that has been imposed upon them, not so much by their intrinsic force and grammatical analogy as by popular usage, 'which is the final authority and is the law and norm of speech' [Horace, Art of Poetry, 72]. Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. I, chap. vi: 'Custom is the surest preceptor in speaking; and we must use phraseology, like money, which has the public stamp.' (W.) Dio Cassius, Bk. LIX [LVII. xvii]:

When Tiberius had used in an edict a word that was not Latin, Ateius Capito declared: 'Even if no one has previously used this expression, yet because of Tiberius it should be enumerated among the primitive usages', but was interrupted by one Marcellus, who said, 'Caesar can give Roman citizenship to men, but not to words.' (F.*)

When Procopius, War of the Vandals, Bk. I [xi. 3 f.], had said that the emperor raised an army partly from his own nation and partly from his allies, he adds:

Now at an earlier time only barbarians were enlisted among the foederati, these, namely, who had come into the Roman political system, not in the condition of slaves, since they had not been conquered by the Romans, but on the basis of complete equality. For the Romans call treaties with their enemies foedera. But at the present time there is 542 nothing to prevent any one from assuming this name, since time will by no means consent to keep names attached to the things to which they were formerly applied, but conditions are ever changing about according to the desire of men who control them, and men pay little heed to the meaning which they originally attached to a name. (D.)

Themistius, Orations, iv [xxiii, p. 286 c]: 'The value of this term Sophist, like the value of coinage, declined in later times.' According to Polybius, Bk. XII, chap. iv [XII. vi], the Locrians, upon arriving from Greece at the extreme tip of Calabria, found the country already occupied by Siculi. The latter, terrified at their coming, received them and made a treaty with them on the following terms: 'The Locrians would be friendly with the Sicels and share the country with them, as long as they stood upon the ground they then stood upon, and kept heads upon their shoulders.' (S.) When this had been agreed upon the Locrians came to take the oath, first putting some earth in the bottoms of their sandals and fastening some heads of garlic on their shoulders, so that it could not be seen. Afterwards they shook the earth out of their sandals and threw away the heads of garlic, and when the first opportunity was given drove the Siculi out of that region. We are informed by Thucydides, Bk. V [xlii], that the Boeotians struck a treaty with the Spartans by which it was agreed among other things that they would deliver up Panactum to the Spartans, and this they did but only after they had razed it. When Leucippus had requested of the Tarentines the use of a place for a day and a night, and would not return it at their demand, he kept replying to them when they asked for it by day that he would return it if they came back that night, and at night he kept putting it off until the next day. Strabo, Bk. VI [i. 15]. Thus they say that when Mahomet, the emperor of the Turks, overran Euboea he promised a certain man that his head would be safe, and then had him cut in two.

When a petty king of India had fled to the king of Persia, and the king of India, sending an ambassador, demanded that he be given up, the king of Persia, while the ambassador was being shown in, had the fugitive put in a basket and hung from a tree, and then denied that he was upon his land. Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. IV, chap. xxx. So some one or other persistently denied that he had laid hands upon a priest, for he had only cudgelled and kicked him. Thus when Temures agreed with the garrison of the city of Sebastia that no blood would be shed if the city were handed over, he evaded the letter of the agreement and ordered the captives to be buried alive.

But just as such cavillings are too obvious and frivolous, so, as Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxxii], properly says, they 'do but fasten, not absolve perjury'. (E.)

4. As to terms used in the arts, which the common sort scarcely comprehend, it should be observed that they are explained in accordance with the definitions of those who are skilled in the art. Cicero, Academic Questions, Bk. I [vii]: 'As for the dialecticians, they have no terms in common use: they use technical terms entirely. And the case is the same with nearly every art.' (Y.) An illustration may be seen in the word 'army', if, for instance, it is stipulated in a treaty that one shall not cross another's borders 'with an army'. In this case the question to be decided is what kind of a body of soldiers comes under that name. Grotius feels that an army should be defined as such a number of soldiers as would dare openly to invade the territory of an enemy, or even to face an attacking enemy in the open field; for historians regularly contrast what is done lawfully with an army, with that done by stealth and after the manner of bandits.

Yet a general definition cannot be given as to how great a body everywhere and always constitutes an army; we must rather take into consideration the strength both of the enemy and of ourselves. If small states are concerned, modest forces, which in the affairs of great nations will be considered only bands of foragers, can pass as armies. 543 Therefore, when Vegetius, De Re Militari,¹ Bk. III, chap. i, says that 'an army is a body composed of legions as well as auxiliaries, along with cavalry, collected for the purpose of waging war', he is not describing an army in general but only one as the Romans then regarded it. For there are also armies composed only of citizens, or aliens, or allies, as well as only of infantry or cavalry. Cicero, Paradoxes, chap. vi, gives the saying of M. Crassus, that 'a man was not rich unless he could support an army from his own income'; and he defines an army as 'six legions and large forces of auxiliaries'. Polybius, Bk. VI, says the Roman army usually consisted of 16,000 citizens and 20,000 allies, although among them a smaller number would sometimes suffice for the name. In Digest, III. ii. 2, § 1, a man who commands even one legion is said to be in command of an army.

But another question may be raised in connexion with this term: Whether, namely, he who has led a large number of soldiers through another's territory, not in a body, but in small bands, has violated the treaty which I have mentioned. In this case, since a man is said to have an army, whether he has it mustered in one place, or has so dispersed his forces that he can gather them together in a short time, it must be considered further to what end such an agreement was made. For if the only thing in mind was that no danger might arise to us, the treaty does not appear to be violated when the troops pass through in scattered detachments and are not mobilized within our territory. But if the treaty looks to the security of a neighbour, that he be not attacked through our territory, the treaty will be violated by conceding a passage, even though the soldiers are in small troops.

The same can also be applied to a fleet, if it be stated in a treaty that a man may not himself sail in a certain part of the sea with a fleet, or allow another to do so. For here not only the number of the ships is considered, but also their size, and the maritime strength of the peoples who are concerned. Here belongs the remark of Florus, Bk. I, chap. xi:

¹ [The correct title is Eptoma Rei Militaris.—Tr.]

There are extant also spoils taken from Antium, which Maenius put up on the rostra in the forum, after capturing the enemy's fleet, if a fleet, indeed, it could be called; for there were only six beaked vessels. But this number, in those early days, was sufficient for a naval war. (W.)

Add Alberico Gentili, De Jure Belli, Bk. III, chap. xx. Thus, if it has been stipulated about a fort that, for example, it be not erected within a certain distance from a country's borders, we often understand by the word a redoubtable and powerful structure, as well as a fortified spot, which, although made up of insignificant works, can ward off a hostile force. And so if the purpose of the agreement was that no fortified spot should threaten our borders, the pact is clearly violated if defences be thrown up only of earth and equipped with mere huts for soldiers. Add Alberico Gentili, loc. cit., chap. xxi.

But if the terms of arts are defined in different ways by different peoples, it aids in the avoidance of disputes to express in simple language what meaning the word is given in that place.

5. When simple words or phrases admit of several meanings, recourse must be had to conjectures to elicit the true sense. The rhetoricians call this ἐξ ἀμφιβολίας [ambiguity], but the dialecticians are a little more exact in calling it ὁμωνυμία [equivocality] if it is one word that admits different meanings, and ἀμφιβολία [ambiguity] if it is a phrase. An example of the former can be found in Tertullian, De Velandis Virginibus, chap. iv, where he maintains that the word 'women' in 1 Corinthians, vii, should be made to include virgins also. Although sometimes the word woman is opposed to a virgin, as when Cicero says, 'To-morrow she will be a woman'. An example of the latter kind is found in Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xl], where a man had put the following clause in his will: 'Let my heir give his mother-in-law a hundred weight of silver plate, at pleasure.' Whereupon the mother-in-law demanded the best and most cunningly worked, but the heir claimed that only those were owed her which he himself wished to give. The ambiguity could have been avoided by the addition of the word 'his' or 'her'. Although it is a rule of Roman law that the option regularly lies with the legatee. And this is agreeable with natural equity. For if the option had to lie with the heir, there was no need of adding the clause 'at pleasure', for when I am ordered absolutely to perform some things, and I can meet my obligation in different ways, the choice is understood to be in my hands. But when a clause about option is added, it is presumed to work in favour of him who is to receive something, that another may not foist upon him some worthless object. See author of the Ad Herennium, Bk. I [xii]; Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. ix.

As to that well-known decision of the Duke of Ossona, Viceroy of Naples, whereby he assigned the entire inheritance to the son against the priests who had been designated as heirs, with the added clause, that they should give to the son 'what they pleased', it is defended not so much by the strict letter of the law, as by hatred for the avarice of men who are intent upon the property of others. Here belongs the reply of Charles V to the ambassador of the French king, when he asked for the dukedom of Milan: 'Of course the same thing pleases me as pleases my brother, the king of France,' which reply the ambassador forwarded with all haste to his master, as if the request were granted. Marselaer¹, Legatus, Bk. II, chap. xxxix.

6. Conjectures must also be used to elicit the real meaning when there occurs ἐναντιοφάνεια, or a contradiction in terms, so that the parts which seem to oppose each other may be reconciled, provided that is possible. For when there is a sure and clear contradiction of terms, a later agreement of the contracting parties will take precedence over earlier ones. Digest, I. iv. 4 pr.; Decretals, I. iii. 3. Livy, Bk. IX, chap. xxxiv: 'When two laws are contrary the new always repeals the old.' (S.) For no man can will contrary things at the same time, and such is the nature of acts which depend upon the mere will of the agent, or by which no right is secured for another, that they can be superseded by a new act of the will. Yet it is sometimes required, for a change of will to effect the annulment of an act, that it be only of one of the parties, as by the civil laws in the case of wills and the like; while sometimes it must be by both parties, as in pacts, which, if not opposed by law, can be dissolved only with the consent of both parties to them. Upon which grounds, by the way, it is clear on what basis Lycortas could have excused his thoughtlessness, in that when he went to renew a treaty of the Achaeans with the king of Egypt, he did not mention specifically which of several treaties then existing between them he came to renew. For he should have said that all the treaties had been renewed, in so far as they were agreed on them, and that of those on which they disagreed, the last one was the object of his errand. See Polybius, Selections on Embassies, xli [XXIII. ix].

As an illustration of two laws which appear contradictory, one is, 'Let the statue of a tyrannicide be placed in the gymnasium'; the other, 'Let no statue of a woman be erected in the gymnasium.'² But it is a woman who kills a tyrant. I should pronounce in favour of the woman. For the reason of the first law is that a youth, who is being trained for virtue in the gymnasium, may by the sight of such honours be incited to emulate them, while that of the second is that the virtues usually found in women are not such as a man need copy. But since, in the case before us, a woman surpassed the daring of her sex, she deserves a statue in a gymnasium all the more, as thereby the weakness of her sex can stir men to even greater rivalry.

¹ [For Marselar read Marselaer.—Tr.]

² [The instance is taken from Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. vii. 5.—Tr.]

There is another example in Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xliv]:

There is a law that he who has slain a tyrant shall receive the reward of men who conquer at Olympia, and shall ask whatever he pleases of the magistrate, and the magistrate shall grant it to him. And there is another law, 'When a tyrant is slain the magistrate shall 545 put to death his five nearest relations'. Alexander who was tyrant of Phœria, a city in Thessaly, was slain by his own wife, whose name was Thebe, at night, when he was in bed with her; she, as a reward, then demands the life of her son whom she had by the tyrant. Some say that according to this law that son ought to be put to death. (Y.)

The following is put forward as an illustration of how two sections of the same law appear to be contradictory. 'Let the victim of rape choose either the death of her assailant or marriage. But there is a man who raped two women, of whom one chose his death and the other marriage with him.' In this case the purpose of the law will point out the path to decision. For the reason of allowing the woman to choose the death of her assailant was not because it was believed that many such would choose in that way, but the legislator undertook to favour the poor woman lest she be forced to go forever single in case her assailant, after the flame of his love had died out, should begin to scorn her, as one who would not deny another with so much persistency what she had granted him contrary to the laws, nor would it be easy to find a man who would knowingly be willing to marry one who had been deflowered by another. Therefore, she will be preferred who chose to marry her assailant, for this squares better with the end of the law which looks more to the benefit of the woman than to the punishment of the assailant. Moreover, this decision leaves at least one of them an opportunity for an honourable marriage, while if their assailant is killed, both of them would have to go unmarried. And the principle also applies here, that, when the considerations on both sides are equal, the milder judgement should prevail. Although most of the speakers in M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. I, cont. v, appear to take the opposite view.

The following is an illustration of when the words of the same law clash only in a particular case. The law runs: 'Let a brave man choose what he will have. But there are two brave men who demand the same maiden.'¹ Now since they both cannot attain their desires, the question is which is to be preferred. The reply is, he who was the first to make her his choice; and in case they both chose her at the same time, the matter must be committed to lot. For the indefinite liberty of choice, in the law, must be restricted by the provision that the desire of the brave man can be conveniently satisfied.

¹ [This law is mentioned in Seneca, Controversies, Bk. X, cont. ii; Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. vii. 4; Gellius, Bk. IX, chap. xvi; Marius Victorinus, p. 298, 1 ff. (Holm's Rhet. Lat. Min.), but the cases are all different from this one.—Tr.]

Another illustration is given by Philostratus, Lives of the Sophists, Bk. I [xxvi], on Secundus. Let him who raised a revolt be punished. The same man raised a revolt and then quelled it; whereupon he requests a reward. On this point Secundus emphatically held: 'In matters where you have done wrong pay the penalty; but where you have done right take the reward, if you are able to get it.' And, indeed, in such cases the obvious obscurity of the words forces one to seek refuge in conjectures.

Yet sometimes the conjectures are so obvious that the real sense forces itself through, even in opposition to the more widely accepted and common meaning of the words. Such a case the rhetoricians term περί ρητοῦ καὶ διανοίας, 'the letter and design of the writing'. A common law in illustration of this is the following: 'Let any alien who mounts the walls be put to death. But in a siege one does so and hurls down the enemy that was preparing to scale them.' Opposed to the alien is τὸ ρήτόν [the letter], in his favour the διάνοια [design], which must without question carry the decision. For the purpose of the law was that no alien should ascend the walls to discover where was the easiest way into the city; which consideration has no bearing upon the case before us. Add Digest, XXXIX. iv. 15.

But it should be noted that sometimes an ἀντινομία [a contradiction] is assumed where there is none; as when words are taken by others not in the strict meaning in which they were delivered by the speaker. A notable illustration occurs in Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. X, chap. x, where king Zedekiah puts no trust in the words of the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, because he held that they were contradicting each other. For the former affirmed that he would be carried off to Babylon, while the latter denied that he would ever see the land of Babylon with his eyes. Yet the prophets fully agreed with one another, for he was in fact carried off to Babylon, yet after his eyes had been put out.

7. Now three considerations are established by Grotius whereby 546 conjectures of the will are suggested, when the words are obscure or ambiguous: by the subject-matter, by the effect, and by the circumstances.

On the first the lawyers speak everywhere of how 'words should be understood in accordance with their subject-matter'. They advance illustrations from Digest, XIX. ii. 15, § 4; XXXIX. ii. 43; Code, IV. xlix. 17, where, if a seller has promised a purchaser that he will undertake to defend him in his purchase against every comer, he is still not understood to have promised to defend him from extra-judicial violence. I should also judge that this rule can be applied to the vow of Jephtha (Judges, xi. 31), and that of Agamemnon, as given in Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxv]: 'When he had vowed to Diana the loveliest thing that should be born that year in his kingdom, he sacrificed Iphigenia, than whom, indeed, nothing lovelier was born that year' (E.), for whoever speaks of a sacrifice is presumed to have in mind an object suitable for sacrifice. Add Everard, Loci Legales [Topica Juris sive Loci Argumentorum Legales], xl, which treats of the subject-matter.

Likewise, if a truce be made for thirty days, it is to be understood of days which are defined by a space of twenty-four equal hours, not of such as are of the period during which the sun is above the horizon. Therefore, it was a frivolous cavil of Cleomenes who agreed with the Argives upon a truce of some days, and then, upon ascertaining that they were sleeping during the third night in the security of the truce, attacked them, killing some and making captives of others. And when he was accused of perjury he denied that he had included in the truce the nights as well as the days; Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms [223 A]. Strabo, Bk. IX [ii. 4], records that the Thracians employed a similar deceit against the Boeotians. It was in vain also that the Egyptian king Mycerinus endeavoured to convict of falsehood the oracle which had promised him only six years of life, by lighting lanterns during the night and thus enjoying his pleasures by night as well as day, as if by turning his nights into days he could stretch the six years into twelve. Herodotus, Bk. II [cxxx].

Thus the word 'arms', which sometimes means instruments of war, and sometimes armed soldiers, must be taken in the former or latter sense according to the subject-matter. For instance, if it has been agreed that a man shall not take up arms against a third party, clearly it is understood of soldiers and an army; but if it is agreed in the terms of surrender of a garrison that the arms shall be surrendered or left in the place, the soldiers are allowed to leave, but their instruments of war are to be left behind. Add Alberico Gentili, loc. cit., Bk. III, chap. xx. So also when the Plataeans promised to return the Theban captives, they dishonestly returned them not alive but dead, Thucydides, Bk. II [v-vi], for the terms concerned living men and not corpses. [Ovid, Tristia, III. xi. 27-8]: 'Hector was alive whilst he fought in war, but once bound to the Haemonian steeds he was not Hector.' (W.) It is said that when Pericles had covenanted with some of his enemies that they should put away their iron, he afterwards accused them of breaking their agreement because they had not put away the iron brooches which they carried in the edges of their clothing. Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. vi [8]: 'Let him who is caught with steel in his hand at night, be sent to prison; a magistrate sent to prison a man who was found with a steel ring.' (W.)

It was a dishonest trick of Q. Fabius Labeo, when king Antiochus had to deliver over by the treaty one-half of his warships, to cut all his ships in two and so deprive the king of his whole fleet. Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. iii; although Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. xxxviii, makes no mention of the cutting of the vessels. According to Polyænus¹, Bk. VI [xv], the Campanians made a treaty with their enemy, which contained the stipulation that the latter would give up one-half of their arms, and then after breaking all their arms in two they told them to take half of them. In Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio's History, on Caracalla [year 217], two soldiers, on being ordered to divide a skin of wine which they had got on a foraging expedition, drew their swords and cut it in two. Likewise, Rhadamistus swears to Mithridates that he will not do him injury with poison or sword, and then smothers him in a mass of clothing. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XII [xlvi].

8. Often also the effects and consequence show the genuine meaning of words. For when words, if taken in their plain and simple meaning, will produce an absurd or even no effect, some exception must be made from their more generally accepted sense, that they may not lead to nothingness or absurdity. Digest, I. iii. 19. There is an illustration in Guicciardini, History of Italy, Bk. V, p. 134, of a treaty whereby Louis XII, king of France, took over the protection of Bologna and its petty king Bentivoglio, respecting, however, the rights of the pope. But a little later Louis cavils at this in another manner, 'becoming a pettifogger, not a king'. Ibid., p. 146. Thus in Thucydides, Bk. IV [xcviii], the Athenians absurdly deny that the place upon which they are encamped with their army is Boeotian soil. By a similar evasion Alexander got out of the conditions proposed by Darius, who had offered him all the land lying between the Euphrates and Hellespont. But Alexander replies: 'He offers liberally all that is on the other side of the Euphrates. Where is it, then, that you speak to me? Why, I am already across the Euphrates. My camps, therefore, are already past the limits of the gift which he promises. Drive me from where I am already, so I may know that what you are granting is really your own.' Curtius, Bk. IV, chap. xi [19]. As if it were the same thing to hold a place by means of armed camps and to possess it in peace and with the consent of the former owner.

Louis XII agreed with the papal legate that the appointments to bishoprics which would fall vacant in France by the death of their incumbents would belong to the king. It happened that a French bishop died at Rome, to whose place the pope appointed a man and the king no less quickly another, which gave rise to serious disagreement. But I for my part would not hesitate to decide in favour of the king, for it makes no difference, for an office to be called vacant, in what place its holder dies, while were that exception admitted the right of the king could be evaded in a number of ways. See Marselaer, Legatus, Bk. I, chap. xxxviii. Compare Everard, Loci Legales, viii, ab absurdo, where he recounts that there was a law of Bologna, that whoever drew blood from another person in a public square should suffer the most severe penalties. On the basis of this law a barber was once informed upon, who had opened a man's vein in the square. And the fellow was in no little peril because it was added in the statute that the words should be taken exactly and without any interpretation. In Quintilian, Declamations, cccxxxii, the following case is proposed:

¹ [For Polyænus read Polyaenus.—Tr.]

A poor man and a rich man were friends. The rich man in his will made another friend his heir, but ordered that the poor man be given as much as the poor man was in his will giving him. The poor man's will is opened; he had made the rich man heir to all his estate. He demands the whole inheritance of the rich man. The designated heir is willing to give only as much as the total property of the poor man amounts to.

And surely it can be an argument on behalf of the written heir that, unless he received something, the man's decision would have no effect, which was one of the main reasons why the Falcidian Law and Pegasian Decree assigned the heir at least a fourth part, for in this way both heirs, the legatee as well as the heir in trust, are cared for. As for the interpretation of civil laws the statement of Cicero, On Invention, Bk. I [xxxviii], regularly holds true: 'One ought to refer all laws to the advantage of the state, and interpret them on the basis of the common weal, not according to the form which they take when spelled out in letters. For no one wants the laws to be observed for the sake of the laws, but for the sake of the state.'

9. A great light is cast upon the interpretation of obscure phrasings and words if they are compared with others which have some affinity with them; with those passages, for instance, where the same writer discusses a similar subject, or with their antecedents and consequences. For since in a matter of doubt the will is supposed to have been consistent with itself, it follows that, when a man in one place has expressed himself clearly on some matter, it is presumed that he is consistent with 548 himself at another place and time, unless a change clearly appears. Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xl]: 'The intent of the writer must be inferred from his other writings, his deeds, words, temper, and life.' Thus, if a man stipulates that some wheat be given him, without mentioning the measure, the stipulation is imperfect. Digest, XLV. i. 115. But if it appear from his former transactions that he thought of and acted upon wheat of a certain kind and quantity, that shall be held as expressed in his stipulation. Digest, XLV. i. 94; Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 7.

A famous instance is the single combat between Menelaus and Paris in Homer, Iliad, Bks. III-IV. It had been agreed that Helen should go to the victor, but when Paris fell he looked to his safety by flight. Agamemnon accordingly announced that Menelaus was the victor, and that seems to have been the decision of Jove also, when he says (Bk. IV, line 13): 'But of a truth the victory belongs to Menelaus, dear to Ares.' (L.L. & M.)

It may be added that the stronger argument belongs to him who offered the condition, for they who accept it when offered have no right to add anything. Now the condition was not concerned with slaughter and death, but with victory, for Helen was to go to the stronger, that is, the one who conquered. There was no question of which was the nobler, for it often happens that a nobler man is slain by his inferior. On the other hand it is claimed that in decrees, laws, treaties, pacts, the later always takes precedence over the earlier. But the last condition was expressed by Agamemnon, since he mentions that the vanquished shall be slain (καταπέφνη) [III. 281]. And Priam also had taken his words in the same way: 'But Zeus knoweth, and all the immortal gods, for whether of the twain the doom of death is appointed.' (L.L. & M.) The first condition is comprehended in the second, for he who slew has surely conquered, but he who has conquered did not necessarily slay. And Agamemnon did not remove the condition as given by Hector, but explained it; he did not change it, but added what was the most important point, namely, that victory should lie in the death of the other contestant. For that is unquestioned victory, while the other point admits of some dispute. 'Now as, when there are laws really contrary, the judges take that side which is plain and indisputable, and mind not that which is obscure; so in this case, let us admit that contract to be most valid which contained killing, as a known and undeniable evidence of victory.' (G.) Plutarch, Symposiacs, Bk. IX, quaest. xiii.

10. But the main point in interpretation is the reason for the law, or that cause and concern which moved the lawgiver to have the law passed. And if any confuse this with the mind of the law, they go far astray, for the latter is nothing other than the true meaning of the law, to seek out which the reason for the law is called in for assistance. And it is the greatest aid to this end, if it be established that the will of the lawgiver was moved by some reason as the single cause, which is no less true in pacts than in laws. So in this case the old saying holds good: 'When the reason for the law ceases the law itself ceases.' But when there were several reasons for a law, the rest do not cease immediately upon the cessation of one, nor are they less valid to sustain the efficacy of the law. Nay, sometimes some general reason appears to urge one thing, while the will of the lawgiver in accordance with its liberty determines otherwise, and so his subjects are bidden to regard his will as the reason. And although it may sometimes depart from the laws of prudence, yet such a will clearly set forth is sufficient to give rise to an obligation.

Now from what has been set forth it is a justifiable conclusion that a donation because of marriage has no force, and when once made can be recalled or reclaimed when the marriage is not consummated, especially if the fault lie with the one to whom the present was made. Although, otherwise, in donations between the living, the reason for the present does not have the force of a condition, unless it has been expressly stated, so that when the reason ceases the gift may be recalled. Thus the Olynthians were justified in refusing to return the territory which Amyntas, king of Macedon, had given them, when he had been defeated by the Illyrians and had given up hope of defending his kingdom. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XV, chap. ix.

549

Yet in certain cases a law can assume the form of a condition. See Code, VIII. lv. Thus Cicero, *For Caecina*¹ [xix], on the interdict unde vi, in which were these words among others, 'whence thou, or thy household, or thy agent', rightly argues that, although a single servant is not a household, yet if he alone has ejected me, it is quite clear from the reason of the law that I should be restored, and that it makes no difference whether it be an agent or some one else who has ejected a person, provided it be in my name. He adds [xx]:

There is no different law for this single case, according to whether it was your agent who drove me away—such a man as is legitimately considered the agent of one who is not in Italy, who is absent on business of the state, being for the time a sort of master, that is, a deputy possessing the rights of another, or whether it was one of your labourers, or neighbours, or clients, or freedmen—or any one else who committed that violence and wrought that expulsion at your request, or in your name. (Y.)

Add Digest, I. iii. 12.

The case proposed by the author of Ad Herennium, Bk. I [xi], should also be decided upon the reason for the law:

There is a law that those who leave a ship because of a storm are to lose everything, while the ship itself and everything on board belongs to those who stay by it. Now in terror before a tremendous storm all the sailors left a ship and took to a boat, with the exception of one sick man, who was so ill that he could not leave and flee. Accidentally the ship got safe to port. The sick man is in possession. The former owner seeks to recover.

The reason, certainly, for such a law was that he who had exposed his life to peril in order to save the ship should enjoy some reward. But the sick man cannot claim this, since he neither remained on the ship for that purpose nor did he help in any way to save it.

II. It should be observed, further, that there is many a word which allows a more loose or a more strict interpretation, and this results from a number of causes. Often the name of the genus attaches itself to one of the species, as in terms of adoption and relationship. In names of animals where they are not common gender, the masculine denotes also the feminine, and vice versa. Sometimes also the application of a word in an art is more inclusive than in general usage, as 'death' in the Roman law extended to exile, while in common usage it means only the separation of the soul from the body. To this you may also refer the ambiguity in the word 'mine' and 'thine', which Martial, Bk. II, ep. xx, has played upon:

¹ [For Caecinna read Caecina.—Tr.]

Bought verses for his own doth Paul recite,
For what you buy you may call yours by right. (W.)

Idem, Bk. VI, ep. xii: 'Fabulla swears that the hair which she bought is her own. Does she perjure herself, Paulus?' (W.)

12. The further point is to be noted that, among promises and pacts, as well as among privileges, some are favourable, some odious, some intermediate or mixed. Those are favourable which contain equality, that is, in which the condition of each party is equal, and the interests of each party are equally looked after, and which look to their common advantage. And the greater this advantage is and the more widely it extends, the greater the favour of the promise. Those also are favourable which preserve partnerships and all kinds of acts. The words of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. iv [10], apply here: 'The plea of escaping loss is much better than that of aiming at advantage.' (W.) So also greater favour extends to those that make for peace than to those that make for war, and to those of a defensive than an aggressive war.

On the other hand those are odious which burden one party only, or one more than the other; also such as carry with them punishments, and which make certain acts void, or effect some alteration in previous conclusions, as well as such as uproot friendship and society.

But if one is mixed, for instance, if it changes some former conclusion, yet in the cause of peace, it will be judged to be now favourable, and now odious, in accordance with the greatness of the good or change; yet, other things being equal, the consideration of favour should be given first place.

13. On these distinctions Grotius builds the following rules: I. In cases not odious words are to be taken in accordance with their exact significance in popular usage; and if the same word admits of several meanings in popular usage, the broadest one should be chosen. For instance, the masculine should be taken for the common gender, so that if two neighbours agree that each can hunt on the other's 550 property all game except bucks, it is reasonable to include under that name the does as well. In matters of this kind an indefinite term will have a universal force; for instance, if it is agreed in articles of peace that the prisoners are to be restored on both sides, this is to be understood of each and every prisoner. Thus Cicero, Pro Caecina [xxv], maintains that in the interdict unde vi, the words 'whence a man is ejected', should be extended to him who is forcibly forbidden from coming into what is his own. Add Digest, XLIII. xvi. 3, § 8. Nor is this sense repugnant to the nature of the word and it is highly in favour of a man for him to be restored to possession of what is his own, for to eject a man from his possession is to prevent his being able to maintain thereafter a possession once acquired. Add Digest, XLIII. xvi. 3, § 5. But for a man to keep possession it is not necessary that he never set foot outside his door; and therefore it amounts to the same thing whether a man puts me out while I am on my place, or prevents my return when I come back after a short absence on other matters. Add Digest, XIX. ii. 29.

It is also due to the force of this rule that, in a case of doubt, when the matter is favourable, a year commenced upon is held completed, when no one's right is thereby injured. See Bussièrès, Historia Francica, Bk. XIX, p. 39. It was against this rule that, according to Suetonius, Caligula, chap. xxxviii, Caligula offended, 'in ruling that Roman citizenship could not lawfully be enjoyed by those whose forefathers had obtained it for themselves and their descendants, except in the case of sons, since "descendants" ought not to be understood as going beyond that degree'. (R.) Add Digest, L. vi. 4. And I wonder whether Dido did not use too broad a favour when, after purchasing as much land as could be covered by an ox-hide, she ordered it cut in the narrowest strips possible and so secured more land than she had asked for. Justin, Bk. XVIII, chap. v; Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. I, line 371, with the remarks of Cerda. With equal cunning Ivor asked for as much land as could be surrounded by a horse's hide, and then cutting it into narrow thongs, he got a space large enough to build a city on. Saxo Grammaticus, Bk. IX; Polydorus Virgilius, Historia Anglica, Bk. V.

II. In favourable cases, if he who speaks is skilled in law, or avails himself of the advice of such as are, the words are to be taken in a broader sense, so that they not only signify what is their meaning in common usage, but also include the force which is used in the discipline of law, or which the civil law has imposed.

III. No recourse should be had to meanings of a word that are plainly improper to it, unless otherwise some absurdity would follow, or the pact or law be rendered useless. For the nature of such undertakings requires that what is in one's mind should be expressed plainly and clearly, and it is presumed that this is regularly done.

IV. On the other hand words will have to be understood in a stricter sense than their proper signification otherwise requires, if that is necessary in order to avoid a breach of equity or an absurdity.

V. If to avoid a breach of equity it is not necessary for words to be taken within their strict signification, nevertheless, if there is a distinct advantage in restricting them, they should be held within the most narrow limits of their proper signification, unless circumstances counsel otherwise.

VI. In odious cases figurative speech can be admitted to some extent in order to avoid a burden. Therefore, in a donation and the cession of a man's right, words, however general, are usually restricted only to such things as are likely to have been in mind. Here may be referred the passage in Cicero, Topics [iii]:

It does not follow, if a man has bequeathed to his wife all the money which belonged to him, that therefore he bequeathed all which was down in his books as due to him; for there is a great difference whether the money is laid up in his strong box, or set down as due in his accounts. (Y.)

Flavius Vopiscus, Aurelian [xxv]:

So Aurelian, when he was getting ready to set out for the Orient, promised the people two-pound crowns, if he ever returned; and although the people hoped for crowns of gold, which Aurelian neither could nor wished to give, he made the crowns out of loaves of bread which are now called siliginei (wheaten), and gave them to the citizens individually.

Nay, it is a rule in court that, if a general statement precede, and 551 this is followed by a detailed enumeration of the parts, that which was not especially stated is not held to have been changed. So when only one party to a treaty has promised assistance, such, it is understood, should be sent at the expense of the party which asked for it, unless there has been an express agreement to the contrary. Likewise, a treaty which is entered into for the defence of a kingdom, when its sovereign is in possession of it, is not extended to its recovery after he has been ejected. See Guicciardini, History of Italy, Bk. XV, p. 433 b.

Sometimes even the loathing felt for a person excuses a strict interpretation, which borders on cavilling. An illustration can be found in the case of Tarpeia, the betrayer of the Roman citadel, who had bargained to receive what the Sabines carried on their left arms, meaning their bracelets, and was buried beneath their shields. See Plutarch, Romulus [xvii].

14. Grotius shows the application of these rules in one or two examples. The question is raised whether a prize offered to him who was the first to reach a goal should go to both of two who reach it together, or to neither. Certainly the word 'first' signifies both him who precedes all others and him whom no one precedes, understanding that sometimes there may be equals in degree. We say, therefore, that if the participants set the prize as a kind of wager, and arrived at the goal together, neither can require something of the other. So when the spectators of a race between two contestants lay a wager, as they often do, upon the victory of one or the other, nothing is forfeit when the race is a tie. But when some prize is proposed by a third person, to quicken the zeal of the contestants, it is better that they who tied join in sharing the prize, if it be such as can be divided, or else enjoy it together; or, failing in these expedients, lots may be cast for the prize, or the contest run again. For it is surely unfair for both to be deprived of the prize because neither was worse than the other. Moreover, the rewards of virtue regularly demand a somewhat liberal interpretation.

Yet those umpires decide more generously who give full prizes to such as tie in any event, when some prize was owed the contestants by their promise or by law. See Livy, Bk. XXVI, chap. xlviii. Yet when Augustus paid one million sesterces to the robber Coracota, who surrendered himself to the emperor upon hearing that such a sum had been put upon his head, he did it because of his highmindedness, rather than because it was due the man. Dio, Bk. LVI.

15. In the terms of peace drawn up after the Second Punic War there was the following article: 'The Carthaginians shall not wage war in Africa or outside Africa without permission of the Roman people.' Livy, Bk. XXX, chap. xxxii; Polybius, Bk. XV, chap. xviii. The same article was also in the peace granted by Flaminius¹ to Philip. Livy, Bk. XXXIII, chap. xxx. The question here is whether 'to wage war' is to be understood only of an offensive war or of a defensive one as well. Surely only the first can be answered in the affirmative, since the article is odious and connected with a diminution of the sovereign power, and it is too great a hardship to go further and limit that part of a man's natural liberty whereby he is allowed to defend himself against whoever offers him violence. Add Livy, Bk. XLII, chap. xli, towards the end. Such an interpretation is suggested also by the purpose of the Romans, which was not to expose either the Carthaginians or Macedon to injuries at the hands of their neighbours, or to guarantee the security of those nations with their own forces, but only so to restrain them that they would not be able to extend their territory and increase their strength through war. Add Livy, Bk. XLII, chap. xxiii. We are informed that in the treaty of the Romans with king Antiochus the following article was expressly inserted:

552 If any of the cities or nations, against whom it has been hereby provided that Antiochus should not make war, should commence war against him, it shall be lawful for Antiochus to war with them. (S.) (In Polybius, Selections on Embassies, Bk. XXXV, chap. iv, and in Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. xxxviii, it is given as follows): If any of the allies of the Roman people shall make war on Antiochus, let him have liberty to repel force by force, provided he does not keep possession of any city either by right of arms, or by admitting it into a treaty of amity. (M.)

16. The Romans had promised the Carthaginians, 'Carthage will be free.' Later they demanded that the city be destroyed and a new one built back from the sea, giving as their reason that the area in which the city was situated was not Carthage. Appian, Punic Wars [lxxx and lxxxix]. But even though in this case the liberty which the Romans had promised the Carthaginians could not be understood as unimpaired, since already not a little had been taken from their sovereign power, enough liberty at any rate was understood to have been left them that they were not obligated at another's command to destroy their native country with their own hands and migrate elsewhere. Indeed, liberty or αὐτονομία [autonomy] is an attribute of a people, not of a city, in so far as a city consists of buildings and walls, and as Nicias says in Thucydides, Bk. VII [lxxvii]: 'For men, and not walls and ships in which are no men, constitute a state.' (J.) Add Justin, Bk. II, chap. xii, § 14. Yet since it was 'Carthage will be free', not the Carthaginians will be free (by which statement the Romans might have given more colour to their fraud), common sense at any rate suggests the meaning that the people in the city of Carthage, as it then stood, would enjoy liberty, and therefore the very houses of the city deserved to be respected. Although Polybius [XXXVI. iv] records that the senate promised the Carthaginians 'freedom and the enjoyment of their laws; and moreover, all their territory and the possession of their other property, public or private'. (S.) It seemed at once suspicious to the Carthaginians that no mention was made of their cities. But in any event it is clear that the Romans were guilty of more than Punic perfidy.

¹ [For Flaminius read Flaminius.—Tr.]

17. There are also other conjectures, arising outside of the signification of the words in which a promise or pact is couched, the effect of which is that their interpretation is sometimes to be extended and sometimes restricted. Yet it should be observed that it is easier to find reasons which lead to the latter course than to the former. For just as in all things the lack of one single cause is enough to prevent an effect from following, while all must agree for it to be produced, so in acts giving rise to an obligation, the lack of one cause is enough to restrict an interpretation, while all must agree if it is to be extended.

And such an extension proceeds with much more difficulty than when we said just now, that, in a favourable matter, words sometimes admit another signification, although one less common. For since the sole use of words is to express the sense of one's mind, it is not unlikely that the mind of the person speaking has been expressed by that sense of the words which is not far removed from common usage. Yet here such conjectures are sought as will show that the mind of the person speaking was other than anything his words lead one to suppose; and such conjectures should surely be the most certain possible.

Nor can a law, for instance, be extended to some case with which a reason squares, that is similar to the one which is in that law, but the reason must be the same. Nay, not even this is always enough; for sometimes the mere will of the lawgiver determines itself at its pleasure, and this is enough to produce an obligation. And so for such an extension to be rightly made in a law, it must be clearly established that the reason under which the case comes is the sole and efficient cause which 553 moved the lawgiver, and that the same reason was so considered by him in its generality, that he would have wished it to apply also to the present case, had he foreseen it or thought about it; and that, because otherwise the law would have been useless or unjust.

Here should be referred what is laid down by the rhetoricians περί συλλογισμοῦ [upon reasoning], when a thing which is not covered by any special law is, through identity of reason, inferred from a similar thing on which the law has a specific ruling¹; or in the words of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. viii [4]: 'When what is not written is deduced from what is written.' Where he also lists the following illustrations: 'It is not lawful to receive a plough in pledge; a man received a ploughshare. It is not lawful to export wool from Tarentum; a person exported sheep. Let him who has killed his father be sewn up in a sack; a man kills his mother. Let it be unlawful to drag a man from his house to the judgement-seat; a man drags another from his tent.' (W.) Add Digest, IX. ii. 7, § 7. Here belongs a case defended by Lucian in his speech entitled The Tyrannicide, [Preface]: There is a law that the assassin of a tyrant shall be rewarded.²

A man forces his way into the stronghold of a tyrant, with the intention of killing him. Not finding the tyrant himself, he kills his son, and leaves his sword sticking in his body. The tyrant, coming, and finding his son dead, slays himself with the same sword. The assailant so claims that the killing of the son entitles him to the reward of tyrannicide. (F.)

Erasmus defends the opposite position. And yet reason leads to the conclusion that the reward is due not merely to the man who slew the tyrant with his own hand, but to him who did something from which the death of the tyrant directly resulted. As Lucian says in the same passage [xi]: 'What is the difference between killing him and causing his death?' (F.) For there is no question that the lawgiver would have decreed the reward also to the latter kind of tyrannicide, had such a case occurred to him.

There is a law that whoever kills his wife shall be put to death. A certain man in France, wishing to get rid of his wife, kept his mule without water for three days and on the fourth, while passing through the fields as if on a pleasure jaunt put his wife upon the back of the famished creature. And when it came near a stream it rushed into it in such haste that the woman was thrown into the water where she perished. Here you may apply the line of Seneca, Hercules Oetaeus [859-60]:

Whate'er can work my death is sword enough. (M.)

Thus the brethren of Joseph vainly believed that their sin would be less if they threw him into a pit to die of hunger, than if they cut him down. Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. II, chap. iii.

¹ [For statuum read statutum.—Tr.]

² [This sentence is not in Lucian at this point.—Tr.]

There is a pact between two neighbouring nations, at a time when there was no other kind of fortified place, that in a certain region no spot should be surrounded by walls. Such a spot shall not be surrounded even by an earthen rampart, if it is established that the sole reason for forbidding the construction of walls was that the place might not be made capable of resisting attack.

A man's will runs thus: 'Let Titius be my heir if my posthumous child', which the testator, of course, expected, 'dies.' But it happens that no child is born after his death. In that case Titius will be his heir, because it is certain that the testator's desire, that he make Titius his heir, was moved by the sole consideration of his coming offspring; and so, had he known that a posthumous child would not be born, he would have written him in as his heir unconditionally. Add Digest, V. ii. 28. M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. IV, cont. xxvii [IX. iv. 9]: 'Many things are understood in a law, although they are not excepted. The wording of a law is restricted, the interpretation is broad; and some things are so obvious that they need no exception.' Cicero, *For Caecina*¹ [xviii]:

What? was this case sufficiently provided for by the terms of the will? Certainly not. What was the thing, then, that influenced the judges? The intention; and if it could not be understood though we were silent, we should not employ words at all: because it could not, words have been invented not to hinder people's intentions, but to point them out. (Y.)

Idem, On Invention, Bk. II [xlii]: 'Not all exceptions are provided for in written terms, but certain obvious ones are tacit.' Lysias, Orations, II [xi. 4], Against Theomnestus: 'It would have been too much 554 trouble for the lawgiver to have written down all the designations which have the same meaning, but what he said about one he wanted to have understood of all the others.' Idem, Orations I [X. 7f.], Against Theomnestus. Thus the law in Exodus, xxi. 33, is properly extended to any kind of tame animal, and the word 'pit' to any excavation. Quintilian, Declamations, cccxxxi:

Those who worded the laws could not possibly have had foresight sufficient to enable them to cover every variety of crime. For despite all their precautions rascality would have got the best of them, and the law would have become so complicated and voluminous that in place of uncertainty, as at present, we should have had ignorance. They therefore undertook to include the general kinds of crime, fixing their attention upon the essential equity. And therefore we frequently find things that are not contained in the words of the law, but are contained in its essential power and force.

Add Libanius, Declamations, xxxi.

18. An excellent use is found for interpretation when it is extended to prevent frauds which are so often concocted by scheming men in evading the laws, as well as to dispose of all kinds of cavils. Digest, I. iii. 29, 30; X. iv. 19; XXXV. i. 76; XLVIII. v. 33, § 1. Frauds of this kind the expositors of the Roman law divide into four kinds: one, they say, takes place in the commutation of things (Digest, XIV. vi. 3, § 3; XIV. vi. 7, § 3); one in the commutation of persons (Digest, XXIV. i. 5; add Livy, Bk. XXXV, chap. vii); another in the commutation of contracts (Digest, XXIV. i. 5, § 5); and the last in the manner of making contracts (Digest, XVI. i. 8, § 14).

¹ [For Caecinna read Caecina.—Tr.]

The illustration of Licinius Stolo, in Valerius Maximus, Bk. VIII, chap. vi, is well known:

When he had provided by law against any one holding more than 500 jugera of land, he himself got hold of 1,000, and in order to conceal his guilt made over one-half to his son. He was accused on this score by M. Popilius Laenas, and was the first to be hit by his own law, teaching us thereby that nothing ought to be laid down as a rule for others, except what a man has previously enjoined upon himself.

The same story is told by Pliny, Bk. XVIII, chap. iii. In the argument of Quintilian, Declamations, cclxiv, there is a case of fraud against the Voconian Law: 'Let no one give more than one-half of his goods to a woman. Now a certain man made two women his heirs, each to one-half of his estate. His relatives accordingly contest the will.' Frauds to evade the Lex Papia Poppaea are given by Suetonius, Augustus, chap. xxxiv; Tiberius, chap. xxxv, at end; Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XV, chap. xix. The evasion which the Romans used, to avoid the performance of private rites, which thereupon passed to the heir with the estate, is set forth by Salmasius on Plautus, Bacchides, Act IV, sc. ix [976], under the words, coemtionalem senem.

Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXII, chap. xvi, tells us that the Rhodians once had a right to the taxes from the island of Pharos. When their tax-gatherers came to collect them, the queen detained them on the excuse of celebrating holidays, joined Pharos to the mainland by moles, and then drove them away, maintaining that they could demand taxes from islands, but not from the mainland.

Thus, among the Athenians, according to Lactantius, On False Religion, chap. xx [Divine Institutes, I. xx]: 'When a harlot, by name Leaena, had put to death a tyrant among them, because it was unlawful for the image of a harlot to be placed in the temple, they erected the effigy of the animal whose name she bore.' (C.)

Because it was¹ forbidden the Rhodians to tear down trophies, they covered over with a building one which had been set up to their shame by Artemisia. Vitruvius, De Architectura, Bk. II, chap. viii.

There is a clever turn in Plutarch, Pericles [xxx]. When the Spartans asked that the decree of the Athenians be rescinded, whereby the Megarians were excluded from their markets, and Pericles pleaded a law 'preventing him taking down a tablet on which the decree was inscribed', one of the ambassadors replied, 'Well then, don't take it down, but turn the tablet to the wall; surely there's no law preventing that.' (P.)

¹ [For esset read esset.—Tr.]

When the king of Portugal wished for certain reasons to forbid the clergy the use of mules, and they pleaded their privileges, he forbade all the workers in iron under pain of death to shoe any mule, whereupon the clergy quit using them of their own accord. 555

Another instance of cavilling is related by the author of the Ad Herennium, Bk. II [xxviii]:

Sulpicius had successfully opposed the passage of a law to permit the return of exiles, who were not permitted to plead their own cases. Later on he changed his mind and proposed the same law himself, claiming, however, that it was a different law, because of a change in designations; for now he did not use the term 'exiles', but claimed to be restoring the 'forcibly ejected'. As though the question had been what those persons were called by the Roman people, or as though every one was not called an exile when once the interdict of water and fire had been passed against him.

We may add the custom of Tiberius given by Tacitus, Annals, Bk. V [ix], and Suetonius, Tiberius, chap. lxi: 'Since ancient usage made it impious to strangle maidens, young girls were first violated by the executioner and then strangled.' (R.)

According to Herodotus, Bk. VI [lxxxix], when the Corinthians were forbidden by law to give away their ships, they sold them to the Athenians for five drachmas each. Add Digest, XLIV. vii. 54.

According to Tacitus, Annals, Bk. II [xxx]:

As there was an old decree of the Senate which forbade the torturing of slaves in regard to a capital charge against their master, Tiberius showed his cunning as the inventor of a new principle of law, by ordering the slaves to be sold singly to the agent of the Treasury. In this way testimony might be extracted from the slaves against Libo without infringing the rule of the Senate. (R.):

although Dio, Bk. LV, ascribes the evasion to Augustus. Critias used a more impudent cavil against Theramenes. Xenophon, Greek History, Bk. II [iii. 20].

It was a petty fraud when some men, in order to avoid the name of gamesters, which was branded by the laws, wanted to be called dice-throwers, 'between whom', as Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXVIII, chap. ix, says, 'there is as much difference as between thieves and robbers'.

Tiridates, when ordered by Nero to put aside his sword, refused, but fastened it in the scabbard with a lock¹. Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio's History [LXIII. ii. 4].

Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. XIV, tells us that

Robert Carncrosse, a man of great wealth, purchased a holy office of the king, who was at that time in need of funds, getting around the law which forbade the sale of such offices by a new kind of fraud. For he lost a heavy wager to the king that the latter would not present him with the next office to fall vacant.

¹ [Really 'with nails'.—Tr.]

During the reign of Philip Augustus of France, in a battle with Otto IV, Philip, the bishop of Beauvais, would not take up the sword, but to avoid shedding blood fought with a mace, slaughtering many of the enemy as though they were victims. Did the prelate excuse himself in this way or make a mockery of his vows? Bussières, Historia Francica, Bk. VIII.

19. But when there is a restriction of the interpretation of words in which an undertaking is expressed, it is due either to an original defect in the will of the speaker, or to the repugnancy of some unexpected case to what he had in mind. That is, sometimes words are spoken generally, and some limitation or exception must be added to them, either because he who spoke them was unwilling at the outset that they be extended to certain cases, or because a case which arises later runs counter to his design.

There is understood to be an original defect in the will of the speaker: (1) From an absurdity which would otherwise follow from it. For no man in his senses should be believed to will what is absurd. And I am inclined to think that the famous dispute between Protagoras and Euathlus ought to be decided on this principle. Gellius,¹ Bk. V, chap. x; Diogenes Laertius, Bk. IX [56]; Apuleius, Florida, Bk. III [18]²; Sextus Empiricus, Against the Mathematicians, Bk. II [p. 81]. For although it appears that they had reached the general agreement, that no reward is due the teacher so long as his pupil has not won a case, yet if the latter has been ordered by the judge in an action about the matter to pay it, he will by no means be able to protect himself by an exception of such a pact. For, in entering upon the pact, this was not thought of, and it is absurd for a man to have drawn up such a pact as would prevent what was owed him by the pact from being possible of attainment.

556 They tell a similar story of Aristides, who had promised a denarius to the one who would tell him the truth. A sophist replied, 'You will not give me the denarius you promised.' There is a question then what Aristides should do. For if he gives it, he does so to him who did not tell the truth, while if he does not give it, the other has spoken the truth, and Aristides is not keeping his promise. And so the rule of the lawyers should come in here: 'In a general statement the person of the speaker always constitutes an exception.' So Epimenides the Cretan cannot be accused of falsehood in his own statement [Titus, i. 12], 'The Cretans are always liars.' Nor can the statement of Lucretius, Bk. IV [471-2], be affirmed: 'Moreover, if any one thinks that nothing is known, he does not even know whether that can be known, since he declares that he knows nothing.' (R.) For he who declares, 'Nothing can be known', does but declare that he knows only this one thing, that nothing is known. Apuleius, Apologia [§ 80]: 'Any man is a fool to say that he isn't saying anything, because the same person in saying that he isn't saying anything, is saying something, and by his very assertion undermines the faith in his own assertion.' Add Lactantius, Bk. III, chap. vi, where he goes on to say that in the schools the following illustration of an inconsistency is usually given: 'A man dreamed that no faith should be put in dreams.' Now whatever genius sent him this wanted him to believe that dream only and none thereafter. So also in the illustration proposed by Gellius, Bk. IX, chap. xvi, the restriction should be made that the law may not deprive brave men of their rewards.

¹ [For Galicum read Gellium.—Tr.]

² [The reference by book is false.—Tr.]

(2) A man's will is held to have been defective at the outset, when the reason ceases which alone fully and efficaciously moved it. For when a reason is added to a thing contained in a law, or when we are sufficiently satisfied about it, the thing is no longer considered by itself but in so far as it comes under that reason. An illustration is in Digest, XXXVII. xiv. 6, § 2, where a patron is forbidden to require an oath of a freedman not to marry or bring up children, and it is added:

Although in the law no person be excepted, yet it is to be understood that the law has in mind those only who can bear children. Therefore, if a man should lay such an obligation by oath upon a sterilized freedman, one must say that the patron may not be punished under this law.

For the reason of the law was that a patron in satisfying his avarice should not be able to prevent the increase of offspring, which cannot be expected of a eunuch.

(3) Or from a defect in the subject-matter. For the subject-matter should always be understood as being held in mind by the speaker, even though the words may seem to afford a wider connotation. For instance, if a fief is granted to a man for himself and his male descendants, the expression is not understood to cover grandsons by his daughter, because that opposes the nature of such a grant, which plainly excludes women and their offspring.

20. On the second head Grotius [II. xvi. 25] remarks: 'Many things are often included under reason not from the point of view of existence, but in relation to their force from the point of view of morals. When such a case arises, no restriction ought to be made.' (K.) His meaning is that a covenant, where the parties had in mind some reason, such as the avoidance of a risk or an inconvenience, is valid not only in cases where that object would have followed, but also in those in which it could probably or without too great difficulty arise. For instance, if two nations have agreed, by a treaty, that no army or fleet shall enter a certain place, in case the reason for the agreement was that no damage might thereby actually be done to either one of them, it will still not be permitted to bring a fleet or army there, although there be no intention of doing any harm. For it is enough that damage may easily be done the one by him who enters that place, and they wished by that pact to avoid not only loss but the probable fear of loss. Thus, if there is a law that no one shall walk the streets at night with torches, a man is not excused if he says that he is using them with such care that no one will be damaged by them.

The question is often discussed whether promises carry with them 557 a tacit condition, provided things remain in the place where they are. This must in general be denied, for since such a condition is odious, as making a promise void, it is not to be lightly presumed when it has not been added, unless it happen to appear most clearly that the present state of things is included in that single reason which we have mentioned. Thus we often read in histories that ambassadors left their duties and returned home from their post, because such a change had taken place in the affairs of the nation to which they were appointed that the entire cause for their mission had ceased. See Tacitus, Histories, Bk. II, at the beginning, where Titus returns after the murder of Galba.

21. That a case which later arises is inconsistent with the will of him who designed something is concluded from two considerations: either (1) by natural reason, or (2) from some expression of his will.

When the will is to be judged by natural reason, Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. x, feels that the intellect should possess as its own virtue or peculiar endowment what he would call γνώμη or εὐγνωμοσύνη, as he would say, 'right understanding', or 'an understanding of what is right'; and the will ἐπιείκεια, or 'a desire to follow equity'. Compare Digest, XLVII. ii. 61, § 5. In the same work (Bk. V, chap. xiv; compare Magna Moralia, Bk. II, chaps. i-ii) he defines equity as the correction of that point in which the law, because of its universality, is wanting; that is, as a skilful interpretation of a law, through which it is shown by natural reason that some special case is not comprehended under a universal law, because in that case an absurdity would follow. And this should be applied, with due consideration for their differences, also to wills and pacts. And in this connexion Grotius on Campanella's Politica has made the further important observation, that equity can have no place in natural law, since nature does not speak more universally than her law requires; but that the law of nature, not as it is of itself, but as it is too little universally stated by men, can be in need of the interpretation of ἐπιείκεια [equity]; in the statement, for instance, that every man should have his own returned to him, we understand one who uses reason, and provided there be nothing to interfere from the side of a superior right. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. IV, cont. xxvii [IX. iv. 9=passage quoted, p. 553]: "In a law", you say, "there is no exception." But many things are understood in a law, although they are not excepted. The wording of a law is restricted, the interpretation is broad; and some things are so obvious that they need no exception.' Quintilian, Declamations, cccxxxi:

Those who worded the laws could not possibly have had foresight sufficient to enable them to cover every variety of crime. For despite all their precautions rascality would have got the best of them, and the law would have become so complicated and voluminous that in place of uncertainty, as at present, we should have had ignorance. They therefore undertook to include the general kinds of crime, fixing their attention upon the essential equity. And therefore we frequently find things that are not contained in the words of the law, but are contained in its essential power and force.¹

Now since laws cannot possibly foresee all cases, nor mention them, by reason of their infinite variety (Xenophon, The Cavalry Commander [ix. 1]: 'To write out all that a man ought to do is no more possible than to know everything that is going to happen' (B.)), those to whom it falls to apply the general decrees of the law to special cases need some liberty, which will allow them to take from the law those cases which are surrounded by special circumstances, and which the lawgiver himself would have excepted if he had been present, or had foreseen them. See Digest, I. iii. 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 13.

There is an illustration in Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xxxii]:

Among the Rhodians there is a law that any warship found inside the harbour shall be confiscated. Once when there was a great storm at sea, the violence of the winds forced such a vessel into the harbour of Rhodes against the intentions of the sailors. The public treasurer demands possession of the ship in the name of the people. The captain denies the claim that it should be confiscated. (Again [II. xlii]): Although a law forbade the opening of the gates at night, a certain man opened them in time of war and let troops into the city so as to keep them from being destroyed by the enemy, if they remained outside, because the enemy was encamped close to the walls.

558

Yet this liberty may not be indulged in too freely, lest a man set himself up as the arbiter of the acts of another, for sometimes the law-givers wish adherence to the strict letter of the law, as is stated in Digest, XL. ix. 12, § 1: 'This, indeed, is very² severe, but that is the way the law is written.' Add Law of the Visigoths, Bk. II, tit. i, chap. 12. Rather it is always required that sufficient proofs be available. Among these the most certain is when it appears that it is illegal, that is, contrary to the laws of nature and of God, for one to follow the exact letter of a law; for since no one can be obligated to do such things, it is presumed that no one in his senses wished to obligate another to that. 'Some περιστάσεις [circumstances] are so fraught with violence that to wish to keep the law in them is to sin against higher laws.' Grotius on Esther, iv. 16. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. III, chap. vii, n. 1; chap. viii, n. 6.

Furthermore, equity is secured in another sense when, for instance, it is said that a cause is settled on grounds of what is just and good, that is, when the rigour of the law is tempered somewhat in favour of the defendant. So also private individuals are said to show equity, when they grant some favour, and do not insist too strictly on their right against their opponents.

¹ [Already quoted above, p. 554.—Tr.]

² [For per quam read perquam.—Tr.]

Finally, causes are said to be settled on grounds of what is just and good, when there is no civil law on the case, or no attention is paid to its ἀκρίβεια [harshness], but a decision is reached by accepting the judgement of good men.

22. Another consideration on account of which a universal law should be restricted is when it is not absolutely unlawful in itself and under all circumstances to follow the express letter of the law, and yet in considering the latter from a human standpoint, it seems too severe and unbearable, either from the common condition of human nature viewed absolutely, or from a comparison of the person and thing concerned with the purpose of the act. For some things appear intolerable to all men, some to certain persons; some undertakings are of such a nature that it is foolish to go to great trouble over them. And the considerations in such cases are all the stronger, not only if law is positive, and the matter in it does not make it probable that the lawgiver requires its observance, if that be attended with some inconvenience from without, but also if the neglect of the law in a case where its observance would be a hardship does not border on effrontery and scorn towards the lawgiver. Add Grotius on Matthew, xii. 3.

Therefore, it is without doubt a foolish religious scruple of the Abyssinians to enfeeble themselves so much by fasting during Lent that they are weakened in both mind and body, and so cannot resist the enemies who attack them at that time. It is said that because of this habit their country is overrun at that period with impunity. Francisco Alvarez, Descriptio Aethiopiae, chap. xiii.

Thus, if a man has lent a thing for some days, he can require it during that time, if he needs it badly, because an act so kind¹ is of such a nature that it is not to be supposed that a man intended thereby to obligate himself to his own great inconvenience.

Thus, if a ruler has promised aid to an ally, he will be excused so long as he is threatened at home, and needs his forces for his own defence. For since every prince is obligated first of all to protect his own subjects, in all promises which he makes to outsiders he understands this condition: in so far as the safety of the state permits.

So also a grant of immunity from taxes and tribute is to be understood of fixed and regular payments, and not of those extraordinary ones which are required by a present and urgent necessity, and are absolutely essential to the state. Hence it appears that the following was a rather off-hand remark of Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xxiv. 10]:

¹ [For beneficia read benefici.—Tr.]

'You are not to perform those promises which may be prejudicial to the party to whom you promise, nor if they may be more hurtful to you than they can be serviceable to him.' (E.) For whether the thing promised will be useful to the person to whom it was made, does not always lie in the province of the promisor to decide, unless he happen to have authority over the other, or is entrusted with the duty of looking after his safety. And some hurt or burden to the promisor is not enough to relieve him of the obligation of his promise (for every fulfilment of a gratuitous promise entails some burden), but only such as should, from the nature of the act, be considered an exception. Such a one is given by Cicero in the passage cited above: 'If you should promise to appear as the advocate of another person while his cause is pending, and in the meantime your son was to be seized violently ill, it would be no breach of duty in you not to perform what you promise.' (E.*) Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. xxxv. 559

23. Finally, there are also other signs of the will which show that a certain case ought not to come under a law or pact framed with universal application. That is, suppose words in another connexion do not, indeed, directly oppose the present law or pact (for that would be a case of ἀντιρροπία [contradiction]), but clash with it in some special case that arises under unusual circumstances, and upon an unexpected turn of events. Or, what amounts to the same thing, it may be that there are two pacts or two different laws which are not opposed, and can and should be kept and observed at different times, and yet cannot be satisfied when, for some reason, they must both be observed at the same time. Compare Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxvii, n. 5. In such a case, therefore, certain rules must be observed, that it may be known which law or pact yields to the other, when both cannot be satisfied at the same time. The following are approved by Grotius [II. xvi. 29].

(1) 'That which is only permitted yields to that which is commanded.'¹ Author of Ad Herennium, Bk. II [x]: 'A command is of greater force than a permission.' 'For that which is enjoined is necessary, and that which is allowed is optional,' as the same author² expresses it, On Invention, Bk. II [xlix]. Quintilian, Declamations, cccclxxiv:

The law which forbids is more powerful than that which permits. The former, moreover, is reserved in the power of the magistrates, and one magistrate who forbids can do no more than all who allow. For with one who permits you have left your freedom of choice; with one who forbids you are subjected to punishment.

For a permission allows the liberty of performing or omitting, while a command involves a necessity of doing, and in this case removes the liberty of omitting.

¹ Slightly modified from the exact form in Grotius.—Tr.]

² [On Invention, however, was written by Cicero. The identity of the author of Ad Herennium is unknown. The first sentence quoted here is from the Ad Herennium, the second from On Invention.—Tr.]

(2) 'That which is to be done at a definite time should have preference over that which can be done at any time.' (K.) That is, when the fulfilment of two obligations comes at one time, of which one can properly be met at but a given time and that the present, and it is of no consequence at what time the other is met, the latter is put off to another time and the former will have to be fulfilled at the time fixed. But it appears from this principle that things which cannot be done at the same time, and of which none can be postponed, should not be laid upon one and the same person. In point is what Plutarch, Roman Questions [cxiii], has to say on the reason why no Flamen Dialis could hold a magistracy: 'Since the priests have fixed, the kings variable duties, irreducible to order, it was found impracticable, if both functions were called for simultaneously, for the same man to attend to both, so that often, when both were urgent, he would neglect one or the other.' (R. *) For it appears that the priests of that age had not yet made that great discovery, how to gather all the honour and profit from a sacred office, and pass the administration of it and the labour involved over to clerks.

(3) *An affirmative precept yields to a negative.*¹ That is, when an affirmative precept cannot be satisfied but through the violation of some negative one, the fulfilment of the affirmative precept will have to be omitted or deferred until it does not coincide in time with the violation of the negative. The reason for this is to be sought in the nature of affirmative and negative precepts, because the obligation of the latter is constantly uniform and equally efficacious, while the former presuppose an opportunity for their performance which is not understood to be present when something cannot be done without violating the law. And so such things are held morally impossible, when matters stand in that way.

560 Because of this no one can injure another, or break faith, in order to further the interests of those who are near to him, or to secure means for a display of gratitude and generosity. It would be a strange kind of piety to steal leather and thus give shoes to the poor by way of alms. Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xliv]: 'For it often happens that the law which forbids something appears by some exception, as it were, to amend the law which commands something.' (Y.) Thus Mohammed forbids in the Koran the giving of alms from ill-gotten possessions. I am uncertain whether Shah Abbas of Persia did right in being willing to devote no money so gladly to charitable purposes as the income from bawdy-houses, which, he said, was paid willingly enough, while practically all other funds were wrung from his subjects with groans. Still it is not seemly to give to the poor money collected in such a fashion. Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. V, chap. xxxi; Marius Victorinus,

¹ [A paraphrase of Grotius.—Tr.]

Expositio in Ciceronis Rhetoricam, Bk. II [xlix, p. 298, l. 22 Halm]: 'The authority of a law which prohibits is greater than that of a law which enjoins; because every law which prohibits is stronger, for the reason that it corrects the law which permits or enjoins.' Here also belongs in a way some statements made by Leo of Modena, De Ritibus Hebraicis, Pt. V, chap. v, § 1: Women were forbidden what was denied men by a negative precept; but as to affirmative precepts, the Rabbis declared that women were not bound by all those which have a certain designated time, because of the weakness of the sex, and the fact that they live under the government of their husbands.

(4) 'Among agreements and laws which are otherwise equal, that should be given preference which is most specific and approaches most nearly to the subject in hand.' (K.) For generals are applied to a specific thing through particulars. Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xlix]: 'For that which has been drawn up with reference to some particular division of a subject, or for some special purpose, appears to come nearer to the subject under discussion, and to have more immediate connexion with the present action.' (Y.) But what Grotius adds on prohibitions, to the effect that those which have a penalty attached are preferred to such as do not, and those which inflict a graver penalty to those which carry a lighter, is after all not so clear. For a prohibition which is strengthened by no penalty, express or arbitrary, appears to have no force at all. And the rule that of two evils the lesser is to be chosen, cannot properly be applied to moral evils or sins. Therefore, I do not see how his rule can stand, unless it be in the sense that, when a case arises where one of two prohibitions must be broken, the one the violation of which involves less loss is understood to be permitted. The following may serve as an example. There is a law that no one shall appear armed in public on a holiday; and another that no one shall stay indoors upon hearing the signal used to indicate a riot, but shall present himself armed to the magistrate in the square. Now a riot breaks out on a holiday. In such a case the decision must be that the second law constituted an exception in relation to the first, as though it ran thus: Let no one appear armed in public on a holiday, unless he is called out by the magistrate on account of a riot.

(5) *Of two duties which conflict at the same time it is reasonable that the one should yield to the other which can show more worthy and useful reasons.*¹ For this exception is understood to be added to the lesser as an obligation that it shall be done, if that is possible, by means of the more important obligation.

(6) *When two pacts, one sworn to, the other not, cannot be fulfilled at the same time, the former will yield to the latter, unless the latter is added to the sworn pact by way of an exception or limitation.*¹

¹ [Only a paraphrase of Grotius.—Tr.]

For an oath, when added to a pact, excludes such tacit restrictions and exceptions as are not necessary in the nature of the thing, while pacts without an oath allow them more easily. In Euripides, Medea [743-4], when Medea asks of Aegeus that he receive her into his country and not hand her over at the demand of her enemies, she wishes his promise confirmed by an oath. To this Aegeus accedes, saying,

Since for myself is this the safest course,
To have a plea to show unto thy foes. (W.)

561 Many further illustrations could¹ be added for this.

(7) *An obligation, imperfectly mutual, binding both parties gives place to one perfectly mutual.*² Thus what is owed on contract should be paid before that which is owed on a gratuitous promise, a rule of gratitude, or some other virtue, if both cannot be met at the same time. And so when Phocion was repeatedly asked for a contribution for a public sacrifice he replied: "Ask from these³ rich men; for I should be ashamed to make a contribution to you before I have paid my debt to this man here", pointing to Callicles the money-lender.' (P.) Plutarch, Phocion [ix, p. 745 CD].

(8) The law of benefaction, when all else is equal, yields to the law of gratitude, although each implies only an imperfect obligation. For a debt of gratitude is more favourable than one of kindness, since the former requires you to return because you received, the latter to be the first to give; and so in such a case the object for beneficence is understood to be lacking, because the necessity for gratitude conflicts with it. And this holds so far that a kindness, even though it be owed to those nearest to us, should rank after a gratitude, unless the former happens to be joined with some more pressing debt.

(9) In the case of laws which emanate from subordinate powers, the law of an inferior power yields to that of a superior, when both cannot be met at the same time. Therefore, it is better to obey God than men (Acts, iv. 19); and the commands of kings outweigh those of heads of households.

(10) According as the matter of one law surpasses another in nobility, usefulness, or necessity, so the one regularly outweighs the other.

(11) The closer the bond by which a person is drawn to us, the more do services owed him outweigh those due others, all else being equal. Galatians, vi. 10; 1 Corinthians, viii. 13; 1 Timothy, v. 8; Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xvii], where he discusses the grades of human society. Here belongs also the remarkable passage of the same author, On Invention, Bk. II [xlix]:

From contrary laws a controversy arises, when two or more laws appear to be at variance with one another. In this manner: there is a law 'that he who has slain a tyrant

¹ [For est read et.—Tr.]

² [This and the following are not in Grotius.—Tr.]

³ [For Hocce read Hocse.—Tr.]

shall receive the reward of men who conquer at Olympia; and shall ask whatever he pleases of the magistrate, and the magistrate shall grant it to him'. There is also another law—'When a tyrant is slain, the magistrate shall put to death his five nearest relations.' Alexander, who was tyrant of Pherae, a city in Thessaly, was slain by his own wife, whose name was Thebe, at night, when he was in bed with her; she, as a reward, demanded the liberty of her son whom she had by the tyrant. Some say that according to this law that son ought to be put to death. The matter is referred to a court of justice. [. . .] First it is requisite to show the nature of the laws, by considering which law has reference to more important, that is to say, more useful, honourable, and necessary matters. From which it results, that if two or more, or ever so many laws cannot all be maintained, because they are at variance with one another, that one ought to be considered the most desirable to be maintained which appears to have reference to the most important matters. Then comes the question also, which law was passed last; for the newest law is the most important. And also, which law enjoins anything, and which merely allows it; for that which is enjoined is necessary, and that which is allowed is optional. Also one must consider by which law a penalty is appointed for the violation of it; or which has the heaviest penalty attached to it; for that law must be the most carefully maintained which is sanctioned by the most severe penalties. Again, one must inquire which law enjoins, and which forbids anything; for it often happens that the law which forbids something appears by some exception, as it were, to amend the law which commands something. Then, too, it is right to consider which comprehends the entire class of subjects to which it refers, and which embraces only a part of the question; which may be applied generally to many classes of questions, and which appears to have been framed to apply to some special subject. For that which has been drawn up with reference to some particular division of a subject, or for some special purpose, appears to come nearer to the subject under discussion, and to have more immediate connexion with the present action. Then arises the question, which is the thing which according to the law must be done immediately; which will admit of some delay or slackness in the execution. For it is right that that should be done first which must be done immediately. (Y.*)

ON THE MANNER OF SETTLING DISPUTES IN A STATE OF NATURAL LIBERTY

- | | |
|---|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. What is owed others should be performed voluntarily. 2. In a natural state there is no judge. 3. Disputes which cannot be settled by conversations between the parties should be referred to arbitrators. 4. There is no pact between the arbitrators and the parties. 5. Arbitrators when in doubt are under- | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> stood to be bound in their decisions by the law. 6. It is not enough for arbitrators to have pronounced on possession. 7. On mediators of peace. 8. What if documents have been lost? 9. On witnesses. 10. On the execution of a judgement. |
|---|--|

THE law of nations requires that men voluntarily perform and do for each other what they, for any reason, owe others, and freely offer to make good any damage which has been done to others. In case damage or offences proceed from malice, the same law further requires the guilty party to show that he repents in all seriousness of the deed, to give his word that he will not offend in the future, and to cultivate friendly relations. And just as this repentance, when it is not elicited by violence but springs voluntarily from a consideration of justice, can serve as sufficient evidence of a change of heart on the part of the offender, so when reparation of the damage has been offered and guarantees taken for the future, the injured person on his side should freely pardon the other when he requests it and is penitent, and should live with him thereafter on peaceful terms. But if a man through malice or desire for revenge spurns such approaches, he will be responsible for the breach of peace and the altercation that follows. The speech of C. Pontius in Livy, Bk. IX, chap. i, is excellent on this point. For it is inhuman and brutish to be unwilling to be satisfied with nothing less than retaliation upon the offender, and for ever to nurse injuries once received. It is a sinister remark that Plutarch attributes to Cato the Elder, in his life of him, when, on meeting a youth in the forum after the conclusion of a trial in which the young man had had an enemy of his dead father branded with infamy, he clasped his hand and said [Cato the Elder, xv. 3]: 'These are the sacrifices we must bring to the spirits of our parents, not lambs and kids, but the condemnation and tears of their enemies.' (P.)

2. But besides the fact that not all mortals are endowed with so good a nature that they are willing of themselves to meet their duty, disputes frequently arise over the fact and amount of the debt, the rating of a damage, the competence and exercise of certain laws, the fixing of boundaries, interpretation of pacts, and other claims. Now among those who live in natural liberty there is no judge who may by his authority settle and dispose of the disputes that arise. This is the meaning borne by those words of Thucydides, Bk. I [lxxvii]: 'Those who may use might have no need to appeal to right.' (S.) Indeed, Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, § 9, makes each man in a natural state the judge of his own affairs. But that statement only allows this meaning: whoever does not have a superior by whom he is controlled, conducts his affairs at his own discretion, and decides by his own judgement upon the means that concern his own preservation. For even though another man may try to decide them, yet since he has no authority to force his⁵⁶³ opinion upon me, whether and how far I am willing to accept his counsel will depend upon my own judgement and decision, and thus I will ultimately be responsible for the ordering of my own actions, which must, of course, be properly governed according to natural law.

Furthermore, although in this state it lies with each man to neglect or defend his right, and either to say nothing about or to avenge an injury, yet in an undertaking of his own he cannot give a judgement by which he with whom he has the controversy is obliged to stand. For although he may make every effort to lay down what he has felt is just, and vows upon oath that he has done so, yet since the other can allow an equal weight to his own opinion, the equality that attends a natural state makes a decision impossible when these two conclusions are opposed. A further consideration is that, according to Aristotle, Politics, Bk. III, chap. vi [III. ix]: 'Most people are bad judges in their own case.' (J.) Sallust, Catiline [li]: 'No mortal man thinks his own wrongs unimportant; many, indeed, are wont to resent them more than is right.' (R.)

3. And yet it should not be thought that natural law allows every man, by his own judgement, to determine his right to take up arms at once and make Mars the arbiter of his disputes, before less violent means have been tried. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xi]: 'Since there are two manners of disputing, one by debating, the other by fighting, though the former characterizes men, the latter, brutes, if the former cannot be adopted, recourse must be had to the latter.' (E.) Add Justin, Bk. VIII, chap. i, n. 4 ff. And when one flies to arms without trying friendly discussion, the remark of Ovid, Tristia, Bk. V, el. x [43], is in point: 'Unjustly the hard sword dispenses justice.' (W.) Therefore, first of all the parties or their agents should meet and see whether the controversy may not be settled by friendly discussion. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxiii, § 7. In fact it is most often the case that even after arms have been resorted to, and the obstinacy of men's minds has been broken by the hardships² of war, a dispute is settled by conversations and negotiations. And in some such cases the nature of the affair and the willingness of the parties make it possible easily to end the altercation by recourse to lot. See Idem, loc. cit., § 9.

¹ [For CAPUT XII read CAPUT XIII.—Tr.]

² [For malus read malis.—Tr.]

But when discussion by the parties cannot lead to the end of the controversy, and they will not agree to leave to chance what they think rests upon firm reasons, the next thing is for the parties to turn to an arbitrator and bind¹ themselves by a pact to stand by his decision. Where Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxiii, § 11, well observes that, although in a doubtful case each party is required to seek conditions whereby war may be avoided, yet he who claims something is more bound to do this than he who holds it, since favour attends the possessor even in natural law.

4. It is easily inferred from the design of appealing to an arbitrator how he should conduct himself. He is called in because every man's judgement on his own case is viewed with suspicion, on account of that boundless self-love whereby every man regularly leans toward himself and his own. Digest, II. i. 10. Plutarch, How to Tell a Flatterer from a Friend [i, p. 48 f]: 'Self-love, that grand flatterer within, willingly entertains another from without.' (G.) Therefore, the arbitrator will take care first of all that, except in so far as the merits of the case warrant, he will show no more favour for one than the other, and that he will accordingly not base right upon affection. When he has done this, there is no reason for him to notice any unjust hatred on the part of the man who has lost his suit. Although for this reason Bias used to say: 'It was more agreeable to decide between enemies than between friends; for that of friends one was sure to become an enemy of him, but that of enemies one was sure to become a friend.' (Y.) Diogenes Laertius, Bk. I [87]. Add Gellius, Bk. I, chap. iii. And it is clear for this reason that no one can properly be taken as arbitrator in a case, for whom there appears to be a greater hope for advantage or renown from 564 the victory of one party than the other, or whose single interest² is that one of them win his point no matter by what means; for such a man will be unable to maintain consistently enough his proper aloofness and impartiality. Aristotle, Politics, Bk. IV, chap. xii: 'The arbiter is always the one trusted, and he who is in the middle is an arbiter.' (J.) On this principle also rests the reply of Amasis, king of Egypt, who, when the Eleans were appointed to supervise the Olympic games and sent messengers to consult with him as to how they could conduct them in the most just manner, said to them, 'Let no Elean be entered in them.' Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xcv. Here belongs the disgraceful act of the Romans, who, upon being called upon to judge in a controversy between the people of Aricia and Ardea³, awarded the field to themselves. Livy, Bk. III, chap. lxxii. Add Justin, Bk. VIII, chap. iii, n. 15.

¹ [For adstringant read adstringant.—Tr.]

³ [For Arcea read Ardea.—Tr.]

² [For in terest read interest.—Tr.]

It follows also from this that there should be no pact or promise between the arbitrator and the parties, by reason of which the former is bound to overlook the merits of the case and pronounce in favour of one of the parties. (Compare Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 14.) Nor should there be any other reward for his decision than the verdict: 'He judged honourably.' Pliny, Panegyric [lxxx. 1]. And so it was idle of Maximilian and the Venetians to refer a case to Pope Leo X, while they each bargained separately and secretly that he would not render a decision to which they did not agree. Guicciardini, History of Italy, Bk. XI, towards the end; Bk. XII, p. 345.

Now although a pact is entered into between the contending parties and the arbitrator on his acting as such (for just as arbitration can be used only with the consent of the parties, so no one may be made an arbitrator against his will), yet no such power attaches to such a pact as to give rise to the obligation of the arbitrator whereby he is bound to give as his decision what appears to him just. And the reason for this is not so much that the law of nature in any event enjoins an arbitrator to render such a decision (and nothing can be added to the obligation of this law by a pact), as that in this way the purpose of seeking an arbitrator is made void, and things would run on for ever. For a pact of this kind would be so worded that the parties undertake their willingness to abide by the decision of the arbitrator, if he renders a just one. And those who enter a pact whereby nothing is taken from their natural liberty are so far equal that they can each question whether the other has satisfied the pact. But if, after the decree has been awarded, it should seem unfair to either party or actually were so, a dispute would again arise over its equity, and since it could be decided neither by the present arbitrator nor the parties concerned, it would have to be referred to another arbitrator. And when¹ a similar pact had been made with him, and a question arises over his decision also, another would have to be sought, and so on ad infinitum.

Therefore, it is clear that the pact by which parties agree upon an arbitrator should be conceived as pure, namely, that they are willing to stand by the decision of the arbitrator; and that it is not accompanied by the condition that he deliver a just decision. For in that case when one of the litigants questioned the equity of his decision, it would have to be referred to another to take cognizance of. And if his equity were questioned another arbitrator would have to be found, and so on ad infinitum. See Digest, IV. viii. 19, 32, §§ 15, 16. And this is the reason for the statement of Quintilian, Declamations, cccclxxii: 'One judgement cannot be rescinded by another.' Moreover, there can clearly be no appeal from arbitrators, since there is no superior judge who can review their decision. Lucian, Abdicatus [11]: 'They had the choice, there, of not recognizing the courts at the outset; if they nevertheless did so, they may fairly be expected to abide by its reward.' (F.) Pliny, Natural History, preface [x]: 'So does every one make him whom he has chosen 565 the chief judge of his cause.' And this holds good also in states, when parties have agreed among themselves on an arbitrator, provided the argument be over a case the manner of deciding which is of no interest to the rulers of the state. And if it be permitted anywhere to appeal from such decisions, that is due to positive law. Although sometimes in states the designation of arbitrators is accorded to extraordinary judges to whom is entrusted the examination and decision of some case closely and without the formalities of court usage. Yet nothing prevents the grant of an appeal from them to a superior.

¹ [For Quicum read Qui cum.—Tr.]

But the statement that one has to abide by the decision of the arbitrator, whether it be just or not, must be taken with a grain of salt. For just as we cannot refuse to stand by the decision which has been made against us, even though we had entertained higher hopes for our case, so his decision will surely not be binding upon us if it is perfectly obvious that he connived with the other party, or was corrupted by presents from him, or entered into an agreement to defraud us. For whoever clearly leans to one side or the other is unfitted further to pose as an arbitrator. See Digest, XVII. ii. 76 ff.

It is, furthermore, clear that if several are chosen to serve as arbitrators, there should be an uneven number, lest in case of disagreement there be a tie and the matter reach no decision.

5. Grotius, loc. cit., § 47, proceeds to observe that in choosing an arbitrator consideration should be given to the question whether he is taken as a judge, or as one with broader authority, who can temper his decision not so much according to strict law as to equity and humanity. For sometimes both parties appeal to justice, in which circumstance the force and merits of the case should be weighed by the arbitrator like a judge. But sometimes an arbitrator is appealed to when one party rests upon strict law, while the other demands its mitigation and remission on considerations of humanity and pity; that is, he appeals to equity. In this place equity does not properly signify the interpretation of laws, discussed in the preceding chapter, which should be observed even by a lower judge, but a mitigation of the law's rigour based upon the virtues of humanity, charity, mercy, and the like, which may be observed only by the supreme judge or an arbitrator appointed upon this law.

But in a matter of doubt it is presumed that an arbitrator is obligated to the rules which a judge must follow, since he is chosen because of the lack of a court and judge, and in a case of doubt we should follow the simplest course. Moreover, one is more easily injured if a broad power is granted an arbitrator rather than a more limited one. And to urge a mitigation of strict law is the first task of those who offer themselves to the disputants as mutual friends in order to settle their difference.

The further point is obvious, that, just as they who sit upon the law between citizens regularly follow civil laws to which the litigants are subject, so he who will judge between those who do not recognize common civil laws will take the natural law as his norm; unless the parties themselves shall have ordered their transaction according to the positive laws of some state.

6. The same author, loc. cit., § 48, also observes that arbitrators chosen by those vested with supreme power should pronounce on the principal point and not on possession, for decision on possession belongs to civil law, while by the law of nations the right of possession follows dominion. On that point our opinion is this: Although by the law of nature and nations it does not seem necessary that he who has been turned out of his possession should immediately be restored to it before further consideration is taken of his cause, especially when a decision of the case may follow at once, yet in many controversies the arbitrator must first learn which is the possessor, that he may know on whom falls first of all the burden of proof. For it is the plaintiff's task to state his case plainly, while the possessor need only meet his arguments, save that it is sometimes well, although not strictly required, for him to have 566 shown the title to his possession. Yet for this reason it is not enough for arbitrators only to have rendered decision on possession, because it is not usual for arbitrators to be called upon for this, which is commonly clear enough, but for bringing the principal point to an end, and in order to stop any further dispute. But natural law requires that during the inquiry no change should be made, and that, when the plaintiff does not prove his case, judgement should be handed down in favour of the possessor.

7. But arbitrators, properly so called, are not the same as mediators who voluntarily interpose between litigants and those who are preparing for or already engaged in war, and strive to move them by authority, reasons, and prayers to settling their affairs peaceably and composing their differences. See Guicciardini, History of Italy, Bk. IV, where it is discussed whether Hercules, Duke of Ferrara, should act as an arbitrator or mediator between the Venetians and the Florentines. Since these undertake so holy a task, it would be the height of inhumanity sternly to repulse them, even on the claim that they seem to have some special connexion with one of the parties. For it is within my power to accept what I will of their offerings, and it is recognized as the chief service of friends that, when they will not themselves join with me in the quarrel, they will endeavour to bring it to an amicable conclusion. And it is often much to the interest of the others that there be no war between two peoples, either because some sparks from a neighbouring fire may be carried to them as well, or because it may be prejudicial to them for one or both of the parties to be destroyed. So regard for their own safety induces them to undertake in all seriousness to smother the rising flame. And Christians should all the more zealously undertake to compose the quarrels of others, because even the Koran, so stupid in general, in the chapter On Doors, teaches that if two Moslem nations and countries engage one another in war, the rest shall make peace between them, and compel him who committed the injury to offer satisfaction; and when this is done, bring them by fair and good means to friendship.

It is certain that several who are especially interested in having the quarrel settled can enter a pact to co-operate in bringing together the combatants, and prescribe to one another how far each of them may join in the war. In which case it is required that no one of them is bound by a special treaty to give aid to either of the combatants in case of war, for promises by a former treaty cannot be circumscribed by a later treaty made with a third party.

Nay, it appears that this further step can rightfully be taken. Two or more to whose interest it is for the war to cease, upon weighing the cases of both sides, may agree on what terms they feel peace can be most fairly secured; and then they can offer these to the warring parties with a threat that, against him who refuses peace on those terms, they are ready to join arms with him who accepts them. For by such a course a man does not thrust himself in as an arbitrator upon another against his will, or undertake the decision of a quarrel by his own authority, neither of which natural liberty allows. Nor is such an arrangement offered the parties in the manner that they must stand by it entirely. But since by natural law a man is able to join arms with him who feels that an injury is being done him, especially when such an injury will entail some damage to himself as well, by such a method he openly declares that he is desirous of equity and peace, because he himself wants others to come to fair terms, and is unwilling to go to war before the other has rejected a friendly way of composing the quarrel. Add Livy, Bk. XLIV, chap. xix, at the end; Justin, Bk. VI, chap. vi, n. 1. And this manner of mediation is the more to be commended, the more 567 easily wars may thereby be extinguished, which would otherwise lead to destruction. Yet he who has decided to act as such a mediator should bear in mind the words of Velleius Paterculus, Bk. II, chap. 1: 'Massilia unseasonably assumed the arbitration between those great men in arms; a case in which such only ought to interpose as have power to enforce submission to their award.' (W.) Add Livy, Bk. IX, chap. xiv.

8. Common reason itself, upon observing the character of each case, sufficiently directs the form and process for arguments held before arbitrators, so that it would be tedious to prescribe in detail how the parties should set forth their pleas, how the state of the controversy should be framed, and how the decision should finally be pronounced, after the arguments of both sides have been set forth. It need only be observed that, when the case of either party cannot be proved otherwise than by documents, and these have been lost, the arbitrator can do nothing but put one of the parties under oath with the consent of the other. I say, 'with the consent of the other', for in natural liberty no one is bound to make his case depend upon the conscience of the other party. It is likewise within the power of the parties to try the fortune by lot or a duel, which was once common enough among many people.

Now the loss of documents and proofs does not of itself extinguish a right, although in a court of law it is useless to implore a judge, when the evidence which proves a right is lacking. But in natural liberty it suffices to pursue my right, if I myself am clearly convinced of it, however much another may deny it. Add Connestagio, De Unione Lusitaniae, Bk. V, p. 222. This is the point of the statement by Quintilian, Declamations, cccxii: 'The condition of mankind is miserable, for it seems to be necessary to have a witness for everything that we do; so truth has little weight, and honesty has no standing. A thing hardly seems to be established that is known by two persons.'

9. Arbitrators have this in common with judges, that, in questions¹ of fact, they should show themselves unbiased towards the simple and unsworn assertion of the parties, that is, when they assert contradictory things to be true, they should believe neither. But when proofs (see Suetonius, Galba, chap. vii) and reasons and authentic documents do not lead to the ascertainment of the truth, their decision will have to be based on the testimony of witnesses. For as Isaeus, Orations, vii [viii. 6], says: 'Documents are more convincing than testimony.' And again (Orations, iii) he shows that especially in questions of inheritance documents are weightier than witnesses. Philo Judaeus, De Decalogo [xxvii]: 'When there is a scarcity of demonstrations, either by reasons or by letters, then those who have questions in dispute betake themselves to witnesses.' (Y.) Add Law of the Visigoths, Bk. II, tit. iv, chap. 3.

Witnesses should not be so disposed toward either party that it can appear likely that they prefer favour, or hatred, and desire for revenge, above conscience. Ovid, Tristia, Bk. III, el. x [35-6]: 'Since there is no reward for a falsehood, the witness ought to be believed.' (W.) Add Law of the Visigoths, Bk. II, tit. iv, chap. 12. Here belongs what De Thou, Bk. LI, tells of how it was once recognized in England that the testimony of an Englishman against a Scotchman, or of a Scotchman against an Englishman, had no value, because of the hatred existing between the two peoples. Yet Camden, on the year 1585, says that this was true only of the English and Scotch along the border, so that only a Scotchman was accepted as witness against a Scotchman and only an Englishman against an Englishman, with the result that even if several Englishmen were at the spot and saw a murder with their own eyes, their evidence would be worthless, unless some Scotchman gave the same testimony.

¹ [For quaestiones read questiones.—Tr.]

Therefore, just as my opponent can reject my relatives, so I can rightfully reject my professed enemies. Although sometimes relatives
568 are excluded from testifying in a case because of humanity, lest they be forced to do violence to their affections or conscience. Therefore, among the Romans there was no power of the law or of a magistrate to force the testimony of a client against his patron, or of a patron against his client¹. Plutarch, Romulus [i, p. 25 B], and the Law of the Visigoths, Bk. V, tit. vii, chap. 11. In addition to this reason why among the same people slaves could not give evidence against a master, there was another, as given by Cicero, For King Deiotarus [xi]: 'When that which is in our houses and is our own can sally out with impunity and fight against us, slavery then gets the mastery, and the master's position is slavery.' (Y.) Lucian, Asinus [5]: 'For slaves know what is reputable and what is disreputable about their masters.' A similar passage is in Lysias, On the Sacred Olive Tree. And for this reason that slave in Plautus, The Bacchides, Act IV, sc. vi [791], says: 'I know I'm a slave. I don't even know what I do know.' (N.) Not foreign to this is the passage in Isocrates, Trapeziticus [27 f.], and one in Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander, chap. xvii. Here also belongs the history or rather tale about Avicenna in Gabrielis Sionita, De Urbibus et Moribus Orientalium, chap. iii. Add Law of the Visigoths, Bk. V, tit. iv, chap. 14, with which compare Bk. III, tit. iv, chap. 10; Bk.² VI, tit. iv, chap. 3; Capitularies of Charles, Bk. VII, chap. cclxxx; Edict of Theodoric, chaps. xlviii-xlix. But the abuse of this law, whereby some men used to purchase the slaves of others who were cognizant of their crimes, so that these slaves could not be put to torture in witness against them, was forbidden in an edict of King Theodoric, chap. ci. So also Aristotle, Politics, Bk. II, chap. vi [II. viii], rightly calls ἄλογον, or 'absurd', that law of the people of Cumae: 'If the accuser produce a certain number of witnesses from among his own kinsmen, the accused shall be held guilty.' (J.)

Finally, the ordinance of Numbers, xxxv. 30; Deuteronomy, xvii. 6; xix. 15, is most agreeable with reason, to this effect, namely, that the testimony of one person should not be enough to decide an issue, not only because a single person can more easily be deceived, or be tampered with, or lie, than can several, and because as Pliny, Natural History,

¹ [For clientes read clientem.—Tr.]

² [For I read L.—Tr.]

Bk. VIII, chap. xxii, says: 'There is no falsehood, if ever so barefaced, to which some cannot be found to bear testimony'¹ (B. & R.), but also because an able judge can discover the falsehoods of witnesses, if several are examined (Historia Susannae, line 51; Digest, XLVIII, xviii. 20), whereas, on the contrary, one can easily be consistent with himself. And although in this way some crimes may go unpunished in this world, and a few persons fail although their cause be just, because the thing in question was done under the eyes of but a single witness, yet this is far less inconvenient than for the other practice to be followed, and for the safety and fortunes of all to depend upon the impudence and cunning of one man, who might devise any kind of guile. For it is better that a few guilty go unpunished than that many innocent be condemned. Valerius Maximus, Bk. IV, chap. i, §§ 10-11.

Yet Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VII, chap. vi, notes that among the Jews the testimony of one man against a Gentile prevailed. Likewise, Grotius on Deuteronomy, xix. 16, observes that one witness was enough, not in establishing guilt, but in investigating a matter, and in forcing the defendant to take oath in affairs that involve money. Among the Moors at this time the testimony of two honourable men is sufficient, but when the witnesses are suspected, twelve are required, for they hold that as much faith lies in twelve men, whoever they may be, as in two. The further qualifications to be observed in witnesses are given in Digest, XXII. v. 2, 3, pr. §§ 1, 2, 3, 4; XXII. v. 4, 5, 9, 14, 21, 23, 24.

The Hebrews required that witnesses should be of good repute, and the right of testimony was forbidden the weak-minded, boys under thirteen years of age, thieves even after they had made restitution, those who live by gambling, publicans who require more than is just, goatherds, and all who habitually do things worthy of stripes. The testimony of one Turk who has made a pilgrimage to Mecca is equal to that of three others.² Christophe Richerius³, De Moribus Turcarum. To 569 which may be added Plautus, Truculentus [489]: 'Of more value is one eye-witness than ten hearsays.' (R.) Lucian, De Domo [xx]: 'Ears are less trusty than eyes.' (H.) Philo Judaeus, De Confusione Linguarum [xxvii]:

A law has been enacted among those nations which have the most excellent constitution, that one must not give evidence on hearsay, because by its own nature the tribunal of the sense of hearing is liable to be corrupted. (Y.) (Idem, De Judice [ii]): The eyes do indeed dwell with the very things that are done, taking hold of them as one may say, and comprehending and seizing upon them in all their parts, the light co-operating with them, by means of which all things are illuminated and clearly proved; but the ears [. . .] are less trustworthy than the eyes, inasmuch as they are not themselves present at the transactions, but are attracted by words as the interpreters of facts, which are not disposed to tell the truth. (Y.)

¹ [The original refers specifically to the Greeks.—Tr.]

² [This sentence is by oversight repeated, with, however, the correct reading at the end of solent for sunt.—Tr.]

³ [For Richeribus read Richerius.—Tr.]

Therefore, no value attaches to the testimony of those who follow another's word.

It should, finally, be added that although the oath of witnesses offers the strongest presumption of truth, yet in natural law nothing prevents a sworn witness from being accused of falsehood. And if the charge is proved, the decision based upon his false testimony comes to naught. This was allowed also by the Attic laws, which granted an action for false witness after the trial, as appears from many passages and especially Demosthenes, Against Euergus, 1 ff., at the beginning and passim. Add also Plato, Laws, Bk. XI, towards the end. But it would appear absurd to allow him against whom the sworn testimony was given to be able to make it void by opposing his own oath, since that would not only offer the widest opening to perjuries, but the controversy would also remain as much in the dark as before, because of the contradiction of the oaths. See Hebrews, vi. 16. Therefore, in keeping with its usual folly, the Koran, in the chapter On Light, unjustly commands that he who accuses his wife of adultery and has no witnesses to support him, should swear four times that he is telling the truth, and on the fifth time call down upon himself the curse of God if he is lying. While the woman will be clear if she also swears four times that her husband is lying, and on the fifth time calls down upon herself the wrath of God, if what her husband says is true.

10. There is no need that we add much on the execution of a judgement, since in a state of nature when another does not willingly fulfil what he owes, every man can force execution with his own strength and arms and those of his allies, and how far this may be carried will be shown more fully below where we shall treat of war. In this connexion it need only be pointed out that, in such an execution, I am not only made the owner of the thing awarded me, after I have in some way secured possession of it, but if I am unable to get hold of the thing itself, I can even seize something else of the same value (adding in at the same time the expenses incurred in the execution itself), with the effect that I become owner of it. For as Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 2, observes: 'Whenever expletive justice cannot acquire the same thing, it tries to obtain something of equal value, which, morally, is considered the same.'¹ (K.)

Yet it may further be said that by nature any possessions of a debtor who is obligated either by his contract, or by the thing itself, or because of an injury which he has done, are understood to be tacitly mortgaged for the debt, so that when he fails to pay the debt itself, they can be seized in its place. Nor is he to whom something is owed satisfied by the mere detention of the thing, since that is often more of a burden than an advantage, unless I can have the full disposal of the thing; nor is my right satisfied if I receive in place of the thing, the dominion of which should have been handed to me, the mere custody of another's possession. Yet a man should make known with what intention he seizes such things, whether he detains them in order that he may the more quickly secure his debt, or whether he intends to take them in payment. Nay, 570 it sometimes appears just that, after a man has got a thing into his hands, he should give the debtor an opportunity, if he so wishes, to pay his debt directly and so get the object back.

¹ [For quod morali aestimationi est idem read quod est morali aestimatione idem.—Tr.]

This method of execution is proper only to natural liberty, and is foreign to the nature of the civil state. See Digest, XLI. ii. 5; XLVII. viii. 2, § 18; IV. ii. 13; XLVIII. vii. 7, 8.

SAMUEL PUFENDORF
ON THE LAW OF NATURE AND NATIONS
BOOK VI

CHAPTER I

ON MATRIMONY

- | | |
|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The transition. 2. Matrimony the seedbed of mankind. 3. Whether there is any obligation to marry. 4. A wandering lust is opposed to natural law. 5. Mankind should not be propagated contrary to the laws of marriage. 6. What kind of an obligation to marry may arise from civil laws; 7. What may arise from natural law. 8. How far the civil law may rule upon marriage. 9. The irregular marriages of the Amazons. 10. The laws and rights of regular marriage. 11. The source of the power of the husband over his wife. 12. Whether that is immediately conferred by God. 13. Whether it necessarily involves the right of life and death. 14. Whether consent and not cohabitation consummates marriage. 15. It is unlawful for several to marry or lie with one woman. 16. The use of polygamy among many peoples. 17-18. Whether it is opposed to natural law. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 19. The most perfect form of marriage is for one woman to be joined to one man. 20. It is unlawful hastily to dissolve marriage. 21. Adultery and wilful desertion dissolve matrimony. 22. Whether intolerable habits are cause for divorce. 23. The opinions of some on the meaning of the law of God concerning divorce. 24. Especially those of Milton. 25. Physical fitness is required for marriage. 26. On error in marriage. 27. A woman married to one man cannot rightfully marry another. 28. Why marriage between blood kin is forbidden. 29. The reason for shame of one's private parts. 30. On nakedness. 31. The origin of natural shame. 32. Marriage between parents and children is wicked. 33. The opinion of the Hebrews on this. 34. On the marriage of brothers and sisters. 35. On the forbidden degrees. 36. On less common forms of marriage. |
|--|---|
-

571 OUR next task is to investigate, first, the origin and nature of human government; and, second, what precepts of the law of nature and nations presuppose it. But since government can be understood only among several persons, and it is established on the authority of the Holy Scriptures that only one human pair was created at the beginning, to which all other mortals refer their origin, we must, accordingly, before treating of civil government, consider matrimony, which is the source of families and furnishes, as it were, the material for the establishment of governments and states. For in the same manner as the human body is made up of several members, each of which considered by itself has the form of a body, so states as well are made up of lesser societies, of which some are called simple and primary, while some are a little more complicated, and usually pass under the name of associations. Of the societies of the first kind there are three: those of the husband, the father, and the master. And these are called simple, because they are not made up of other lesser societies, not because not more than two persons compose them, as is maintained by Iohannes Friderich Hornius, De Civitate, Bk. I, chap. i, § 2. For what prevents one father from having several children, and one master several servants, who, nevertheless, form a simple society no less than if there were but one son to one father, or one servant to one master? And that the first place in this discussion properly belongs to marriage is shown even by Plato, Laws, Bk. IV [p. 721 A]:

ATH. What will be our first law? Will not the legislator, observing the order of nature, begin by making regulations for birth?

CLE. Certainly.

ATH. And in all states the birth of children goes back to the connexion of marriage?

CLE. Very true.

ATH. Then, according to the true order, the laws relating to marriage should be those which are first determined in every state. (J.)

2. After mankind had become subject to death, the most wise Creator, lest either a new race should always have to be created, or the duration of so noble a species should lapse within a generation, contrived a distinction in sexes, endowed with the natural faculty of propagating themselves by joining their bodies. And that mortals should not fail to do this because of negligence or of the labours involved in the birth and rearing of children, He implanted in the sexes a mutual attraction and quick impulse for each other, as well as the deepest affection for their offspring, so that they willingly and joyfully undertake what alone can continue the family of mankind. And the result, as Bacon of Verulam, The Advancement of Learning, Bk. VII, chap. ii, observes, is that 'among the delights of animals the pleasure of generation is greater than that of feeding'. Seneca, Hippolytus, lines 466 ff.:

When he beheld the boundless greed of death,

The mighty father of the world ordained

A means by which the race might be renewed.

[. . .]

Suppose our youth should choose a mateless life,

And live in childless state: then all this world

Of teeming life which thou dost see, would live

This generation only. (M.)

3. The first point to be considered regarding marriage is whether men otherwise fitted for marriage are under any obligation to enter upon it and raise up offspring. For no less upon this than upon other things to which a man is borne by his natural appetite, such as self-preservation and the love and rearing of children, some men raise a doubt, as if they are not approved by natural law, maintaining that there was no need for nature to do so, since instinct and sense appetite alone sufficiently incite men to it. But, granted that natural instinct tends toward such things, it does not follow that the law of nature does not for that reason command them. In fact it appears from this very consideration that nature wishes them to be observed as carefully as possible, as directly leading to the preservation of mankind, while distrust-572 trusting, as it were, the mere dictate of reason she has ordered so violent an instinct to come to man's aid that he can only with difficulty make headway against it. Add Oppian, The Chase, Bk. III, lines 107 ff.; On Fishing, Bk. I, lines 702 ff. For how many men would want children, who often are a cause of grief, always of cares and labours, did not a person's natural inclination, over and above his reason, draw him to desire them? See Euripides, Medea, lines 1090 ff.; Hippolytus, lines 616 ff. Especially since it entails an act of no great consequence and familiarity with women, which to a wise man would be trivial as well as tedious, were it not for nature's delights. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. ii, § 1; Montaigne, Essais, Bk. III, chap. v, p. 137; Descartes, Les Passions, art. 90. We recognize that there is a great difference between natural instinct and the dictate of reason, that in any number of things they tend in different ways, and that the former, when struggling with the latter, must be controlled, and to do that gives evidence of no slight spirit. Yet although instinct alone carries no obligation of itself, it may happen that we are obligated to do something to which our instinct also inclined us. Nor is a mother free from sin against the law of nature, when she kills her child in order to avoid disgrace, and thus overcomes her instinct toward her child by another instinct, namely, that of fear of and escape from infamy, as is held by Graswinckel on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 11. For the life of the babe was guarded not only by the mother instinct but by law; and the mother should have recognized before the event that her infamy was of less consequence than the death of one whose existence was due to an act to which she herself had consented. Wherefore, if the care for her reputation meant more to her than the pleasure of copulation or the love of her own offspring, she ought to have been thinking about the matter before she took the man to herself. After the act, the child does not merit death, in order that the sin of the parent may go unobserved.

Finally, after marriage is once consummated, since fecundity does not lie within the power of human kind (compare Genesis, xxx. 1-2), he who becomes the parent of few children satisfies the law of nature as well as he who becomes the parent of many, while he whose wife bears him none at all has no cause to fear sin. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. II, cont. xiii [II. v. 7-8]:

Fruitfulness does not come at our pleasure, nor at the time fixed for it. Nature is answerable only to herself, and is not bound to human laws; sometimes she hurries and outruns our wishes, sometimes she is slow and delays them. [. . .] Nature does not reply as upon a formula, and chance does not follow prescription. No matter if a law does set a date, nature takes no notice of it.

4. But to proceed as clearly as possible, we hold it to be fully established, first of all, that those indulgences which have no other end than obscene gratification of the senses are not agreeable with natural law. For the stronger the stimuli by which men are drawn to venery, the more does natural law take care that they may not disturb the decorous order so necessary to the peace of society, rather that they contribute to knitting more closely the minds of men. And so no grace is accorded that vile practice of sodomy, a vice once so common among the Greeks that it appeared difficult to Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII [p. 839 A], in his ideal state, to restrain it by laws. Phocylides [188 ff.]: 'Do not hold sexual intercourse with animals. Nor disgrace a woman in shameless postures. Nor transgress the natural forms of copulation in illicit love. Nor let a man cohabit with brutes themselves. Nor let women imitate the intercourse of men.' Pliny, Bk. X, chap. lxiii: 'In the human race, the men have devised various substitutes for the more legitimate exercise of passion, all of which outrage nature; while the females have recourse to abortion. How much more guilty than the brute beasts are we in this respect.' (B. & R.) Add Aeschines, Against Timarchus. As Critias used to say: 'Among males the most beautiful sight is the female, and among females that of the opposite sex.' Dio 573 Chrysostom, Orationes, De Pulchritudine [xxi. 3].

It may be mentioned in passing that, although sodomy is forbidden by the Turkish laws, the Turks commonly so use the boys who are captured in war, claiming that every man can dispose as he pleases of what he captures in war. Scipio Ammiratus, Discursus, Bk. V, chap. v. On the other hand, the Peruvians regarded that vice as so detestable that, if a man in a quarrel threw it up to another, he was disgraced for several days because such a word had passed his lips. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. III, chap. xiii.

But since nature has contrived the regular union of the sexes not for their gratification but in order to propagate offspring, they offend against this purpose who find in it nothing other than a means to alleviate their desires. Martial, Bk. I, ep. xci [xc]: 'You have invented a prodigy worthy of the Theban riddle, that here¹, where no man is, should be adultery.' (K.) Some, indeed, believe that many peoples held it a part of natural liberty for the unmarried of both sexes to grant each other the use of their bodies, even gratis, for the mere gratification and pleasure, or for a set price. Thus Selden, Bk. V, chap. iv, shows from the Hebrew rabbis, that before the Mosaic law a maiden unmarried and still unbetrothed, was permitted to bestow herself gratis, or for a fee, without thereby consenting to cohabitation. But that after the Mosaic law was given, the intercourse of the unmarried was at once forbidden the Hebrews, so that from then on the circumcised could no longer go in to each other except in wedlock, either for a price or from pure desire, although in certain cases they did not hold it unlawful for a circumcised youth to lie with a pagan maiden. In favour of this they cite Deuteronomy, xxiii. 18; Leviticus, xix. 29; Genesis, xxxviii. 14; add Grotius on Genesis, xx. 9. Selden records that the reason given by Maimonides for holy people being forbidden the practice of prostitution was this: That the evils of contentions and rivalries which regularly arise from such licence, when not restrained by marriage, might be avoided, and that they might enjoy that advantage of a distinction and certain knowledge of families. There is no use of our calling upon the testimony of heathen writers. See Epictetus, Manual, chap. xlvii; Plautus, Curculio, Act I, sc. i [33 ff.]:

¹ [For Huic read Hic.—Tr.]

PHAED. Why, it's a pimp that lives there.

PAL. In that case nobody stops or forbids you to buy what 's in the open market, if you've got the cash. Nobody stops any one from walking along the public highway. Provided you don't make inroads on fenced-in preserves, provided you keep away from married women, widows, virgins, young innocents, and children of respectable families, love any one you want. (N.)

The youth in Quintilian, Declamations, xiv [2, 3], left himself no further height of impudence, who did not hesitate to bring a charge against his mistress that she had given him a hate potion, because of which he ceased to love her. He says in part: 'Yet I had enough to keep life and soul together; I had a modicum, enough to have afforded me lawful pleasure in my mean condition. And therefore I was always content with one and the same mistress, which is a certain sign of good husbandry even in a man's pleasure.' (W.*)

But it is quite clear that, if it were a universal rule that every one could regard his powers of procreation as given only for the exercise of wantonness, and should use them to this end alone, decency and peaceful relations could no longer exist among men. This is enough to prove that such excesses are condemned by natural law; for as Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v, § 46, says, 'Nothing can be established in accordance with right reason to which all cannot agree'.

Yet the dictate of natural law on this point was not so obsolete even among those peoples, when a kind of public security was enjoyed by that vice, as to lead them to approve a wandering lust and to free it from every mark of baseness. 'A prostitute is vile because she is a 574 prostitute' is the pronouncement of Ulpian, and it passed as the severest punishment for them to publish their calling by showing the licence for their lewdness before the aediles. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. II [lxxxv]: 'Vistilia, belonging to a praetorian family, had given in her name to the aediles, in accordance with the rule adopted by our ancestors who believed that wanton women would be sufficiently punished by the mere acknowledgement of their scheme.' (R.) But such customs were tolerated by the understanding, among the nations more inclined to venery, that the honour of matrons and virgins would be less exposed to attack. And it was the judgement of honourable men that, just as it was a special virtue to remain true to one's wife, so for loose women of the common sort to follow such a life was held a failing of youth, not so much to be defended as overlooked, as best one could, because of their unripe and vacillating age. See Cicero, Pro Caelio [xvi ff.]; Epictetus, *Manual*¹, chap. xlvii; add the extended treatment by Musonius in Stobaeus, Anthology, vi; and especially Grotius on Matthew, v. 27.

We may add in passing that among Mohammedans fornication with housemaids is held lawful, although the high-class Hindus are more chaste in such matters, holding even the slightest indulgence of this nature a great sin. Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. III. It is an interesting fact, given by Plutarch, On Noble Traits of Women [p. 249 DE], that among the people of Chios² there was no record of adultery or rape of a virgin for a period of seven hundred years; and yet the island was famous for women of singular beauty.

5. If one observes human nature one sees very clearly that it is not fitting for mankind to be propagated by indiscriminate intercourse unrestrained by law, even though one or both of the parties have in mind conception. Such a life the ancient inhabitants of Attica are said to have led before the time of Cecrops, cohabiting like animals without law, and if any woman conceived from such promiscuous intercourse, she offered her progeny to any one that was pleased to take it of those with whom she had cohabited. And when Cecrops had forbidden this barbarism by the introduction of laws on marriage, he was thereafter called two-formed either because he who had formerly known only his mother could now also claim a father, or because by the bond of marriage he made two unite, as it were, into one body. Athenaeus, Bk. XIII, chap. i [XIII. ii]:

But at Athens, Cecrops was the first person who married a man to one wife only, when before his time connexions had taken place at random, and men had had their wives in common. On which account it was, as some people state, that Cecrops was called διφύης (of double nature), because before his time people did not know who their fathers were, by reason of the numbers of men who might have been so. (Y.)

But who does not see how little man would differ from cattle, if there were no laws on marriage? Although even among not a few of the brutes one may see some signs of regular mating. Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. IX, chap. ii [64], remarks upon Vergil, Aeneid,

¹ [For Enchirid. read Enchirid.—Tr.]

² [Actually 'Ceos' in Plutarch.—Tr.]

Bk. IV [550]: ‘“Might I not have lived free from the nuptial couch, without a crime, like the savage herd?” Though Dido complains of marriage, yet her passion forces us to understand that she thinks life without marriage to be a life not for human beings, but for beasts.’ (W.) Consider what quarrels men would have over beautiful women. They would be much more common than among bulls, because these are not incited to passion except when a cow is in heat and she allows the male only once a year, while man is an animal always ready for the deed of love. Furthermore, is not such a promiscuity in generation unfitted to reproduce the species? For if a woman kept herself for one man alone, that would be a kind of marriage.

A further consideration is the weakness of a woman and her need of support in pregnancy. Yet what man would offer his support unless he were sure he was the father?—a matter of uncertainty apart from marriage. The rearing of the human species is likewise a matter of 575 labour and expense, for which a woman’s resources scarcely suffice. Yet what man would undertake the care of any but his own offspring, whom it is not easy to pick out when such free licence prevails? For what Aristotle, Politics, Bk. II, chap. ii, recounts of some peoples of Libya (who, perhaps, are the same as Nicolaus of Damascus, De Moribus Gentium [Stobaeus, Anthology, IV. ii. 25; also in Jakoby, Die Fragmente der Griechischen Historiker, under Nikolaus von Damaskos, 103 d], calls Limyrnians), how their wives were held in common, ‘but their children were distinguished by their resemblance’¹, is an uncertain kind of proof. Although Theocritus, Idylls, xvii [44], makes a proof of adultery on the part of a wife the fact that ‘the children do not resemble the husband’; while Horace [Odes, IV. v. 23], on the other hand, says, ‘Mothers win praise because of children like unto their sires.’ (B.)

Finally, since it is impossible to conceive of families without laws on marriage, and of states without families, and so on them rests all that decorous order which should prevail in the life of man, it is clear that without marriage men would lead a life of isolation little better than that of the beasts. Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode v [III. vi. 17 f.], well says: ‘Teeming with sin, our times have sullied first the marriage-bed, our offspring, and our homes; sprung from this source, disaster’s stream has overflowed the folk and fatherland.’ (B.) A further consideration is that without marriage, nearness of kinship could not be sufficiently established, and there could be no bequeathing of estates, the elimination of which would mean the loss of a great part of the advantages which either maintain or adorn the life of men. Here belongs what Justin, Bk. III, chap. iv, tells of the Spartan Partheniae who from fear of want, because they had no father to whose estate they might hope to succeed, left the land of their ancestors, although

¹ [For forma read formae.—Tr.]

Servius on Aeneid, Bk. III, line 551, and Lactantius, De Falsa Religione, chap. xx, record some variations from his account. Here too may be referred most of the arguments presented so generally against Plato's community of wives. Add Stobaeus, Anthology, lxxv. In Procopius, Persian War, Bk. I, chap. v, and Agathias, Bk. IV [xxvii], when the Persian king Cabades had by law ordered the promiscuous use of women, and made it lawful for any and every man to lie with a married woman, his subjects rose against him and drove him from the throne.

6. Since, therefore, it is clear that the propagation of the human species must be regulated by laws on marriage, if a decorous and duly organized social order is to be maintained, the next point to be examined is whether there exists for individual men who are fitted thereto in age and body, any obligation to enter upon marriage, and if so what its nature is. We find on all sides the laws of many peoples on this point.

According to Selden, Bk. V, chap. iii, the ancient Hebrews held that the divine law to 'increase and multiply' obligated all males to marry before the end of their twentieth year, unless a man were free from the keen stimulus of passions, and had devoted himself to the study of the law, or were physically unable to procreate; and that this command was laid upon all the descendants of Noah. They added that he who had lost his wife and left no child of either sex, who could continue the name (for an impotent son or sterile daughter did not pass as offspring), had not met that command; but that he whose son or daughter, though dead, had left children of either sex, was free from the command, since his grandchildren of either sex took the place of his own sons and daughters. But otherwise he who could have children was bound by it, when he had no children of either sex. Nor was the law met if a man married one too old or too young to bear, without at once taking to himself one that could. Leo of Modena, De Ritibus Hebraicis, Pt. IV, chap. ii, adds that while the divine law above mentioned was satisfied if a man had male or female¹ offspring, yet a man of suitable age and strength was no less required to marry, in order that he might avoid the danger of fornication. (And injunctions to much the same purpose are 576 given by Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [p. 930 c], where he goes on to say: 'Two children, one of either sex, shall be deemed sufficient in the eye of the law.' (J.)) But the Hebrews themselves were not entirely agreed as to whether that rule also applied to women. The most probable conclusion they could have drawn is that women were not obligated for any set period of time, since it does not lie in their power to marry whenever they wish, but that when the opportunity arose, they as well were obligated to do their part in propagating the human species. Finally, it is a saying among the same rabbis: 'Whoever disobeys the command to multiply mankind should be regarded as a murderer.' And yet there was within the same people the sect of the Essenes who avoided all contact with women; on whom see Pliny, Bk. V, chap. xvii; Solinus, chap. xxxviii.

¹ [For faemellam read foemellam.—Tr.]

Laws and sentiments to much the same effect are found also among other nations. The Lex Maenia,¹ given in Nonius, under the word Eunuchare, ran as follows: 'Whoever destroys his country, his greater parent, is guilty of crime. And any one does this, so far as he can, if he emasculates himself, or in any way puts off children,² that is, defers procreating children.' The opinions of Musonius, Hierocles, and Antipater³ may be seen in Stobaeus, Anthology, lxx. Add Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. vii, about the middle of the chapter. Pollux, Bk. III [48], περὶ ἀγάμων [On the Celibate], records 'suits for failure to marry and for late marriage' both at Athens and in Lacedaemon. Plutarch, Lycurgus [xv. 2], gives the following injunction of that lawgiver, to the effect that bachelors were forbidden to view the games of the young girls when they went naked; that by an order of the magistrate they had to march naked through the forum in the winter, singing a song against themselves to the effect that they deserved that punishment because they did not obey the laws; and that they were furthermore deprived of the honour and respect accorded old men by the youths. And the same writer in his Laconian Apophthegms [xiv] tells how a certain youth did not move from his seat before the famous Dercyllidas, who was, however, unmarried, saying: 'You have begotten no son who will some day give me his seat.' Phocylides [175 f.]: 'Remain not unwed, that thou perish not nameless; give something thyself to nature, and beget again even as thou wast born.' Plato, Laws, Bk. IV [721 B]:

A man shall marry between the ages of thirty and thirty-five, considering that after a sort the human race naturally partakes of immortality, of which all men have the greatest desire implanted in them; for there lives not a man who does not desire that he may be famous. Now, mankind is coeval with all time and immortal in this way, that they leave children behind them, with whom they are one in the unity of generation. And for a man voluntarily to deprive himself of this gift of immortality, as he deliberately does who will not have wife and children, is impiety. (J.*)

Add Ibid., Bk. XI. Cicero also in his On Ends, Bk. III, says that in order for a man to live according to nature, he should desire to take to him a wife and wish to have children by her. Baldaeus, De Idolatria Indorum, Art. II, chap. iii, reports of the Benjanites that they considered it a disgrace to be without children and incapable of having any: 'Such men', they say, 'are not worthy to be the first in the morning to look upon a man.' Thus at Rome the censors Camillus and Posthumius ordered those who arrived at a childless old age to pay a fine into the treasury, which was called uxorium (wife-tax). Valerius Maximus,

¹ [For Moenia read Maenia.—Tr.]

² [For Antipatri read Antipatri.—Tr.]

² [The text of the original is uncertain.—Tr.]

Bk. II, chap. ix; see Festus on the word uxorium and the comments of Joseph Scaliger. Plutarch, Camillus [ii], mentions the same thing. There is a fine passage from a speech by Metellus in Gellius, Bk. I, chap. vi:

If, Romans, we could do without a wife, we should all be without that source of vexation; but since nature has so ordered it, that we can neither live with them happily enough, nor without them by any means, we must consult for our lasting security, rather than a transient gratification. (B.)

Here belongs the statement of Strabo, Bk. VII [iii. 3, p. 296], that 577 Posidonius called the Mysians who live without women Abioi (men who do not live), since he held a single¹ life without mates was but half a life. On the Lex Papia Poppaea see Lipsius on Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III and Jacob Godefroy. This law the Christian emperors abrogated, probably at the instance of the clergy. See Code, VIII. lvii; and Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History,² Bk. I, chap. ix. An interesting speech of Augustus is given by Dio Cassius, Bk. LVI. Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk.³ VI, chap. vi, gives a law of the Spartans that he who had furnished the state three sons should be free from watch duties, and the man with five sons should be free from all public services and expenses. Add the full treatment of Hierocles in Stobaeus, Anthology, lxxiii.

It follows from these considerations that it is wrong to emasculate men, at least against their will, and a law of Domitian forbidding this merits praise. See Suetonius, Domitian, chap. vii. Statius, Sylvae, Bk. IV [iii. 13]: 'He who suffers not men to be unsexed.' (S.) Add Martial, Bk. VI, ep. ii. Casaubon on⁴ Suetonius, ibid., drawing from Justin Martyr, shows that after this edict a man who wanted to emasculate himself or another, regularly first asked permission of the emperor or the governor of the province. Add Deuteronomy, xxiii. 1; Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. IV, chap. viii; Digest, IX. ii. 27, § 28; Novels, cxlii, and the remarks by Denis Godefroy on Digest, XLVIII. viii. 4, § 2. Eusebius, De Praeparatione Evangelica, Bk. VI, chap. viii [10, p. 279 D]: 'In Syria and Osroene many used to castrate themselves in honour of Rhea, until King Abgarus ordered that all who mutilated themselves thus were to have their hands cut off also. From that time on no one castrated himself in Osroene.' Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. V, chap. xii [19]:

But to me, who look to nature, any man, with the full appearance of virility, will be more pleasing than a eunuch; nor will divine providence ever be so unfavourable to its work as to ordain that weakness be numbered among its excellences; nor shall I think that an animal is made beautiful by the knife, which would have been a monster if it had been born in the state to which the knife has reduced it. Let a deceitful resemblance to the female sex serve the purposes of licentiousness if it will, but licentiousness will never attain such power as to render that, which it has rendered valuable for its own purposes, also honourable. (W.)

¹ [For celibem read caelibem.—Tr.]

³ [For I read l.—Tr.]

² [For Trist. read Hist.—Tr.]

⁴ [For add. I read ad. l.—Tr.]

The account of how Hermotimus revenged himself upon Panionius, by whom he had been emasculated, may be read in Herodotus, Bk. VIII [cvi]. Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VII [lviii f.], shows why the kings of the Orient preferred to have eunuchs in their service. To which may be added the further reason that the kings could succeed to their estates with less envy, since they were childless. Heliodorus, Ethiopica, Bk. VII [VIII. 17]: 'At the Persian court the eunuchs are the eyes and the ears; they have no children and no kinsmen to warp their fidelity, but it attaches itself to him only who has entrusted himself to them.' Claudian, Against Eutropius, Bk. I [187-8]: 'Being a eunuch also he is moved by no natural affection and has no care for family and children.' (P.)

But since it was believed that eunuchs were particularly cruel they were not permitted by the Jews to act as judges. Grotius on Deuteronomy, xvi. 18. It is likewise a common saying in India that animals when gelded become docile, but that emasculated men usually become far worse, more proud and intolerable. We may note in passing another remark by Heliodorus, ibid., Bk. IX [25]: 'Eunuchs have an element of jealousy in their nature; the fact that they themselves are deprived of something acts as an obstacle to prevent others¹ from enjoying it.'

Some have also observed that the number of men is greater than that of women, or at least equal, and that is the reason eunuchs were made in those countries where one man is allowed to have several wives. Others, however, think that eunuchs were first introduced by the laws of war, in that the victor, who might have killed his foe, took from his 578 captives in this way the very heart of their private interests and affections, and so could with greater security entrust them with the guardianship of his property.

7. But when one considers natural law alone, it is apparent that marriage is the foundation of social life, and that men are also obligated to enter into it, in so far as they are bound to all things which necessarily serve that end, yet as an affirmative precept, indefinite and indeterminate, and which does not lie upon a man necessarily and at all times; for affirmative precepts require the opportunity for their performance. Now the opportunity for marriage is understood to depend not alone on proper age or likelihood of offspring, but also on fitness of condition, as well as the means to support a wife and children, and that the man be fitted to play the part of the master of a household. Pliny, Letters, Bk. I, ep. xiv:

When I reflect upon the prevailing manners of the age, and even the laws of Rome, which rank a man according to his possessions, I feel that they certainly claim some regard; and, indeed, where children and many other circumstances are to be duly weighed, this is an article that well deserves to be taken into account. (B.*)

¹ [For altis read aliis.—Tr.]

Add the speech of M. Hortalus in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. II [xxxvii]. The laws of Iceland forbade marriage between the very poor. See Arngrimur Jonsson, De Islandia, chap. viii.

Sometimes also the condition of the times, and a function which we are performing, allow no consideration of marriage. See I Corinthians, vii. 26. Therefore, it is not only unnecessary, but stupid as well, for youths to turn their minds to wives when they can promise themselves and their family nothing more than extreme hunger, and will only fill the state with beggars, or when they have little more sense than boys. Indeed, they do well who defer marriage that they may the better as celibates cultivate the mind and prepare themselves to render outstanding services to society—things made somewhat difficult for the married by the customs of the state or the ways of womankind. Furthermore, since marriage is called for, first, in order that the human species may be preserved through offspring, and, second, that wandering lust may not defile the dignity of society, it appears that if neither ¹ of these ends is going to be impaired, no criticism should be made of the celibacy of those who see that in all probability they will serve mankind and their state better in the celibate life, the continence of which they feel they can maintain, than if they married. And so if any man is so loftily endowed that he either does not feel the shafts of love, or lightly wards them off, 'a lover of not loving', as Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. VIII, chap. iii [VIII. vii], says, and if he can show himself a useful citizen of the world by serving it in some other way than leaving it his offspring, surely it should not be held that he is obligated by nature to make the charms of women an obstacle to his worthy purposes. Add Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. xxii, pp. 311-12, ed. Wolf, and Cornelius Nepos, Epaminondas, chap. x. Especially since there are but few with such control of mind and body that they can forgo the desire for posterity and the attractions of women, and maintain an unstained chastity.

Much less should those persons fear reproach who, already given children by one marriage, refuse to bring to them a harsh stepmother or stepfather, when for their children that means some deprivation, and as for themselves, they have fulfilled the design of marriage and can easily do without another spouse. Although the law of Charondas in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. xii, seems excessively harsh, for he excluded from the public councils of the state those who had brought home a stepmother to their children:

For he judged that a man could never advise his country well, who was so imprudent in his own family; for men that were once well married, ought to rest satisfied with such a happiness; and such as are unfortunate in their first match, and yet against their own experience commit a second fault of the same kind, justly deserve to be noted for fools. (B. *)

¹ [For neuter read neuter.—Tr.]

Yet the children of a former marriage do not always fare badly by a second; and he who has experienced a happy marriage is desirous of a like felicity, while he who has not fared so well hopes for gentle zephyrs after the gale. There are some lines of an unknown poet in the Anthology, Bk. I [IX. 133]: 'He who has mated once and seeks a second couch, ventures forth, like a man once wrecked, a second time upon the grievous deep.' This Henricus Stephanus has countered with a no less pointed couplet: 'He who has mated once and seeks a second couch is not deserving of our censure: if the first wife prove bad, perhaps the second will not; while if she was good, he may have excellent hope the second time as well.' Add also Charron¹, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xlv, n. 2-3; Bacon, Essays, chap. viii.

But it may happen, on the other hand, that, in addition to the common obligation to marry, a man may be led to marriage for some special reason. Suppose a reigning house is reduced to a single member; that sole survivor will stand under a special obligation to seek the legitimate propagation of his line, both to avoid the danger of an interregnum, and because the line of Euripides, Iphigenia among the Taurians [57], applies especially to royal houses: 'Seeing the pillars of a house be sons.' (W.) And what we have just set forth on the obligation to marry is more agreeable with the nature of things than the loose generalization of Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. vi, § 9: 'Since the earth is already well stocked with human beings, a man is free to live as he pleases, single or married.'

8. We must judge from that which has been said so far, as to what power belongs² to civil laws to tighten or to loosen the necessity of marriage. Now it is incontrovertible that a civil lawgiver can by his authority require marriage of those who are fitted for it in age and in body, and who have the means to support themselves, a wife, and offspring. For to force a man to beget children to no hope but that of hunger is inhuman, and to fill a state with a crowd of beggars is improvident. On this point the laws already mentioned bear, although it appears more mild in such a matter to make use of rewards or deprivations of certain advantages than of positive penalties. Here belongs the Roman 'right of three children'; likewise the Spartan law given by Aristotle, Politics, Bk. II, chap. vii [II. ix]: 'The father of three sons shall be exempt from military service, and he who has four from all burdens of the state.' (J.) Thus the Persian kings every year gave rewards to those who had begotten a large number of children. Strabo, Bk. XV [p. 504].

It is no less clear that it would be not only an unjust but a foolish law, were a ruler to undertake to forbid marriages to all his citizens; or if, for example, he should allow it only to the first born, and enjoin celibacy upon all the younger children. See Digest, XXIII. ii. 19. For it is not possible that all of them would be fitted by nature to maintain an unstained celibacy; nor would this be a method of limiting the increasing number of citizens much milder than that most cruel custom of antiquity, familiar enough to the Greeks, of exposing a new-born child, or that of causing abortion, which is recommended by Aristotle, Politics, Bk. VII, chap. xvi.

¹ [For Charon read Charron.—Tr.]

² [For comperat read compelat.—Tr.]

But if it has been discovered that some office in a state can be far better served by an unmarried than by a married person, nothing seems to prevent the civil laws from allowing only unmarried men to fill it, with the choice of leaving it if a man regards the office as of less worth to him than a wife; provided there be as great a supply of such men who are endowed with the faculty of living a chaste life, as the office requires. For it is presupposed that no excuse be thereby found for wandering lusts, and that no violence be done any man's nature (since no man¹ who does not feel himself fitted is required to undertake the office); and, finally, that it be seen to that the number of offspring be sufficient.

In the same way, for instance, an ambassador, general, or soldier may be forbidden to take his wife out of the country with him, or upon a dangerous expedition. See Digest, I. xvi. 4, § 2; Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III, chaps. xxxiii–xxxiv. Pliny [Natural History], Bk. VI, chap. xxii, writes of the inhabitants of Taprobane (a passage quoted by Solinus, chap. lxvi):

Their king is chosen by the people, an aged man always, distinguished for his mild and clement disposition, and without children. If after he has been elected king, he happens to become the father of children, his abdication is the consequence; this is done that there may be no danger of the sovereign power becoming hereditary. (B. & R.)

Since, likewise, the obligation to marriage is indeterminate and enjoys some latitude, the civil law will be allowed to set the time and age of the persons who would marry. So a provision of the Lex Papia Poppaea ran: 'Let no man sixty years of age, nor a woman of fifty, marry; nor any man under sixty a woman of fifty',² which was abrogated by Justinian, Code, V. iv. 27. Thus Plato, Republic, Bk. V [p. 460 E ff.], set the age of parenthood for women from twenty to forty, and for men from thirty to fifty-five. Add Aristotle, Politics, Bk. VII, chap. xvi, with the comments by Michael Piccart; Tacitus, Germany, chap. xx. Among some peoples a man is not allowed to marry until he has performed some deed of valour against the enemy. Thus, according to Strabo, Bk. XV [ii. 14, p. 727], no man of the Carmanians married 'until he had brought to the king the head of an enemy'. Add also Abraham Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pt. I, chap. xi.

Finally, although it belongs to natural liberty for a man to be able to marry whom he pleases, it will still be permissible, if it shall appear to be to the advantage of the state, for the civil power to stipulate, for instance, that a citizen shall not marry a woman of foreign extraction, or a nobleman a plebeian. Arrian, Indica [xii], writes that among the Indians a law forbade marriages between the castes into which the people were divided, and that, for instance, a farmer could not marry the daughter of an artisan, and vice versa. The same is found in Hieronymus Osorius, De Gestis Regis Emanuel., Bk. II.

¹ [For memo read nemo.—Tr.]

² [The precise wording of this law has been a subject of much dispute.—Tr.]

So also the civil law can ordain that marriages may not be consummated except through the offices of the public authority, especially between those who are of considerable consequence in the state. The force of this and similar laws can be that any marriage contrary to their ordinances may be deprived of certain effects designated by the civil law, or even be declared utterly null and void. Thus in Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. xxxvi, 'The Campanians [. . .] petitioned that they might be allowed to take in marriage women who were citizens of Rome, and that any who had, heretofore, married such might retain them, and likewise that children born of such marriages, before that day, might be legitimate, and entitled to inherit.' (M.) Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. VI [i], gives a decree of the senate upon the approach of a Latin war, whereby Latin women married to Romans and Roman women married to Latins, could remain at their husbands' homes, or depart to their respective countries, leaving with their husbands their male children, but taking with them their unmarried daughters. And it is added that almost all the Roman women left their husbands and returned to Rome, but the Latin women, with but two exceptions, remained in Rome holding their husbands dearer than their native land. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. xxxv: 'Suppose that I have promised you my daughter in marriage, that then you turn out to be a foreigner, and that I have no right of intermarriage with foreigners; in this case the law by which I am forbidden to fulfil my promise, forms my defence.' (S.)

- 581 9. Our next task is to inquire through what kinds of articles a marriage pact is sealed by natural law, and what kind of right is thereby acquired by each party to it. We presuppose at the outset that by nature all individuals have equal rights, and no one enjoys authority over another, unless it has been secured by an act of himself or of the other. For although, as a general thing, the male surpasses the female in strength of body and mind, yet that superiority is of itself far from being capable of giving the former authority over the latter. Therefore, whatever right a man has over a woman, inasmuch as she is his equal, will have to be secured by her consent, or by a just war. Yet since it is the most natural thing for marriages to come about through good will, the first method is more suited to the securing of wives, the second to that of handmaids. And so those who wish to join themselves to women who have been captured in war and reduced to slavery, have usually laid aside the harshness of the master's authority over slaves. Add Deuteronomy, xxi. 10 ff.

If now we conceive mankind as constituted in natural equality and liberty, it may happen that a woman no less than a man may desire to secure offspring over whom she may acquire a right. To gain this end a man and a woman must make a pact to give each other the service of their bodies. If this pact be but a simple one, looking only to the procreation of offspring, and has no added convention on continued cohabitation, it will confer no authority of the one over the other, and neither will secure a right over the other, except to require the service of the body for the conception of offspring, which will be under the power of the mother, if the pact set forth that she is seeking offspring for herself and not for her husband.

Such a marriage, irregular and simple though it be, you may call that practised by the Amazons, if what is told of such a people be in general true. The account is questioned by Arrian, Anabasis of Alexander, Bk. VII [xiii]; Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. IV; Palaephatus, De Fabulosis Narrationibus [De Incredibilibus], Bk. I [xxxiii]. See Jornandes, History of the Goths, chap. viii; Justin, Bk. II, chap. iv. Although Diodorus Siculus, Bk. II, chap. xlv, relates that these women forced men to perform the services of slaves or of handmaids; something like what the same author, Bk. III, chaps. liii and lv, recounts of a certain people of Libya, which was afterwards destroyed by Hercules [lv]: 'For it was a thing intolerable to him [. . .] to suffer any nation to be governed any longer by women.' (B.) Thus in Curtius, Bk. VI, chap. v, Thalestris undertook to conceive of Alexander, and the Queen of Sheba of Solomon (if the story of some is true), not a spurious but a legitimate issue. Eduardo Lopez, De Regno Congo, Bk. II, chap. ix (add Francisco Alvarez, Descriptio Aethiopiae, chap. cxxxiii), relates that in the kingdom of Monomotapa some excellent regiments are composed of women who dwell apart in territories granted them by the king, and at a set time make use of such men as they choose, to their liking, for begetting offspring. If the offspring be girls, they keep them for training in the arts of war, but the boys are returned to their fathers. Add Isaac Vossius, De Nilo, chap. xix. Perhaps we should refer here what is told by Michael Glycas, Annals, Pt. II [p. 270 ed. Bonn]: 'Among the Agileans the women exercise authority over men, and play the whore without being subject to the jealousy of their husbands; they farm and build houses, and work at everything that men do.' Now although such mating savours somewhat of barbarism and almost beastliness, yet it is clear that there are marriages also among the most advanced peoples, in which either no authority is yielded one over the other, or the husband himself is subject to the full civil authority of the wife. A case of this nature is when women who have crowns of their own, take to themselves husbands, without relinquishing their full authority over the state.

- 582 See the terms of marriage between Philip II and Mary, queen of England, in Thuanus, Bk. XIII, on the year 1553-4; and that of Mary, queen of Scotland, in idem, Bk. XX, on the year 1558, and Bk. XXXVII, at the beginning. Add also Juan Mariana, History of Spain, Bk. XXIV, chap. v. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xxvii, writes that it was a custom of the Egyptians in honour of Isis 'that they honour a queen, and allow her more power and authority than a king; and in their contracts of marriage authority is given to the wife over her husband, at which time the husbands promise to be obedient to their wives in all things'. (B.) Add also Guicciardini, History of Italy, Bk. VI, p. 178, where he describes the joint administration of Castile by Ferdinand and Isabella.

10. But we may take leave of these irregular marriages and turn to such as square more precisely with the condition of human nature. Now without question it agrees better with the endowment of both sexes, that the marriage pact commence with the husband, and that the husband court the wife, not the wife the husband. For although it is the practice, in some places, for the kinsmen of a maiden to make the approaches to young men, and offer them her hand, yet that is done for no other purpose than to engage the youth to fix his choice upon her as his wife.

This being established, it is surely patent that a man desires for himself legitimate offspring, not supposititious or adulterous. Therefore, the maiden should, before all else, plight her faith to the man to grant no one but him admission to her bed. Therefore, what Aloysius Cadamustus, Navigatio, chap. lxxv, recounts of the king of Calicut, is abhorrent to all reason and the common affection of men. He writes: 'The king has two wives, who are constantly attended by and cohabit with ten priests; and they boast of this as a great virtue of the king, giving him no other title of greater honour than that his wives accept the embraces of priests. Yet the issue of these priests never succeed to the throne, that being reserved to the nephews of the king by his sister.' A similar account is in Ludovicus Romanus, Navigatio, Bk. V, chap. vii. Indeed, Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. III, ep. vii, says that the general practice among that people is for wives to be held in common; and for that reason the fathers take little care of their children, and all inheritance follows the maternal line. Vile enough also are the practices of the Colchians as described by Busbecq, Letters, iii. An offensive law of Evenus III, king of Scotland, is given by Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. IV, to the effect that 'the king should be allowed to be the first to consummate the marriage of the nobles, and the nobles that of the common sort; and that the wives of the latter were always at the beck of the nobility.' But later Malcolm III, moved by the prayers of his wife Margaret, altered this so that the husband could purchase this right to the first night by the payment of a half a mark of silver, which fee is called to this day the 'marchets of women'. Idem, Bk. VII; Polydorus Virgilius, Historia Anglica, Bk. X. Compare Suetonius, Caligula, chap. xl, at the end, and the comment of Boxhornius. Even to this day in the kingdom of Pegu and Aracam, it is said, the bride is deflowered by one of the wedding guests, although it is a capital offence for him to be apprehended with her a second time. Louis di Barthema, Itinerary, Pt. II, chap. xi; on the inhabitants of the province of Caniclu see Paul of Venice, Bk. II, chap. xxxviii.

It is furthermore obvious that nothing is more foreign to a decorous social order than a wandering and desultory life that knows no fixed abode or seat of fortune, without which civil life is scarcely imaginable. And so Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VII [v. 56], rightly says of one's fireside: 'For there is no spot on earth more sacred, more sweet, or more dear than that.' (M.) Add Aristotle, Economics, Bk. I, chap. iii. Again, the rearing of a common offspring is most conveniently conducted by the united efforts of both parents, whose souls are bound more closely to a mutual love by the existence of such as a pledge. Genesis, XXIX. 32. The statement is made in Lysias, Orations, i [6]: 583 'After a child was born to me I put all my trust and confidence in it, because I felt this to be the firmest bond of our union.' Seneca, *Hercules Oetaeus*¹ [407]: 'Children often win a husband's love.' (M.) Besides, continued cohabitation furnishes the maximum of joy to couples that are well mated, and by it a husband can be surer of the chastity of his wife, than if he dwell apart from her, and depends only upon her given pledge. Therefore, a regular and consummated marriage, and one best suited to natural reason and the uses of civil life, includes in addition to a pact of chastity, the further condition that a wife shall always live at her husband's side, and so unite with him into the closest society of life and into the same family, for the more convenient rearing of offspring and for mutual help as well as recreation. [To which there is understood as added a mutual promise of such a manner of conduct as the nature of that society requires.]² Demosthenes, Against Neaera [122]: 'Wives we keep to bear us legitimate children and be our faithful housekeepers.' (K.*) Add Xenophon, Economics; and Columella, On Farming, Bk. XII, Preface. Here belongs the belief that the custom among the Chinese for women to bind their feet so closely as to be unable to walk without great pain, was to the end that they should not learn to wander about in the public ways, but to stay at home. Compare Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. III, chap. xxviii. Plutarch, Conjugal Precepts [xxxiv]:

¹ [For Octavo read Oetaeo.—Tr.]

² [Added, at Barbeyrac's suggestion, from the De Officio Hominis et Civis, II. ii. 4.—Tr.]

Now, as the physicians say, that liquids are the only bodies which most easily intermix without any difference of propriety or respect with another; so should it be said of people joined together in matrimony, that there is a perfect mixture of bodies and estates, of friends and relations. Therefore, the Roman law prohibits any married people giving and receiving mutual presents one from another; not that they should not participate one with another, but to show that they were not to enjoy anything but what they possess in common. (G.)

Quintilian, Declamations, ccxlix:

It is by marriage, as you know, that the state is maintained, and nations, and children; furthermore, succession to patrimonies, different grades to inheritances, and domestic security. For otherwise how shall we go abroad, how leave the house to go into the fields and cultivate them, what security will we feel in undertaking public commissions, or leaving for military service?

Seneca, Octavia [189 ff.]:

The fire of youthful passions glows at first
With heat impetuous; but soon abates,
And vanishes like flickering tongues of flame.
Unhallowed love cannot for long endure;
But pure and lasting is the love inspired
By chaste and wifely faith. (M.)

The reasons are easily drawn, from what has been said, why it belongs to the husband to decide on their place of dwelling: because, namely, he received the wife into his family, not vice versa; and he is constituted its head and director. Although no man would in all likelihood be so harsh as not to confer with his wife as well on such a matter, especially if he is indebted to her for some part of his wealth.

Another obvious conclusion is, that, if the marriage pact is to continue unimpaired, a wife cannot go abroad or dwell apart without her husband's permission, or deny him her embraces without sufficient reason.

Upon these considerations rest that presumption that every child is held to be from its mother's husband, or why a child is in the eyes of the law what the marriage of his mother shows that it is, unless such presumption is removed by weightier arguments. See Gellius, Bk. III, chap. xvi; Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VII, chap. v. Although the English laws are too favourable to women, in that they force the husband, even though he has been absent several years, to acknowledge as his a child born in the meantime to his wife, provided he has for that period not left the island. Edward Chamberlayne, The Present State of England, Pt. I, chap. xvi. And this for the reasons that the wife gave her husband her word on this very point, which she is presumed to keep, and that the authority lies with him to guard his wife's chastity. For it is assumed that any man makes a normal use of his own right and power. Gyges says in Herodotus, Bk. I [viii]: 'Each man should look on his own.' (M.) Here belongs the account of Plato, Alcibiades, chap. i [p. 121 B C]:

The wives of the Spartan kings are under the observation of the Ephori, who are public officers, and watch over them, in order to preserve the purity of the Heracleid blood. And the Persian king far surpasses them; for no one ever entertains a suspicion that a prince of Persia can have any other father. Such is the awe which invests the person of the queen, that she needs no other guard. (J.) 584

Therefore, it is not without every reason, that, in the eyes of the common sort, some disgrace is held to attach to husbands from the loose ways of their wives, because they would not use their power through their own carelessness or faintheartedness. Add Descartes, Les Passions, art. 169. And Domitian was right in striking the name of a Roman knight off the jury lists, because he had received back his wife whom he had divorced on a charge of adultery. Suetonius, Domitian, chap. iii [viii]. And by the Athenian law a man who still kept his wife after she had been taken in adultery, lost his citizenship. Demosthenes, Against Neaera [52]. Add Digest, XLVIII. v. 29 pr., 2,¹ § 6. According to Tacitus, Annals, Bk. II [lxxxv. 3]: 'Vestilia's husband, Titidius Labeo, was called upon to explain how it was that, though the guilt of his wife was notorious, he had failed to put in force against her the penalties of the law.' His excuse was: 'The sixty days allowed him to make up his mind had not expired.' (R.) Although there are those who base the reason for this disgrace on the fact that it appears a shameful thing for a man to lack those endowments which could deserve his wife's love, or preserve her promise. And yet those who cannot remedy that misfortune, or see unfortunate consequences following upon the punishment of the guilty wife, may find it their safest course to follow the advice of Euripides, Hippolytus [465 f.]:

The maxim this

Of wise men that dishonour be not seen. (W.)

Add Plutarch, De Tranquillitate Animi, p. 467 E F. And the remark of Charron², De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxix, n. 11, cannot always hold good, namely, that to throw up to a husband the misconduct of his wife as his own disgrace, is one of the foolish ideas of the common sort; as if he who had no power to find a remedy should atone for another's sin.

That such marks of reproach, which the common sort throw up to husbands, are not new, or employed alone by Western peoples, is shown in Nicetas Acominatus, De Imperio Andronici, Bk. II, where he tells how the emperor had some unusually large horns of stags which he had killed, hung on the gates of the market-place as though to call attention to the number of beasts he had taken, but actually to censure the morals of the state and the looseness of the women. Yet just as she cannot be called an adulteress, who unwillingly and despite her struggles fails a victim to another's lust (see Decretum, II. xxxii. 5. 2 ff.), so it does not appear disgraceful for a man to keep such a victim as his wife. Although the action of David in 2 Samuel, xx. 3, is worthy of our approval.

¹ [For '1. 1' read '2'.—Tr.]

² [For Charon read Charron.—Tr.]

11. A further subject for investigation is, whether, by the mere law of nature, in consequence of a principal pact of a completed marriage, there necessarily results a sovereignty, or dominion, properly so called, of the husband over the wife. In Holy Writ, indeed, the will of the wife is said to be subject to her husband, and the latter is expressly constituted her master. But since this is said to have been enjoined upon a woman by way of punishment, it can be looked at as a command only of positive law. Now in deducing the natural law on this point, it will have to be observed, first of all, that he who is obligated to obey the will of another in some kind of business, does not at once become subject to him, since the former status can arise also from a simple pact. For there are many pacts, particularly those of 'gift for work' and 'work for work', where, at the outset, the parties enjoy equal freedom of choice whether they would enter them or not. Yet after such a pact is entered upon, one of the parties must follow the will of the other in the business agreed upon, and not vice versa. Therefore, although in matters peculiar to marriage the wife is obligated to adapt herself to the will of the husband, yet it does not at once follow that he necessarily has power over her in other acts as well.

Furthermore, the end of marriage is not like that of states, which is 585 the defence and security of men, for the society so formed consists of too few members for their united strength to be able to furnish mutual security. How much defence, indeed, can come from union with a woman? No, marriage has as its end the propagation of mankind. Therefore, just as states are unimaginable without sovereignty, so it appears that marriage may be sustained by a mere pact, and affection without sovereignty. And yet a family by itself does have at first glance some similarity to a state, for when a wife is received into it, it appears that she should submit to its regimen, since it would be unusual for it to have two heads, or for a person to be in it and yet not subject to its head. But the reply may be made that families, and especially those with a large establishment, may have a twofold end, one common with that of states, the other peculiar to itself. The common end is discernible in defence and security resulting from the union of several persons. And although this requires sovereignty, yet since the wife makes little contribution to that end, it can suffice for the unity of a family if she be joined to her husband by a simple pact and a degree of friendship. Thus Abraham exercised sovereignty or authority over the rest of his household, and yet he appears to have held Sarah in no other than sisterly equality. See Genesis, xvi. 2, 5, 6; xxi. 10-12. Yet her respect for her husband is especially commended in Sacred Scripture, because she called him Lord. 1 Peter, iii. 6.

The special end of marriage, likewise, seems easily enough obtainable, even though neither of the parties should exercise over the other real sovereignty, such as includes the right of life and death, and a very rigorous restraint; but mere affection and a pact may unite the couple. Yet since the position of the husband is better, inasmuch as he enjoys the superiority of his sex, that pact partakes of the nature of an unequal league, in which the husband and wife each owe the other something, the former protection, the latter obedience. Martial, Bk. VIII, ep. xii [3-4]: 'The mistress of the house should be subordinate to her husband, for in no other way, Priscus, will the wife and husband be on an equality.' (A.) Pliny, Panegyric [lxiii. 4 and 7]: 'Many have been prevented from passing as great men because as husbands they have been second rate.' Yet there is nothing repugnant to natural law in a wife being subject to the actual sovereignty of the husband, for the fear of supreme authority and conjugal affection are no more mutually destructive than does the sovereignty in a prince of itself destroy the love of his citizens. And this sovereignty can not only be acquired by individual citizens through being added by a pact to the marriage contract, but it can also be sanctioned among entire nations by public law. Caesar, Gallic War, Bk. VI [xix], writes of the Gauls that they had over their wives, as well as over their children, the 'right of life and death'. Among the Germans husbands were allowed with their own hands to punish their wives for adultery (Tacitus, Germany, chap. xix); and this was to be meted out by virtue of their sovereignty, not as a means of indulging their wrath. About servants the same writer adds [xxv]: 'If they kill a slave, it is not usually to preserve strict discipline, but in a fit of fury, like an enemy, except that there is no penalty to be paid.' (H.) Gellius, Bk. X, chap. xxiii, gives us a portion of a speech by Cato:

A husband (says he)¹ when he puts away his wife, judges his own cause as a censor, and has, it seems, entire control in the matter. If she has committed any perverse or disgraceful act, she is fined; if she has drunk wine, or contaminated herself by intercourse with another man, she is condemned. (Likewise) if you shall have caught your wife in adultery, you may kill her without any legal process; but she, should you be guilty of the crime, must not presume to touch you with her finger: the law does not permit it. (B.)

Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIII, chap. xxxii: 'Pomponia Graecina, having been accused of some foreign superstition, was handed over for trial to her husband. So in accordance with ancient practice he sat in judgement on his wife's status and reputation in the presence of her relatives.' (R.) Add also Euripides, Medea, lines 230 ff.; and on the customs of the Japanese, Bernhard Varenus, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xiii. Law of the Visigoths, Bk. IV, tit. iv, chap. 3. Worthy of 586 mention is what Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. XII, chap. xxxviii, tells about the Sacae: 'If any one wants to take a girl to wife, he starts a fight with her. If the girl wins, she carries him off as her captive and maintains authority over him; if she loses he rules over her. The struggle, however, is not for life and death, but only for victory.'

¹ [For nisi read inquit.—Tr.]

How much power belongs to the husband over his wife's money, will likewise depend upon an agreement between the two, or upon civil laws. For these engagements must be strictly lived up to, whatever agreement the two may have reached; whether the woman is to bring a dowry at marriage, or the resources of the two are to be fused into one, or the husband is to have a full or restricted power to dispose of the marriage dowry, and the like. Among the Japanese the wives bring no dowry to their husbands; the wealthier parents sometimes send a certain sum of money by their daughters to the groom on the wedding day, but he returns it with fitting ceremonies. For they are unwilling to do anything whereby the wife might have occasion for pride. They also commonly repeat the saying, that a woman her life long is without a home which she can call her own; for a daughter lives in the house of her parents, a wife in that of her husband, and a widow with her children. Bernhard Varenius, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xii. We may note, in passing, a custom of the ancient Thracians, as given in Solinus, chap. xv: 'Marriageable maidens do not take husbands at the will of their parents, but the more beautiful ones prefer to be put up at auction, and through recognizing the right of valuation these marry not for character but at a price; while the less attractive ones purchase husbands with dowries.' So in Xenophon, Anabasis, Bk. VII, Seuthes says: 'If you have a daughter, I will purchase her in the Thracian fashion.' Add Heraclides, De Politis [Aristotle, frg. mdcxi. lviii]; Mela, Bk. II, chap. ii. The Assyrians likewise set up their maidens for public auction. Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. IV, chap. i; Herodotus, Bk. I.

We may add the rules of Roman law on prohibiting donations between husband and wife; Digest, XXIV. i. 1, 2, 3 pr. When the civil laws have no ruling on such matters, or when the pair lives in natural liberty, they may make such agreement among themselves as they please on these matters.

12. To illustrate these points it is worth while to consider what is said by Johannes Frid. Hornius, De Civitate, Bk. I, chap. i. He at once rejects those who maintain that the sovereignty of a husband over his wife is by nature. This we assent to, provided it means that sovereignty belongs to a husband by nature alone, without an intervening pact and voluntary subjection on the part of the wife. That, indeed, is opposed to the natural equality of all mankind; and aptitude alone does not confer sovereignty.

He then maintains: 'No sovereignty, either public or private, belongs to man over man, save by the most explicit appointment of God, and His most evident intervention.' Here we must observe that when the origin of sovereignty is investigated we properly inquire about the nearest, immediate, and secondary cause; and that the first and universal cause is always presupposed. And so, although there be a command of God on the introduction of some kind of order among men, the question still remains, what pacts should intervene to make men order themselves according to the command of God. For surely it is credulous to believe that when God is called the moral author of some thing, it is caused by Him in the same manner as He created the heavens and earth without the intervention of any creature. If God commanded that the tabernacle be made, it does not mean that those who undertook the task cannot be called the nearest and immediate cause of it. And so, even if God commanded that a woman obey a man, yet for such a sovereignty actually to exist, she should subject herself to him by a pact, by which very act and through it he is constituted her lord. Thus, although God said, 'Have dominion over the beasts of the field,' we must needs secure them by hunting. 587

His next argument also is worthless: 'The wife has no marriage sovereignty and so cannot confer it on her husband.' As if agreements among men cannot produce a moral quality which did not formally exist beforehand! It is not necessary for the establishment of sovereignty that it already formally lie in one person and be transferred to another (just as for physical substances to be transferable from one person to another, they must be already existent); but it arises when a man renounces that faculty of resisting another which he otherwise enjoyed by reason of natural liberty, and subjects his will to the will of the other, giving his promise to abide by the other's dictates.

Furthermore, although it is stated in Sacred Scripture that subjection was enjoined upon Eve as a penalty for having seduced her husband, yet it does not follow from that fact that her husband's sovereignty, after the fall, did not have as its second and nearest cause, the agreement between husband and wife. For inasmuch as not every necessity for obedience carries with it some infelicity (just as the most blessed state of the angels is not impaired because they must give scrupulous obedience to God), the punishment in woman's subjection lies in this, that she bears the yoke against her will and under the constant urge of a desire to rule. Therefore, these statements are not contradictory: The husband's sovereignty naturally springs from the consent of the woman; and, God made that sovereignty galling to women by way of punishment.

The following is a meaningless subtlety: 'Now whatever will and voluntary pact is found in the woman, pertains only for the contraction of the marriage, and must, therefore, be interpreted in accordance with the assent and approval by which the woman acquiesces in the sovereignty, which will follow, of a certain husband.' This merely means that a husband's sovereignty is not produced by the consent of his wife, but is already ordained by the command of God, and consented to by the wife. Just as a traveller does not build an inn, but of his own accord enters one already built.

And yet it should be carefully noted that the sovereignty, as a moral entity, of one man over another, does not exist without a human act and is not intelligible without obedience. And no obligation to obey lies upon a woman before she has with her own consent subjected herself to a man. And although it is agreeable to the divine will that this be done, that circumstance does not, however, prevent her pact, and the attendant subjection, from being the immediate and nearest cause that produces the sovereignty of her husband.

13. Nor do we grant the same author, loc. cit., that there belongs to the husband, in addition to sovereignty in things relating to the marriage and family, full 'right of life and death', and that in this right 'lies the sum of the husband's sovereignty'. Yet let this power be understood to be such as has not yet been restrained by civil sovereignty, and as does not consist of any licence excusing the cruelty of parricide, but of the lawful authority to punish without shrift capital crimes. But that 'all sovereignty, in so far as it is seated in a proper person, and is not held precariously from some man or circumscribed by a superior, implies the right of life and death', is a statement which I can scarcely accept offhand. Surely the end of marriage requires no such sovereignty. And if some one believes that certain heinous crimes should be brought before a human court, who will punish the head of a household distinct from the state, and who will punish a king in a state? But if a wife commits an intolerable crime, she may be thrust out of the family like an enemy, and put to death as if by the right of war. And we have already admitted that a sovereignty of this kind is not opposed to the nature of marriage.

14. At this point we must explain the common maxim of the lawyers, that 'consent and not cohabitation consummate marriage' (Digest, XXXV. i. 15); or, as it is stated by Quintilian, Declamations, ccxlvii: 'Copulation and intercourse that are unsanctioned by law do not make a woman a wife' (see Decretum, II. xxvii. 2, 5). This may 588 have two interpretations: either that they who have had associations of intimacy do not forthwith form a pair, unless they have agreed upon marriage (Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. IV [338-9]: 'Nor did I proffer you a formal marriage, nor did I undertake a bond like that' (B.)); or that as soon as both have given their consent the marriage contract is looked upon as consummated, even before they have known each other. My judgement on this would be, that just as it is required for the full transference of dominion over a thing, that it be so constituted in some one's power that he may dispose of it whenever he pleases, so for it to be said that some one is actually another's wife, it appears necessary that she have come, as it were, into the hands of the man in such a way that he may treat her as a wife. But it is not at all necessary that this begin with the marriage bed. Thus Rebecca became the wife of Isaac after he had brought her into his mother's tent. Genesis, xxv, towards the end. So also I question whether we can call a woman an adulteress who, although betrothed to an absent lover, copulates with a third before she is taken to his home, even though marriages be consummated in the eyes of the law by proxy. On the other hand it would be absurd to try to deny that Sarah was the wife of Tobias for the first three nights (see Tobias, vi. 19 [18]); or that the marriage is not completed, when by our customs the priest has performed his part, until the night has brought consummation.

According to the Hebrews, as Selden, Bk. V, chap. iv, tells us, before the giving of the Mosaic law there was required for marriage both consent and consummation; and so in those days marriage was a physical union of a man and a woman, preceded by consent to the uniting of life and bed. But in the eyes of the Hebrew civil law consent alone made marriage. Deuteronomy, xxii. 23-4; add Code, V. v. 8.

We should add, in this connexion, what Grotius on Matthew, i. 18, notes: That among the Hebrews a wedding was not complete until a gathering had been made and the ceremony begun with solemn prayer; which the Jews formerly observed and still do, not so much as a command of the law, but as a custom of their ancestors, from whom that most worthy institution has passed on to Christians. And so, although after betrothal the young man took upon himself the care of the maiden's honour, she yet remained until the day of her marriage ἐν τῇ γυναικωνίτιδι [in the women's quarters], apart from her lover, living from then on as in another house. Compare Genesis, xxiv. 67; Deuteronomy, xxi. 13.

15. Our next step is to inquire whether there can be no marriage by natural law save between one man and one woman, or, what amounts to the same thing, whether that law allows polygamy. Now polygamy is of two kinds: the one, when several men copulate promiscuously with one woman, or when one woman marries several men; and the other when one man has several wives. To the former kind you may refer the community of wives of Plato, so much discussed; compare Plato, Republic, Bk. V, and the preface to that book by Marsilius Ficinus. A similar practice is ascribed to the Taprobanians by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. II, chap. lviii:

They never marry, but make use of women promiscuously, and breed up the children so begotten as common to them all, with equal care and affection to one as well as to another. The children, while they are tender infants, are often changed by the nurses, that they cannot know even their mothers.¹ (B.*)

Add Idem, Bk. III, chap. xv, on the Ichthyophagi; Bk. III, chap. xxiv, on the Hylophagi; Bk. III, chap. xxxii, on the Nomads, who are also mentioned by Strabo, Bk. VII. On the vile customs of the Garamantes, see Pliny, Natural History, Bk. V, chap. viii, and Solinus, chap. xliii; of the Troglodytes, Agatharchides, chap. xxx, and Pomponius Mela, Bk. I, chap. viii; of the Agathyrsi, Herodotus, Bk. IV [civ], as well as of the Gindani and Nomads. Of the inhabitants of Thule, Solinus, chap. xxxv [22, 17 addit.] reports, I know not how trustworthily: 'They treat their women as a common possession, and no one is formally married.' Caesar, Gallic War, Bk. V [xiv], has the 589 same to say of the ancient Britons: 'Groups of ten or twelve men have wives together in common, and particularly brothers along with brothers, and fathers with sons; but the children born of the unions are reckoned to belong to the particular house to which the maidens were first conducted.' (E.*) It is clear, in this case, that Caesar did not mean that one woman married at the same time ten or twelve husbands, as even Selden, Bk. V, chap. xi, believed, but that when ten or twelve had each taken a wife, they thereupon kept them in common and each lay with any one he pleased. The same custom is mentioned, but less definitely, by Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio's History, Nero (in the speech of Buduica² [LXII. vi. 3]), and Severus. Much the same is told of the Sabaeans by Strabo, Bk. XVI [iv. 25]:

Property is the common possession of all the relationship, but the eldest is the owner. All the members of the group have one wife; the one who comes first goes in and leaves his staff at the door. [. . .] The common wife, however, spends the night with the eldest member. In consequence of these customs all are the brothers of all the rest. [. . .] An adulterer is punished with death; but in order to be an adulterer one must come of a different family.

Add what the same author writes (Bk. XI) of the Massagetae and Tapyri. Ludovicus Romanus, Navigatio, Bk. V, chap. viii, has this to say of some of the inhabitants of the kingdom of Calicut: 'A woman marries seven men who keep turn in their nights with her. And their women, when they have given birth, assign the child to any one of the seven they please, there being no appeal from their decision.' The same is told by Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. III, ep. vii. Here you may also refer the account, drawn from Aeneas Sylvius, of the Lithuanians by Johannes Boemus, De Moribus Gentium [Omnium gentium mores], Bk. III, chap. vii: 'The matrons openly have, with the permission of their husbands, their lovers, whom they call assistants of their bed; but concubinage among the men is condemned.'

¹ [So Pufendorf incorrectly for 'so that not even the mothers can recognize their own' of the original; or else, more probably, suas is a misprint for suos, which would give the correct sense, and the error belongs to the printer.—Tr.]
² [For Bundoicae read Buduicae.—Tr.]

In the same way, according to Plutarch, Lycurgus [xv. 6 f.] the lawgiver endeavoured to banish from the Spartan state the empty and womanish passion of jealous possession, by making it honourable to share with other worthy men in the begetting of children, laughing to scorn those who regard such common privileges as intolerable, and resort to murder and war rather than grant them. For example, an elderly man with a young wife, if he looked with favour and esteem on some fair and noble young man, might introduce him to her, and adopt her offspring by such a noble father as his own. And again, a worthy man who admired some woman for the fine children that she bore her husband and the modesty of her behaviour as a wife, might enjoy her favours, if her husband would consent, thus planting, as it were, in a soil of beautiful fruitage, and begetting for himself noble sons, who would have the blood of noble men in their veins. For in the first place, Lycurgus did not regard sons as the peculiar property of their fathers, but rather as the common property of the state, and therefore would not have his citizens sprung from random parentage, but from the best there was. In the second place, he saw much folly and vanity in what other peoples enacted for the regulation of these matters; in the breeding of dogs and horses they insist on having the best sires which money or favour can secure, but they keep their wives under lock and key, demanding that they have children by none but themselves, even though they be foolish, infirm, or diseased; as though children of bad stock did not show their badness to those first who possessed and reared them, and children of good stock, contrariwise, their goodness. (And this was done, he concludes), with the aim of physical and political well-being. (P.)

Mention also of that law is made by Xenophon, Constitution of the Lacedaemonians [i. 7].

The Stoics also, according to Diogenes Laertius [VII. 131], on Zeno, used to say that among wise men wives should be in common, so that any one might lie with the first woman who met him, for in this way all men would love children like fathers with equal affection, and suspicion of adultery and jealousy would be utterly done away with. Add also Thomas Campanella, City of the Sun. Nor was it unusual among the Romans for a man to lend, as it were, his wife to another man that he might have children by her, and then take her back again, if he so wished. See Plutarch, Numa [p. 76 D]. Thus Cato lent his wife Marcia to Q. Hortensius. Idem, Cato the Younger [xxv, p. 771]; Lucan, Bk. II, line 326. A law of Solon allowed an heiress who had been claimed by an impotent kinsman, to yield herself to his kinsmen. 590 Plutarch, Solon [xx].

Yet it cannot be doubted that all these practices are repugnant to natural law. Compare Matthew, xxii. 25 ff. For the natural and orderly end of marriage is for one to secure his own particular offspring, and how could a man recognize his own in such promiscuity? Furthermore, since conception may occur but once, such intercourse serves no end but the satisfaction of lust. A further consideration is that the most endearing terms of relationship are by such actions confounded and practically done away with entirely. For the scheme of Plato, Republic, Bk. V [p. 461 B ff.], that the law shall designate not only the words of relationship, such as father, mother, son, daughter, brother, sister, but also the duties owed to such relations, and that a man shall regard those who are older than himself as his parents, those who are younger, as his children, and those of his own age as his brothers, is of no value. He who has not a particular father has no father. Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. III, chap. xx, remarks to the point:

If all are the children of all, who will be able to love children as his own, when he is either ignorant or in doubt whether they are his own? Who will bestow honour upon any one as a father, when he does not know from whom he was born? From which it comes to pass, that he not only esteems a stranger as a father, but also a father as a stranger, &c. (C.) And it was well answered the man who wondered at the fact that adultery was not heard of among the Lacedaemonians, that their marriage was adultery, in reference to their vile custom of lending their wives around.

Again, the main difference between the mating of mankind and the promiscuity of the beasts, lies in the fact that the wives plight their faith to their husbands to give their bodies to them alone. If a husband voluntarily breaks his engagement to his wife by admitting assistants and substitutes to his bed, he is unworthy the name of man and husband, and is the vilest kind of a disturber of ordered human society. And if a lawgiver felt that a fertile field should not lie idle because of the impotence of a senile husband, a far better way to prevent that loss would have been to forbid the marriage of young girls to nerveless old men.

Furthermore, as to that jealousy, due to a wife's suspected misdeed that never took place, just as it is the most foolish and miserable disease (see Oppian, The Chase, Bk. III, lines 237 ff.), so no sane man would say that in its form as a zealous preservation of the chastity of a wife and the reluctance to admit waylayers to one's bed, it is repugnant to honour and reason (see Seneca, Hercules Oetaeus,¹ line 233). And yet that community of wives could not have removed this idle jealousy, nor should it have done away with the honourable kind. Nor can I be persuaded that citizens would ever be bound in the closest ties possible, by some such scheme, whereby any man may say of any one, 'This is mine'. It is undoubtedly preferable that states be filled with stalwart men, in preference to maimed and sick, and it is a rule that the strong bring forth strong rather than weak. Yet even if the offspring would always carry on the strength of their father, that consideration would never bulk so large, that, in order to gain it, the sanctity of marriage, the foundation of all good order, should be destroyed. To apply to this institution a parallel from the breeding of horse, is a thing too vile to deserve refutation. Add the arguments adduced against Plato by Aristotle, Politics, Bk. II, chap. ii, and his excellent remarks in the same work, Bk. VII, chap. xvi (21) [VII. xvi. 18]: 'As to adultery,

¹ [For Oclau. read Oetaeo.—Tr.]

let it be held disgraceful for any man or woman to be unfaithful when they are married, and called husband and wife.' (J.)

16. The second kind of polygamy, and that which properly bears the name, is when several wives are united to one man, as it has been and still is practised among many peoples. The custom as it prevailed among the Hebrews is to be seen quite clearly from Deuteronomy, xxi. 15; xvii. 16-17, and the passage of Ambrose in Decretum, II. xxxii. 4, 3 and 7. Thus in 2 Samuel, xii. 8, God claims it as a proof of His great kindness to David, that He had given him many choice wives. And as Selden, Marriage and Divorce among the Hebrews, Bk. I, chap. ix, points out, the Hebrews held that every man might take as many wives as he wished, provided he was able to furnish each of them with food, clothing, and the proper conjugal affection. Yet it was to avoid the inconveniences attendant upon a number of wives, that their wise men advised no one but the king to take more than four; and he who did otherwise was held imprudent and disobedient to the institutions of their fathers. They held that a priest should have at the same time no more than one, although, if the first were divorced or dead, he was not forbidden to take a second. But they believed that by the command of Deuteronomy, xvii. 17, the king was forbidden to take more than eighteen. Yet if members of their race were dwelling where only monogamy was practised, they were directed to take but one. Thus, according to Code, I. ix. 8, polygamy was forbidden such as lived under Roman jurisdiction. Add likewise Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. V, chap. vi. On the present Jews, Leo of Modena, De Ritibus Hebraicis, Pt. IV, chap. ii, observes that those living in the Orient still marry several wives, which is not permitted in Germany and is not done, while it is very rare in Italy, and only in case a man has lived with his first wife many years without issue. Here Selden, loc. cit., remarks that in the first edition the words were added 'yet not without securing the permission of the pope at Rome', which are omitted in the Paris edition of 1637.

Tacitus writes of the ancient Germans [Germany, xviii]: 'They are almost the only barbarians who are content with a wife apiece; the very few exceptions have nothing to do with passion, but consist of those with whom polygamous marriage is eagerly sought for the sake of their high birth.' (H.) Thus according to Caesar, Gallie War, Bk. I [liii], Ariovistus had two wives, one of the Suebi, the other of the Norici.

Although the Greeks were as a rule monogamous, there was a vote of the Athenians which ran: '[The Athenians, on account of the scarcity of men, passed a vote,] with the view of increasing the population, that a man might marry one citizen, and might also have children by another who should be legitimate.' Diogenes Laertius [II. 26], on Socrates. Therefore, Athenaeus, Bk. XIII, chap. i [27], while saying that it did not seem likely that Socrates had the two wives, Xantippe and Myrto, as some writers affirmed, both because of the law of Cecrops, and especially since the comic poets, who were always abusing him, make no mention of it, adds: 'Unless perhaps this licence was allowed by a decree at that time on account of the scarcity of men.' Gellius, Bk. XV, chap. ii, gives as one of the reasons for the μισογυνία [misogyny] of Euripides, that he had two wives (since it was allowed by that decree of the Athenians), and became wearied of his marriage to them. When the Spartan king Anaxandrides was unwilling to repudiate his wife who had given him no issue, he was forced by the orders of the ephors to take another who would. Herodotus, Bk. V [xxxix, xl]. It is well known that the Romans were monogamous; see Code, V. v. 2; IX. ix. 18. And yet Suetonius, Julius Caesar, chap. lii, writes that Julius Caesar wanted to have a law passed 'Making it lawful for him to marry what wives he wished and as many as he wished "for the purpose of begetting children".' (R.) So also Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. IV, chap. xxvi [xxx], says that the emperor Valentinian, in addition to his first wife Severa, took a second, Justina, a woman of great beauty, and passed a law, published in all the provinces, whereby every man was allowed 'to have two lawful wives'. The same account is given by Paulus Diaconus, Bk. XI, although Zonaras mentions only 592 his two wives and is silent about the law. And since the other historians, Ammianus, Zosimus, and Orosius, as well as the Christian Fathers who dispute so often on questions of marriage, are silent on the matter, the case is taken as one of bigamy and the law as a pure fiction, by Baronius, Bk. IV, § 125, on the year 370.

¹ [For '56r' read '59r'.—Tr.]

Also Mahomet in his new dispensation permitted polygamy, very cunningly adapting himself to the nature of the peoples whom he was setting out to deceive. For those who dwell in warmer portions of the earth are usually very passionate, while their women, whether from natural endowment or because of their rearing, are so under the power of their husbands that their jealousies generally do not greatly disturb the peace of the household. Yet the wealthier among those peoples follow the practice of keeping each wife in a separate house, while some of them keep them in different cities in order to avoid their quarrels. Richerius, De Moribus Turcarum. The reason for this institution is given by Boccalini, Ragguagli di Parnaso, Cent. II, chap. lxxviii, namely, that it serves to dispose men to bear the harshness of slavery, inasmuch as the division of wealth among several children weakens the families, is subtle indeed, but not such as Mahomet could have envisaged, since the Turkish Empire arose so long after his death. It is said that the principal reason why so many princes of India reject the Christian faith is because they were commanded to be content for the future with one wife. Add Abraham Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pt. I, chap. xiii; Alexander of Rhodes, Divers Voyages, Pt. II, chap. xi.

17. Whether or not this form of polygamy is repugnant to the law of nature, is a question upon which the learned are not yet in entire agreement. We for our part will set forth the arguments for both sides, leaving the decision to the reader.

Now those who maintain that polygamy is not repugnant to the law of nature speak in this way. The end of formal marriage, which is certainty as to one's offspring and mutual assistance, can be secured no less in polygamy than in monogamy. For the repeated claim of some that 'by this custom there will be no return of conjugal faith', as reason dictates, 'since otherwise the reason of the pact and exchange of faith cannot take place', is senseless, for mutual faith does not require that it be equal upon both sides. Nor does the end of formal marriage require that just as the wife shall admit to her person no one but her husband, so her husband may not bestow himself on any other women than his sole wife; for the certainty as to one's offspring which forbids a woman from being intimate with several men, has nothing to do with a man. Nor is the husband less obliged to keep faith with his wife, which is seen in the giving of aid and the performance of what is called the conjugal debt. And on this last obligation, inasmuch as among many nations men have such strength that they can satisfy several women, several wives of one man can have no cause for complaint. Indeed, if we direct our gaze upon the primary purpose of marriage, which is the generation of offspring, even among continent peoples it is not beyond the strength of one man to meet that duty for several women, especially if the women would follow the example of Zenobia, queen of the Palmyrenes, 'who knew not her own husband save to secure issue', as says Trebellius Pollio [Thirty Tyrants, xxx]. Therefore, the fierce hatred of women for polygamy is due to their intemperance.

But if a wife had bargained with her husband that he serve her bed alone, as Laban required of Jacob that he take no other wives after his daughters, such a pact must be kept. Add Digest, XLV. i. 121, § 1. When that has not been done, it is enough for the wife that she have had her share¹ of her husband's attentions. See Genesis, xxx. 15, 19; Herodotus, Bk. III [lxix]: 'In Persia a man's wives sleep with him in their turns.' (R.) Nor does the wife suffer an injury if her husband share his affections with his other wives, because she has no further right over the body of her husband than she acquired by the marriage pact. And in that she received a right not to his entire affections, but to her share of them, and to such a marriage she gave her free consent. And so her sole cause for complaint against her husband is when, as

¹ [For rara read rata.—Tr.]

Plautus, Asinaria, Act V, sc. ii [874], says: 'A man attends to the business of ploughing other people's fields and leaves his own uncultivated.' Add Digest, XLVIII. v. 13, § 5, and the comments thereon by Grotius in Florum Sparsio [XLVIII]. For women are not usually so desirous of honour that they are willing to acquiesce with complacency in the excuse which Aelius Verus in Spartianus offered his wife when she complained of his other indulgences [Aelius Verus, v]: 'Let me indulge my desires with others; for wife is a term of honour, not of pleasure.' Add Plautus, The Merchant, Act IV, last scene; Decretum, II. xxxii. 6. 2 ff.

They add, further, that polygamy does not reduce wives to a state of slavery, nor is it any disgrace for women to hold a position inferior to that of men; for the very weakness of their sex urges that they live under the tutelage, as it were, of their husbands. Euripides, Suppliants [40-1]:

Seemly it is

That women, which be wise, still act through men. (W.)

The reasons adduced with regard to jealousy, domestic discords, and hatreds of rival mothers for their offspring, do not make polygamy unlawful in the eyes of natural law, but the domestic infelicities which attend it are such as are not wanting in monogamy and second marriages, which no man would call illegal on that account. Nor are such troubles found equally everywhere, but only among those nations where the women are too forward, or where men are too subservient to their wives. But among many nations women are more accustomed to obey their husbands, whether because of their nature or their training (Benzoni, History of the New World, Pt. I, chap. xxxvii,) and a tactful man experiences no difficulty in preserving peace even between several wives. The reasons advanced by Denis Godefroy on Code, I. ix. 7, will be found to be trifling enough.

18. Those who deny that polygamy is agreeable to natural law call upon the command of the Decalogue not to commit adultery, which no one ever has said, or will say, applies only to women. If, then, it is binding upon both husband and wife, the former will be guilty of adultery whenever he has taken the marriage vow to a second wife, or received another woman to his bed, against the desires of her to whom he first pledged his faith, and gave power over his body. Decretum, II. xxxii. 5. 15, 16, 23. See Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 9. Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vi, § 16, &c.; chap. xiv, § 9, makes some reply to this, which we will discuss in another place.

Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus, III. i. 13, on Digest, XLVIII, denies that adultery is committed by polygamy (he had denied in the preceding section that intercourse between a married man and an unmarried woman was adultery), since adultery is committed only with another's wife (Digest, XLVIII. v. 6, § 1). He further denies that every case of conjugal infidelity is adultery, for although a man who maliciously deserts his wife, and who does not fulfil his conjugal duty to her or support her, does violence to his marriage vow, yet he is not called an adulterer on that account. He goes on to say that although it is unfair for a man to demand a chastity of his wife which he himself does not observe, that does not mean that such a sin in both of them is equal. For every one knows that wives stand under a greater necessity of chastity, because of the modesty of their sex, the disgrace attending promiscuity of women, and the danger of the foisting off of children born of adultery, as well as the disgrace to the family and the whole state. Surely if it was held disgraceful for a child to be born of a citizen and a foreigner (and such offspring were formerly designated as hybrids) how much greater is the disgrace also for an entire state, if it is uncertain whether its citizens are the issue of an adulterous or a legitimate union. Thus in Leviticus, xviii. 20 and xx. 10, adultery is defined as approach to or violation of another's wife. Nor does it appear likely that a law on adultery which is passed for a polygamous people, can in any way apply to polygamy unless that had been expressly prohibited. The words of Sacred Scripture which calls it adultery to have desired another's wife, on which so many of the sayings of the fathers rest, and which are advanced by Gratian, Decretum, II. xxxii. 4. 3, 4 and 1, and II. xxxii. 6. 5 and Decretals, IV. xiii. 4, 10, are to be taken like those which call it homicide to hate one's brother. 594

Others take the opposite position: That the aforementioned commandment without doubt binds men as well as women, and that a husband should no more violate his wife's bed than a wife her husband's. But there is no violation of a couch in polygamy. It is, of course, obvious that he who promised his wife his entire body, breaks his word if he either goes after strange women, or takes another wife. But how will it appear that a man has broken his word who, on taking a wife, reserved to himself the privilege of taking yet another? Nor does he who promised but the partial service of his body withhold his conjugal duties by performing them for another as well.

To this the reply is made, that 'it is impossible to believe it would ever happen that a woman would consent to her own injury, unless brought to it by force or fear, or moved by weakness and lack of judgment, and from neither of these can a right arise'. But some do not recognize any injury in this, for the right belonging to one person over another's body was secured by the latter's consent and a pact. Therefore, if as much is performed as was promised by the pact, there is no reason to complain of injury. Nor does it follow, that, if a man is to secure a right over a woman as his wife, it can be secured by the nature of a just marriage only in its entirety, and therefore, vice versa, a right should be acquired by a woman only over an entire man. Nor is the natural inequality of men infringed upon by this pact, for that equality by no means requires that the mutual performances among men be equal. Were this so, it would be repugnant to natural law that after some antecedent deed of men, even of aliens, some should, by mere fortune of birth, be born to sovereignty and others to obedience. And in marriage itself no sensible person would extend the equality of men so far, that he would maintain that the family sovereignty should be borne by husband and wife in turn. So in the bringing into the world of offspring what an easy part is played by the man, what anguish, what cares are drained, as it were, by the mother to the very dregs! Women would make themselves a laughing-stock in states, if they would want to be admitted to a share in the government; and yet no one would be so bold as to say they are excluded from this to their injury by men's tyranny. Thus if any people were of such a mind as to wish to be governed by a more autocratic sovereignty, which its bolder foes call no better than slavery, it would act foolishly and against that ruling prudence, which is the most benignant sister of natural law, if it would wish to give it more rein than is fitting. Therefore, it would be no less foolish to pity the condition of the women of Asia than that of plowmen and artisans, because they had a harder lot than those of gentle birth. The reason why a husband may not in decency admit friends to his bed is a very different thing.

Therefore, there is no reason for a wife fearing for her conscience if she agrees to a polygamous marriage, when it is the custom of the 595 land; especially since it would be morally impossible for a custom once established in the public mind to be overthrown by women alone, even were it the most vicious imaginable. For they are both lacking in strength and excluded from a voice in the state, while there would not fail among them some who would want to cling to the side of peace. Isaiah, iv. 1. And although the example of the heathen and the Mohammedans (who may take four wives and as many concubines in addition as they can support) may be disregarded, since they obviously go counter to many principles of natural law, yet those act frankly who admit that the objection drawn from the polygamy of the fathers under the old covenant is unanswerable. Finally, they observe, on the saying of the Apostle in 1 Corinthians, vii. 4, that there is no discussion there of the primary but of a secondary and indirect end and use of marriage, διὰ τὰς πορνείας [to avoid fornication], and since that end is needed as much by women as men, humanity and equity join in providing not only for the man but also for the woman; and it follows therefrom that a man cannot deny his body to his wife. But it does not follow from this that a man cannot bestow himself upon any other woman than his wife.

19. However all this may be, it is surely patent that it is best and most decorous, as well as most conducive to domestic peace, for one man to live content with one woman, and so this kind of marriage should undoubtedly be regarded as the most perfect, whose laws are to be observed most sacredly no less by the husband than the wife. Euripides, Andromacha [464 ff.]:

Never rival brides blessed marriage-estate,
Neither sons not born of one mother:
They were strife to the home, they were anguish of hate.
For the couch of the husband suffice one mate:
Be it shared of none other. (W.)

Isocrates, Nicocles [40]:

More than that, I considered that men were guilty of great wickedness, who, after taking a wife, and entering upon a life-long association, are not content with the arrangement they have made, but by their own indulgences pain those whom they expect never to cause them any pain, and while in other associations of life they behave fairly, do wrong in their dealings towards their wives, whom it was their greater duty to protect in proportion as they are nearer and dearer to them and of greater value than other people. (F.) Plautus, The Merchant [824-5]: 'Now a wife, a good wife, is content with just her husband; why should a husband be less content with just his wife?' (N.) To this subject can also be applied the following remarks of Plutarch, Conjugal Precepts [xliv]:

It is reported that the scent of sweet perfumes will make a cat grow mad. Now, supposing those strong perfumes which are used by many men should prove offensive to their wives, would it not be a great piece of unnatural unkindness to discompose a woman with continual fits rather than deny himself a pleasure so trivial? But when it is not their husbands' perfuming themselves, but their lascivious wandering after lewd and extravagant women, that disturbs and disorders their wives, it is a great piece of injustice, for the tickling pleasure of a few minutes, to afflict and disquiet a virtuous woman. [. . .] Much rather ought a man to be pure from the pollutions of harlotry, when he approaches his chaste and lawful wife. (G.)

Clytemnestra speaks as follows in Euripides, Electra [1035 ff.]:

Women be frail: sooth, I deny it not.
But when, this granted, 'tis the husband errs,
Slighting his own true bride, fain the wife
Would copy him, and find another love. (W.)

But it is also the case that of several wives one is loved above the others. Genesis, xxix; Deuteronomy, xxi. 15; Esther, ii. 17; Song of Solomon, vi. 7-8. Therefore, even when there is a number of wives, nature, as if of its own accord, inclines towards singleness. On this point bears the statement of Sallust, Jugurtha [lxxx]:

But such a tie (of son-in-law) is not considered very binding among the Numidians and Moors, since each of them has as many wives as his means permit—some ten, others more, and kings a still greater number. Thus their affection is distributed among a large number; 596¹ none of the wives is regarded as a consort, but all are equally misprised. (R.)

¹ [For '396' read '596'.—Tr.]

Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXIII, chap. xii [76], writes to the same effect of the Parthians: 'Natural affection is lost among them because of the numerous objects of their license.' (Y.) Procopius, War of the Vandals, Bk. II [xi. 13]: 'And as for children, that will be your concern, who are not permitted to marry more than one wife, but with us, who have, it may be, fifty wives living with each of us, offspring of children can never fail.' (D.) Claudian, War with Gildo [441-3]: 'Though each has many wives, ties of family bind them not, nor have they any love for their children whose very number causes affection to fail.' (P.)

The following reasons for the reception of monogamy by Christians are adduced by Grotius, On the Truth of the Christian Religion, Bk. II, n. 13: That the wife, bestowing her mind and affection entirely upon her husband, may be met with an equal return; that the domestic regimen proceeds more properly under one head; and that different mothers may not cause discord among their children. To these may be added the political consideration, of considerable weight against polygamy among the more advanced nations, now that mankind has so multiplied, that with the signal increase of children noble families must be reduced to slender means and the poorer sort to beggary, while a state must be filled with too great a multitude of impoverished rabble, which will surely overwhelm society by its very mass, if it cannot conveniently be drawn off, for the doing of which there is not always an opportunity. For it is a most horrible manner in which the superabundance of men caused by polygamy is decreased in the kingdom of Angola—by selling them to toil in America. Nay, they say that even among the Turks polygamy is not practised so much as formerly, and is kept far within the limit of their law, the cause for which being apparently not so much the increase among them of sodomy, as the disadvantage attendant upon polygamy.

20. Another question no less vigorously discussed is, whether by natural law marriage is an association that can be dissolved, and whether, therefore, the same law allows divorces. Here again we shall set forth what is usually stressed on both sides, leaving the decision to those who know how to weigh the force of arguments.

As is presupposed at the outset, every pact implies that one party cannot depart from it but with the consent of the other, or if the other has violated it. Therefore, it will be repugnant to natural law if one of the married pair leaves the other against his will, when the latter has violated no part of the marriage pact; and this merely to better his position, or because it suits his fancy. Nor should Digest, XVII. ii. 14, be called upon in this connexion; for beside the consideration that either party thus deserted does without doubt suffer a damage, a partnership which was entered into for the sake of profit is far more easily dissolved than that most intimate union between husband and wife. For in marriage each of the parties has secured a right over the body of the other, which cannot be taken away against either's will. Moreover, although marriages may be dissolved by mutual consent without any very serious cause, that is both unbecoming and menacing, since both families and the general propriety of states cannot avoid being seriously injured by the licence of such divorces. See Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. ix, § 2. This principle may be extended to betrothals, which should not be broken off at the mere dissent of the parties, even though they be in their beginning, unless there be very good reason, or the conditions are wanting on the existence of which the validity of the pact was made to depend. Add Gellius, Bk. IV, chap. iv. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. II [xxv], highly commends an institution of Romulus in which he commanded that the bond of a marriage consummated by the offering of bread (confarreatio) should hold for ever: 'This law obliged both the married women, as having no other refuge, to conform themselves, entirely, to the temper of their husbands, and the husbands to retain their wives as necessary and inseparable companions.' (S.) And you may well number among the principal causes for the corruption of the morals of the Romans, the fact that divorces were so freely granted for unimportant causes, or none at all. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. III, chap. vi [16]:

597

Is any woman ashamed of being divorced, now that some noble ladies reckon the years of their lives, not by the number of the consuls, but by that of their husbands, now that they leave their homes in order to marry others, and marry only in order to be divorced? (S.)

Thus it is worthy of the barbarity of the Saracens which is seen in other things as well, that, as we are informed by Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XIX, chap. iii [XIX. iv]:

Their wives are hired, on special covenant, for a fixed time; and that there may be some appearance of marriage in the business, the intended wife, under the name of a dowry, offers a spear and a tent to her husband, with a right to quit him after a fixed day, if she should choose to do so. (Y.)

Similar marriages are often entered into by the Dutch in Japan, to be broken when they depart. Bernhard Varenus, Japonia, chap. xiii. This is the custom also in other regions of India. Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. V, chap. xxii, writes that such marriages are common also among the Persians, as also does Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. II, ep. xvii. Surely there is no decency in that which is castigated by Juvenal, Satires, VI [142 ff.]:

'Why does Sartorius burn with love for Bibula?' If you shake out the truth, it is the face he loves, not the woman. Let three wrinkles make their appearance; let her skin become dry and flabby; let her teeth turn black and her eyes lose their lustre: then will his freedman give her the order, 'Pack up your traps and be off! You've become a nuisance;

you are forever blowing your nose; be off, and quick about it! There's another wife coming who will not snuffle.' (R.)

For 'when a woman grows old her children cement the marriage tie and a mother's dignity compensates for the lost charms of a wife'. Claudian, Against Eutropius, Bk. I [72-3]. Add Martial, Bk. X, ep. xli. Equally disgraceful is a law of Charondas, in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. xviii, whereby men and women are allowed to marry again after divorce, provided a younger mate is not taken than the one left.

Surely it is a great affront to dismiss a wife—an affront such as no honourable woman deserves save for very serious cause. And this should be extended to all repudiations. When Radigis, in Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. IV [xx. 22], broke off his betrothal to the maiden Brittia without showing any cause on her part, she 'unable to endure the disgrace, violently sought to make him pay for the insult. For the barbarians in that quarter of the world set so great store by chastity, that when marriage has once been mentioned, although not accomplished, a woman is regarded as having played the wanton'. In Tacitus, Annals, Bk. II [lxxxvi], in filling the office [of Vestal Virgin] 'the daughter of Pollio was preferred, for no other reason than that her mother had never had but one husband; whereas Agrippa had impaired the honour of his house by a divorce'. (R.) Publilius¹ Syrus [223, 340]: 'Repeated marriage merits condemnation. [. . .] The woman who marries many men is unattractive to many.'

21. We must inquire, further, whether what is common to all other pacts also holds true of marriage, namely, that when the primary articles, at least, of the pact have been violated by one of the parties the other secures thereby the power to withdraw from the marriage. It appears that this can safely be answered in the affirmative in the case of the principal articles. For the bond is entered into for the procreation of offspring, which end requires the mutual service of their bodies. Therefore, by mere natural law one of the two will be freed from the marriage bond when the other is guilty of malicious desertion, as well as of obstinate and voluntary refusal to perform the due rights of marriage. Under the latter head, according to Selden, Marriage and Divorce among the Hebrews, Bk. III, chaps. vi and vii, the Jews placed the 'action of conjugal dues'. Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. V, chap. xxiii: 'The true reason why God willed that all other female animals should resist the advances of the males when they were pregnant, but that woman alone among them all should accept them, was that lust should not impel men, when their women repelled them, to look elsewhere, and in so doing² lose the glory of chastity.' Add Decretum,

¹ [For Publius read Publilius.—Tr.]

² [For sacto read facto.—Tr.]

II. xxxiii. 5. 1 ff. To this can be added Plutarch, Amatorius [xxiii, p. 769 A]:

Solon was a lawgiver the most experienced in conjugal affairs, who decreed that a husband should lie with his wife thrice a month at least—not for pleasure's sake—but that, as cities renew their treaties one with another at intervals, so the alliance of matrimony might be renewed by this enjoyment, after the jars which may have arisen in the meantime. (G.*)

And Idem, Solon [xx]:

598

Conformable to this, also, is the requirement [...] that the husband of an heiress shall approach her thrice a month without fail. For even though they have no children, still, this is a mark of esteem and affection which a man should pay to a chaste wife; it removes many of the annoyances which develop in all such cases, and prevents their being altogether estranged by their differences. (P.)

Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. III, chap. v, pp. 102–3. Thus it is told in Diogenes Laertius [VIII. 21], in the life of Pythagoras, that when the philosopher descended into the lower world he witnessed the punishment 'of those who refused to consort with their wives'. Aristotle, Economics, Bk. I, chap. iv: 'A husband does wrong to seek sexual intercourse away from home.'

In the next place marriage is contracted so that a person may obtain, not adulterous nor supposititious offspring, but his own. Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. III, chap. x: 'Moses absolutely prohibited adultery, feeling the happiest state was for men to rest secure about their own marriage bed, and that it was best for states as well as private homes that the children who were born should be legitimate.' (W.) Nay, above and beyond the procreation of offspring, honourable men wish to keep their wives to themselves alone, and judge it improper, even though their ship be not loaded, to have it receive passengers. Surely we do not rate the praise of urbanity so highly as to fear the stricture of Ovid, Amores, Bk. III, chap. iv [37–8]: 'He is too countrified who is hurt when his wife plays false, and is but slightly acquainted with the manners of the city [Rome].' (S.) Martial, Bk. VI, ep. xc: 'Gellia has but one gallant; this is a great disgrace, but, what is greater, she is the wife of two husbands.' (A.) Add Abr. Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pat. I, chap. xiii.

It will, therefore, be just cause for divorce, if a wife grants another the service of her body, provided, of course, it be voluntary; for no one may rightly charge those women with adultery who are ravished against their will. See Valerius Maximus, Bk. VI, chap. i, § 2, inter externa; Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. xxiv; Xenophon, Hiero, p. 578; Digest, XLVIII. v. 13, § 7; XLVIII. v. 39 pr., Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. XII, chap. xlvii. For although it appear a graver offence to assault a woman's virtue by violence than by blandishments and persuasiveness, yet rape involves a greater injury for the wife, persuasion for the husband. Digest, XI. iii. 1, § 3.: 'To persuade is something more than to compel and to constrain.' (M.*)¹

It appears, then, that the reason why adultery and malicious desertion are recorded as a sufficient cause for divorce, is not due to a special positive law of God, as though those were the two exceptions added to the absolute stability of marriage, but to the fact that the common nature of pacts is such that when one party does not abide by the agreements, the other is no longer bound by them. So much so that not only is the injured party no longer required to cohabit with such a perfidious consort, but he or she may marry again. Whatever the canon law urges to the contrary is nonsense. Nor is it a difficult task for those priests to find some other way around their own laws, if they wish to curry favour with some one, by declaring that the marriage was null at the outset, for which conclusion the same law can find many excuses.

But although marriage is chiefly entered into for the sake of securing children, yet it does not seem that mere sterility or lack of fecundity on the part of either, when otherwise fitted for the marriage state, is sufficient for divorce, since it does not lie within the powers of man to ensure fecundity. And yet Sp. Carvilius Ruga, the first man in Rome to divorce his wife, in the 523rd year of the city [231 B.C.], is said to have been moved to do so by the oath which every married man had to take before the censors, 'that he had a wife to secure children by her.' See Gellius, Bk. IV, chap. iii; Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. i. We are informed in Herodotus, Bk. V, that although the Spartan king Anaxandrides was unwilling at the command of the ephors to divorce his wife, who had given him no issue, he nevertheless heeded their advice and took a second who could.

599 22. Now the main point of controversy concerns the following consideration: Since a wife regularly agrees to a continuous cohabitation with her husband, with all her strength to come to his aid with assistance and pleasant companionship, and places herself under his guidance in the home, her husband in return for all this owes his wife defence, honourable treatment, and the like. Homer, Iliad, Bk. IX² [341 f.]: 'Whatsoever man is good and sound of mind loveth his own and cherisheth her.' (L. L. & M.). Does then an aggravated violation of this duty to the husband give sufficient ground for divorce?

Not a few have no hesitation in answering this question in the affirmative, so far as the mere law of nature is concerned. For since a father has the right to cut off a disobedient son, who is surely in nature's law more closely joined to him than his wife, why may not a wife of unbearable disposition, who will not brook correction, be cast out of the home like a rebellious member of the family? Especially since nothing is more true than the remark of Fulgentius, Mythologicon, Bk. I [xxvii]: 'The more closely a wife is bound to her husband by the law, the more certainly is she either pleasing by the charm of her association or poisonous by her vixen disposition: for she is either a constant haven or a perpetual torment.' Semonides¹ [Iamb. 6]: 'A man wins no better spoil than a good wife, none more baneful than a bad one.' Euripides, Orestes [602 ff.]:

¹ [The text of the Digest at this point is very uncertain.—Tr.]

² [For 'x' read 't'.—Tr.]

Happy the life of men whose marriages
Are blest; but they for whom they ill betide
At home, abroad, are they unfortunate. (W.)

On the other hand, if a husband treats his wife with unreasonable severity and fails to accord her the respect and regard due her sex, so as to show himself not so much a helpmate as a vexatious enemy, it seems but fair that she be able to look to her own interests by way of a divorce. Add a law of Theodosius in Justinian's Code, V. xvii. 8.

But now, however, a scruple arises as to whether it is permissible definitely to sever the conjugal bond because of intolerable habits and severe treatment, or whether the other offices of marriage, such as the propagation of offspring, may not be continued even though constant and pleasing cohabitation have been discontinued; for the former pact that concerns the bearing of issue seems essential, and the second only additional. In such a case it is patent that the same persons can enter into several pacts, on the condition that, although one of them be violated, the rest may still be held to. Indeed, a pact of several heads may be entered into, and the agreement added that although one of them may be broken, the parties shall continue to the fulfilment of the rest.

Now if the marriage was contracted in this form, it is apparently possible for the performance of the dues which pertain to the bringing forth of issue to be continued, even when the wife has by her vexatious manners rendered herself no longer suited to constant cohabitation. But since it is not likely that she with whom association is intolerable can fit herself for this debt, or that a man will not turn from a body which houses so crabbed a guest, since a man will scarcely want issue of one whom he hates, it is the regular custom for husband and wife to make an agreement, by one and the same pact, regarding the two heads of the mutual service of body and association in family life, which are so inextricably bound together that the breaking off of the one appears to involve the severing of the other. Therefore, it is repugnant to natural law for husband and wife to separate from the associations of table and bed, because of intolerable manners and incompatible temper, and yet to maintain the bond of marriage which prohibits them from changing their position for the better. Unless it happen that such a separation be enjoined for a time, as a method of punishment, for the purpose of breaking down stubbornness and exploring more thoroughly whether there be any hope of effecting a change of ways. For it is absurd to say¹ that the bond of a pact still 600 holds when no part of the debt which flows from that pact can or should be performed. And although we should concede that that party on whose shoulders rests the blame for separation, is perhaps justly punished by this method, yet the innocent is injured, being forced to pay for another's sin and compelled to a life of celibacy, perhaps highly inconvenient or intolerable.

¹ [For Simonides read Semonides.—Tr.]

Down to this point the state of husband and wife appears to be equal by the law of nature. Therefore, Plutarch, in his life of Romulus [xxii], calls his law σφοδρός, or 'harsh', which forbids a woman to leave her husband, but permits the husband to repudiate her, 'for using poisons, for substituting keys (although Xylander prefers to read 'children'), and for adultery.'² (P.) Euripides, Andromacha [672 ff.]:

'Yet husband's cause'—say'st thou—'and wife's alike
 Are strong, if she be wronged of him, or he Find her committing folly in his halls.'
 Yea, but in his hands is o'ermastering strength,
 But upon friends and parents leans her cause. (W.)

By a law of Solon, among the Athenians the husband could renounce the wife and the wife the husband, although different terms were used for such separations; for if the husband renounced the wife it was called ἀποπομπή [dismissal], if the wife left the husband ἀπόλειψις [withdrawal]. That is, the bride was brought to the house of her husband and so she could not 'dismiss her husband' and cast him out of the house, although she could 'withdraw from' him and retire elsewhere [Lexicon Seguerianum, p. 421, in Corpus Juris Attici, iv. 1369].

Yet it should be observed that no matter what the reason be for the granting of divorces in any state, it should be done only after that reason has been passed upon by a judge, and that a matter of such consequence should not be left to the mere conscience of the parties concerned. For the reason advanced to the contrary by Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. I, chap. iii, that, were this done, the standing of one or the other of the parties would be prejudiced, does not appear sufficiently valid. Add also Plato, Laws, Bk. XI, p. 974; Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xlvii, n. 12; Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. V, chap. vii.

23. But regarding the divine law, whether of the first dispensation or that of Christ, there is greater difficulty. Undoubtedly the Jews believed that by God's law in Deuteronomy, xxiv, divorces were not only permitted, but also commanded, in case the wife was displeasing to her husband. Nay, the conclusion is possible from Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [III. vi], that a man should divorce his wife for sterility:

¹ [For dicere read dicere.—Tr.]

² [The text used by Pufendorf reads: 'for poisoning his children or counterfeiting his keys.'—Tr.]

As many men, therefore, as marry virgins in ignorance of how they will turn out as regards their prolificness, when after a long time they perceive [...] that they are barren, and do not then put them away, are still worthy of pardon, being influenced by habit and familiarity, which are motives of great weight, and being also unable to break through the powers of those ancient charms which by long habituation are stamped upon their souls. But those who marry women who have been previously tested by other men and ascertained to be barren, do merely covet the carnal enjoyment like so many boars or goats, and deserve to be inscribed among the lists of impious men as enemies of God—for God [...] takes all imaginable care for the generation of mankind. (Y.*)

Nor should we question whether divorce was commonly practised by that people, although in their sacred and profane history over a period of more than 700 years no instances of it, or at least very few, are recorded; for only such acts as are sure to contain something unusual and peculiar are commonly noted in annals, not those which agree with the common customs. Nay, in Isaiah, l. 1, and Jeremiah, iii. 1, 6, when the prophets tax the people for their sins¹ they employ similes drawn from divorce, as though from an act quite familiar² to the people. And so Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. XV, chap. ix, notes as unusual and opposed to common law the fact that Salome sent a bill of repudiation to her husband Costobarus, governor of Idumea and Gaza, since the custom of the Jews did not permit a wife to leave her husband, unless she had been put away by him, except when a man had claimed that on the marriage night he had not found his wife to be a virgin, and the charge was false. In that case she could exercise her choice of leaving or staying with her husband, and if she wished to stay with her husband, he had to keep her. Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [iii. 80]. Josephus, Bk. XVIII, chap. vii, gives the same story about Herodias, the daughter of Aristobulus, whom John the Baptist reprov'd. Matthew, xiv; Mark, vi. 601

But most theologians, on the authority of Matthew, v. 32; xix. 8; Mark, x. 4, maintain that our Saviour entirely withdrew such licence of divorce. Here Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 9, adds that it was always God's will from the creation that marriage be for ever binding, but that men were not obligated to that under the old dispensation; and that under the new dispensation Christ sanctioned by his express law, what had before been most agreeable and pleasing to God. Yet Selden, Marriage and Divorce among the Hebrews, Bk. III, chap. xxii, explains the saying of Christ in this way. At that time there were two sects of the Jews, the followers of Shammai and those of Hillel, the first of whom held that a husband could not leave his wife except upon the discovery in her of some baseness, while the latter held that she could lawfully be dismissed for anything which was not to his fancy. Now Christ acted as an arbitrator between the two sects, and decided for the disciples of Shammai, that is, for those who held it illegal to break up in such rash fashion a union established by God himself, unless some vile reason, such as was in the genius of the Hebrew language usually designated πορνεία [fornication], demanded it. See Valerius Maximus, Bk. IX, chap. ii. He goes on to say that not even among the early Christians was divorce except for adultery absolutely unlawful (as is shown by Code, V. xvii. 8, a law passed by a most Christian emperor), until the popes in their superstition and iniquity declared it a tie to be severed only by death.

¹ [For peccatis read peccatis.—Tr.]

² [For in in read in.—Tr.]

Buxtorfius, De Sponsalibus et Divortiiis, shows, in opposition to most of the Jews, that the words of Moses in Deuteronomy, xxiv. 1-4, contain only the one command, that a man who had once dismissed his wife should not take her again to his bed. That the custom of dismissing wives was in that passage neither approved by Moses, nor clearly disapproved, but left, as it were, open; and when our Saviour says that it was allowed them for the hardness of their hearts, he does not mean that the Mosaic permission approved, but only tolerated and connived at it, thereby merely freeing it from any punishment in a court of law. Add especially the full discussion by Grotius on Matthew, v. 31-2.

24. John Milton in a special work, On [the Doctrine and Discipline of] Divorce, perhaps because irritated by his own domestic infelicity, goes to great pains to prove that even by the principles of the Christian faith intolerable habits and disparity, coupled with incompatibility of disposition between husband and wife, are a sufficient cause for divorce, nay, that they who find themselves so ill-mated are under every obligation to separate. It will not be tedious to review the principal reasons which he adduces.

At the outset he lays down this presupposition:

[. . .] God, in the first ordaining of marriage, taught us to what end he did it, in words expressly implying the apt and cheerful conversation of man with woman, to comfort and refresh him against the evil of solitary life, not mentioning the purpose of generation till afterwards, as being but a secondary end in dignity [. . .].¹

This hypothesis appears to us to be false. For they are not distinct ends when God desires to create a helpmeet for Adam and join her to him, and then commands them to increase and multiply, but by the later words are described the first fruits arising from the helpmeet lent him by favour of God's benediction. And surely if a happy association had been the primary purpose of God, what need would there have been of different sexes? For if you should remove the procreation of offspring and the pleasure with which nature endows it in order to promote the union of the two sexes, men would rather gather by themselves and could find of their own number a more practical helpmeet. Therefore, boys before they experience the desires of love, and old men who are past it, are more drawn to association with their own sex than with women. And Milton dreams about some undefined delights of association, and creates for himself an ideal of a wife highly suited to the genius of a wise and literary man, who can make herself a companion of his studies or refresh him, when wearied, with merry jests, and cheer him, when oppressed with cares and sadness, by her polished conversation. Yet just as no wise man would deny that the pleasure of the mind in its infinite forms is preferable to the momentary tickling of the senses, so since there are so few who are blest with that sublimer wisdom, you will find few marriages of wise men which might not be dissolved on this score. Nay, if there is any man so highly endowed that he holds the procreation of offspring as of little or no worth, and feels none of the urges which can be allayed only in the company of women, my advice to him would be that he by no means take to himself a wife. For as a rule the wisdom of such men holds no charms for women, while it is not at all strange that they in their turn are little loved by such nerveless and morose men.

¹ [Milton's own words. Vol. II (Bowles and Dearborn, Boston, 1826), p. 86.—Tr.]

Finally, no matter how such men may excuse their feeling that the association of women rather than men was instituted as a solace for life, they can advance no other reason than because nature has endowed men and women with a singular leaning toward each other, resulting from their difference in sex. It may, therefore, be better to keep our philosophy on lower levels, and, taking into account the common genius of women, hold that a woman does her share for her husband when she devotes her energies to bringing forth and rearing children, and to undertaking her share of the labour of the house, even though she may otherwise offer little aid in matters of philosophy. Surely there is much in what Juvenal¹, Satires, VI [448 ff.], says:

Let not the wife of your bosom possess a special style of her own; let her not hurl at you in whirling speech the crooked enthymeme! Let her not know all history; let there be some things in her reading which she does not understand. I hate a woman who is for ever consulting and poring over the 'Grammar' of Palaemon, who observes all the rules and laws of language. [. . .] Let husbands at least be permitted to make slips in grammar. (R.)

On the Brahmans Strabo, Bk. XV [i], says: 'With their wives the Brahmans do not philosophize, lest they tell to the uninitiated their secret lore, if they be evil; or else, if they be good, lest they abandon them. For he who despises pleasure and pain, and so likewise life and death, is unwilling to be subject to another.' Euripides, Hippolytus [640-1]:

¹ [For Juvenalis read Juvenalis.—Tr.]

In mine house
Ne'er dwell one wiser than is woman's due. (W.)

Of Milton's arguments in general it is to be observed that they prove nothing at all, if, indeed, it be clearly established that Christ wished no cause to suffice for divorce save adultery. For in that case the common saying will obtain, 'It is, indeed, hard, but it is the law.' So also human laws, which in their general application are for the good of the state, are not at once abrogated if they cause some hardship for one man or another, for that must be regarded as an inevitable misfortune. And so what Milton accomplishes is no more than this, that if the decision of the Saviour may bear another interpretation it would appear more agreeable to the compassion of the teaching of the Gospel, to follow a meaning more lenient than the one commonly accepted.

His arguments sum up to something like this: Disparity of dispositions, stubbornness of mind such as makes association with some certain man impossible, and cannot be corrected, and whatever else 603 interferes with the primary good of marriage, namely, helpfulness and diversion, constitute a far more weighty cause for divorce than a natural defect, or ill-health, or any repulsive feature of the body, because of which the Jews, on the basis of Deuteronomy, xxiv, allowed divorce. Furthermore, no partnership binds members together contrary to the primary purpose of its formation, or the intention and expectation of each or one of the members. But now God wished to join to man not a domestic tormentor, but a helpmate who would minister to him not alone in giving him children, but in rearing them, and would cling to him through life; and this end an intolerable harshness of nature and manners destroys. It seems absurd, that, although the canon law has without scruple declared impotence to be a sufficient cause to dissolve marriage, it should take no account of manners, especially since the former can be immediately discovered, while the latter are usually entirely concealed and covered for a time, until the victim has fallen into the meshes which cannot be broken. It is contrary to the law of charity, it is inhuman, in any way to bind a man to miseries which can be ended only by death, and for which a perfectly easy remedy could be found, were it not for that severe positive law; since it appears that God Himself in promulgating His laws accommodated Himself to human frailty. Among other reasons for marriage the Sacred Scriptures recommend it for the avoiding of the temptations arising from an incontinent life. But he who finds nothing in marriage in which his mind can acquiesce, whose whole life is a thing of loathing because of his wife, is vexed with far more serious temptations than if he had remained a bachelor. For he is ever ill at ease and because his wife yields him no pleasure, his passions yearn to break out elsewhere. Among the reasons for the law on divorce Maimonides adds this as well: That peace and quiet may the more easily be preserved in individual households. In the same way Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. I, chap. iii, says that no law can be more holy than that of God on divorces, whether to check the pride of women, or to control the wrath of men. But since this reason applies as well to Christians as formerly to Jews, it does not appear likely¹ that God wished to lay a heavier yoke on the former than the latter.

(Thus Bernhard Varenius, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xii, says that divorces are extremely common among the Japanese, although the nobles keep the unloved wife in their houses and provide for her needs. The result is that the women make every effort to understand the manners of their husbands, so that with this knowledge they may do what is gratifying and pleasing to them, and omit nothing which might avail to win back to them their husband's attentions. Nay, not only do they make no complaints to those who have turned away from them, but even affect grief, so that by the charm of their association and the promptness of their services, they may win back the love of their husbands.)

The Sacred Scriptures command us to remove all hindrances to piety, among which the chief in all likelihood is the moroseness of a partner who can in no way be corrected or escaped. Yet it is repugnant to nature to join dispositions that cannot be adapted to each other in an irrevocable bond. The Christian emperors judge that a plot undertaken against one's life is a ground for divorce. And yet how many have had their life shortened by such ceaseless jarrings! Finally, marriage is a society or partnership between individuals. Yet when human societies are bound together by a moral tie, it is more a union of minds than of bodies. For were this not true, nothing remains to them but a joining of bodies in no way superior to that of the beasts, since among many of the animals something like kindness is discernible between mates². When, therefore, the mind does not find that fitting and due union which it seeks in marriage, a pair so badly matched 604 passes its life more in a prison than in a human society. And since vows that are strengthened by an oath can be broken, when they are not germane to the case in hand, or are prejudicial to a third party, why cannot also the marriage agreement? It is idle to reply that unfortunate marriages are given by God to develop men's patience, for diseases and other calamities are sent of heaven, and yet men are not forbidden to resist them with the means at their disposal.

He then discusses at length the permission of divorce among the Jews. For if, he says, it be in its own nature adultery for either party, upon being separated, to marry again, it follows that Moses authorized adultery as though by a holy law. Yet to hold this of that law which has God as its author is both absurd and impious.

¹ [For verosimile read verisimile.—Tr.]

² [For comparcs read compares.—Tr.]

He also denounces those who think that the Jews lay under a divine dispensation. He observes that a dispensation may be so denominated either properly or improperly. The latter is a special and exceptional law, such as Numbers, ix. 6 ff., whereby a man is for a just and fair cause exempt from the requirements of a general law. Another such is the law on marrying the wife of a brother who died without issue. A dispensation properly so called applies only in special and unusual cases, and such as are, for that reason, rarely set forth in law, but are left to the charity and prudence of judges; for instance, the permission for David, when hungry, to eat of the shewbread. And so this last dispensation is nothing other than an interpretation of the law on the principles of equity.

Here it is patent that Milton confuses dispensation with equity, which are two very different things. And yet if any man would endeavour to maintain that divorce among the Jews was by way of dispensation, he must first have shown that there was at that time a general law to the effect that marriages could not be dissolved on the ground of manners, which law must have been either of nature or a positive one of God. For regarding the words, 'and the two shall be one flesh', some hold that there is meant the very closest form of society or union, which it would be neither fitting nor advantageous to mankind to have rashly dissolved. Yet it does not follow from this that the union in question cannot be dissolved for causes which subvert the nature and end of marriage. Thus God joins husband and wife, and yet it does not follow that it is not left to man's own choice whom he may wish to marry, or that no pact need intervene between the pair. The proper conclusion to be drawn is: God joins husband and wife by an intervening pact; therefore, He does not wish them to part unless that pact has been violated.

Milton then inquires into the opinion of those who say that divorces are only permitted by divine law but not approved. He feels that such a view is lacking in reverence for God, since it is a witness to a ruler's weakness for him to permit to his subjects what he himself does not approve. And how does it come that so many Christian nations for all these centuries have been able to accommodate themselves to this law, and the Jews alone, for their σκληροκαρδία [hardness of heart], could not?

On the words 'In the beginning it was not so', some descant as follows: In the state of innocence the manners of mankind were more agreeable and yielding, so that there could arise no opportunity for such great disagreements. Therefore, it witnesses to human imperfection that men and women had to have recourse to the remedy of divorce.

Finally, the same author censures the view of those who assert that divorce was permitted the Jews because they had become accustomed to it in Egypt. For when the remembrance of their bondage in Egypt was still fresh in their minds, would have been the most opportune time to cure them of it. And the very reason why such specific laws were passed on the avoidance of idolatry, was because they had witnessed the daily practice of it by the Egyptians.

But such matters as these we leave without decision.

25. Of those who will properly enter upon marriage, natural law requires both physical aptitude and moral ability or suitableness. By the former we understand such a constitution of body as fits a person to attain the primary end of marriage, which is the procreation of offspring. Zosimus, Bk. V[xxviii]: 'To give an immature maiden to the marriage-bed is nothing other than a breach of nature's law.' And so it is vain for those to aspire to marriage who labour under a permanent and incurable impotence, such as eunuchs and the like. For it is without doubt repugnant to natural law that eunuchs, as not experienced in all the pleasures of venery, used to marry in Egypt, as is recounted by Grotius on Deuteronomy, xxiii. 2, on the basis of Genesis, xxxix. 1. In which connexion the question might be raised, as to whether it can properly be called marriage when a decrepit old man marries an elderly woman past the age of child-bearing. Indeed we are told by Plutarch, Apophthegms [p. 175 F], that when Dionysius was asked by his ancient mother to secure a husband for her he replied, 'I can break the laws of the state, but not those of nature'. Here may be applied the statement of Quintilian, Declamations, cccvi: 'There is a certain immodesty even about marriage.' Many also hold to another saying of the same author, Declamations, ii [14]: An old man that marries again is a pitiful kind of creature, for it is with but frigid powers that we conceive a very violent passion for a wife's love. Compare Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. vii, § 4. Yet in most states such matches are countenanced, because at least one of the ends of marriage, mutual assistance, can be secured. See Code, V. iv. 27. You may not inaptly denominate them honorary marriages, in the sense in which some men are called 'honorary', who are given the title of an office without the actual performance. In Suetonius, Nero, chap. xxxv, such barren matings are called the 'insignia of wifehood', in the sense in which men used to speak of the insignia of triumphs. Here you may refer the cohabitation of Abishag with David, in 1 Kings, i, although it appears that Solomon held it a true marriage, having Adonijah slain, when he asked to marry her, on the ground that a marriage with the king's widow was a threat of civil war, and because it was forbidden in that nation to marry the widows of the king. Grotius on 1 Kings, ii. 17.

26. It is also presupposed in marriage, from the nature of pacts in general, that in the agreement to it there should be present a sufficient use of reason, and no taint of error as touching its substance, and of unjust compulsion by fear. On the last consideration it was a special point in the civil laws of the Hebrews, that, if a maiden had been led to betrothal by force or fear, the arrangements were void, but not if the youth made such a claim, since there was not an equal presumption that force or fear were used upon him, while he was able to repudiate her if he did not like the new state. Selden, Marriage and Divorce among the Hebrews, Bk. II, chap. iv. Thus, if there is an error in the object of the consent, or in the person, or in some quality which concerns either the marriage itself, or what by way of condition the consent was based upon, especially when there intervenes some practice of fraud by the other party, it is patent that the marriage contract is void. Therefore, if a bride posed as a virgin and was upon marriage found to be otherwise, their sacred law not only legalized a divorce but also made her liable to punishment in addition. Although the ancient heathen nations paid little attention to virginity, as may be seen from the customs of the Baleares in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. V, chap. xviii; of the Armenians and Lydians in Strabo, Bk. XI, and in Herodotus of the Babylonians (Book I), of the Thracians (V), of the Adyrmachidae and Nasamones (IV). The sordid tale of Aristippus is in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. II [74]. Add the comments of Boethornius on Suetonius, Caligula, chap. xl, at the end; Justin, Bk. XVIII, chap. v, § 4; Paul of Venice, Bk. II, chap. xxxvii, on the customs of the inhabitants of Tebeth, and chap. xxxix, on those of Caraia. A similar depravity among the Phoenicians was abolished by Constantine the Great; Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. I, chap. viii; Bk. V, chap. ix.

- 606 Thus, if a man has added an express clause to a marriage pact that such a person will be his wife if she be of noble birth, if she bring a certain dowry, he will surely¹ not be obligated to consummate the marriage until that condition appear. Yet if a man fail to inquire about the existence of that condition and consummate the marriage, he will appear to have tacitly renounced that condition; and so if what was hoped for does not later appear, it will by no means furnish cause sufficient for divorce. For the agreement did not run, 'I will divorce you, if you do not bring me a certain dowry', but, 'I will not marry you, if you do not bring me a certain dowry', which is something quite different. Therefore, if a man's first interest in a marriage concerns his bride's fortune, he plays the fool if he goes through with the ceremony before he has made sure of it. Especially since many of those who arrange matches fit the character given them by Libanius, Progymnasmata [Chriae, i. 10]: 'He who comes with a long and beautiful speech already made up, clearing away what actually exists and introducing what was not already there, readily reconciles nations.'

¹ [For utiquē read utique.—Tr.]

Much less will it be possible either to break off a betrothal or to refuse to consummate it, when it has been properly engaged, if a man has not agreed upon a definite dowry, but snatched at only a tacit hope of fortune without investigating it. So the ephors were justified in fining the man who promised to marry the daughter of Lysander while he was still alive, but refused to do so when it was discovered that her father had died in poverty. Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. VI, chap. iv.

These principles hold good only in natural law, for civil laws can provide that such conditions may not hinder consummation of marriage, since they have no direct bearing upon it.

27. The moral ability to marry is lacking in those women who are already married to another man. For the right of the husband over such a woman lasts so long as he has not renounced it. Therefore, marriage with a woman already married and not yet formally released from her husband is not only unlawful but useless, both because the power of entering a new marriage is wanting in a woman already bound to another man, and because all cohabitation with such is continued adultery. So also where polygamy is forbidden, a man marries in sin when he is already bound to a wife. By the Hebrew law it was also unlawful for a man to marry a second time her whom he had once divorced. Deuteronomy, xxiv. 4. It was without question thought that divorces would not be so frequently sought out of hand and on slight occasion, if there was no hope of getting back, when the first burst of passion had spent itself, her who had once been dismissed from the home. Grotius in commenting on this passage adds this reason: 'Because it has the appearance of lending to another one's own wife, and all kinds of pandering¹ might be hidden under such a veil.' Yet some feel that by Jeremiah, iii. 12, it was allowable to take her back before she had in the meantime married another.

The Koran allows one to take back his wife, even when she has been dismissed three times, provided in the meantime another has married and then cast her off. But that this is an unworthy practice may be inferred from the reply of Amurath to Tamerlane: 'If he does not come as he threatens, may he take back his wife after he has thrice dismissed her.' Laonicus Chalcocondylas², Bk. III. Another law of the Koran is that he who will dismiss his wife must set for her a certain time during which she shall not marry another, as though he would consider for so long whether he wishes to receive her back.

There is also a Hebrew law worth noticing, as given by Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. IV, chap. viii: 'If a man be not to marry a virgin, let him not take to wife a woman whom he has persuaded to leave another man, nor let him embitter the life of her former husband.' (W.) And reason sides with the Christian canons which forbid a man marrying

¹ [For leocinia read lenocinia.—Tr.]

² [For Chalcondilam read Chalcocondylam.—Tr.]

607 another man's wife with whom he has committed adultery. Decretum, II. xxxi. 1, 2 ff. Especially since the words of Euripides, Electra [921 ff.], usually hold true:

Let whoso draggeth down his neighbour's wife
To folly, and then must take her for his own,
Know himself dupe, who deemeth that to him
She shall be true, who to her lord was false. (W.)

28. It is also held that marriage between individuals joined by certain degrees of relationship or kinship (see Digest, XXXVIII. x. 4, §§ 3, 4, 5) is unholy, so that not only at the outset is such a marriage forbidden, but for all its duration it labours under a perpetual taint. Now although it is found that this view is commonly held by all peoples whose moral code is at all advanced, yet it is not so easy to assign for it a firm reason, and such as may proceed, like other precepts, from the social nature of man. Some in discussing this simply fall back upon an abhorrence of men's affections, as though all men not corrupted by ill rearing or vicious habits, instinctively feel something repugnant in such mating, which is a sure witness that natural law forbids it. And yet such abhorrence in the feelings is not to be found equally among all peoples, not even among those who are inclined to culture, and to those who assert this it can be said not improperly in reply, that such abhorrence may come not so much from some innate principle as from custom and training which often pass for nature's dictates. Nor is it altogether safe, in eliciting the law of nature, to consult the mere judgement of the senses and passions, since the opposite conclusion can be reached, that all things to which the senses and passions are strongly attracted are enjoined by the law of nature, while most of them are in fact clearly opposed to that law.

Plutarch, Roman Questions, cviii, after wondering why the Romans did not marry their near relatives, with some diffidence, after his manner, suggests the following reasons:

Do they wish to increase by marriage the size of their families and the number of their relatives by giving wives to and taking them from other families? Or are they afraid of the quarrels which take place in marriage between near kin, and fearful lest these should destroy even the natural rights? (Because, for example, hatreds are so common between mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law, and so a man should not marry one who already on natural grounds owes his mother respect, that is, his sister.) Or do they consider that the weakness of women puts them in need of many protectors, and so did not wish to let near kinsfolk marry, so that if the husbands ill-treat their wives, their relations may protect them? (R.)

The latter reason seems to be drawn from Euripides, *Andromacha*¹, lines 674 [675-6]:

In <the husband's> hands is o'er-mastering strength,
But upon friends and parents leans <the wife's> cause. (W.*)

¹ [For Andromachi read Andromache.—Tr.]

The former reason, that, namely, of contracting friendships more widely by alliances, also receives the approbation of Augustine, On the City of God, Bk. XV, chap. xvi, which is cited by Gratian, Decretum, II. xxxv. 1, with whom in turn Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. vii, § 9, agrees. Yet not to mention the fact that what is less advantageous is not for that reason unlawful, what is useful is not always obtained by this rule, since it is quite possible that a greater advantage would come from the very opposite course; for instance, should the nearest relatives marry among themselves, their wealth would be prevented from passing to another family. Hence the law of God in Numbers, xxxvi, enjoined women who held immovable property, to take husbands only from their nearest of kin, so that the lands would not pass from one tribe to another, although they could marry any 608 Hebrew they pleased, provided they renounced their inheritance. But the women of the tribe of Levi were not constrained by this law, since they were unable to hold land. See Grotius on Matthew, i. 16.

Among the inhabitants of Peru under the rule of the Incas, a law forbade men to take wives within their own city and family; yet the young couple were presented by their fellow citizens with a house, and with it furnishings by their nearest relatives. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. IV, chap. viii. By the law of Athens girls who were ἐπίκλητοι [the sole heirs of their parents] were commanded to marry among their nearest kin, that the ancestral estate might be kept in the family. And since such girls were often the objects of quarrels among their suitors, quarrels which had to be settled in court, they used to be called ἐπίδικοι [objects of suits]. Yet there was another law of Athens which served as a kind of compensation for the first, that if such an heiress be left with little means, her nearest relative had either to marry her or to furnish her with a suitable dowry. A similar law of Charondas is in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. xviii.

29. We must in this connexion consider first of all why, in view of the fact that it is a worthy task in itself to propagate so noble a being as man, among more advanced peoples such great modesty surrounds both the generative organs and the act itself, that only those can overcome it whose shame has been lost in a life of immorality. Worthy of record in this connexion is a story of the maidens of Miletus in Plutarch, On Noble Traits of Women [p. 249 c]; and Polyænus, Strategemata, Bk. VIII [lxiii]. When for some unknown reason they were seized with a frenzy to hang themselves, and could in no way be prevented from doing so, a law was finally passed ordering that all the bodies of those who had encompassed their death in this way should be borne to burial naked through the market-place. So fear of a disgraceful burial recalled them to sanity, when death could not.

Indeed, when nakedness or open indulgence has been practised among any nations, such customs have been condemned by the rest as a blot of base barbarism. Mela, Bk. I, chap. xix, reports of the Mossynians that 'they lie with each other promiscuously and openly'; and the same people are thus described by Apollonius Rhodius, Argonautic Expedition, Bk. II [1017 ff.]:

And strange are their customs and laws. Whatever it is right to do openly before the people or in the market-place, all this they do in their homes, but whatever acts we perform at home, these they perform out of doors in the midst of the streets, without blame. And among them is no reverence for the marriage-bed, but, like swine that feed in herds, no whit abashed in others' presence, on the earth they lie with the women. (S.)

The same account is given by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIV, chap. xxxi; and of the Massagetæ¹ by Xenophon, Anabasis, Bk. V, and Herodotus, Bk. I, towards the end, while the latter, in Book IV, treats of the Nasamones.

Now the reason for this modesty is not so clear; for these members are not signalized by any outstanding deformity or striking unattractiveness, while they serve a most noble function, the propagation of mankind. For this latter reason they were held in sacred veneration by the Egyptians, and by the Athenians in the celebration of their mysteries. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxxviii. Nay, the act of generation in itself conforms to nature, is necessary, and fitted to continue a being of such dignity. Why, then, should a man be any more ashamed of exercising it in the presence of others than of eating and drinking, since the human species can no more be preserved without the former act than individuals without the latter? Nor is much gained by the explanation of Plutarch, Banquet of the Seven Wise Men [xv, p. 158 F]:

For the body there is certainly no pleasure more harmless and commendable and fitting than that which springs from a plentiful table—which is granted by all men; for, placing this in the middle, men converse with one another and share in the provision. As to the pleasures of the bed, men use these in the dark, reputing the use thereof no less shameful and beastly than the total disuse of the pleasures of the table. (G.)

609 Although in Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio's History, Severus [LXXVI. xvi], the wife of the Scotch chieftain Argetocoxus, when taxed by Julia Augusta because the women of her nation mingled so boldly with the men, replied to her very wittily: 'We fulfil the necessities of nature in a much better way than you Roman women. We have dealings openly with the best of men, whereas you let yourselves be debauched in secret by the vilest.' (F.) Montaigne, Essais, Bk. II, chap. xii, p. 398; Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxii.

Nor do those who take refuge in the statement of Holy Writ, to the effect that this shame arose immediately after the fall, contribute anything to the matter. For the question still remains why modesty fastened only upon these parts, since a man's hand and tongue are as instant in service upon our disorderly and base desires. Nay, since man's first disobedience came of eating, that evil reputation should apparently have first fallen upon the mouth and the act of eating.

¹ [For Massa getis read Massagetis.—Tr.]

30. The author of De Principiis Justi et Decori [Velthuysen], pp. 59 ff., in theorizing upon nakedness and its accompanying shame, begins by saying, 'Not everything which causes shame is sinful and is forbidden by the dictates of natural law'. He then proves this by some examples; for instance, of poverty, mean attire, an innocent mistake, deformity, and the like, at which we blush although there is actually no moral baseness in them. The reason why we avoid them is because they bespeak some shortcoming and infirmity which every one wishes to hold at arm's length from himself. Now although nakedness and the uncovering of the private parts are not sinful in themselves, yet a man may not reveal them in the sight of others, unless in such an act there be nothing repugnant to natural honour. Yet this is sometimes the case, for a man may well be ashamed when he has such imperfections, or some the disclosure of which could cause his neighbour to despise him or justly and deservedly to esteem him the less, because they do not agree with the dignity of the position which he assumes. Thus it is no disgrace in itself for a man who has never had any education to be ignorant of something, but for him who has long devoted himself to studies and made no advance, ignorance is a cause for shame. Thus plain manners do not ill become a countryman but clownishness among gentler folk is surely unbecoming. The man who uncovers those parts of his body which the custom of his people would have covered, sins against natural honour in so doing. As Herodotus, Bk. I [viii], says: 'Together with her tunic a woman puts off also her modesty.' Yet a person in another country, where men regularly go about naked, as among the Caribbeans, may uncover them without sin or the imputation of wantonness. In some parts of Abyssinia the women of the lower classes go about entirely naked, and yet the men are no more moved at such a sight than if they saw but their hands or feet. Franc. Alvarez, Descriptio Aethiopiae, chap. xxxii; add Jean Lery, Historia Americae [Itinerary], chap. viii; Rochefort, Descriptio Antillarum, Pt. II, chap. ix. In fact, if I am not mistaken, among some Indians, to go about with a loin cloth met with the same penalty as that for adultery.

It is considered imprudent among comparative strangers or men of influence to fail to ask their permission to do what¹ is freely enough done among our acquaintances. And you may not with good breeding do among honourable men, or in a gathering, what you need not be ashamed of when by yourself, unless Claudius finally issued the edict which he considered so long, as given in Suetonius, Claudius, chap. xxxii. Add Diogenes Laertius, Bk. VI, in the life of Metrocles.² Thus

¹ [For quæ read quae.—Tr.]

² [For Metrolis read Metroclis.—Tr.]

610 a teacher of anatomy lays out before the eyes what it would be disgraceful even to name, save by reason of his profession; and the same should be said about the disclosure of one's genitals. For although that nation must have cast off all modesty in their manners which does not hold the display of them disgraceful—since civilized nations are careful even in death εὐσχήμως πεσεῖν, 'to fall decorously' (Euripides, Hecuba, line 568)—nor was it without heinous sin that their ancestors arrived at such immodesty, yet after this custom has taken such firm root that in the eyes of all the nation such a mode of living was freed from all censure, the whole people can appear in such fashion without stain of sin, inasmuch as they recognize in it no more the shortcoming or weakness at which a man should blush, than do we in looking upon the faces of women in public, for which, however, women are severely criticized by other peoples. Plato, in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. III [86], in speaking of an ἀγγραφος [unwritten] law which obtains by use, gives as an illustration 'not to come naked into the market-place'. But even among peoples where nakedness is forbidden, such members may sometimes be uncovered without sin, when, for instance, they must be treated by a physician, or necessity does not allow time or provision for covering, or when infants are wrapped in swaddling clothes; for in such cases there ceases to be any censure of shamelessness, since the members are shown without wantonness and display. Therefore, since among some barbarian peoples the nakedness of the genitals is not censured as an infirmity or flaw, the display of them involves no crime of immodesty, nor does any man among them fall under contempt for that reason, as is regularly the case with us. Thus among the Pygmies, 'where a whole regiment is no more than a foot high',¹ their stature is no cause for shame, although others make sport of it. Nay, among the Casares, when the women have been given some present, they entirely uncover themselves as a sign of their civility. Herbert, Itinerarium Persicum et Indicum [Travels], p. 21.

The same author, p. 240, makes a similar statement: That the uncovering of the genitals is not base in itself, but only according to the circumstances, which depend upon the lust of those nearby, or their position, or one's own esteem, for which every man should look out for himself. But because of the variation in the external signs, by which we show respect and honour to one nearby, many things may with one people imply disgrace for one nearby, or for oneself, which do not have that character under different circumstances. And so in John, xxi. 7, on the approach of the Master Peter makes haste to put on his cloak, although he had not been ashamed to go about his fishing naked with his companions; for the dignity of Christ to whom Peter owed respect, required that in his converse with his Master he conduct himself with modesty and dignity, which in the eyes of people who go clothed was not possible were one naked. Therefore, at Rome, 'Sons grown to manhood, never bathed with their parents, nor sons-in-law with their father-in-law.' Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I, chap. xxxv; Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. i, § 7. So in Livy, Bk. III, chap. xxvi, the ambassadors 'command L. Quintius to don his toga and hear the orders of the senate'. We are not ashamed to go about our house in old clothes, which, however, it is indecorous for one to wear to a wedding or formal gathering. Matthew, xxii. 12. So also some things are done in secret the performance of which in public would be most disgraceful; nay, it is not improper for others to know why we are retiring. Finally, many things may be done without censure by men which would be considered brazen for maidens.

¹ [From Juvenal, Satires, xiii. 173.—Tr.]

He concludes from 2 Corinthians, xi. 17 and 19, that after a request for pardon, and upon its being granted by another, something may properly be said or done which would have been improper without it, 611 such a thing being improper not in itself but only from the circumstances, upon the removal of which it can no longer be censured under that head. For the other person remits, as it were, the respect which was otherwise due to him. Yet in this connexion he rightly adds the proviso, that it be the universal custom of the nation for men to grant each other this liberty, for were this not the case, individuals may not avoid the censure of immodesty, when they grant each other such freedom from respect. Thus if debauchees agree to go about naked in their own company, they do not escape censure among a people whose custom is to go about clothed.

He ends with the conclusion that our first parents before their sin were as regards shame like children; but when they had sinned, a sense of shame came over their minds, as a result of which they recognized that it was indecent for them to go about naked, just as we conclude as we grow up. And his conclusion from all of this is that the law of nature fixes no degrees about the act of marriage, but that it is only agreeable to natural honour that it be restrained within some degrees. Compare also Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xxxv; Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. vi.

31. Although there plainly appears to be much good sense in all this, yet we feel that we can best assign two reasons for that modesty about the genitals and the act of procreation. Firstly, because man is a proud animal, desirous of renown and seemliness and averse to all that makes against them. Now it is by these and neighbouring parts that nature casts forth the refuse of our food and drink which are loathsome to man, not because of their qualities alone, but also because they seem to offer reproach to his condition, since the daintiest food is changed within his body into such filthy matter. Therefore, the proud nature of man is always solicitous that such indications of his weakness go entirely concealed. This is the force of 1 Corinthians, xii. 23-4. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xxxv]:

Nature seems to have paid a great regard to the form of our bodies, by exposing to the sight all that part of our figure that has a beautiful appearance, while she has covered and concealed those parts which were given for the necessity of nature, and which would have been offensive and disagreeable to the sight. This careful contrivance of nature has been imitated by the modesty of mankind. (E.)

These remarks seem to be derived from Xenophon, Memorabilia, I [iv. 6]. Add Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. I, chap. xviii.

Herodotus, Bk. II [xxxv], tells of the Egyptians that they relieve themselves at home, but eat in the streets, giving as the reason: 'What is unseemly but necessary ought to be done in secret, but what has nothing unseemly about it, should be done openly.' (R.) Although I may add, in passing, that the same people were laughed at for working their clay with their hands and their bread with their feet. Thus in Sadi, A Persian Rosegarden, chap. viii, there is given as the reason for rings being worn on the left hand, although it is less honourable than the right, that 'the highest distinction for the right hand is its own dexterity'. For the same reason, it is said, the inhabitants of Borneo always cleaned themselves with the left hand, because, as they maintain, the right is for their mouth. Here belongs what Aloysius Cadamustus, Navigatio, chap. x, recounts of the Azenagians, inhabitants of the kingdom of Senegal: 'They are as much ashamed of their mouth as of their privates, and keep it covered as a thing of shame, because, as they say, it sends forth an odour like a fetid sink; nor do they uncover it except to eat and drink.' The same account is given also by Leo of Africa, Bk. I, who, however, calls the tribe Zenagates.

612 In the second place, because, after our passions were corrupted by the fall, our depraved lusts yearn to break forth in great violence through those parts, and, because all becoming order in human society hinges upon the condition that the propagation of offspring be guarded by sacred laws, nature, studious to preserve its dignity and at the same time to guard against occasions of unlawful or untimely venery, devised that modesty whereby those parts would be carefully covered, in order that they might not, by their continued exposure to the eyes, arouse the lust that waits for any call, and in order that unlawful venery might be the less indulged in, inasmuch as the delicate feelings of that modesty would restrict even lawful venery to places of secrecy out of human sight. Therefore, after the harmony of our first parent's affection had become depraved, and they had observed that their disordered lusts built a passageway, as it were, for themselves by those parts, they were overcome by a worthy shame at discovering in themselves so great an imperfection, for which they set about to devise some sort of cure by way of coverings. And I should judge that the original reason why that shame of nakedness disappeared among many nations was poverty, when men were driven into barren regions and could find no material for other garments, when what they had wore out, and, in fact, felt no need for any in the pleasant climate. And so their modesty passed away with their clothing, although some of them kept a little of it by covering their loins with a small cloth, from which it was but an easy passage to entire nakedness.

Furthermore, that modesty is greatly increased before those persons for whom we owe some natural reverence, or in whose presence we should conduct ourselves with dignity, such as our parents, and children in particular. And so the man who is not restrained by it so as to hesitate before that familiar joining of bodies, may be held to have a brazen character and such as would not stop at any other villainy as well; who, indeed, in the words of Euripides, Medea, line 471, suffers from that which is:

[. . .] Of all plagues infecting men, the worst,
Even shamelessness. (W.)

Huarte, Scrutinium Ingeniorum, chap. i, at the beginning, advances another reason for that modesty, which we have not now the time to put to the test.

32. This modesty appears to be not the least reason why the law of nature itself is held to forbid marriage between kindred in the direct ascending and descending lines, especially since there never was, and probably never can be, a case when such would have to be allowed in order to preserve the human race. For the daughters of Lot, in Genesis, xix. 31, were too eager with their solicitude, although Grotius in commenting on that passage, feels that they thought that lawful which they knew to be the common practice of the neighbouring Arabs, as was also the custom of the Persians as well. And in this sense is to be taken also the reason advanced by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 12: 'The son, being by the law of marriage superior, cannot show toward his mother, as his wife, the reverence which nature demands, nor the daughter to her father, since she, although inferior by the law of marriage, is prevented from showing reverence, because of that familiar relation necessitated by her marriage to him. Yet were that modesty of which we have spoken, removed, it would not be so absurd for a mother to be joined to a son of legal age, since it is agreeable for a husband to show his mother reverence, because of her virtue, wisdom, or nobility. Tacitus, Agricola [vi], observes of his wife's parents: 'Their life was singularly harmonious, thanks to mutual affection and alternate self-sacrifice.' (H.) Much more could a daughter-wife show her father-husband filial reverence along with conjugal obedience, did not modesty prevent her. The objection of Socrates in Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. IV, is barren enough, as though there were nothing else in the marriages of parents and children deserving of censure, than their disparity of age, which would mean either sterility or ill-formed offspring. And as though there were not any number of marriages in which the ages range from that of complete puberty to as many years as parents can be separated from their children.

613¹ But we must in this connexion praise the chaste rules of the Roman laws, whereby, because of nothing else than the reverence due to the name of father, they declared void all marriages between a father and his adopted daughter, even after the rights due to adoption had been given up by her emancipation. See Digest, XXIII. ii. 55. And when a certain woman refused to acknowledge her son, and the arguments on each side were indecisive, Claudius acquitted himself better than was his wont in forcing her to confess, by commanding her to marry the youth. Suetonius, Claudius, chap. xv.

Some have also tried to show how the unseemliness of such marriages would lead to the confusion of the different words of relationship. Thus Myrrha argues with herself in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. X [346 ff.]: 'Think how many ties, how many names you are confusing! Will you be the rival of your mother, the mistress of your father? Will you be called the sister of your son, the mother of your brother?' (M.) Oedipus is thus described in Seneca, Phoenician² Women [134 ff.]:

He was his grandsire's son-in-law, and yet
His father's rival; brother of his sons,
And father of his brothers; at one birth
The granddame bore unto her husband sons,
And grandsons to herself. (M.)

In the Agamemnon [34-6], of the same author, Thyestes says:

Then were the laws of nature backward turned:
I mingled sire with grandsire, sons with grandsons;
Yea, monstrous! husband and father did I join. (M.)

An old epitaph runs as follows:

Here I lie, Hersilus, and by me rests Marulla, my sister, mother, and wife. Do you think I lie, and do you frown, and treat this as a riddle of the Sphinx? Nay, but it is truer than the Pythian tripod. My father begat me by her who was his daughter, and then we wedded. And so she was sister, wife, and the one who gave me birth.³

Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [III. iii], in the midst of an invective against the Persians, who allowed marriage with one's mother, adds:

And yet what can be a more flagitious act of impiety than to defile the bed of one's father after he is dead, which it would be right rather to preserve untouched, as sacred;

¹ [For '913' read '613'.—Tr.]

² [For Phaenissis read Phoenissis.—Tr.]

³ [From Del Rio's commentary on Seneca's Thebaid [Phoenician Women], 134, but it is almost certainly a forgery. Hersilus is not an old Latin name.—Tr.]

and to feel no respect [. . .] for one's mother, and for the same man to be both the son and the husband of the same woman, and again for the same woman to be both the mother and wife of the same man, and for the children of the two to be the brothers of their father and the grandsons of their mother, and for that same woman to be both the mother and grandmother of those whom she has brought forth, and for the man to be at the same time both the father and the uterine brother of those whom he has begotten? (Y.)

No less detestable is what they tell of the inhabitants of the island of Ceylon, that a father always deflowers his daughter at the time of her marriage, giving the preposterous reason that it is but fair that he pluck the first fruits of a tree of his own planting. The same vile excuse was offered by Shah Jehan for his incest, in Bernier, De Rebus in Regno Mogolis.

33. The Hebrews on this question took refuge not so much in natural reason as in the original prohibition of God. For they said that from the beginning of the world six kinds of conjunction were forbidden by God: With one's mother, step-mother, another's wife, a sister by one's mother, another man, and a beast. And they concluded from Genesis, ii. 24: 'Therefore shall a man leave the bed¹ of his father' (that is, he shall abstain from his father's wife, or his step-mother) 'and shall cleave unto his wife' (not another's wife, and not a male), 'and the two shall be one flesh' (therefore, one must abstain from a beast, since a man cannot unite with such into one flesh). Selden, Bk. V, chaps. i and ii. Yet it is a strange thing which the same author recounts (chap. xviii), to the effect that they believed that when a Gentile became a proselyte of righteousness, every relationship, by which he was before bound to other Gentiles by blood or marriage, vanished. Nay, they said that as soon as those who were before blood kinsmen, such as mother, son, or daughter, were admitted to Judaism, the right of relationship at once expired between them, so that henceforward they were as aliens to each other. For they felt that by reception into the Jewish faith a man was entirely regenerated and, as it were, made a new-born babe. The same thing appears to be hinted at by Tacitus, Histories, Bk. V. v: 'The first thing instilled into their proselytes is to despise the gods, to abjure their country, to set at naught parents, children, brothers.' (O.) Therefore a proselyte had no longer a mother, step-mother, and sister, so that no one of these was forbidden to him 614 on the basis of natural kinship; and this was due to the force of their regeneration, by which the proselyte was constituted a new man, as it were, all those rights having been extinguished which depended upon his former birth as a Gentile. All this, they held, proceeded from the divine law. Although in the traditions of their wise men a proselyte was forbidden to marry his mother, or daughter, or sister when likewise proselytes. And if any man while yet a Gentile had married his mother, step-mother, or sister, he was forced to dismiss her upon becoming a proselyte. By a similar consideration a slave, when received into Judaism in his servile condition, was held to have no relationship or right of blood. And so it was not considered unlawful for him to take as a concubine his mother, daughter, or sister, although such practices were forbidden no less to free-born Gentiles than to Jews. The reason for this was that a slave was considered a nobody before the law, and so their marriages stood or were dissolved at the mere will of their masters. Yet by the Roman laws the kinship of slaves in the matter of marriage was as strictly observed as that of free-born. See Digest, XXXVIII. viii. 2, § 1; XXIII. ii. 8, 14, §§ 2, 3; L. xvii. 32. Selden, Bk. V, chap. xvi.

¹ [The text differs markedly from that of the Authorized Version.—Tr.]

We should also note, in passing, what is said of the Chinese, namely, that they refrain from marrying those women who have the same name as themselves, although there be no blood relationship between them. But if they have different names they give little heed to how closely the bride and groom are related in blood, so that girls do not hesitate to marry their mother's brothers. See Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. I.

34. We must next examine other degrees of relationship in a transverse line, as well as relatives by marriage. And we may observe that brothers and sisters are most closely bound to one another, and between them there is observable such a degree of modesty that those who are more sensitively inclined will not willingly meet where the caresses of lovers may happen to be witnessed or even discussed. Nay, even brothers usually avoid any light discussion with each other of the things of sex. The reason for this, according to Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII [p. 838 c], is as follows:

Because every one from his earliest days has heard men saying the same thing about them always and everywhere, whether in comedy or in the graver language of tragedy. When the poet introduces on the stage a Thyestes or an Oedipus, or a Macareus having secret intercourse with his sister, he, when he is found out, is ready to kill himself as the penalty of his sin. (J.*)

And Simplicius on Epictetus, chap. xlvii, says:

Since now law and custom forbid the union¹ of sister and brother, such desires are restrained as though by the command of nature and therefore something unchangeable—save when men are driven by untempered² frenzy and the dire avengers of past crimes.

Compare Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. II, chap. viii, n. 6.

Yet what chiefly prevents us from asserting that marriage between these is of itself contrary to the law of nature, is the fact that, as the Sacred Scriptures describe the beginnings of the human race, there must have been marriage between the children of our first parents, i.e., between brothers and sisters. For it is not likely that God appointed such a case where violence had necessarily to be offered to the law of nature, commanding that the human species be propagated, and yet furnishing no other means for such propagation than marriages of that kind; especially since He was under no necessity of creating but one pair of mortals. Nor do I see why some look upon this reason with such arrogant scorn, especially since the grounds which they adduce for the opposite view, are of no greater worth. They say, 'God wished the entire human race to take its origin from one stem and thus be closely related.' Yet just as their statement really serves our argument, so the relationship would 615 have been near enough had several pairs had the same creator and nature, for the children of the unions between them would have kept the strain much the same. Nor is there any point to their further contention, that, had there been several first pairs, 'the world would have been created in war and destroyed at its very birth'; for, as it was, the first son born killed his brother. Therefore, it must appear that the prohibition of such marriages came from positive law. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. viii, § 9; Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. V, chap. viii.

¹ [For consuetudine read consuetudinem.—Tr.]

² [For intemperie read intemperiae.—Tr.]

Yet some ground for such a prohibition can apparently be found in the facts, first, that there is modesty between brother and sisters, and, second, that this daily and unobserved companionship could easily furnish the occasion for debauchery and adulteries, if such amours could be made permanent by marriage. See Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. IX, lines 458, 535, 558 ff.

In this connexion it is worth while to record from Selden, Bk. V, chap. i, the position of the ancient Hebrews, who reckoned among the six kinds of cohabitation, originally forbidden by God, that with a sister by one's own mother. But they added that this precept exerted its force only after the human race had multiplied, and there were enough other women besides one's sisters. There is an old belief among the peoples of the Orient, that all the children of Adam except Seth were twins; and although it was necessary for brothers to marry their sisters, they carefully refrained from marrying a twin sister, but took one born at another time, avoiding twin sisters. The Hebrews believed, furthermore, that a brother was more closely related to a sister by his own mother than by the father alone. See Deuteronomy, xiii. 6, where brothers of the same mother are apparently more closely joined. And so they held that this first command applied only to the former sisters, and not to the latter, because there was a closer bond between those of the same womb than between those of the same father. And so in their view only a sister by the father could properly be married to a 'descendant of Noah', that is, a Gentile who is under only the law of nature and nations. This was the reason, why, before the law of Moses, Abraham married Sarah, his sister by his father. And lest one might think the word 'sister' in that place meant any kinswoman at all, Abraham says plainly, 'She is indeed my sister, the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother.' Genesis, xx. 12; add Grotius on this passage. Although that such a union was unusual among neighbouring peoples is proved by the fact that Abraham believed he would not be considered Sarah's husband, if he announced that she was his sister; unless we should rather say that the word 'sister' was taken in its common sense as one by both parents.

Some trouble is caused, in this connexion, by 2 Samuel, xiii. 13, where Tamar says to Amnon, her brother by her father, as he was intent upon violating her, 'Speak to the king about marrying me, for he will not withhold me from thee.' For it is not likely that she did not know of the divine law which expressly forbade the marriage of brother and sister by the same father. And it would have been vain for her to wish to avoid her brother's violence in this way, if they could not be wed without violating the law of God, although the opposite view is expressed by Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. VII, chap. vii. Here the Hebrews offer the following solution: Maccah, the mother of Tamar and Absalom, was captured by David in a war against the king of Geshur, and while not yet a proselyte she bore Tamar, and after conversion bore Absalom. Therefore, because they believed, that, when a person passed from heathendom to Judaism, all his former relationships were extinguished, and that offspring from a Gentile mother followed the mother and not the father, and was considered a Gentile, and since Tamar afterward became a proselyte, all her relationship that she had formerly had as a Gentile with Amnon, by reason of their common father, was lost. And so she actually believed that, since her conversion had destroyed all former relationship, she could properly marry 616 Amnon and not sin against the divine law.

Turning to the customs of other nations, we find that in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. IX [457, 458, 537-558], Biblis complains that the laws of men forbade marriages which the gods themselves contracted. [497-9]: 'But the gods have loved their sisters: so Saturn married Ops, blood-kin of his; Oceanus, Tethys;¹ the ruler of Olympus, Juno.' (M.) In Homer, Odyssey, Bk. X [7], the daughters of Aeolus are said to be married to his sons. Theocritus, Idylls, xvii [130-1], speaks thus of the wife of the king Ptolemy: '[. . .] She loveth with her whole heart brother and husband in one. So too in heaven was the holy wedlock accomplished.' (E.) Artemisia was the sister and wife of Mausolus. Lucian, Dialogue between Diogenes and Mausolus. Arrian, Anabasis of Alexander, Bk. I [xxiii], tells us that Hidrieus married his sister Ada 'by the law of the Carians'. Among the ancient Peruvians only the Incas were allowed to marry their sisters, but others were forbidden that practice. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. IV, chap. ix. On the other hand the Romans held such marriages in great disrepute. When Plutarch, Roman Questions [vi, p. 265 c], explains¹ why women saluted their kinsmen with a kiss, he adds:

¹ [For Thetyn read Tethyn.—Tr.]

Is it because marriage between blood relations was not allowed, so that their mutual affection went the length of a kiss and no farther, this alone being retained as a token of relationship and kin? Men did not anciently marry their kinswomen, just as to this day they do not marry their sisters or aunts; cousin-marriage was permitted at a recent date. (R.)

The reason for this last practice may be seen further below in the same connexion.

By a law of Solon the Athenians could marry their sisters germane or consanguine, but not uterine. Therefore, Plutarch, in his life of Themistocles [xxxii], writes that his son Archeptolis married his sister Mnasiptolema 'since he was born of another mother'. Demosthenes, Against Eubulides [20]: 'My grandfather married his sister, but not by the same mother.' It is related in Cornelius Nepos, [Preface, iv] and [Cimon, i. 2 and 4], that Cimon married his germane sister, 'which the manners of the Athenians allowed'. See the note of Boecler on that statement. Yet a passage in Andocides, Against Alcibiades, Or. [iv. 33], appears to controvert this: 'Recall how brave and fore-sighted were our ancestors, in ostracizing Cimon for over-stepping the laws, when he cohabited with his own sister.' This is supported by Athenaeus, Bk. XIII, chap. xxi. But Plutarch, Cimon [p. 480 E], leaves this point in doubt, when he says that some censured Cimon for making sport of his sister, while others said the marriage was lawful, because, due to her poverty, she could not find another husband.

In Sparta, however, according to Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [III. xxii], by a custom opposed to that of the Athenians a man could marry his uterine sister but not one by his father. It appears also from Plato, Laws, Bk. V, that he legalized marriages between brothers and sisters, since he forbids them only in the ascending and descending line. We have the authority of Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xxvii, that among the Egyptians marriage with sisters was formally sanctioned, because it had turned out so well in the case of Isis. Achilles Tatius, Bk. I, attributes the same custom to the Phoenicians.

Yet other people disapproved of such marriages. Phocylides [182]: 'Mount not the abominable couch of a sister.' Ocellus Lucanus, De Natura Universi, chap. iv [12]: 'Lie not with mother, or sister, nor in an open spot.' Although it may be inferred from Euripides, Andromacha, lines 173 f., that over Greece in general marriages with sisters were extremely unusual, since Hermione censures Andromacha with the following words:

Suchlike is the whole barbaric race:—

Father with daughter, son with mother weds,

Sister with brother. [. . .] No whit hereof doth law forbid. (W.)

¹ [For ratismem read rationem.—Tr.]

617 That the custom at any rate completely vanished among the later Greeks is to be gathered from Sextus Empiricus¹, Pyrrhoneiae, Bk. I, chap. xiv [152]: 'Among the Egyptians men marry their own sisters, which is forbidden us by law.' Idem, Bk. III, chap. xxiv [205]: 'It is a crime among us for a man to marry his own mother or sister.' Add Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. V, chap. xi. On the marriage of the Persians with their mothers and sisters see Sextus Empiricus, loc. cit., as also Strabo, Bk. XV [iii. 20, p. 735]; Diogenes Laertius, Preface; Curtius, Bk. VIII, chap. ii; Lucian, De Sacrificiis [xiii. 5]. Although the opinion of the better men on such practices may be gathered from the reply of the royal judges to Cambyzes, in Herodotus, Bk. III. Add what is written, although I know not how trustworthy the account is, by Leonhard Rauchwolf, Itinerarium Orientale, Bk. II, chap. xv, on the Thrusci, a people of the Lebanon Mountains.

We should observe, in this connexion, that, in forbidding marriage between brothers and sisters, the ancient Jews were not concerned whether the sister was of an adulterous or of a lawful union. And so the offspring of a mother-in-law and of an adulterer was considered a sister in the prohibition of marriage. Add Digest, XXIII. ii. 54. Although they also held that incest was committed only by marriage, not by violence or adultery. Therefore, it was not incest if a man lay with a mother and then with her daughter, since it would be incest only if a man married first the mother and then her daughter. So also a man could marry a woman whom his father, brother, or uncle had already lain with, although he could not without incest marry his mother-in-law nor his uncle's widow, nor his brother's wife, save in the special case when his brother had died without issue. Compare Digest, XXV. vii. 1, § 3; XXXVIII. x. 4, § 8. So also in their opinion a man could marry Seia even though he had already violated her mother, sister, grandmother, aunt, daughter, or niece. And although their teachers regarded such a marriage as unlawful, yet when once contracted it held, though the man was scourged. The conclusion, then, is that they felt that kinship was established not by the mere contact of bodies but by marriage. Selden, loc. cit.

Nicetas Acominatus relates that when Andronicus Comnenus desired the marriage of Alexius to Irene, both of whom were incestuously born of Theodora, and inquired of his judges concerning it, some of them 'maintained that they were not related because, being born of an unlawful union, the law of kinship had nothing to do with them, and they were to be held as entirely alien to each other'. Although the writer calls the judges 'avaricious men, who were accustomed to put sacred matters up to auction and to sell their votes for banquets with the rich'.

¹ [For Emperici read Empirici.—Tr.]

35. Regarding the other degrees forbidden in Leviticus, xviii, it would be more difficult to find a reason why they should stand in the way of marriage by virtue of natural law also, although such unions are held in disrepute by many heathen nations as well. The statement of the Apostle, in 1 Corinthians, v. 1, on a step-mother, agrees with that of Phocylides [179 f.]: 'Touch not thy step-mother, thy father's second couch, but honour as a mother her who follows in a mother's footsteps.' Well known is the story in Plutarch, Demetrius [xxxviii], of Stratonice, whom her husband Seleucus gave to his son Antiochus when he was wildly infatuated with her, saying, as it is reported: 'If his wife were reluctant to take this extraordinary step, to call upon his friends to teach and persuade her to regard as just and honourable whatever 618 seemed good to the king and conducive to the general welfare.' (P.) Appian, Syrian Wars [lix], also calls that love of Antiochus an 'unholy passion'. Add Seneca, Controversies, Bk. VI, declam. vii; Valerius Maximus, Bk. V, chap. vii, § 1, ext. Thus Cicero, For Cluentius [vi], expresses his deep disgust at the marriage of a young man with his mother-in-law: 'Oh, the incredible wickedness of the woman, and, with the exception of this one single instance, unheard of since the world began!' (Y.) Andocides, Orations, i [124]: 'That vilest of men lay with a mother and her daughter.' Add Digest, XII. vii. 5, § 1; XXIII. ii. 12, §§ 1, 2, 3; XXIII. ii. 15, 39. Although it is the custom among the Tartars for a son to marry his step-mother upon the death of his father. Haythonus, De Tartaris, chap. xlviii; Paul of Venice, Bk. I, chap. xv.

The ancient Hebrews, according to Grotius, loc. cit., gave two main reasons for forbidding marriages in these degrees, one drawn from natural shame, which does not allow the authors of offspring, that is, parents, to have intercourse with their own offspring, either in themselves or through persons closely related to them in blood and marriage connexion. Now, although this reason is strong enough in the ascending and descending degrees, yet since that modesty entirely vanishes in collateral relations, especially those beyond the second degree, it can have no force for the formation of any natural law. Yet reason approves those civil laws which have extended the prohibition of degrees more widely, placed like a hedge, as it were, about those degrees which are held forbidden by natural as well as divine law.

Their second reason is, that the daily and unobserved contact of such persons would give opportunity for lewdness and adultery, if such amours could be made permanent by marriage. This argument can likewise give rise to positive law, but does not suffice for natural law. The Hebrews seem to make good enough use of it to explain why Leviticus, xviii, forbids the marriage of an aunt, but not of a brother's daughter, although both appear to be distant in the same degree. For they say that young men regularly visit the homes of their grandparents, or even live there along with their aunts, yet they have no such frequent entrance into the homes of their brothers, and enjoy no such¹ right there. The same degree was unlawful by the customs of the Romans, as appears by the example of Claudius when desirous of marrying Agrippina. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XII. Yet there are many who assert that in this passage not persons but degrees are forbidden, though there is, perhaps, no want of something that might be said in opposition to their reasons.

But those who feel that every and all degrees listed in this passage of Leviticus are repugnant to natural law, emphasize the words of the twenty-seventh verse.² For they say, since every transgression presupposes a law, it must be that those heathen, in contracting such marriages, violated either some natural or divine positive law that was binding upon all nations. It would be hard to make out a clear case for the latter. To this Selden, Bk. V, chap. xi, replies that those words should be taken only of those sins which could have fallen also upon the heathen. And he finds an argument in the fact that it is prohibited there for a man to marry two sisters—a thing, however, which was done by Jacob, a most righteous man. Although it can be said with some reason that the rivalry between those same sisters was one of the reasons for that law. So also Amram, the father of Moses, married his aunt Jochabed, a degree expressly forbidden in that same chapter.

Some interesting facts on the degrees of consanguinity are given by Abr. Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pt. I, chap. xii. In the chapter On Wives in the Koran marriage is forbidden with the following persons: mother, step-mother, daughter, sister, aunt, niece, nurse, foster-sister, mother-in-law, step-daughter, daughter-in-law, two sisters, the daughter of a woman whom a man has known in a sexual relation, 619 another man's wife, unless captured in war. Add Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VI, chap. xi, towards the end.

It may be noted, in passing, that many men hold the force of kinship to be broken upon the death of the person on whom it was based, and of those who sprang of it. Euripides, Medea [76]:

The old ties in the race lag far behind
 The new. (W.)

Isocrates, Aegineticus [8]: 'He thought so much of my father's friendship, that when my aunt died without issue, again he married a relative, this time my father's cousin, so as not to lose relationship with us.' Cicero, For Quinctius [vi]: 'A relationship, which while his children lived, could not possibly be annulled.' (Y.) Idem, Philippics, XI. [iv. 10], on Dolabella, his former son-in-law: 'And this man, O ye immortal gods, was once my relation.' (Y.) Florus, Bk. IV, chap. ii: 'At the death of Julia, Caesar's daughter, who had been married to Pompey, and had kept them friends through the bond of matrimony, rivalry immediately broke forth between these men.' Philo Judaeus, On the Embassy to Gaius [x]: 'Intermarriages are the bonds which unite families between which there is no kindred, [. . .] but when that bond is dissolved, then the union is dissolved likewise.' (Y.) On the other hand Paul of Venice, Bk. I, chap. lviii, records of the Tartars that parents unite in marriage dead unmarried sons with unmarried daughters, and believe that by such a posthumous contract as close a relationship is established between their surviving parents and relatives as would have been possible had the wedding been celebrated in their lifetime.

¹ [For tandundem read tantumdem.—Tr.]

² [For all these abominations have the men of the lands done, that were before you, and the land is defiled.—Tr.]

36. Something may well be added, in conclusion, on the subject of secondary wives, an institution which is found among many peoples; I mean such as offer actual conjugal faith to their husband and are joined in the closest relationship with him, and yet either because of inequality of station and birth, or for other reasons, never attain the dignity of a full mother of a household, nor secure for their issue as much right as usually belongs to the children of a household. Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. V, chap. vii, may be consulted, who makes it clear that the distinction between these and lawful wives is due only to positive law or pacts between individuals. For distinctions of position have been established by positive law, and the parties to a marriage pact may add to it at their pleasure whatever does not change its nature. It is clear that such a distinction is introduced in order to preserve illustrious families, or in favour of former children (in Julius Capitolinus [xix. 29 f.], the emperor Marcus, 'after the death of Faustina [. . .] took a concubine, the daughter of a steward of his wife's rather than put a stepmother over so many children' (M.*)), or, finally, the better to avoid the expense which the manner of states would otherwise have required for a lawful wife. For it tends to preserve illustrious families if the daughters of the same be taken into houses of equal station; and for this end civil laws have in certain places ordained, that, if a man joins himself to a woman of inferior position, such a marriage need not have all the effects which otherwise attend a legal marriage in that state. They are likewise weakened by a division of the estate, to avoid which it is helpful to take secondary wives, lest, if smaller portions be assigned the children of the lawful mother of a family, they would have just cause for complaint. And, on the third reason, he is surely a fool who marries a wife whose expenses must reduce him to beggary.

From all this it is patent, that an injury is done such secondary wives, if they are given the vile name of concubines. For these last are properly such as live a life of shame with a man, without promising him conjugal faith, and differ from prostitutes only in degree. Nor are they removed from that class, even if they agree to give themselves for a time to but one man (see Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. X, chap. xviii); for in conjugal faith there is something far more sacred and comprehensive than the mere preservation of one's body for a single 620 man, in return for money alone or mutual lust. Although sometimes the term concubine would appear to carry no opprobrium with it. See Digest, XXXII. xlix, § 4; and in Code, V. xxvii. 3, a certain form of concubinage is called 'unequal marriage'; see also the remarks thereon of Godefroy.

On the Turkish rulers Busbecq, Letters, i, reports that after Bajazet none of them ever even took a lawful wife. 'For when he and his wife came into the power of Tamerlane after his defeat, nothing seemed so disgraceful to him as the affronts and dishonour to which his wife was subjected before his eyes. The following rulers, bearing this in mind, refrained from taking wives, and begat sons only of wives of servile condition, who, they thought, could suffer less injury than lawful ones.¹ Nor, in fact, do the Turks pay less honour to sons of concubines or mistresses than to those of lawful wives, nor are such accorded less right to their father's property.' Although Abbas, king of Persia, conceived another plan of preventing such an insult, for when he had taken along his harem on a campaign, he left them in the care of his eunuchs, with the command to behead them in case he was defeated in the battle. Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. II, ep. v.

When the Chinese have no hope of issue from a lawful wife they take concubines, since they hold it the greatest misfortune to be without children to accord them at their death the honour of mourning and burial. Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. VI, chap. i, p. 201.

We should observe, in conclusion, that just as civil laws regularly clothe other contracts as well with certain formalities and rites, upon the absence of which they are held invalid in a court of law, so also in some states such features are understood to be joined to marriage, with the result that, if they are lacking, the marriage is regarded as unlawful, or at any rate is lacking in some of the effects in a court of law. See Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. III, tit. xx. Now although these formalities are unknown to natural law, nevertheless, since that law enjoins the observance of civil laws in the case of those who are subject to them, it is vain for those who lack the power to pass or abrogate civil laws, to claim² that the law of nature is indifferent to such cases.

¹ [For uxors read uxores.—Tr.]

² [For ellegant read allegant.—Tr.]

CHAPTER II

ON PATERNAL POWER

- | | |
|---|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The common view of the origin of paternal power.2. According to Hobbes the original power over children lies with the mother,3. Which is then derived from her upon others.4. Upon what reasons the sovereignty of the father is based¹.5. How far it belongs to the father rather than the mother.6. How much power over his offspring belongs to a father as such; | <ol style="list-style-type: none">7. And, indeed, in their infancy and childhood.8. How far during this period children are capable of sovereignty.9. Whether a father can sell his son.10. On the obligations of emancipated children.11. What power over adult children belongs to fathers outside states;12. What within states.13. How this power is lost.14. Whether children must have the consent of their parents for contracting marriage. |
|---|--|

FROM marriage come offspring, and over them is established paternal power, a most ancient as well as sacred form of sovereignty, whereby children are required to respect the commands of their parents and acknowledge their superiority over them. On its origin Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 1, and most writers, say that it springs from generation, 621 in which men are in a way like God, in that they bring into being one who before was not. But that, since each parent shares equally in that generation, each originally secures a right over the offspring, although if they dispute over the sovereignty and both cannot be satisfied, that of the father is to be preferred, not only because he is superior by reason of his sex, but also because he exercises sovereignty over the mother.

2. Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ix, has undertaken to investigate the origin of this sovereignty as follows. Although, he says, it is a logical conclusion that because a man is the father of a son he is also his master, yet it is not so manifest as at once to show clearly the necessity for it, as is true in other conclusions, one of the terms of which is included in the definition of the other, but must be based upon other considerations. Furthermore, since supreme sovereignty, so long as it is expected to have a regular form, is indivisible, so that no man can at the same time serve two masters, of whom neither is subordinate to the other, and yet two persons concur in generation, apparently sovereignty cannot be acquired by generation alone. Therefore, paternal power must be deduced from a natural state in the following manner: Since in that state everything is permissible over any person, in so far as a man feels that it makes for his own preservation, the conqueror becomes the master of the conquered. It follows from this, that, by the law of nature, the sovereignty over an infant belongs at the outset to the one who was the first to have it in his power. It is clear, then, that an infant by reason of its birth is first in the power of its mother, and of no one else; and if she has decided to rear it (as, of course, she is required to do), she is understood¹ to do so to the end that it may not grow up to be her enemy, that is, that it render obedience to her. (For by his hypothesis all who are not related to each other as sovereign and subject, or do not acknowledge a common master, are mutual enemies.) For it is not to be presumed that any person gave another his life that he might later, so soon as he acquires strength by age and his right, become his enemy. Therefore, on this score, every woman who brings forth in a state of nature, becomes at the same time both a mother and a sovereign mistress. The excellence of sex is not sufficient to give the father, rather than the mother, right over the offspring, for the inequality of strength between man and woman is not so great that the former can secure sovereignty over the latter without a struggle, and so he has need also of war to bring her under his authority. It is a further consideration, that the part of woman in the generation of children as compared with that of man, if not more noble, is at least more laborious and irksome, since she has carried the child for so long a time within her body and nourished it with her own strength.²

¹ [For nitasur read nitatur.—Tr.]

² [For '92r' read '62r'.—Tr.]

Quintilian, Declamations, cccxxxviii:

It is one thing to be made a parent by a brief and transitory act of pleasure, and to be endeared to one's children only by this external satisfaction; and a very different thing to love what you have yourself given birth to, that which reminds you of those ten months, and recalls so many dangers and anxieties.

Medea speaks as follows in Ennius: 'I would rather face battle thrice than be a mother once.' [Frag. 222 Ribbeck.] The thought is taken from that famous line of Euripides, Medea [250-1]:

Thrice would I under shield Stand, rather than bear childbirth peril once. (W.)

They say of the women of Paria in America, that they suffer no labour in parturition, and feel no weakness, but return immediately after delivery to their accustomed tasks. The same is told of the women of Chile, and that women of Spain, after a long residence there, become equally hardened. Although Orestes, in the play of that name by Euripides [552 ff.], may, when it serves his purpose, appear to give his vote for the father:

My sire begat me, thy child gave me birth—
The field that from another gat the seed;
Without the father might no offspring be.

¹ [For intelligetur read intellegitur, or else translate 'she will be understood'.—Tr.]

² [This reason belongs to Pufendorf, not Hobbes.—Tr.]

I reasoned then—better defend my source
Of life, than her that did but foster me. (W.)

622

Furthermore, since in a mere state of nature, where no commonwealths or families are recognized, to which each person might have been subject, it cannot be known to what father a child belongs save on the declaration of its mother, and so it belongs to whomsoever the mother wishes, and is hers first of all. Hence it is a rule of Roman law that a child born out of wedlock follows the womb, that is, the mother. There was also a law among the Lycians, that, 'If a woman who is a citizen marry a slave, the children are accounted to be of gentle birth; but if a man who is a citizen, though he were the first man among them, have a slave for wife or concubine, the children are without civil rights.' (M.) Among the same people children took their name from that of their mother and not from that of their father. Herodotus, Bk. I [clxxiii].

3. According to Hobbes this power passes from the mother to others in different ways. I. If the mother has renounced or thrown away her right by exposing her child. In that case he who has found and reared him will have the sovereignty which the mother had, for that life which the mother gave him when she carried him, she took back, so far as she was able, by exposing him. Therefore, the obligation as well which a child owes his mother, and which sprang from her gift of life, is removed by her having exposed him, while the child owes everything to the one who saved and nourished him, as a foster-child calling him his mother, and as a servant his master. Here may be applied the words of Admetus in Euripides, Alcestis [666 ff.]:

For thee dead am I. If I see the light—
Another saviour found—I call me son
To her, and loving fosterer of her old age. (W.)

Libanius, Orations, xiii [xx. 43]: 'The man who has saved another from a river's swirl, may well be called his father.' Now although we may concede that such a child should be willing to show some regard for his mother, and upon her repentance to assume again their natural relationship, yet that may not be done without the consent and withdrawal of his foster-father, to whom he must return the cost of his rearing and all other expenses incurred upon him. And this appears to be the only case whereby sovereignty over a man is secured by seizure.

II. If a mother is captured in war, the issue born to her after her capture belongs also to her capturer, because whoever has dominion over a person, has it also over all her possessions, and so over her son. Although it should be observed, that, in this case, a different kind of power is acquired by the capturer over the child than that which the mother had.

III. If a mother is the citizen of some state, he who has the highest sovereignty in that state will also have dominion over her issue, although it should be noted in this case also, that the power held by the state is different from that which belongs to the parents; and that the power of the mother is not immediately extinguished by the civil sovereignty, but in some states is circumscribed within definite limits, and in others left practically unimpaired.

IV. If a woman give herself to a man in union, on the condition that the sovereignty shall be with him, the children born of both are under the father, because of his sovereignty over the mother. But if the woman have the sovereignty, and beget children by him who is subject to her, they are under the mother, for otherwise the woman cannot have children and keep her sovereignty unimpaired. And, in general, if the society of the man and woman be such a union wherein one is subject to the sovereignty of the other, the children are under the one that is free. Yet if a man and woman agree to cohabitation in a state of nature, in such a way that one is not under the sovereignty of the other, their children are under the mother, unless they have agreed otherwise.

623 For the mother may by pacts dispose of her right as she pleases. This, they say, was done by the Amazons, who reached the agreement that, of their issue by their neighbours, they would return the males and keep the females. But in states, if there is a contract for cohabitation between a man and a woman, the children are under the father, because in all states, at least in those formed by the male heads of families, the domestic sovereignty belongs to the man. If such a contract is drawn up in accordance with civil laws and in due form, it is called marriage. But if they only contract a concubinage, or a cohabitation without due form, the children will be under either the father or the mother, according as the civil laws have determined.

4. For our part, as in other similar points, we presuppose a universal cause, even the most Good and Great God. Yet we think it no less proper to inquire into secondary and immediate causes. For when some say: 'All sovereignty which belongs to man over man is communicated to him by God through some divine commission, and man has no power but that which is delegated him,' such a statement seems to us disrespectful to God, however much those who so glibly repeat such thoughts maintain a pose of exalted piety. For whoever exercises a delegated authority has it along with him who delegated it, except that the latter possesses it as his own, and the former as another's. And yet he has a very low idea of God's majesty who thinks that the same kind of sovereignty as lies in God belongs also to men. See Matthew, x. 28.

So much being premised, we feel that it should, in the first place, be fixed beyond doubt, that the act of generation gives rise to an occasion of acquiring some right over offspring, which not only has power against others, who are not parents (that as he who is master of a thing is also master of its fruits, so he has the nearest degree to acquire mastery over a child, who is master of the body from which it was born), but has force against the child itself. I say 'occasion', for in our opinion generation alone is not sufficient for a claim to sovereignty over human issue. For although our offspring may be of our substance, yet because it passes into a person that is like us, and is our equal, so far as the rights naturally belonging to men are concerned, there is need of some other claim to render it unequal to us, that is, subject to our sovereignty. Especially since such issue follows upon an act which we usually perform with an eye to our own pleasure¹, and which we cannot impute to our children, as being of such worth that they are obligated to be subject to us, whether they will or not. Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. V, chap. xviii: 'He who begets a son has it not in his power to effect that he shall be conceived, or born, or live; from which it is evident that he is not (so much) the father, but only (as) the instrument of generation.' (C.*)

Therefore, the right of parents over children is based upon a two-fold claim: First, because the very law of nature, by reason of its command that man be sociable, has laid upon parents the care of children, and, to provide against its neglect, has at the same time implanted in them the most tender affection for their offspring. For unless you provide that parents rear their offspring, it is impossible to conceive of a social life. But that care cannot properly be exercised unless parents have power to direct the actions of their children to their good, which is not yet recognized by the children because of their immature judgment. See Ecclesiasticus, viii. 25; xxx. 1 ff. And so for this very reason nature enjoins upon parents that they exercise sufficient sovereignty over their children to attain that end. For whoever obligates a man to an end is understood to have conferred upon him at the same time the power to avail himself of the means without which it cannot be obtained. Furthermore, this power of parents, resulting from the command to care for one's children, necessarily lays upon children the 624 obligation to submit themselves to the direction of their parents, since this direction without the former obligation is to no purpose.

In the second place, the sovereignty of parents appears to rest upon the presumed consent of the children themselves, and so on a tacit pact. For as a parent by his acknowledgement of a child declares that he will fulfil the obligation enjoined by nature, and will give it proper rearing, so far as he is able, so, on his part, the infant, although unable, because his reason is not yet developed, expressly to promise the services which correspond on his side to the obligation of his parents, contracts an obligation towards his parents by reason of their care for him, no less than if his consent had been expressly stated. Add Digest, III. v. 2. And this obligation exerts its force so soon as he is able to understand what is done for him by his parents. For it is presumed that had he had the use of his reason at the time when he was acknowledged by them, and had recognized that he could not preserve his life without their care and the sovereignty imposed upon him, he would gladly have consented to it, and would have agreed on his part to a rearing so advantageous to him. This consent, being reasonably presumed, has the same force as if it had been expressed. Compare Seneca, To Marcia, On Consolation, chap. xviii. Just as he whose business is conducted by another in his absence and without his knowledge, is understood to have contracted an obligation, as if from a tacit contract, to repay the other what was paid for his advantage. From this it is patent, that the sovereignty of a parent over a child is actually established when he accepts and rears¹ it, and undertakes to mould it, as well as he can, into a useful² member of human society.

¹ [For delectionis read delectationis.—Tr.]

Nor is there any force in the view of some, that the obligation between parents and children can in no way be derived from consent and a tacit pact, 'because, under whatever title consent comes, it cannot properly be found save in actions that were free before the consent; and yet it is not free to the father or to the son to decline respectively the right of education and any debt consequent upon it.' For it is not contradictory that a thing should arise from a precept of natural law, and also from tacit consent. Surely a man is not free not to obey God, and yet God has willed to require obedience from the faithful by a covenant. So also a citizen owes military service to his state, and yet, when he enlists, his consent and oath are required. And so why may it not be said that the tacit consent of a child is understood, when a parent actually undertakes its rearing, the effect of which is that he has no cause to complain that the paternal sovereignty is laid upon him without his consent and to no purpose?

5. When the further question is raised, as to which parent has the greater right over the offspring, the matter may be cleared up by drawing a distinction at the outset. For they either live within or without a state; and there is, or there is not a pact between them. If the parents live without a state, in natural liberty, the offspring belongs to the mother, in case they joined themselves without any lasting pact. For in that state the father cannot be known but on the evidence of the mother, at least with such certainty as matters of fact usually require, it being permissible in such a state for the mother to accept the services of other men as well. Compare Institutes, II. i, §§ 31, 32, and Digest, XLI. i. 7, § 13. For this reason the Roman laws assign children of uncertain parentage to the mother, although the custom of the ancient

¹ [For nutrique read nutritique.—Tr.]

² [For incommodum read in commodum.—Tr.]

Egyptians, as given by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxx, was just the opposite:

None of the sons are ever reputed bastards, though they be begotten of a bond-maid, for they conceive that only the father begets the child, and that the mother contributes nothing but place and nourishment. And they call trees that bear fruit males, and those that bear none, females; contrary to what the Grecians name them. (B.*)

A similar opinion occurs in the Pythagorean Theages, De Virtutibus [Mullach, Vol. II, p. 22]: 'The father generates the spirit; the mother does in bringing forth but supply the material body.'

But when there has passed between a man and a woman a pact 625 which disposes of the issue, it will fully decide the question as to the one to whom belongs the sovereignty over the issue, for it is contrary to rule that two should together hold the supreme authority over the same person. Now this pact either merely looks to the acquiring of offspring, or also involves sovereignty over the woman, and so includes a lawful marriage, where the sovereignty over the offspring unquestionably lies with the father.

But although it is the rule, in pacts of the former kind, that they have their rise in the man, and he seeks issue for himself and not for the woman, and so has bargained for that parental sovereignty for himself, yet it can happen, contrary to this rule, that a woman may choose a man, and not the opposite. This was once done by the Amazons, and is needful at the present time in the case of women who hold the supreme sovereignty in a state and marry without impairing it, whose husbands are not, properly speaking, so much kings as husbands of queens. Nor are such pacts repugnant to the law of nature, by reason of the fact that one of the parents apparently frees himself of that care of the children which nature enjoined upon both without distinction; for nature does not specifically require that they both, of themselves and personally, look after the rearing of their offspring, but her law is met if they agree to turn that over to one of them, just as a mother is not required to suckle her children, but may turn them over to a nurse. (Although the opposite position is taken by Plutarch, The Education of Children [v], and Favorinus, in Gellius, Bk. XII, chap. i. Add Ferdinando Pinto, Itinerarium, chap. liv, where he describes how the Javanese make it a point of their religion for the mothers to nurse their own children. In the Koran it is especially commanded that women do this for their offspring two full years.) And in the same way fathers are allowed to hold that the mind and manners of their children may be shaped by capable instructors.

But where males establish states, just as they are regularly the heads of the families, so the private sovereignty over children lies with the fathers, and hence the orders of the mothers have of themselves only the force of advice, and usually have full authority to obligate the children only as they borrow the power from the father. For just as it is advantageous for wives to be admitted to a share in the administration of the household, so the sovereignty of the father does not exclude the mother's care over the children. Although civil laws may dispose of this in their own way. Thus Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. I, ep. xvii, writes that among the Babylonians the supreme power over the sons lies with the father, but that over the daughters with the mother.

But if, upon the death of the father, the government of the family lies with the mother, it is also right that she receive the power of the father over the children. Compare Genesis, xxi. 21 with xxiv. 4. And when her second husband succeeds to the care of rearing his step-children, he will be accorded the respect owed their natural father. Yet it is recorded of the Chinese, that, if a woman upon the death of her husband marry again, she leaves her children, taking with her but a single garment, because among that people the children will not tolerate a step-father, much less obey him. Neuhoof, Legatio, p. 281.

6. It is our next task to inquire into the amount of the power of parents over their children. Here we must distinguish (1) between heads of households established without the bounds of states, and those who have already subjected themselves to states; and (2) between the power held by a father as such, and as the head of a separate family.

Now since the power which belongs to a father as such is necessary to his fulfilling towards his children the obligation which is enjoined by nature, it is understood to be as great as serves to obtain that end. Furthermore, the duty of a parent as such lies chiefly in this: That he rear his children properly, that is, provide for and govern them until they are able to look out for themselves and to temper their actions to 626 their wills, and see to it that they become useful members of human society. For generation is not a part but only the occasion of the duty of a father. And parents should undertake this duty all the more zealously, as there is the more truth in what is said by Plutarch, The Education of Children [vii, p. 4 c]: 'The fount and root of excellence is to receive a proper education.' Especially since the observation of Plato, Republic, Bk. VI [p. 491 E], is nearly always true:

And may we not say that the most gifted minds, when they are ill-educated, become the worst? Do not great crimes and the spirit of pure evil spring out of a fulness of nature ruined by education rather than from an inferiority, whereas weak natures are scarcely capable of any very great good or very great evil? (J.)

The same writer also in his Laws, Bk. VII [p. 808 D], calls a child 'the most unmanageable of all animals'. (J.) Libanius, Declamations, xx [ix. 6]: 'Education is a great service for the soul.' Horace, Odes, Bk. IV, ode iv [33 f.]: 'Yet training increases inborn worth, and righteous ways make strong the heart; whenever righteousness has failed, faults mar even what nature had made noble.' (B.) An anonymous poet [Menander, Monostichoi, 96 and 557]¹: 'One must learn how to read and write, and when he has learned, have some sense; for learning is nothing without sense.' Add Stobaeus, Anthology, lxxxi.

It is patent from all this, that the power of the father does on no account extend so far that he can destroy the child while yet unborn. (See Digest, XLVII. xi. 4; XLVIII. viii. 8; XLVIII. xix. 38, § 5; except in case both the mother and the child would otherwise perish. See Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, V. i. 5, on Digest, XLVII²; Grotius, Florum Sparsio, on Digest, XLVIII. xix. 39.) Nor may he expose it upon birth, or kill it, especially if it is somewhat advanced in years. For although it may be said that a child traces its origin to the substance of its parents, yet upon conception it attains a like condition with them, at least to the extent that it is capable of suffering injury from a person. Pliny, Letters, Bk. IX, ep. xii: 'In exerting the authority of a father, remember always that you are a man, and the parent of a man.' (B.) See Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws; Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. VI, chap. xx; Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvii. Add Grotius on Exodus, xxi-xxii; Law of the Visigoths, Bk. VI, tit. iii, chap. 7; Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. IV, chap. i. It is a most absurd custom of the natives of Formosa to regard it as disgraceful for a woman to conceive before the age of thirty-five or thirty-six; and if she becomes pregnant before that age they kill the foetus by buffets, blows, and pressure, which are attended with excruciating pains.

And so we must condemn the view of Aristotle, Politics, Bk. VII, chap. xvi [21]:

As to the exposure and rearing of children, let there be a law that no deformed child shall live, but where there are too many (for in our state population has a limit) [...] let abortion be procured before sense and life have begun; what may or may not be lawfully done in these cases depends on the question of life and sensation. (J.)

Not much more humane is the institution of Lycurgus in Plutarch, Lycurgus [xvi]:

Offspring was not reared at the will of the father, but was taken and carried by him to a place called Lesche, where the elders of the tribes officially examined the infant, and if it was well-built and sturdy, they ordered the father to rear it. [...] But if it was ill-born and deformed, they sent it to the so-called Apothetae, a chasm-like place at the foot of Mount Taygetus, in the conviction that the life of that which nature had not well equipped at the very beginning for health and strength, was of no advantage either to itself or the state. (P.)

Compare, Digest, XXV. iii. 4. I know not whether any credit is to be given to what Diodorus³ Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lviii [II. lviii], recounts of the way in which the Taprobanians discover the future quality of their children. Indeed, this monstrous custom of exposing children was

¹ [The first line is ascribed also to the much earlier poet, Philonides, by Stobaeus, Anthology, III. xxxv. 6 a.—Tr.]

² [This reference we have not succeeded in verifying.—Tr.]

³ [For Diodorus read Diodorus.—Tr.]

so common among the ancients, that Strabo, Bk. XVII [ii. 5, p. 824], calls it a 'peculiar' practice that the Egyptians 'reared all their children'. Add Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxx. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, 627 Bk. I [xvi], has the same to say of the Aborigines, that they 'would not put any of their children to death, looking on this as the greatest of crimes' (S.). And Tacitus, Histories, Bk. V [v], writes that among the Jews: 'It is forbidden to put any of their brethren to death.' (O.) Yet Curtius, Bk. IX, chap. i [25], tells us that the Spartan custom was practised in India in the kingdom of Sophes: 'The children are not reared and educated according to the decision of the parents, but of officers appointed to examine the conformation of infants; who, if they observe any to be monsters or defective in their limbs, cause them to be killed.' (A.) The same is recounted of the Catheans by Strabo, Bk. XV [i. 30, p. 699]. Poor parents among the Chinese freely kill their offspring, especially the girls. And because of their belief in metempsychosis, which is held by almost all the heathen nations of the Orient, they feel that they are doing their children a good turn, since in this way they open a way to them for birth into a better condition.

But it does not appear that this power, as such, should be extended to a right of life and death, to be exercised upon the occasion of wrongdoing, but only to moderate reproof, since it concerns that tender age in which there are but few cases of incurable misdeeds that deserve the punishment of death. And so it was the custom among the Romans for boys who had not yet come of age to be lashed with a whip of eel-skins, 'and for that reason they were not fined.' Pliny, Natural History, Bk. IX, chap. xxiii. And if a man has a son who, because of incorrigible self-will and perversity, stubbornly scorns the care expended on him for his own good, it is a better course to drive him away and order him to live at a distance. And so it appears that the severest punishment a father as such can inflict upon his son is to disown and disinherit him.

7. It is of such parental power, in the strict sense, that we must understand the passage of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 2, where he distinguishes between three periods in the life of children: The first, of imperfect judgement, and when there is no proairesis [free choice]; the second, of perfected judgement, yet when the son still remains a part of the father's household and does not conduct his own¹ affairs; the third, when he leaves the family, whether he has established one of his own, or has entered into another's. Still I cannot discover the reason why Ziegler, in commenting on this passage, cannot accept it. For although the Sacred Scriptures, in enjoining upon children obedience to their parents, make no such distinctions (Ephesians, vi. 1; Colossians, iii. 20), neither does it forbid treating a little boy in one way and a grown youth in another; just as it does not require that a son, when grown, should never leave his father's house within the lifetime of his parents. During the first period, therefore, as Grotius holds, all the actions of children lie under the direction of their parents, since it is right that whoever cannot direct himself should be directed by another, and no one can naturally be found,¹ to whom that control better belongs than one's parents.

¹ [For tuas read suas.—Tr.]

8. The question is raised, in this connexion, whether a child at this period is by natural law capable of a dominion which will prevail against his father. Here, it seems, we must distinguish between property which is secured by one's own industry, and that which is made over to one by the liberality of others, as by wills or gifts. At that age how little, indeed, can a boy acquire by his own labour! Surely it will not be more than his parent spends or has spent on his education; and so the father may properly claim this in return for his troubles and expense. For although he was required by natural law to support his offspring, he was not forbidden to receive any profit which he could get from rearing it, any more than parents are forbidden to take pleasure in their children, which is often so great that they are glad to purchase it at any price. See Seneca, To Marcia, On Consolation, chap. xii [2]. Therefore, it would be effrontery in a son of that age to try to demand 628 compensation for the work he does for his father. Sophocles, Oedipus at Colonus [508-9]:

In a parent's cause
Toil, if there be toil, is of no account. (S.)

Among the inhabitants of Peru children were obliged to work for their parents until they were fifteen years old. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. IV, chap. xix.

But when a child receives something by the generosity of others, such a transfer appears at first invalid, because it requires acceptance, which cannot be given without deliberate consent, and therefore without the use of reason. But because it would indeed be a hardship for those who, because of their tender age, stand in special need of aid from others, to be shut off from some way of receiving such aid, it is entirely fair for another to receive it in their name, and also to administer it until they are able to manage their own affairs; and for such a trust no one is more fit than the father. From this it appears that it is by no means in accordance with nature for a father to secure dominion over goods which are transferred to a son in this way; although equity does not prevent the father from enjoying their usufruct, and supporting his son by this means, until the latter can take over their administration. And so it appears that the Roman laws were on firm ground when they divide the private property of sons of a family into what he receives of his parents, from others, and for his military service.

¹ [For aut emineniri read autem inveniri.—Tr.]

9. Another question, in this connexion, is whether the paternal sovereignty and duty can be taken from the father and transferred to another. Here we should bear in mind, that, although it was a personal act, such as cannot pass from one man to another, which conferred the paternal duty and sovereignty (Libanius, Declamations, xx [ix. 43]: 'The fact that you are born of me cannot be undone by law'), yet this does not prevent that function from being delegated and turned over to another, upon the urge of necessity or the advantage of the child. Although it is well to bear in mind the admonition of Plutarch, The Education of Children [xiii, p. 9 D]:

Those parents, moreover, are to be blamed, who, when they have committed their sons to the care of pedagogues or schoolmasters, never see or hear them perform their tasks; wherein they fail much of their duty. For they ought, ever and anon, after the intermission of some days, to make trial of their children's proficiency; and not intrust their hopes of them to the discretion of a hiring. For even that sort of men will take more care of the children, when they know that they are regularly to be called to account. (G.)

Furthermore, it is not repugnant to the law of nature to turn over one's child to a worthy man to be educated, provided some advantage will accrue therefrom to the child. Add Gellius, Bk. V, chap. xix. Euripides, Ion [1535-6]:

[...] As friend to friend should give
His own son, that his house might have an heir. (W.)

But in no case does it appear that nature allows a father to use his son as a pledge, or sell him, unless there is no other way to support him. For if that be the case, it is better that he be sold into some easy slavery, from which there is some hope of his securing release, than that he starve to death. Here belongs a law of the Thebans in Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. II, chap. vii:

No Theban is allowed to expose an infant or cast it away into some solitary spot, upon pain of death. However, if the father suffers from extreme poverty, whether the child be male or female, the law bids him to take the child immediately at birth, and in its swaddling clothes, to the magistrate. The latter takes it and sells it for a modest price to some person who enters upon a pact and an agreement to care for the child in good faith, and, when it is grown up to treat it as a slave, recovering by its subsequent services the cost of upbringing.

This law may be defended on the ground that nature is held to give a right to whatever is absolutely necessary for its commands. So the emperor Constantine, in Code, IV. xliii. 2, allows a father, because of 629 extreme want and poverty, to sell his own son or daughter, that they, the children, and not the parents, may not starve; on condition, however, that, if any man gives their purchaser the purchase price, they can regain their liberty again. When the Edict of Theodoric, chaps. xciv-xcv, and the Law of the Visigoths, Bk. V, tit. iv, chap. 12, forbid the selling of children in order to secure food, that must apparently be understood of food for the use of the parents. A law of Romulus in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. II [xxvii], appears to have given parents greater latitude than was just, who even gave leave to the father to make an advantage of selling his son, so far as three times, giving by this means a greater power to the father over his son, than to the master over his slave. For a slave who has once been sold, and afterwards obtains his liberty, is his own master ever after¹, but a son, when sold by his father, if he should become free, returned to his father's power. And if he was a second time sold, and a second time freed, he was still as at first his father's slave; but after the third sale he was discharged from his father. (S.)

This law was slightly weakened by Numa, when he excepted from it those sons who were married, provided they had married at the command or with the consent of their father. Plutarch, Numa [p. 71 E]. Nor did the Decemvirs dare entirely to abolish it, although it gradually passed into disuse and was finally rescinded. Code, IV. xliii. 1. Yet a part of the old custom was still retained, when, in the emancipation of sons, they were, as a formality, sold three times, a usage which was finally abolished by Justinian in Code, VIII. xlvii. 11.

From Plutarch, Solon [p. 85], it also appears that in Athens, at least before the time of Solon, a child could be sold to pay his father's debts. Compare Matthew, xviii. 25; 2 Kings, iv. 1; Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. VIII [vii. 12]: 'With the Phrygians it is a fashion even to sell their children, and once they are enslaved, they never think any more about them.' (C.) Add Plutarch, Lucullus [xx, p. 504 C D]. According to Sigismund, Baron of Herberstein, among the inhabitants of Muscovy a father could sell his child four times, but after the fourth sale had no further right over him. Add Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. III, chap. vi. The Chinese have the custom of selling children whom they think they cannot support, although on the condition that any one of them can claim his liberty upon paying the price for which he was sold.

10.² That we may know what power belongs to the father over his child in the second period, we must observe that fathers also hold a degree of sovereignty, in so far as they are heads of their families, which sovereignty is one thing among those who live outside of states, and another among those who united within states. For just as distinct families have somewhat of the form of states, so their heads bear some analogy to royal sovereignty. What prevents us from calling them states, with Hobbes, is the fact that the end of families and states is different, and therefore many parts of royal sovereignty do not fall upon families. Indeed, Hobbes himself in his Leviathan, chap. xx, acknowledges that a family is properly not a state, unless it be so powerful, either because of its number, or other opportunities, that it cannot be subdued without war. Yet there is place in them for the right of life and death, to be exercised in the case of crimes, somewhat as the legislative power, as 633 well as for the right of arms and of concluding treaties. This sovereignty of the father over adult children is based upon a tacit pact, whereby the father extends his commands to things which look beyond the rearing of his child, and the latter renders him obedience. The laws of equity and gratitude suggest this, since a child should yield his strength first of all to him through whom he is what he is, until he is freed from that sovereignty by the consent of the father himself.

¹ [For in posterum read in posterum.—Tr.]

² [This appears as § 11 in the 1688 edition, but the context seems to indicate that the order herein followed was intended by Pufendorf.—Tr.]

II.¹ But after separation into states, some rights were taken away from the heads of families,² while others were restricted. Yet nearly everywhere as much as is needed for the rearing of children was left, although Plato in his state seriously restricted the power of fathers as such. Nor was much left them by the ancient Persians, if there is any historic truth in what is reported by Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. I. Elsewhere little was taken from the power of the fathers of a family.

Thus at Rome the fathers had the right of life and death over their children, which they exercised practically like a court, calling their kinsmen and friends into council, and imposing punishment upon their opinion. See Valerius Maximus, Bk. V, chap. viii, §§ 2, 3, 5; Seneca, On Clemency, Bk. I, chap. xv. In Livy, Bk. I, chap. 1, Turnus says: 'There was no question more quickly settled than one betwixt father and son, for these few words were enough to end it: "Unless you obey your father, it will be the worse for you."'³ (F.) Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. I, chap. iv, calls Justinian to account for claiming (Institutes, I. ix, § 2) that others did not have this right, since he shows that the Persians as well as the ancient Gauls, according to Caesar, Gallic War, Bk. VI [xix], had the right of life and death over their children. And some vestiges of this custom still remained among the people of Bordeaux down to A.D. 1301, in whose laws it was set forth that fathers had the right of life and death over their children, and husbands over their wives. And had a man killed his wife in a fit of rage or pain, he had only to declare his repentance, with a solemn oath, to be cleared of all punishment. Bodin goes on to show that the abrogation of that power was the cause of many evils to the Romans. This conclusion is concurred in by François Connan, Commentaria Juris Civilis, Bk. II, chap. xiii, while the institution receives the praise of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. II [xxvi-xxvii].

On the other hand, some strongly defend the view of Justinian, claiming that nowhere did fathers have such strict power over their children as at Rome, where, indeed, it had no limit or restraint. And

¹ [Appears as § 12 in the 1688 edition.—Tr.]

² [For patribusfamilias read patribusfamilias.—Tr.]

Dionysius of Halicarnassus seems to lend colour to this point, in the passage cited above. Others say that the emperor had in mind the fact that the paternal power among the Romans had certain attributes which were not found elsewhere; for instance, it was lost if a man suffered the least deprivation of civil rights, or exile, which punishments, however, do not elsewhere include the forfeiture of his right by the law of nations. And they allege, further, that since legal marriage belongs to civil law, so will the paternal power, which is a result of it, this being the view of Maestertius, De Justitia Romanorum Legum, chap. xxvii. Perhaps the simplest thing is to say that in the Roman state no one who was not a Roman citizen was allowed to exercise the right of life and death over his children.

But those who left this right to fathers when living in states had as their reasons to increase notably in this way the reverence of children for their fathers, and at the same time to leave the latter control over the misdeeds of those who were living under their eyes, while the tenderness of the fatherly affection would not abuse that power to a point of cruelty, in those tender years when there is greater need of clemency than of harshness. Thus in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. IV, chap. xlv [IV. xlv], Phineus observes: 'No father would willingly so punish his own sons, unless the greatness of their faults had overcome all natural affection.' (B.) Sopater¹ says of the law permitting a father to put his children to death: 'The law ordained this, since it knew how upright a judge a father would make.' Add Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. I, chap. xxxiv. 634

On the other hand, those who have taken away that power may be moved by the reason that they have witnessed its abuse by some fathers, for often the most tender regard, when strained beyond measure, will be transported into a violent passion.² Libanius, Declamations, xxxiii [xxxix. 36]: 'Believe not that nature is a sufficient bond. For the most part it serves well enough. But whensoever the plagues of the spirit become violent, it is broken, and a father becomes something other than a father, under the stress of a disordered mind.' Furthermore, it seemed superfluous, since capital offences can easily be punished by the magistrates; while it is hard to strain the paternal affection to such a point as to compel a father to pass capital judgement upon his own, even though guilty. See Aelian, Various History, Bk. I, chap. xxxiv; Valerius Maximus, Bk. V, chap. ix, § 4. Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xlvii. Libanius, Declamations, xxxv [xl. 75]: 'To do anything in the case of one's children is the same as to suffer it.' What is commonly opposed to this from Digest, XLVIII. ix. 5, to the effect that the paternal power 'lies in affection, not in rigour', has no bearing on the matter. For Hadrian had banished a father to an island for killing his son while out hunting, because he had been guilty of adultery with his step-mother. And it is right to punish him for killing a guilty person like a robber, or by stealth, when he could have called his friends to council and sentenced him to death after the manner of a domestic tribunal. Although we should possibly say that the words here used savour of an interpolation by Tribonian.

¹ [Probably the rhetor, in Walz, Rhetores Græci, vols. IV, V, and VIII. But the reference seems to have been taken by Pufendorf from Grotius II. v. 28, the editors of which work have not been able to verify the citation any more than have we.—Tr.]

² [For in truculentas read truculentus.—Tr.]

By the Hebrew law it was a part of the paternal power to be able to declare void the vows of the son and the daughter of the family. The reason for this was not alone that an imprudent age, moved by a false kind of piety, might ruin itself by rash vows, but also, either that the paternal estate might be burdened by such vows, or that the services which the parents owe might be interfered with. And so that power flows not from positive law alone, but also from natural reason, since no one, who is subject to another, can effectually dispose of those things in which he is subject to the power of another. Grotius in his comments on the law in Deuteronomy, xxi. 18 ff., calls it severe, yet it was capable of a strict interpretation, since it was not extended to a daughter, while a son who was not yet capable of guile, and one who was of age and was established apart from his father, were excluded. Moreover, writers disagree on the extent of gluttony and drunkenness which had to be shown for the law to be effective. They also felt it was necessary for the father and mother to be alive, because when a son has lost his father or mother, he often has some property with which the damage can be met. To-day, among the Japanese, parents possess the most severe right of life and death over their children.

From this it appears that the following statement of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 3, must be understood of paternal power as it is found in most Christian states, where the paternal sovereignty is chiefly concerned with the matters which affect the education of children. He says:

In the second period, when judgement has now matured with age, no other actions are subject to the rule of parents except those which in some way are important for the position of the family in relation to the father or the mother. It is in fact fair that the part should conform to the interest of the whole. In other actions, then, children in that period have ἐξουσία, that is, a moral faculty of action¹; but nevertheless in those acts they are bound to desire always to please their parents. If, however, they have not done so, that reason does not make void what they may do. (K.)

Thus it is just that if children wish to be sustained by their father's goods, and later to succeed to them, they should obey the will of their 635 father, in so far as it implies nothing absurd or incongruous, while if they refuse to follow it without sufficient reasons, they will have no ground to complain when their parents refuse to take any further interest in their rearing, and disinherit them. Yet at this point civil laws have wisely provided against parents possibly following a reckless obstinacy rather than reason, and inhumanly cutting off their children from inheriting their estate. Thus Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [p. 973 E], does not allow a father to disinherit a son without the consent of his kinsmen. Add Seneca, Controversies, i and ix; Quintilian, Declamations, ix.

¹ [For agindí read agendi.—Tr.]

And in general, just as it has fallen within the province of states to accommodate the other rights of private citizens to the public advantage and repute, so civil law-makers usually provide that parents are not to abuse their authority over children to the harm of the latter, or the detriment of the state. Thus a father is obligated, so far as he is able, to train his sons to become useful members of civil society. This was the end of a law of Solon, whereby a son need not support his father, if he had not taught him a trade. Plutarch¹, Solon [xxii, p. 90]. But since there are different callings and ways of living in states, it is right that sons should follow the authority of their fathers in their choice of them, provided it leads to nothing absurd or base; especially when the expense of undertaking them is met by their parents. Yet it would be foolish and unjust to compel children against their will to a kind of life that their nature abhors, and a scoundrelly undertaking to force them to a life of shame, such as that of prostitutes, or to one so unsuited to human nature as is celibacy without the gift of continence, and monastic life.

12.² In the third period, when a child leaves his father's household and is freed from the paternal power, he is in all things αὐτεξούσιος [free] and possessed of his own right, though always remaining under a debt of filial duty and reverence, the reason for which is perpetual since it rises from the past services of his parents. On this there is a weighty observation of Plato, Laws, Bk. IV [p. 717 B C]:

To parents we have to pay the greatest and oldest of all debts, considering that all which a man has belongs to those who gave him birth and brought him up, and that he must do all that he can to minister to them: first, in his property; secondly, in his person; and thirdly, in his soul; paying the debts due to them for the care and travail which they bestowed upon him of old, in the days of his infancy, and which he is now to pay back to them when they are old and in the extremity of their need. And all his life he ought never to utter an unbecoming word to them. [...] And we ought to yield to our parents when they are angry, and let them satisfy their feelings in word and deed, considering that, when a father thinks that he has been wronged by his son, he may be expected to be very angry. (J.)

(Compare Digest, XLVIII. ii. 11, § 1.) Then he gives some final admonitions on erecting a fitting monument to the dead and on cherishing their memory. See ibid., Bk. XI, p. 975 [XI, p. 932]. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. II, chap. x:

¹ [For Plutarh read Plutarch.—Tr.] ² [Appears as § 10 in the 1688 edition, see § 10 supra.—Tr.]

Next remember that you are a son [. . .] whose part is to count all that is his as his father's, to obey him in all things, never to speak ill of him to any, nor to say or do anything
 630 to harm him, to give way to him and yield him place in all things, working with him so far as your powers allow. (M.)

Oppian, On Fishing, Bk. V [89]: 'Sons impart a second vigour to a father in his old age.'

Among the Chinese, when a man's parents die, he is at once required to drop whatever office he had in the state, provided it be not military, return to his home and mourn them three years, by reason of the fact that the first three years of his rearing meant so much trouble to his parents. Neuhoof, Legatio. Many forms of their mourning are given by Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. I, on the eighth Emperor. Among the same people a son always takes a seat below his father and at his side, never before him. And, indeed, it is a by-word that children can never do enough to equal the merits of their parents. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, chap. xvi: 'While nobody could make a due return to his parents, a person is considered to be virtuous if he pays such regard as lies within his power.' (W.*) Add Xenophon, Memorabilia [of Socrates], Bk. II [ii]; Stobaeus, Anthology, lxxvii. Although Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. III, chaps. xxix and xxx, maintains at length that a son may sometimes surpass a father in benefits. He quotes also the saying of Alexander in Arrian, Bk. VII [xii.]: 'It was a heavy rental that his mother was charging for ten months' lodging.' But however much that merit may be, it is not enough to allow a father to order the performance of a crime. Therefore

When the mother of Alexander the Great urged him to put to death some one who was innocent, and repeated to him over and over again that she had borne him nine months in her womb, and was his mother, that emperor made her this prudent answer: 'My excellent mother, ask for some other reward; for the life of a man cannot be put in the balance with any kind of service.' (Y.)

Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XIV, chap. x [XI. xxii]. Add Gellius, Bk. II, chap. vii.

Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ix, § 8, feels that this debt of reverence is derived not alone from the law of gratitude, but also from a tacit pact, because it is not presumed that he who frees another from his power, wished him to be his equal, and so under no debt to him, but that it must always be understood, that whoever is freed from an inferior position, promises at least the outward signs by which superiors are usually honoured by their inferiors.

Yet it is an idle superstition, which is given by Constantin l'Empereur, Baba Kama, chap. viii, § 3, to the effect that the Jews through fear did not allow a son to let the blood of his father, to cut a vein, or even to pull out a thorn or open a sore, lest blood might flow. Add Selden, De Jure Naturali, et Gentium, Bk. VII, chap. ii.

Yet it may happen among those who live in states, that a father should show a son respect because of his public position, preserving, however, the prerogative of a father in private concerns. Thus Fabius Cunctator approved the conduct of his son as consul, because he commanded his father to dismount from his horse in his presence. Plutarch, Fabius [xxiv, p. 188 A], and Apophthegms [196 A]; Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 4; Gellius, Bk. II, chap. ii; Digest, XXXVI. i. 13, § 5; XXXVI. i. 14 pr. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 6.

But some scholars are not agreed as to whether that perpetual obligation of children, which endures even after the expiration of paternal authority, arises more from the act of generation than from the faithful labour of rearing them. Some favour the act of generation, on the plea that by it a parent gives life, the greatest boon possible, and the occasion of all others, and that parents in begetting, represent God himself, in some fashion. Others prefer to cast their vote for education, by which a child finally learns to fill his place in the world and which requires long and continued care with no less labour and expense. And still others illustrate this by the observation that among animals the male which begets is observed to feel practically no affection for his offspring, while the mother shows affection only until they¹ are able to provide for themselves; yet the στοργή [affection] of human beings lasts for ever. And this is a proof that the love of parents and the obligation of children, which corresponds to it, do not rise, or at least not chiefly, 631 from mere generation and its accompanying pleasures, which men have in common with lower creatures, but from the fact that children are trained by their parents to a social life. Indeed, Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, chap. xiii, declares:

A father is the author of the child's existence, which seems to be the greatest of all benefactions, as well as of his nurture and education. (W.)

And again, loc. cit., chap. xiv:

The friendship or love of children for parents, and of men for the Gods, may be said to be love for what is good and higher than themselves; for parents are the authors of the greatest benefit to children, as to them children owe their existence and nurture and education from the day of their birth. (W.)

And although in this passage the first place is given to generation and life, no comparison is made between them and education. Philo Judaeus, Legum Allegoriae, Bk. II [III. iii]: 'It is not possible for a man to exhibit due gratitude even to his parents, for it is impossible for him to become their parents in his turn.' (Y.)

Quintilian, Declamations, v [x]:

Thy obligation to me was nevertheless for bringing thee forth as a piece of myself into the visible scene of this world. 'Twas because of me that thou canst make use of sea and

¹ [For prolem read proles.—Tr.]

land for thy advantage, and serve thyself by the unwearied courses of the stars, yea and of the bright-shining firmament of heaven. (W.*)

Yet in our opinion the truth seems to lie with the statement that more obligation arises from education than from mere generation. And it appears that Plato, Grito [p. 45 D], leans to the same persuasion: 'No man should bring children into the world who is unwilling to persevere to the end in their nurture and education.' (J.) In the beginning of the same writer's Theages [p. 121 C], Demodocus says: 'For of this my son, whether one must call it the planting, or the procreating, it is the easiest of all things; but his education is difficult, and I am continually in fear about it.' (D.) And Socrates replies: 'I know no subject which a wise man would be more in earnest about than his own son, how to make the best possible man of him.'¹ For, as it runs in Euripides, Hecuba [600]: 'Sooth, gentle nurture bringeth lessoning in nobleness.' (W.) In Quintilian, Declamations, cclxxxv, a father says:

I do not now charge him with those common things like light, liberty, and the enjoyment of life. But this I do: Your brave deed, as it was a part of my strength and body, is mine; that death-defying spirit of yours flowed from me. Years ago under my instruction I began the task of making a brave man out of you; of late I continued it with my example.

Add Idem, Declamations, cclxxviii; Phaedrus², Bk. III, fab. xvi.

Indeed, I could not well believe that a parent had conferred any signal benefit upon a child by merely begetting him, if he should cast him off at birth, or only give him bare food, without any of the refinements of life, and allow him to develop like a beast of the field, to lead a life shameful to himself and profitless to his fellows; as though 'there is nothing on which a father will spend more money than on his son'. (R.) Juvenal, Satires, vii [184 f.]. Here belongs a law of Solon in Plutarch, Solon [xxii]:

The sons who were born out of wedlock were relieved from the necessity of supporting their fathers at all. For he that avoids the honourable state of marriage, clearly takes a woman to himself not for the sake of children, but of pleasure; and he has his reward, in that he robs himself of all right to upbraid his sons for neglecting him, since he has made their very existence a reproach to them. (P.)

Add Vitruvius, De Architectura, Bk. VI, Preface. Juvenal, Satires, xiv [70 ff.]:

It is good that you have presented your country and your people with a citizen, if you make him serviceable to his country, useful for the land, useful for the things both of peace and war. For it will make all the difference in what practices, in what habits, you bring him up. (R.)

Aristotle in Diogenes Laertius [V. 19]: 'Those parents who gave their children a good education deserved more honour than those who merely begat them; for the latter only enabled their children to live, but the former gave them the power of living well.' (Y.)

¹ [These words do not occur here, although they represent fairly the general sense of the original.—Tr.]

² [For Phaedrus read Phaedrus.—Tr.]

The basis upon which the pupils among the Chinese accord so much veneration to their teacher, who stands in the sacred place of a parent, is given by Martinus, Historia Sinica, Bk. IV, chap. ii. The same writer (Bk. VI, chap. i, p. 122) records that it is customary among them for a man never to attain a higher position of honour than his father; and so, if, for his services to the state, he receives honours which his father did not enjoy, they are accorded his father even after death, by way of a posthumous advancement. For with them obedience to and respect for one's parents is regarded as the greatest and first virtue.

In the next place there is no logical basis for their further argument: 'Life is the greatest good; therefore the act of a parent, whereby that is given, is the one most fitted to give rise to an obligation in children.' For however much I desire to impute some deed of mine to another, I must first know to whom I am giving a kindness, and whether it will reach him. Nor is it of little bearing upon this matter for me to have reflected, whether I really intend to obligate another to me by my kindness; how much it costs me; whether I undertook it more for another's benefit than that I myself might reap some advantage or enjoyment; whether I was led to undertake it for some reason, and after deliberation, or at the urge of my affection and the enticements¹ of my passions; and whether, finally, what I did may be able to help another without some additional services. Whoever has dwelt upon these considerations with some seriousness will easily decide whether the act of education is far more effective in giving rise to an obligation than that of generation.

Although I can in no way give my approval to all the arguments offered on this point by Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. III, chaps. xxx ff.: For surely one cannot allow him to call the life of man, to whom God gave an immortal soul a thing which I bear in common with wild beasts, and the smallest and some of the foulest of creatures. [. . .] [xxx] A boon which I possess in common with flies and worms. [. . .] (The rest, however, of what he has to say, need not fear to such an extent censure from the wise.) [xxx] 'Consider what the fact of my birth is in itself; you will see that it is a small matter, the outcome of which is dubious, and that it may lead equally to good or to evil. No doubt it is the first step to everything, but because it is the first, it is not on that account more important than all the others. [. . .] <Nor are first things equivalent to very great, merely because the very great could not exist without the first>² [. . .] [xxx] Life is merely an unimportant factor in the art of living well. [. . .] [xxxi] Suppose, father, that I have saved your life, in return for the life which I received from you; in this case also I have outdone your benefit, because I have given life to one who understands what I have done, and because I understood what I was doing, since I gave your life not for the sake of, or by the means of my own pleasure. [. . .] Do you wish to know how far from a benefit it was to give life under such conditions? You should have exposed me as a child, for you did me a wrong in begetting me. I gather from this that the cohabitation of a father and mother is the very least of benefits to their child, unless in addition this

¹ [For ille cebris read illecebris.—Tr.]

² [Modified from a sentence in chap. xxix.—Tr.]

beginning of kindness be followed up by others, and confirmed by other services. (S.) (And a little further on he calls the benefaction of generation) [xxxiii] something common [. . .] The gift he received from his father was of one sort only, was easily performed [. . .] and one in which he had in view (at least most fathers) everything rather than him to whom he was giving life. (S.*)

13. Finally, as a father should not banish his offspring from his family save for the best of reasons, so they will not pass into another family without his good permission. But if children have a just reason for leaving their home, and yet their parent is so stern as to forbid it, my feeling would be that they are not obligated to give up looking out for their own interests, however much a harsh father may object; and especially when they are willing to give up their hopes of inheritance. For as civil laws rightfully uphold the authority of parents, so they will be cautious in sustaining their idle perversity. Nor, indeed, does it appear that the heads of separate families can keep their children against their will, to wit,¹ when they have a just reason to leave, since not even in orderly states is it easy to deny free men the right of emigration, if no other tie binds them to their country than the common one of citizenship.

14. Here also belongs the question whether children can marry against the will of their parents. On this point we feel that there must be a clear understanding as to what is required by the duty of filial piety, what obedience is due to sovereignty, and what right belongs to fathers as such, and what to them as heads of families². We have said that paternal power as such is by nature so much as is needed for the education and government of children, until they are able properly to look after their own affairs. Therefore, it does not appear to extend to the point where it can declare void the marriage of children, since it is supposed that this state is entered into only by those who have arrived at the full use of reason. Indeed, the duty of filial piety and reverence requires that children both heed the advice of parents on this step and not oppose their will. Catullus, [Poems, lxii. 60 ff.]:

It is not right to strive with him to whom³ your father himself gave you, your father himself with your mother, whom you must obey. Your maidenhood is not all your own; partly it belongs to your parents, a third part is given to your father, a third part to your mother, only a third is yours; do not contend with two, who have given their rights to their son-in-law together with the dowry. (C.*)

Hermione says in Euripides, Andromache [987-8]:

My marriage, 'tis my father shall take thought Thereof: herein decision is not mine. (W.)

636

So also Xenophon [Training of Cyrus], Bk. VIII [v. 10], writes that Cyrus refused to marry without his parents' consent. Yet that marriage is not at once null and void, which was entered into contrary to this duty, for the obligation to hear and respect another's counsel, does not at once do away with one's power to dispose of one's own affairs. An added consideration is to be found in the words of Quintilian, Declamations, cclvi: 'Nowhere is liberty so necessary as in marriage; for who can love with an estranged heart?' Add Digest, XXIII. ii. 21, 22, 25.

¹ [For semigrandi read sc. (that is, scilicet) migrandi.—Tr.]

² [For familiarum read familiarum.—Tr.]

³ [For quos read quot.—Tr.]

But what shall we say of the power held by fathers as heads of families? Indeed, in many states civil laws lay various restrictions on the faculty of marrying. Thus in some states those of royal blood cannot marry save after advising with the king, since it is commonly recognized what great advantage is often sought by the state through such matches. Among the Japanese the monarch himself chooses for his nobles the wife by whom they are to secure their successors, and orders the marriage to be realized. Bernhard Varenus, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xii; add Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. III, tit. xxi. In other places marriages between a citizen and a foreign woman, between a noble and a plebeian, are held void. For as in states every man is understood to have free power to marry whomsoever he will, and liberty to leave the state, provided there is no express law, or custom equivalent to law, to the contrary, so in separate families, in view of the fact that most of the reasons of civil laws regarding marriage between certain persons are wanting, the head of the household appears to have no right to forbid and rescind marriages of his children, which otherwise labour under no defect, and provided the children are ready to leave the paternal family. For no one would demand that the head of a family have to bear with a daughter-in-law who is odious to him. Genesis, xxvi. 34-5. But if a father see his children scorn his authority without good reasons (see Digest, XXIII. i. 12, § 1), he is not forbidden to banish such recalcitrant ones from his family and inheritance by way of punishment. See Law of the Visigoths, Bk. III, tit. ii, chap. 8; Law of the Burgundians, Tit. XII, chap. v.

The right belonging to heads of families, resident in states, is to be known from the laws of each of them. Among the Japanese all marriages are arranged by the parents of each party, but if these are dead, the duty falls upon the nearest of kin. Bernhard Varenus, *Descriptio Japoniae*¹, chap. xii. Among the ancient Peruvians under the Incas, marriages contracted by children without the parents' consent were considered void and their issue illegitimate, unless the parents later agreed to them. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. VI, chap. xxxvi. Here it is certain that just as civil laws can invalidate the drawing up of some contracts, either because they lack the proper formulae, or because certain persons are forbidden to enter them, so they can make the validity of the marriage among sons of the family depend upon the consent of the parents, so that unless their approval is added, a marriage is held void in the eyes of the law, and may be rescinded. See Digest, XXIII. ii. 2; XLVIII. v. 7. For carnal copulation and an agreement to live together can no more make a valid marriage, if the civil laws object, than the contract of a ward¹, and the consequent transfer of property without the authority of his guardian, can effectually transfer the dominion over his property. Although sober men are right in warning parents that even when such power is allowed them they should be circumspect and not too severe in² exercising it. Add Boecler and Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 10.

¹ [For Japon read Japon.—Tr.]

¹ [For pupulli read pupilli.—Tr.]

² [For citra read circa.—Tr.]

ON THE POWER OF A MASTER

- | | |
|---|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The nature of the relation between master and slave. 2. Actual slavery is not an institution of nature herself; 3. Nor directly ordained of God. 4. It appears that slavery originated in a contract. 5. Later on the number of slaves was greatly increased by war. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 6. Hence comes the obligation of captives towards their masters. 7. Slaves are in a fashion equivalent to property. 8. Yet they are capable of receiving an injury. 9. On the offspring of slaves. 10. Disadvantages in slavery. 11. The ways in which a slave may be freed. |
|---|---|

IN the same manner as families are formed of husband and wife, as primary members, from whose union offspring are produced, so slaves are added to them as secondary members, whose labour is used by the heads of families in their undertakings. Since the government of these is usually more exacting than that of children, men require a form of regimen to be laid down in the relation of master and slave which is more rigorous than in that of father and son, inasmuch as children are commonly given a looser rein. Yet we feel that Hobbes errs a bit in calling that relation a state, both because it usually implies a smaller number of persons than can make for the security of those who live in natural liberty (see Genesis, xxxii. 7 ff.; xxxiv. 30), and because a master takes slaves to himself not so much for purposes of mutual defence, as that he may handle his affairs more conveniently and on a larger scale by means of their services.

2. Regarding the origin of this relation, we must reject the view of those who assert that the master's sovereignty and slavery were actually established by nature. We observe, of course, the greatest differences between men, and, not to mention other points, it is quite obvious that some of them are so keen as to perceive of themselves what is to their advantage, and quick to undertake upon their own initiative, and without suggestion from others, what will serve their interests. On the other hand, some are so stupid that they do not observe, without the lead of others, what will be of use to them, and are more fitted to undertake mere physical tasks than such as require some mental perspicacity. Such, moreover, is their sluggishness that only under compulsion will they do anything well, nor do they know how to keep or expend to any advantage what they have acquired. These latter Aristotle calls slaves by nature, not because master and slave are actually constituted such by nature, without the intervention of some act of men, but because such men, formed in that mould by nature, are better suited to minister to others than to act on their own initiative. This is illustrated by the remark of Agesilaus: 'The free inhabitants of Asia are cowards, but the slaves brave men.' Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms [ii, p. 213 c]. Which remark Passienus applied in this way to Caligula: 'No man had ever been a better slave, or a worse master.' (R.) Tacitus, Annals, Bk. VI [xx].

3. Johannes Friderich Hornius, De Civitate, Bk. I, chap. iii, strikes his customary jarring note, in running counter to the common opinion of lawyers, who trace the origin of slavery to the law of nations. Only the manner, he says, of establishing slavery was taken over by different peoples, that is, a common custom¹ prevailed of reducing to slavery 638 persons taken captive in war. But the sovereignty of a master is not to be sought in custom or the law of nations; rather the cause of a society is always to be distinguished from that of sovereignty. And so God must be assumed to be the cause of the sovereignty of a master, for since victory comes of God, and an enemy is delivered into the hand of the conqueror by divine providence, it follows that the victor can take the life of his enemy. But since it was not to the interest of humanity that an unarmed and prostrate captive be always put to death, when he might be of use, the superior retained his power over the prisoner.

But as men entered war partly for defence, partly to vindicate their rights, so when victory was gained and they were willing to spare the conquered, it lay within their choice, either to reduce them to slavery, or to keep them under guard until they were freed by treaty or ransom. All of these things, as well as the power over such captives, in so far as they accord with right reason, was not immediately established by God, but approved by Him as established by men.

Equally incorrect is his further statement: 'The right of life and death which the victor once had over his captive he keeps,' and so that right which the victor has over the conquered before he exacts faith of him, is the same as that by which he later rules him as a master. For these two rights are very different things. A victor can by the right of war do whatever he pleases to the conquered, slay him or grant him his life; but no one has ever yet, so far as it is known to us, called this blanket power a right of life and death. But a right of life and death, such as a master is said to hold over his slave, denotes a legal power to inflict capital punishment because of some antecedent offence.

Finally, the same author (Bk. I, chap. iii, § 5) says that all sovereignty of whatever nature carries power over the life of a subject; consequently, no difference is discernible in the power itself but only in its exercise; and therefore, the sovereignty of a husband over his wife, a father over his child, a king over his citizens, is the same as that of a master over his slave, save that the former are usually exercised more leniently, the latter more harshly. But I have as yet been unable to prevail upon myself to accept this view.

¹ [For morem read morem.—Tr.]

4. Our idea on the origin of slavery is as follows. When in early days men departed from their original simple manner of living and began to devote more efforts to the elaboration of life, and to turn their attention to increasing their possessions, it is highly probable that the more sagacious and more wealthy invited the more sluggish and the poorer sort to hire themselves out to them. Then when both parties came to realize the advantage of this, the latter sort were gradually led to attach themselves permanently to the families of their employers, on condition that the latter should provide sustenance and all other necessities of life, and the former take care of all the work about the establishment as the owners might order. And so the first beginnings of slavery followed upon the willing consent of men of poorer condition, and a contract of the form of 'goods for work': I will always provide for you, if you will always work for me.

How much dominion belongs by nature to a master over slaves of this kind, is easily gathered from the end of this relationship. A master can lay upon such a slave whatever tasks he will, considering, of course, his strength and skill. He can also reprove the carelessness and slothfulness of a slave, by measures of such severity as his nature warrants, although he cannot on this score put him to death. And so the most severe form of punishment a slave of this kind can receive is to be expelled from the family for his laziness. Nor does it appear that such slaves can be sold to others against their will, but when they do not please their master, they should either be expelled from the family or transferred to another, although not without their consent, since they are in fact nothing but labourers for life, working entirely for their master while that status exists. Finally, if they commit some serious offence against others outside the family, while yet in subjection under the terms which we have mentioned, it does not even then appear that masters can assert the right of life and death. But that the master may avoid involving himself in a suit in their defence he can and should expel the culprits from his establishment, which is the equivalent of handing them over. But if such an offence be against the master himself and his family, they can be put to death, not, however, by the force of sovereignty but by the law of war, as though they are enemies. Yet the punishment should be meted out in a different fashion from that practised, according to Tacitus, Germany [xxvi], by the Germans, who used to kill their slaves 'not to preserve strict discipline, but in a fit of fury, like an enemy, except that there is no penalty to be paid'. (H.)

639

What we have outlined above is the condition of slaves and the master's power as described in Exodus, xxi. 2 ff.; Leviticus, xxv. 39 ff.; Deuteronomy, xv. 12 ff.; Exodus, xxi. 26, 27, 32; Ecclesiasticus, xxxiii. 25 ff.

5. Now after the convenience of performing one's labours by the hand of others was recognized (on which account Aristotle, Politics, Bk. III [I. iii], calls a slave 'a tool that takes the place of other tools'), and when wars began to grow common, it gradually became customary to grant captives in war their life and bodily liberty, provided they served their captors for their lifetime. On the origin of the custom Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VII, chap. lvi, says, 'The Lacedaemonians invented slavery,' which cannot be admitted except in the sense that either they first introduced it among the Greeks, or that they also enslaved any Greeks whom they captured in war. Although it argues for the first reason, that, when Herodotus, Bk. VI [cxxxvii], describes how Lemnos was seized by the Pelasgians, he adds: 'For at that time neither they nor the other Hellenes as yet had household servants.' (M.) Thus, according to Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lvi, Sesostris forced no Egyptian to labour on his works but completed them all with the labour of captives, and for that reason carved on his temples: 'No native of Egypt has done any work upon this.' Add Busbecq, Letters, iii, p. 120; Christophe Richerius, De Moribus Orientalium, p. 101.

Now these captives in war were usually treated very harshly, because there still remained in their captors some of the wrath that is felt towards an enemy; and while it was held that severity was excusable against those who had menaced our life and fortunes, and threatened us with the same ills. And this licence proceeded so far that it was held lawful to kill them in anger or for any offence. Add Grotius, Bk. III, chap. vii, § 2. Once having been introduced it was extended, even on a relatively slight excuse, also to the children of such captives, or to such as had been acquired by purchase. Yet in some states it was later restricted, and in others entirely removed.

Therefore, the origin of slavery was due to willing consent and not to war, although war was the occasion for a great increase in the number of slaves and made their lot a harder one. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 27.

6. Let us see how Hobbes, De Cive, chap. viii, derives the power of a master and the condition of slaves from war. Here we must at the outset reject his contention that out of a mere natural state, which he calls a war of all against all, there arises a right to attack every one, overcome him by force, and reduce him to slavery. But this much is right, that, as by the law of just warfare, an enemy can be deprived of his life, so, when one man has conquered another in war, he may grant him his life, on condition that the captive promise to serve him, that is, do everything that he will command. In this pact the one who has been conquered receives some good, that is, the present of life, which could have been taken by the right of war, while the good which he in turn promises is service and obedience, and the latter, so far as is possible, absolute. For whoever is obligated to obey a man's commands, before knowing what that other will command, is bound to all his orders without question and without restriction, although Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xiv, shows that the law of humanity orders some mitigation in such matters.

But, as Hobbes correctly observes, not every captive in war whose 640 life is spared is understood to have entered into a pact with the victor, for the death of some is but postponed, to be required at the will of the victors whenever they so please. This was the case at Rome for those captives who were reserved for a triumph, or for their spectacles, while not every one is accorded so much trust that he is left so great an amount of natural liberty whereby he can, if he has the mind, either make his escape, or refuse his services, or plot some evil or loss for his master. For such a person performs the part of a slave, or gives his services, truly enough, but without any exchange of mutual trust, or the restraint of but natural ties, in workhouses, in chains, or under close watch, in the same manner as animals give us their services. Therefore, he continues, the obligation of a slave, who has been secured in war, toward his master, is not born from the mere gift of life, or postponement of death, but from the fact that he is not held in prison or chains, since that obligation, consisting as it does of performance upon both sides, springs from a pact, and in every pact there should be a mutual exchange of trust. Therefore, to the kindness of a grant of his life there is joined a confidence, because of which the master leaves him in bodily liberty, so that, did there not intervene an obligation and contractual or moral ties, not only could the slave make his escape, but he could also slay his master and preserver, since there would still be a state of war between them. From which it follows that slaves who are confined in prisons, workhouses, or chains, are different from such as are joined to their master by a pact, since the former serve him, not out of respect for a pact, but in order to avoid a flogging. And so if they should escape or murder their master, they would not be transgressing natural laws, for to bind a person with actual bonds is proof that he who does so supposes that such a captive is not sufficiently restrained by any obligation or moral bond.

But it is a false statement of his, that a master has no less right over a slave not in bonds, than over one who is in bonds, for he enjoys the fullest right over both. That licence of war which a master has reserved for himself over his captive is something different from sovereignty, for by it the victor can take his life, whenever he pleases, on the plea of a state of war, from which, it appears, the captive is not yet freed, while the very highest form of sovereignty does not properly include a right over life, save for crimes.

7. Now although sovereignty, which is properly the right to govern another's person, when constituted with the voluntary consent of a subject, regularly cannot, without that one's consent, be transferred to another, since a person often has his own reasons why he would be subject to one man and not to another, yet in those sovereignties which took their rise in force, it is customary for the same to be capable of alienation at the will of those who wield them. But so long as subjects enjoy any liberty, it cannot properly be said that the men themselves are alienated, but only the right to rule over them, in so far as that implies some advantage or gain. For although every sovereign can say of his subject, 'He is mine', yet such proprietorship or ownership is entirely different from that whereby a man says some material object is his. For by the former statement I mean only that to me and not to another belongs the right to rule over this man, such a rule, however, as implies that I am under some obligation towards him, and that I cannot exercise that right without limit. But proprietorship over a material thing includes a right to use, waste, or consume it to my profit or pleasure, so that, whatever treatment I may accord it, I am not guilty of any injury to it, but can give this good and sufficient answer, 'It is mine'.

Now although the law of humanity does not give its permission, that all traces of original equality be extinguished toward an enemy, 641 after he has come to terms with us, whatever may be his deserts, and that he can be treated like a beast or some inanimate object, toward which we lie under no obligation, yet the brutality of many nations has gone to such lengths that slaves are numbered among their material possessions, and are treated not as subjects for their master's sovereignty, but as objects for his violence, so that a man can say, 'He is mine', as well of his slave as of his ox. And so in Quintilian, Declamations, vi [17], a prisoner of war who had become a slave says, 'I have destroyed myself'. In the Roman law runaway slaves are said 'to make a theft of themselves' (Digest, XLVII. ii. 60; Code, VI. i. 1), while it held that what was done for a slave by his master, was done not so much for the advantage of the former, as for that of the latter, so that the master might suffer no loss if the slave died, and the only sympathy the poor man might receive would be because of the price paid for him. Yet add Dio Chrysostom, Orations, xv, On Slavery, p. 241 ff. ed. Morelli [lxv. 21 ff.].

Yet it is not right to conclude that the property belonging to the slave before his captivity falls to his master after captivity, for this can only be allowed in the sense that whatever the slave might be worth previously by his labour, now falls to his master. When a man voluntarily gives himself into slavery, he can turn over his small savings as well as himself to his master, although that is not always necessary. Nay, it seems likely that those who, in former times, sold themselves, kept their purchase price as well as their property, as a kind of personal holding, or turned it over to those whom they were before obligated to support, such as their children, or aged parents. Although the Jews had a law that a man could not rightfully sell himself, unless he had absolutely no means of self-support. See Selden, Bk. VI, chap. vii.

But by Roman law whoever had allowed himself to be sold so as to share in the sale price, was reduced to actual slavery. What they did was this: Gaius claimed that Seius was his slave, although actually a free man, while Seius also posed as a slave, having already bargained for his share of the price. Then when Seius had been sold, a third party was called into the scheme who brought action in court that a free man had been sold. In this way the purchaser lost both his slave and his money, after Gaius had cleverly gotten out of the way. An example of this is in Plautus, The Persian, Act IV, sc. iv and ix [594 ff., 738 ff.].

But if a captive has been enslaved by the law of war, the victor can keep whatever of his property he seizes along with him; but whatever was not seized together with him, shall then stand as though he were naturally dead, at least until he has recovered his liberty. But it is patent that all that a slave acquires during his servitude is acquired for his master, for to whom a person himself fully belongs, to him also will belong all that is produced by that person. And so there will be nothing that a servant can keep as his own against his master, although whatever the latter has made over to him as his very own for his use or supervision, such as food, clothing, dwelling, savings, he can keep and defend against a fellow servant. See Pliny, Letters, Bk. VIII, ep. xiv.

8. When the same writer denies that any injury can be done a slave, his statement must be taken with a grain of salt. For the reason which he adds, namely, that since a servant has subjected his will to that of his master, whatever the latter does is done by the will of the former, and no injury is done to a willing recipient—all this only means that a servant cannot complain, no matter what kind of task, provided it be within his strength, his master lays upon him, even if it happen not to be to his liking. In the same way, also, a citizen cannot complain if an absolute monarch administer the affairs of the state according to his judgement, however much that administration may displease him. But we will show in another connexion that that subjection of the will does not hold good to this extent. Yet who would deny in general that an injury is done a slave if some task is required of him beyond his strength, if he is beaten without cause, or, because he did not perform the impossible, if he is denied food? Theano, Letters, III. vi 642 [2 Hercher], makes it a requirement for the 'just use' of slaves 'that they be neither broken down by labour nor weakened by want'.

Here we may well note the gross inhumanity of the Jews, whereby they believed that they were not required to furnish clothing and food for a Gentile slave, although they could lawfully exact services from such by every kind of cruelty. Selden, Bk. VI, chap. viii. This may have been because they themselves had borne such treatment in Egypt (Exodus, v. 13-14), for they held that the regulations of Leviticus, xxv. 43, concerned only Hebrew slaves.

The Roman laws were more kindly in this regard. See Digest, I. vi. 1, § 2; I. vi. 2; Code, VII. vi. 1, § 3. Here belongs a frequent saying of Cato, given in his Life by Plutarch [Cato the Elder, xxi]: 'It was shameful for a man to quarrel with a domestic over food and drink.' (P.) Although in other respects he was harsh enough in maintaining that when old they should be sold, and those who were capable of no service should no longer be fed, for which Plutarch justly censures him on the ground that [v] 'Beneficence may often be extended even to dumb animals'. (P.) Plautus, The Two Menaechmi [87]: 'The servant you really want to keep from running off ought to be bound with food and drink. A loaded table—tie his snout to that.' (N.) Juvenal, Satires, xiv [126], censures the master who 'pinches the bellies of his slaves with short rations'. (R.) We must also commend a decree of Claudius given by Suetonius, Claudius, chap. xxv:

When certain men were exposing their sick and worn out slaves on the Island of Aesculapius because of the trouble of treating them, Claudius decreed that all such slaves were free, and that if they recovered, they should not return to the control of their master; but if any one preferred to kill such a slave rather than to abandon him, he was liable to the charge of murder. (R.)

The same account is given by Dio Cassius, Bk. LX [xxix. 7]. These are excellent words of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, chap. xiii: 'It is possible to be friends with a slave qua man. For there would seem to be a possibility of justice between every man and any one who is capable of participation in law and covenant, and therefore in friendship, in so far as he is man.' (W.) Add Idem, Economics, Bk. I, chap. v; Seneca, On Anger, Bk. III, chap. iv; On Clemency, Bk. I, chap. xviii; Letters, xlvii; Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xiii; Stobaeus, Anthology, lx [lxii = V. xix].

Now as the other rights of fathers of families have been tempered or restricted by civil laws, so it often happens that this power of the master is found to be limited more in one place, less in another. But when that power remains absolute and unlimited, it should be conceived of as not established by civil law, but passed over and left in the form in which it could be exercised by fathers of families outside the bounds of states. Although the laws of some states incite the harshness of masters toward slaves and ordain greater severities against them than the law of nature allows even to absolute sovereignty. Here belongs the custom of the Romans, whereby, if a master had been murdered, 'the whole household of slaves, which had stayed under the same roof, had to be executed', which in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIV

[xlv], C. Cassius undertakes to defend by arguments based upon its advantages. Some time later Hadrian, according to Spartianus [Hadrian xviii], relaxed its severity in some degree, to the effect that not all the servants were subject to examination, in case a master was found dead in his home, but only those 'who were close enough to know what was going on'. Add Digest, XXIX. v. Compare, however, 1 Samuel, xxvi. 16. Herodotus, Bk. IV, towards the beginning, relates that the Scythians also put out the eyes of their servants.

9. Regarding the offspring of slaves the questions are raised, first, as to whether they necessarily follow their mother, and second, whether it is just that they also be held in slavery. On the former question the Roman laws ordain, that, as with animals, so with men in servile condition the 'offspring follows the womb'. Digest, I. v. 24. Yet Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 29, feels that this is not entirely in accord with natural law, in case the father can by sufficient evidence be known, for since in the case of some animals the males as well as the females exercise a care 643 over their young, which proves that their young are common to both, so if the civil law has made no point of this matter the issue will follow the father no less than the mother. See Edict of Theodoric, chap. lxvii. But we feel otherwise on this matter. For we have shown above that in early times the issue belonged to the mother, but that the father acquired a right over it by the marriage pact.

But now since slaves and all that they produce belong to their masters, the issue of slaves will likewise be in the power of the latter, after slavery has been extended to the point that not only the labour but also the body of a slave is understood to belong to his master. Add Grotius on Exodus, xxi. 4, where he shows that even the marriages of slaves may be annulled at the will of their master. The passage in Xenophon, Economics [ix. 5], has some bearing on this point, where among his rules for the ordering of the household he includes one, to the effect that slaves should not have children without the consent of their master, giving as his reason: 'For honest servants generally prove more loyal if they have a family; but rogues, if they live in wedlock, become all the more prone to mischief.' (M.) Now several reasons can be given why the right of the mother's master is greater than that of the father's. The first is that the loves of male slaves are not so easily watched and circumscribed. See Plautus, Casina. Again, the body of a female slave belongs to her master, and during pregnancy it is not so able for a time to meet its tasks, as is not the case with a male servant. And this is favoured also on the ground that things planted go with the soil. But if the master himself be the father of the slave's issue, its legal status will be such as he himself or the laws of the state shall decide. And these latter will also have to determine the fate of what the mother conceived in slavery but brought forth when free, or vice versa. Although humanity always favours the liberty of the issue of slaves. Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [p. 930 D E], thus pronounces on the offspring of slaves:

In case a female slave have intercourse with a male slave, or with a free man or freed-man, the offspring shall always belong to the master of the female slave. Again, if a free woman have intercourse with a male slave, the offspring shall belong to the master of the slave; but if a child be born either of a slave by her master, or of his mistress by a slave—and this be proven—the offspring of the woman and its father shall be sent away by the women into another country, and the guardians of the law shall send away the offspring of the man and the mother. (J.)

Now the master does no injury to the issue of a slave, if he decrees that it shall follow that servile state. For since its parent has no property of her own, she can in no way maintain it but by what is her owner's. And since the master must furnish the food for her offspring, and all else necessary to sustain life for a long while before its services can be of any use, and even then what he can do will not be much in excess of his keep, at least at the first, the issue will not be permitted to avoid slavery against his master's will. And this holds true not only so long as the issue is still understood to be, as it were, in the master's debt, but also because his master undertook to rear him, on condition that his service be for life, to which condition he is supposed to have given his tacit consent, especially since he would never have been born, had his master wanted to use his privilege and killed his parents by the right of war. And liberty is understood to belong naturally to all men in so far as no need of our own or of another has preceded, which is capable of making us unequal to another.

Now all this is clear enough of the offspring of those who are reduced to slavery by reason of war. Regarding those who voluntarily enslave themselves to another, equity, and the favour extended to liberty, appear to suggest that, in the absence of any law or express pact, the expense of their rearing shall be understood to be included in what is owed to their parents, and so they shall not be liable to slavery upon that score. Compare Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 27.

644 10. We must see, in the next place, what is the disadvantage contained in slavery which many people hold the greatest misery possible, to be escaped by every means, even by death itself. Sadi, A Persian Rosegarden, chap. i: 'It is better to sit down to one's own simple bread than to stand at another's table with a golden belt.' Now personal slavery consists in this, that a man owes the labour of his whole life in return for food and the other necessities of life, and if this is received in natural terms, without inhuman cruelty on the part of some masters, or rigour of civil laws, there is no great harshness involved in it. For that perpetual obligation is compensated by the perpetual certainty of maintenance, which is often not the lot of those who work by the day, because of lack of employment, or their own laziness, which can be cured only by blows. See Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. xxvi, p. 257 [§ 23]. Lucan, Bk. III [152]: 'Not to ourselves, but to our tyrant, is the poverty dangerous that acts the slave.' (R.) Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 27. It is the opinion of some, and this not without cause, that the doing away of slavery among Christians is one of the reasons why one meets everywhere such a pack of wandering thieves and sturdy beggars, which evil has been met in some states by the erection of public workhouses, in which lazy rascals are constrained to a life of labour. Add Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. I, chap. iv; Busbecq, Letters, iii, p. 118.

Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ix, § 9, discourses in the following manner on the differences between slavery and liberty. Liberty, says he, is nothing other than the absence of hindrances to motion. These hindrances are either natural and external, or moral and arbitrary. By the former kind a man's liberty is greater or less according as he has more or less space in which he may move, so that he who is secured in a larger prison has more liberty than a prisoner in a small one. So a man can be free to go in one direction but not in another, as a man who journeys between hedges and fences, is restrained upon both sides from tramping down the neighbouring vineyards and fields. This form of liberty may be called corporal and physical, and in this sense all slaves and subjects are free who are not restrained by chains or prisons.

Furthermore, the obstacles to liberty impede motion not absolutely but only by accident, that is, by our own choice, in so far as we judge it better for us to refrain from an action than to perform it. Thus a man on shipboard is not prevented from being able to throw himself into the sea, provided he is able to will to do so; but if he is wise he will decide that to remain on the ship is preferable to drowning in the waves. Thus no matter what kind of penalties are established, a man who does not fear to meet them will be able to do what they forbid. And this is that intrinsic liberty of will, in no way separable from it, which is enjoyed by slaves as well as by all other subject persons. Therefore, the distinction must be sought elsewhere.

And, in the first place, although scarcely any master is so stern as to forbid his slave to do the things necessary for the preservation of his life and health, which are naturally a man's first care, yet in general free men are given easier and more frequent opportunities to look after their own welfare, than are slaves, who are sometimes not a little limited in this respect by coarser food and unseasonable labours. Here belongs the saying of Cicero, *On the Orator*¹, Bk. I [II. vi]: 'For he does not seem to me to be a free man, who does not sometimes do nothing.' (W.)

In the next place, free men have as an honour above slaves, the fact that they fill the offices in the state and the more honourable positions in the household, and so possess more of the luxuries of life, both of which advantages are highly suited to men of loftier parts. For the trouble of such labour is requited by its distinction and there is a satisfaction in the abundance of possessions, because we think they will either be to our advantage in the future, or enable us to live more comfortably, or allow us the opportunity to put many people under obligation to us.

¹ [For Orotore read Oratore.—Tr.]

But the greatest consideration of all is that free men need obey 645¹ only the state and its general laws, and need fear no punishment but what is defined in them, while in all else they hold it their special delight to suit their own will. But slaves serve one who is even a fellow citizen, are subject to his special orders, penalties, and restraints, and are forced to bear his harshness, which is all the more irksome the more frequent and intimate the contact between them. And this is all the harder because the laws of the state rarely come to the assistance of servants against their masters, save when their harshness comes to a head in some outrageous savagery. Such things as these are the greatest distress to those of gentle natures, although it makes a great deal of difference whom a man serves. In Terence, Eunuch [486], the appearance of a servant leads to the conclusion that his master is poor and miserable, though on the contrary, 'All your great houses are full of saucy slaves.' (R.) Juvenal, Satires, v [66].

We may add that the troubles of slavery are not a little heightened by human pride, because of which no man thinks himself unworthy to rule. Therefore, when a slave feels that he is as much or even more fitted to rule than his master, he concludes that fortune is doing him an injustice, and desires to better his condition by any means possible. In Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VIII [i. 4], Chrysantas appears to set forth such a distinction between liberty and slavery:

As you think it right to rule those that are under you, so let us submit to those to whom it becomes us to submit. We ought so far to distinguish ourselves from slaves, that slaves do service to their masters against their wills; while it behooves us [. . .] to perform willingly what appears to be of the highest importance. (W.)

Here also belongs a passage in Dio Chrysostom, Orations, xiv, On Slavery.

II. A slave is given his freedom in several ways. I. If his master makes him a free present of it. For whatever right over himself a slave transferred to his master, the latter may again return to the slave, although it is customary in many states for the slave so freed to owe his former owner respect. See Law of the Visigoths, Bk. V, tit. vi, chaps. 17 and 21. But if the master acknowledge a superior, he cannot give the slave his freedom save in a way that always preserves the right of that superior, and is according to the laws of the state on manumission.

II. If a master drive his slave from his presence, which is in a state held the equivalent of banishment, and differs from manumission not in effect but only in manner; for in both cases the power of the master is given up, but in the latter the liberty is granted by way of punishment, in the former as a favour. For even free servants recognize it to be a punishment to lose an agreeable and wealthy master.

¹ [For '64' read '645'.—Tr.]

III. If a slave is captured his new slavery removes the old one; and this is true whether the slave be captured alone, or his master with him. But if only the master has been captured the slave passes back into that state in which he would have been, had his master died a natural death; at least until the time when his master shall have been restored to his former full liberty.

IV. A slave attains his freedom, from ignorance of his master's successor; suppose, for instance, his master die without transferring his right to another; for in that case no obligation lies upon him to serve any one else. For no one is understood to be under obligation, unless he can know for whom he must perform what he owes. But the question whether such a person can live as a free man and citizen in a state, will have to be settled according to the civil laws. Thus some say that among the Turks manumission of slaves is of avail only against the claims of the old master, not against those of others, who may again reduce the one thus freed to slavery. It may also happen that a slave attains his freedom, from ignorance of his master's successor, if no heir is to be found for his master, when deceased either naturally or in the eyes of the law. For although such a person's property is held derelict, and passes to the first person to seize it, that is not the case with such a man's servant, as though he could be dragged back to slavery by any and every person. For other things are defended by no right which prevents some man from claiming them as his own, unless another has already secured a 646 right over them. But over a man another cannot assert any right but such as arises from the former's consent, or some antecedent deed which concerns him. So now that the former right is extinct, which the victor secured as his very own over the slave by warfare, his natural liberty returns, even though slavery may be more appropriate to his character. For inclination and aptness of character of themselves give no man a right to drag off a person to slavery against his will, nor can I impose upon a man by force what may be to his advantage.

V. When a slave is thrown into chains or otherwise deprived of his liberty of movement, not because of some preceding crime, or by way of punishment, he is freed from the obligation that arose from his pact, since his master by putting physical chains upon him is supposed no longer to wish to hold him by his obligation. For there exists no pact when no trust is put in the party to it, nor can faith be broken when none is given. Therefore, it will not be a breach of trust for such a slave to run away.

SAMUEL PUFENDORF
ON THE LAW OF NATURE AND NATIONS
BOOK VII

CHAPTER I

ON THE MOTIVE LEADING TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A STATE

- | | |
|--|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. Introduction.2. Man by nature loves himself more than society.3. Yet from the love of society does not at once follow the love of a state.4. There are many faults in man which disturb civil society.5. Does a state arise by natural development? | <ol style="list-style-type: none">6. May need or helplessness be a cause for the establishment of a state?7. The real cause for founding a state.8. Mere respect for the law of nature does not insure the peace of mankind;9. Nor arbitrators alone, nor pacts.10. Differences in views disturb the peace of mankind.11. A stronger control is needed to restrain men than mere natural law. |
|--|--|

AFTER the so-called 'prime societies' we must now discuss a state or commonwealth, which is considered the most perfect society, and is that wherein is contained the greatest safety for mankind, now that it has grown so numerous. The reason why men, after being first scattered in distinct families, formed this, will be perfectly patent after we have examined with some care both the nature of civil society, and the inclinations of human character. To make this clear it will be profitable to set forth what is commonly said on this matter.

647 2. Most writers fall back upon the nature of man, which is so drawn to civil society that without it he neither wishes to nor can exist. For this purpose they advance those arguments which were adduced above (Bk. II, chap. iv) on behalf of man's social nature, and drawn chiefly from the miseries of a solitary life, the monotony of solitude, speech which was given man to no purpose except for society, the love of associating with men, the advantage following upon companionship with others, and the like. On the other hand, Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, attempts to show that man is in fact an animal which loves first and foremost himself and his own advantage (Isaeus, Orations, ii [iii. 66]: 'No man cares more for others than he does for himself.' Euripides, Medea [85-86]: 'What mortal does not know this now; that every one loves himself more than his neighbour?' Isocrates, On the Peace [7 and 28]: 'To me all men seem to desire their advantage, and to have more than any one else'); and that man's love for society and other men is only secondary, and extends so far as the possibility of its leading to some pleasure and advantage of his own. He would prove this by the fact that a man is not induced to love the society of another by the mere fact that he is a man, but that he hopes to secure some position or advantage for himself in the company of some one man rather than another. This he illustrates by induction from particular societies.

Those who unite for business purposes have an eye to their own profit, which they hope they can obtain better by taking partners than by conducting their business separately. When they have been deceived in this expectation, every one will consider them fools, if they do not withdraw from such a losing partnership at the earliest opportunity. Those who are united by reason of a service for the state, form a kind of party friendship, which savours more of mutual fear than love, and implies more a false display of externals than a sincere union of spirits, so that such men may form a faction to secure their private advantage by uniting their strength, but scarcely ever is there any real consideration for one another. If a man feels secure in his own resources, he gives little heed to securing associates. When men join together for a good time, or to banish care, each is greatly delighted if he can provoke mirth for others or himself, yet that is well-nigh impossible without calling attention to the folly or boorishness of others, for a man may not with propriety smile at something in others which he knows to exist in himself. For Juvenal, Satires, ii [23], says: 'Let the straight-legged man laugh at the club-footed, the white man at the blackamoor.' (R.) Therefore, whoever laugh at others cannot avoid holding them lower than themselves, and seeking some little glory for themselves by comparison with another's stupidity. And although laughter may sometimes be without offence, and raised by harmless raillery, it is still patent that a man is led to engage in it more for his own pleasure than from the charm of society. Nay, those who follow the profession of amusing others, have before them, first of all, the securing of some favour or advantage by a display of festive humour. In fact most men have a deep-seated itching to examine, discuss, condemn, and parade the words or deeds of others, and, if they can enjoy that to the full, they feel that they have tasted the sweetest pleasures of life. Difficult indeed is it to control or remove this by discipline or punishment.

Finally, if several learned men, those who lay claim to more wisdom than all others, meet together for discussion, there are as many who wish to be regarded instructors as there are persons present, and he who sees his words of wisdom scorned by the others not only has no liking for them but feels himself insulted. Here belongs the passage in Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. ii:

And if some one comes and tells you, 'We were discussing who was the best philosopher, and one who was there said, "There is only one philosopher, So-and-so (naming you)"', straightway your poor little four-inch soul shoots up to two cubits: Then if another who is by says, 'Nonsense! It is not worth while to listen to So-and-so: what does he know? he has the first rudiments, nothing more,' you are beside yourself, and grow pale and cry out at once, 'I will show him the man I am, he shall see I am a great philosopher.' (M.) 648

Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxvi, n. 6. From all this it is perfectly clear that every voluntary association is due either to need or the desire for glory, and so the men who thus meet have in mind some advantage, or regard and glory from their associates, or, finally, pleasure from them.

The same conclusion is reached by another argument, based on the definition of will, good, honour, and utility. Societies are entered into by men through an act of the will. But when the will acts it implies an object, namely, some good. Yet to what good is the love of individuals drawn save to what each of them has judged to be good for himself? For however good a thing may be of its own nature, yet unless it has some relation to us we take not the slightest interest in seeking and esteeming it. For no matter how happy the king of Persia may be, his happiness has no value for me. All good is attended by some pleasure which touches either the mind alone, or the body as well. All pleasure of the mind is either glory, or ultimately leads to it, while those which affect the body pass under the name of advantages. Therefore, every society is entered into either for the sake of advantage, or of glory, that is, for the sake of oneself and not of one's associates.

Yet a society based upon the mere desire for glory cannot embrace many men, or be of a long duration, because glory, like honour, when the possession of all men, belongs to none, inasmuch as it consists of superiority to others and in comparison with them; nor does the association with others aid a man in finding cause for glorying, except in so far as to be in the company of men of recognized merit is held to be a proof of equal or superior worth. For otherwise a man is worth as much as he can perform without the aid of others. It is, of course, obvious that the advantages of this life can be increased by mutual assistance. Yet it would be far easier and more advantageous, if by our mere command we could require others to give us their services, just as also among the other conveniences of life a thing is considered all the more desirable the more advantages it brings, and the less expense and labour are required to secure and preserve it. Therefore, men will doubtless be drawn more to sovereignty than society, that is, they would prefer to command others, while being themselves uncontrolled, rather than join in mutual labour, were they not restrained by some fear, or foresaw that danger threatens those who wish to order everything by their mere fiat. In accord with this is Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. II, chap. xxii:

Every creature is attached to nothing so much as to its own interest. Whatever then seems to hinder his way to this, be it a brother or a father or a child, the object of his passion or his own lover, he hates him, guards against him, curses him. For his nature is to love nothing so much as his own interest; this is his father and brother and kinsfolk and country and god. Therefore if interest, religion and honour, country, parents and friends are set in the same scale, then all are safe; but if interest is in one scale, and in the other friends and country and kindred and justice itself, all these are weighed down by interest and disappear. For the creature must needs incline to that side where 'I' and 'mine' are. (M.) (The same writer had said just above): Did you ever see curs fawning on one another and playing with one another, so that you say nothing could be friendlier? But to see what friendship is, throw a piece of meat among them and you will learn. (M.)

Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [v. 22]: 'It is no more than what nature will allow of, that each man should look after himself in the first place, and furnish himself with the necessities of life, before he takes care to provide for other people.' (C.)

3. Now although we have shown above¹ that these arguments do not at all prove that man is not a social animal, or is not designed by nature to live in the society of his kind, yet although we presume in man a love of society, it does not at once follow that man is led by nature to a civil society, any more than we can say that because man naturally desires some occupation he is therefore led by nature to the higher studies. For that love can be satisfied by simple societies and by friendship with one's equals. Here belongs the observation of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, chap. xiv: 649

[. . .] Man is naturally more inclined to contract a marriage than to constitute a state, inasmuch as a house is prior to a state, and more necessary than a state, and the procreation of children is the more universal function of animals. (W.)

Add Kenelm Digby, De Origine Mundi, chap. ix, §§ 8 ff. And Hobbes, in the passage cited, approves what we have said, that civil societies are not mere groups but ordered assemblies, the formation of which requires trust and pacts. Their force is not realized by children and the unlearned, or their advantages by those who have never experienced the losses consequent upon their non-existence. This is the reason why the former, because they do not understand the nature of a civil society, cannot enter into it, while the latter, because ignorant of its advantages, give no heed to it, or at least live in it in such a way as not to value its excellence. Therefore, all men, being born as infants, are by that fact unsuited to civil society, and most of them remain so all their lifetime, while it is discipline, not nature, that fits a man for such a society.

Nor is this conclusion shaken by the authority of Aristotle who says that man is φύσει [by nature], or πεφυκέναι [is born], a ζῷον πολιτικόν [political animal], for such a designation sometimes means that there is actually something in a thing by nature, without² any antecedent act on its part or on that of another; in which sense, for instance, a fish is born to swim, a bird to fly, an oak to bear acorns. At other times it means that there lies within a thing an aptitude or ability to receive by some cultivation and discipline that full development which nature intends should be in it, or at least approves as fitting and not repugnant to her purposes. In this sense we may say that a horse, for example, is fitted by nature to prance, while an ass is not, a parrot to chatter, a field to bear grain, a hillside vines, man himself to converse and learn the different arts and sciences. In the same sense also we shall show soon that he is a political creature, despite the fact that all men come into the world as infants, because, when we inquire what belongs or does not belong to men by nature, we are understood to conceive of them as arrived at adult age and endowed with the use of reason. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 2.

¹ [Compare II. ii. 7; II. iii. 16.—Tr.]

² [For circa read citra.—Tr.]

In the next place we should observe, regarding the words of Aristotle, that he sometimes employs the phrase ζῷον πολιτικόν [political animal] in a wider sense for a social creature, not strictly such as is led or fitted to civil society. Thus he says in his Politics, Bk. III, chap. iv [III. vi]: 'Man is by nature a political animal. And therefore, men, even when they do not require one another's help, desire to live together all the same. [. . .]' (J.) And yet it does not follow from the ὄρεξις τοῦ συζῆν [desire to live together], that a man is led to civil government, since that love can be satisfied by less developed societies and intimate associations with others, which can be conceived of without states. Thus in his Politics, Bk. I, chap. ii, the same author would prove that man is a political creature, by the fact that otherwise there would have been no purpose in his being endowed with speech. And yet there may be a use for speech in other places than a state, and at any rate men used 650 it in their intercourse long before the first states were established.

In the same way is to be taken the passage in Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. I, chap. v:

[. . .] It may be assumed that the final good is self-sufficient. But when we speak of self-sufficiency, we do not mean that a person leads a solitary life all by himself, but that he has parents, children, wife, and friends, and fellow-citizens in general, as man is naturally a social (πολιτικόν) being. (W.)

And yet there can be parents, children, wives, and friends outside the borders of a civil state.

4. The matter will be clearer if we consider what condition is assumed by men upon the formation of states; what is required that a man may actually be called a political creature, that is, a good citizen; and, finally, what there is in the nature of a man that is repugnant, so to speak, to a civil life.

Whoever enters a state gives up his natural liberty and subjects himself to sovereignty, which embraces, among other things, the right over him of life and death, and at the command of which many things must be done that a man would otherwise shrink from, and as many avoided which he would greatly desire; so that a large number of actions must be rated by the good of society, which often appears to differ greatly from that of individuals. And yet a man's natural inclination is to be subject to no one, to suit all his actions to his own pleasure, and to seek his own advantage in all his undertakings. Surely to overcome such most agreeable inclinations there were needed weighty reasons, and such as have the force of necessity; and so we conclude that man did not enter states of his own free will, led, as it were, by nature, but that he did so to avoid graver evils.

In the next place, we maintain that man is really a political creature, that is, a good citizen, who promptly obeys the commands of his superiors, who works with all his might for the public good, and willingly regards it as above his own advantage, who, indeed, holds nothing good for himself but what is for the public good, and who, finally, puts himself at the service of other citizens. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. II, chap. x:

What then is the calling of a Citizen? To have no personal interest, never to think about anything as though he were detached, but to be like the hand or the foot, which, if they had the power of reason and understood the order of nature, would direct every impulse and every process of the will by reference to the whole. (M.)

Here belongs also a custom of the Persians whereby a person in sacrificing makes his vows not for himself only and his own, but prays for all the Persians and especially for the king. Herodotus, Bk. I [cxxxii].

Yet no one is so ignorant as not to recognize how ill-adapted are the characters of most men to this end. To few is it given to meet all the requirements of a good citizen; most men are restrained by the fear of punishment, and remain their life long poor citizens and non-political creatures. Nay, rather, no animal is more fierce and uncontrolled than man, more prone to vices which are calculated to disturb the peace of society. Most animals are intent upon their food, and in their hunger fall upon each other; but if they have food in plenty they will not easily be moved to strife. Some are driven on by their lust, yet that flame usually blazes but for a part of the year. And whatever their ferocity they rarely turn upon their own kind. 'The fierce tigress of India dwells in perpetual peace with her fellow; bears live in harmony with bears. . . . Wild beasts are merciful to beasts spotted like themselves.' (R.) [Juvenal, Satires, xv. 159 ff.].¹ But men strive with each other not merely for meat and drink, and at the urge of venery in every season of the year, but also by reason of other vices unknown to the brutes and often opposed to one another.

Among these causes for strife first place is held by an insatiable desire for superfluous things and ambition, the most baneful of evils. And as man alone seems to have a sense of the latter, so he cherishes it in the most tender fashion, since nothing disturbs brutes but what brings them some actual bodily harm. Sallust, Catiline [x]:

651

The lust for money first, then for power, was the root of all evils. For avarice destroyed honour, integrity, and all other noble qualities; taught in their place insolence,

¹ [The order of lines is 163-4, 159-60.—Tr.]

cruelty, to neglect the gods, to set a price on everything. Ambition drove many men to become false; to have one thought locked in the breast, another ready on the tongue; to value friendships and enmities not on their merits but by the standard of self-interest, and to show a good front rather than a good heart. (R.)

Added to these are a most vivid memory of injuries and yearning for revenge which are rarely found in brutes and then not so active. And what is worst of all, man delights to turn upon his own kind with such rage, that most of the evils to which mankind is exposed are of their own making. Nor would it be absurd for one to say that it is by the foresight of his Creator that man develops by such slow steps as opposed to brute animals, in order that the ferocity and harshness of his character may be broken by long delays and brought into harmony with other different dispositions. For were man to come suddenly to full strength, he would be more difficult to manage than any creature. See Proverbs, xiii. 24; xxiii. 13-14; Ecclesiasticus, xxx. 1 ff., 12.

Here belongs what is laid down by Hobbes, Leviathan, chap.¹ xi, to the effect that it is the custom of all men to be hunting perpetually and with no set purpose for one power after another, not because a person is always hoping for a greater power than he now enjoys, or because he cannot rest content with only a little, but because he cannot preserve his present power and resources for a life of comfort save by acquiring more, since they are soon exhausted unless constantly replenished. And even when this is accomplished there arises another new one, looking to fame or new pleasures. Furthermore, every one's desire for riches, honours, sovereignty, or power disposes men to strife, enmities, and war, for a way to secure one's desire lies in killing your competitor, or defeating him in some way.

A further point is that within the various kinds of animals there is in general a similarity of inclinations and appetites, but with men there are as many ideas as there are individuals, and with most of them a steadfast purpose to attain one's end. And this last alone can surely suffice to throw into confusion all that join into one group. Euripides, Phoenician Maidens, 502 [499 f.]:

Were wisdom gauged alike of all, and honour,
No strife of warring words were known to men.
But no men judge alike, no men agree,
Save touching names; no being hath the deed. (W.)

Therefore, so far from man being by nature a political creature, that is, such as is fitted at once by his birth to play the part of a good citizen, but a few of them, and that only after long discipline, are developed to such a degree. Here belongs a passage of Plato, Laws, Bk. VI [p. 766 A]:

¹ [For 'Bk.' read 'chap.'—Tr.]

Man, as we say, is a tame or civilized animal; nevertheless, he requires proper instruction and a fortunate nature, and then of all animals he becomes the most divine¹ and the most civilized; but if he be insufficiently or ill-educated he is the savagest of earthly creatures. (J.)

Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. ii: 'For man, when perfected, is the best of animals, but when separated from law and justice, he is the worst of all.' (J.) A little further on he says: 'If he have not virtue, he is the most unholy and most savage of animals.' (J.) Idem, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. II, chap. i: 'The difference between one training of the habits and another from early days is not a light matter, but is serious or rather all-important.' (W.) Idem, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VII, chap. vii: 'For a bad man will do ten thousand times as much evil as a brute.' (W.) Add Seneca, Letters, ciii. Polybius, Bk. XVII, 652 chap. xiii [XVIII. xv]:

[. . .] Man, reputed the most cunning of animals, gives considerable grounds for being regarded as the stupidest. For the other animals, which obey their bodily appetites alone, can be deceived by these alone; while man, though he has reason to guide him, is led into error by the failure of that reason no less than by his physical appetites. (S.)

Lactantius, On the Anger of God, chap. xii: 'What will be more savage, what more unmerciful, than man, if, the fear of a superior being taken away, he shall be able either to escape the notice of or to despise the might of the laws?' (C.) Plutarch, Cicero [xlvi]: '[. . .] No wild beast is more savage than man when his passion is supplemented by power.' (P.) We need not mention the reflections cast so generally upon the vices of the common sort, which make up the largest part of mankind. Add Mornay, Traité de la Vérité de la Religion Chrétienne, chap. xvi. And so a great part of civil prudence is to know the evils and deceits of men to the end that they may be kept in mind and avoided. See Bacon of Verulam, Advancement of Learning, Bk. VII, chap. ii.

It is sufficiently clear from all this in what sense then man can be called by nature a political animal: Not because there resides in each and every one a natural aptitude to act the part of a good citizen, but because at least a part of mankind can by nature be fitted to that end, and because the safety and preservation of mankind, now become so multiplied, can be secured only by civil societies. Into these, nature always intent upon its own preservation, impels men to enter, just as also it is the first fruit of civil society, that in it men may accustom themselves to lead an orderly civil life.

5. Johannes Friderich Hornius, De Civitate, Bk. I, chap. iv, §6, calls a state a work of nature which is produced by natural order and consequence. That is, the first pair from whom was propagated all mankind was bound in conjugal love, and also their children were united in the same most tender affection with their parents. Hence arose a family, which, abounding in offspring and increasing by regular additions, planted new colonies, as it were, until it was large enough to form a state, and all this was the result of an innate love of society, which was increased by the cohabitation of kinsmen. But the view that men withdrew and scattered into woods and desert places and led a wandering life like that of wild¹ beasts, is to be rejected as no better than a pure falsehood.

¹ [For indiviniissimum read in diviniissimum.—Tr.]

But to try to exclude the causes working throughout this natural development, and the pacts of men regarding establishment of states, is as if one would say that a tree grows from a seed, from the tree are made planks and timbers, these properly brought together make a ship; therefore, a ship is made by natural development and order, neither has that type of structure any cause peculiar to it, nor were the labours of workers concerned in it. We therefore regard it as fabulous that a great number of men were congregated at the beginning, then scattered in woods and desert places, and finally collected into states. It is no less a pure figment of the imagination that states formed so rapidly from one human pair, or after the flood from four families, without the urge of some special cause or the intervention of pacts. For although the paternal care kept children within the paternal family until they had arrived at man's estate, yet since in those early periods living was gotten almost entirely from agriculture and grazing alone, there was no reason why a father should want to keep his married sons at his side after their 653 marriage. Nay, rather, we gather from Holy Writ that sons, and especially several sons of one father, had advanced so far that they were able to meet the duties of fathers of families, being accustomed to set out to strange places in order to establish homes for themselves; especially since vacant land lay on every side, and the smiling face of other regions now and then enticed them to distant parts. See Genesis, xiii. 5, 6, 9. Nor was Sicily the only land in those primitive times to have such inhabitants as are described by Homer, Odyssey, Bk. IX² [112 ff.]: 'These have neither gatherings for council³ nor oracles of law, but they dwell in hollow caves on the crests of the high hills, and each one utters the law to his children and his wives, and they reck not one of another.' (B. & L.) There is, indeed, love between brothers, yet such that they would prefer to live as equals rather than for one to be subject to the other's sovereignty, and they would love each other more steadfastly if their affairs were not intertwined. And so the primitive conditions of mankind as it multiplied, led more to their separation and scattering into different parts of the earth, than to their collection into large groups.

But when the wiser ones recognized that those disadvantages which attend the separation of families could be removed, if several of them gathered into the same group and formed a state, they not only decided to combine their families by a pact and sovereignty, but they began to gather their dwellings, scattered before that time over fields and in woods, into the same place, for reasons of greater security and convenience. And in this sense are we to interpret those writers who have described how men were first scattered throughout woods, and were later gathered into one body by the first founders of states.

¹ [For adferarum read ad ferarum.—Tr.]

² [For 1 read 4.—Tr.]

³ [For conoilis read conciliis.—Tr.]

6. Many think that men were moved by want to gather into states, to the end that they might render more civilized and rich a life, which, if led in solitude, could not but be uncivilized and straitened. Of this so much is true that there would scarcely be an animal more miserable than man, if each individual were thrown upon his own resources with no assistance at all from his fellows. Yet no more can it be denied, that, after men gathered into states, their life began to become refined to the point of elegance. Lactantius, De Opificio Dei, chap. iv:

If man had sufficient strength for the repelling of dangers, and did not stand in need of the assistance of any other, what society would there be? Or what mutual reverence? what order? what system? what humanity? Or what would be more harsh than man? what more fierce? what more brutal? But since he is feeble, and not able to live by himself apart from man, he desires society, that his life, passed in intercourse with others, may become both more adorned and more safe. (C.*)

And yet we are convinced that want was neither the only nor even the main cause for the establishment of states, although Plato, Republic, Bk. II [p. 369 B ff.], inclines to that view. For even before that time, when men were still living scattered about and divided into distinct families, they had provided themselves with the necessities of life, having learned agriculture, herding, the culture of the vine, the making of clothing, and other arts. See Genesis, xiii. 2; xxiv. 35. Let us suppose the father of a family, supplied with fields, herds, and servants. What can he lack to keep body and soul together? And if he does lack something it will be easily supplied by commerce. See Cornelius Nepos, Atticus, chap. xiii. There are many states to-day which seek abroad the means to supply their needs or pleasure, and yet they do not feel it necessary to combine with those with whom they trade into one state. While, on the other hand, there are not a few peoples that have led a civil life for many centuries, and yet they lived with no more refinement or ease than did once the old fathers of families, who might make the boast recorded in Valerius Flaccus, Bk. V [VI. 329 ff.]:

Nor do I care for your walls, I who live a free man on the Northern plains. All that 654
I own I carry with me; my wagon is my only care, my only loss, nor will you hold it long as spoil. My banquet is any domesticated or wild animal.

And so those refinements in which the life of many nations now abounds, owe their origin not so much to states as to large cities, for the common sort of the city, having no income from fields and flocks, turns to the cultivation of different arts in order to find a living. Moreover, there is a rivalry in culture between city people, and from this they pass to luxury which is served in many places by no fewer trades than serve man's necessity. And yet civil life could easily do without them.

7. Therefore, the real and principal reason why the fathers of families left their natural liberty and undertook to establish states, was in order that they could surround themselves with defences against the evils which threaten man from his fellow man. For just as nothing, next to most Good and Great God, can be so helpful to man as man himself, so nothing can do him greater harm, as¹ is shown at large by Cicero, On Duties, Bk. II [v ff.]. Although mankind is exposed to various ills, his ingenuity has found for each of them some sort of remedy. Against the onslaughts of diseases have been discovered the arts of physicians; the rigours of the atmosphere are resisted by dwellings, clothing, and fire. The earth has been cultivated by men's industry and banishes famine. Arms or traps curb the ferocity of wild beasts. But against those ills with which man in his baseness delights to threaten his own kind, the most efficient cure had to be sought from man himself, by men joining into states and establishing sovereignty. The Persians undertook to prove this, according to Sextus Empiricus, Against the Mathematicians, Bk. II [I. iv. 33 ed. Fabricius], for after their king had died they used to go five days without any law: 'So as to learn by actual experience how great a calamity lawlessness is, which brings with it murder, thievery, and anything else that is worse; and this is done in order that they may be more faithful guards of their kings.' Some lessons can be applied here from what Herodotus, Bk. I [xcvi f.], recounts of the reasons which led the Medes, who had up to that time lived in villages, to choose Deioces their king.

Now after men had so ordered themselves as to be able to be secure from mutual injuries, the natural result was that they enjoyed to a fuller extent such advantages as can come to human kind from their fellows [such as learning from boyhood more beneficial habits, finding different modes of living, and cultivating the arts which have made the life of man affluent and easy].² They also agree with us, who find fear the cause for states, which is to be understood not as the turmoil of a trembling and alarmed mind, but as a seemly precaution against future evil. Of which Aristophanes, Birds [376], rightfully observes: 'Fore-sight brings us safety.' (R.)

By this definition of fear we avoid the argument of some who reply, that, far from fear furnishing the cause for the establishment of states, if men had actually feared each other they could not have borne the sight of their kind, and so they would have remained for ever apart,

¹ [For ut read ut.—Tr.]

² [Added by Barbeyrac from De Officio Hominis et Civis, II. v. 7, in order to complete the sense of the passage.—Tr.]

one taking himself in this direction, another somewhere else. As though to fear connoted only flight and not distrust, suspicion, and precaution! Nay, it is the part of one who is fearful to take due precaution that he have no probable cause for fear. So when people retire they close the doors because they are fearful of thieves; and when they have done so they fear no more. Those who are upon a journey take a weapon because they fear highwaymen; but when they are fully armed they fear them no more. Here belongs the statement of Thucydides, Bk. I, that the custom of going armed, common enough among the barbarians, was still found among some peoples of Greece as a relic of the old times, when they did not live with any protecting walls, and could not come together without mutual distrust. Worthy of note also is a saying of Pyrrhus, given in his Life by Plutarch [xii. 4]: When he had entered Athens and ascended the citadel to sacrifice to Minerva and come down again, he said that he was grateful to the people for their kindness and the trust they had reposed in him, 'but that in future, if they were wise, they would not admit any one of the kings into their city nor open their gates to him.' (P.) States place forts upon their borders, fortify their cities, and store armouries with munitions of war, even in times of the most settled peace, all of which would be useless, did they not fear neighbouring states. But when they are well prepared they have no further fear. And so it is the way of fear to find out means to banish itself. For a similar reason men secure safety from their very selves, because of their mutual fear, by establishing a state. The force of this fear has been fully recognized by those who proclaim that were there no courts of justice one man would devour another. Compare Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, § 2. 655

We have fully shown before (Bk. II, chap. ii, §§ 6 and 12) that men have plenty of reasons why they should fear and beware of one another, which is true enough, despite the assertion of Hornius, loc. cit., that 'the fathers of families lived on equal terms for many centuries without fear of these imaginary attacks upon them. Mankind fell a prey to ambition at a late age, and after states were organized, which gave rise to honours and a distinction of dignities.' As though that frightful murder among the first brothers was not caused by ambition, when Cain was angered because his brother was held more worthy in the eyes of God! Furthermore, ambition is not the sole cause of mutual fear, but the stubbornness of men and their scramble for the same object play a part, of which the former in those simplest of ages caused the violence of the giants, while the latter occasioned strife even among those who were most closely related. See Genesis, xiii. 7; xxvi. 15, 20-1. And granted that ambition stirs more mightily the breasts of kings and rages with greater ruin to mankind, yet the minds of shepherds and tillers of the field are not entirely free from its evil influence. See Vergil, Eclogues, III, lines 25 ff., and Eclogues, VII; Theocritus, Idylls, v and viii.

Hornius goes on to say, 'To attack others with curses and weapons would have been the work not only of a scoundrel but of a fool. For the persons thus attacked could properly slay their assailant; and further, no booty could have been expected of poor men, or such as possessed no more than stores of fruits which the earth discloses everywhere for one to gather with little or no labour and no danger.' As if the hope of but little booty would not be enough to move depraved men to crimes! or as if maraudings and thievery have not been common enough in every period of the world among peoples whose living is gained only from agriculture and grazing! Nay, men are driven into states not alone by fear of robberies, but also in order to prevent their being exposed to every kind of injury which men are fitted to offer and to receive.

We agree to what he adds later, namely, that 'however just may have been one's distrust of another, by no law is it allowable to attack another because of unconfirmed fear'. That right against all men and to all things, which according to Hobbes accompanies the state of nature, is to be extended no farther than sane reason admits, which is in a sense something like this: Man, when living in natural liberty, has a right to use all the means, which sane reason judges necessary for his preservation, against all by whom the same sane reason suggests that he is threatened. Therefore, if a man extends his precaution beyond the bounds set by sane reason, he will, without question, be sinning¹ against the law of nature. And so if a man has anticipated his enemy in killing him, because of an uncertain fear which he could easily have escaped from, it must by no means be held that his deed is permitted by nature. So also they are unquestionably perverted who feel that on the same principle rapine and robbery against a potential enemy can be defended. For rapine and robbery are in themselves such a medium as sane reason can in no way designate as necessary to man's preservation, but as something undertaken rather from excessive avarice and cruelty. Surely no highway-656 man despoils travellers only because they threatened him with peril.

But the following is a fatuous statement of his: 'However much hatred and distrust there may be between men, still they will not be said to occur for the sake of a state.' For men did not hate and distrust each other in order that they might establish states, but they established a state because they distrusted each other. And even if one man hates only a few who displease him, but² loves others and favours, or at least is not angered at, all other men, yet should each man have but a single enemy, all mankind would be filled with hatreds and enmities. And so it is idle to contend that 'states arose entirely by men grouping together and by their natural increase'. The latter furnished the stuff of which states are formed, the former perhaps the occasion for neighbours especially to unite in the same state; but the two do not contain the cause which impelled men to establish states.

¹ [For peccabic read peccabit.—Tr.]

² [For contra read contra.—Tr.]

8. Nor is it possible for a man to believe that mere respect for natural law, which forbids every manner of injury, could have been able to make it possible for all mankind to live secure in natural liberty. There are, indeed, men to whom order, honesty, innocence, and honour are of first concern, and who would not violate them even when assured of immunity. There are also not a few to whom applies the remark of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, IV. viii [IV. i. 39]: 'But some keep their hands off their neighbours' goods from fear; they calculate that it is not easy to take what belongs to others without others taking what belongs to oneself, and so they prefer neither to take nor to give.'¹ (R.) If all were of this mind it looks as though there would have been no need of states at all. But opposed to these is a great mass who hold every sacred thing vile, whenever a hope of gain entices them, and have confidence in their own strength or wit whereby they promise themselves that they will repel or evade those whom they have injured. Not to distrust such is for one voluntarily to offer himself to their knavery and insolence. Sallust, Jugurtha [xiv. 4]: 'Virtue alone is not its own protection.' (R.)

Yet as it is wisdom to guard against wicked men, and to place about oneself suitable guards in due time, so that is an overly harsh saying of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. v, § 1: 'Each man's hope of security and self-preservation lies only in his being able by his own strength and schemes to forestall his neighbour in mischief, be it openly or by stratagems.' There is, indeed, such perversity in most men, that, whenever they think they will secure a greater good from the violation than from the observance of laws, they violate them readily. Thus Plato, Republic, Bk. II [360 c], says: '[. . .] Wherever any one thinks that he can safely be unjust, there he is unjust. For all men believe in their hearts that injustice is far more profitable to the individual than justice. [. . .]' (J.) Yet it would be too much to accuse all mankind of such perversity. Nay, as Hobbes himself confesses, there are modest souls as well, who claim no more for themselves than they allow others and hold before their eyes the maxim: 'What you would not have done to you, do not to others.' I for myself do not see how, on what plea of his own security, a man could fall upon such to destroy them. Nor will sane reason ever approve my undertaking to kill another, when there is no incontrovertible evidence of his wishing and attempting to make away with me, since there are many better ways of establishing peace with him. For the mere perversity of all men, having, as it does, its degrees, does not at once make man the professed enemy of man.

¹ [The quotation is not very apt, and Barbeyrac reproduces here with some justification, perhaps, the form which Pufendorf gave the passage in his later work, De Officio Hominis et Civis, II. v, § 8.—Tr.]

Now we confess that no such security is enjoyed in a state of nature as in organized states, that others will fulfil toward me the duties of 657 natural law, yet that lack of security is not such that one must act like an enemy to all. For when I see that my strength is the equal of or greater than another's, and when he affirms by words and pacts his desire to live at peace with me, and has confirmed this attitude by specific acts, why should I hold him my enemy? And how can the mere suspicion that his friendship may be feigned, or that he will change his mind, give me good reason to attack him? These principles are to be seen at this time more clearly in the relations between states, which dwell in respect to one another in a state of nature. For it is held unlawful by the confession of all men for one state to undertake to destroy by force or guile some other, which is unknown to the aggressor either for benefit or injury, and has never pledged friendship with it by pact or act; this merely because they own no common authority which might punish the former for an injury to the latter. All of which goes to prove that Hobbes is entirely wrong in maintaining that in a state of nature 'natural laws are silent', although there lies far greater security in fulfilling them in organized states, where I can get the magistrate to compel an unresponsive person to meet me in the duties of peace. But despite all this, prudence dictates not only that we fortify ourselves betimes against the open knavery of others, but also that we recognize that the probity of all others is liable to change. Although in general no more convenient safeguard is to be found against such dangers than civil society.

9. Furthermore, although natural law dictates that, if some dispute arise, it either be composed amicably or left to the decision of arbitrators, yet even this will not constitute a sufficient guarantee of peace. For easy as it is for man to sin against the other laws of nature, so easy also is it for him to scorn arbitrators and take recourse in arms. Nay, since the parties agreed upon an arbitrator by a pact alone, it will not be difficult, in case his decision be distasteful, for that pact to be trampled under foot by the one whose confidence in his own strength promises him licence of action, among his fellows; especially in view of the fact that the arbitrator can have no authority to force the parties to abide by his decision. And so prudence assuredly advises us not to place too great confidence, when in a state of natural liberty, upon mere pacts and the word of others, but to believe that agreements are likely to be held most sacred, when they are based upon mutual advantage, and when their violation would, therefore, entail a loss for both parties, or when one party can easily be forced to keep his promises. Where profit and impunity are foreseen as the reward of perfidy, it is held rash to believe that one's safety is sufficiently safeguarded by the wording of a mere pact.

And this is proved by the practice of nations which safeguard themselves by treaties with other nations after they have broken a treaty with one state. And in doing so they do not condemn their own lack of faith in entrusting themselves to the faith of others, but because states usually weigh their treaties first of all by the advantage to themselves. So soon as they have rid themselves of a useless or harmful one, they turn to one more advantageous. And it is in this softened sense that we must take the statement of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 11: 'Pacts of mutual trust are null and void in a state of nature.' Though there is a pleasant appearance to the statement of Livy, Bk. XXII, chap. xxii: 'Every one likes to be believed, and for one man to keep his word often obligates another to keep his.' Yet in a natural state it will be much the safer course to think upon the old saying: 'The man who believed, lost his property; the man who disbelieved kept his.' 'By faith I lost money; by lack of faith I saved it.' Theognis [831].

10. There is yet a further reason why the mere law of nature cannot encompass the peace of mankind. This is the character of natural liberty, to wit, that just as each man looks to his safety with his own strength, so both in securing that end and in the direction of his actions each man uses his own judgement. How greatly this varies in different individuals surely every one realizes. But very few are blessed with ability enough to be able of their own power to see what is for the permanent advantage of mankind in general and of individuals and to be willing to persist in that knowledge! So many in their dulness are imposed upon by gross error posing as reason. The majority are led by the violence of their passions wherever their lust or a false idea of their advantage may take them. In such a medley of opinions and fancies what sure peace and concord can there be, when the fool as well as the wise man thinks his own opinion the fairest, and the fool shows no more inclination to follow the leadership of the wise, than the wise man that of the fool? But since reason alone, as it is found in individual men, is unable to compose such great differences, some sort of agreement of opinions must be sought by a different course.

11.¹ Finally, although it is plain enough on the face of things not only how much the violators of the law of nature obstruct their own happiness, which requires the help of other men for its promotion, and what evils and perils they bring upon themselves, yet also that natural law itself lays it clearly enough upon the consciences of men that those who wantonly injure others against her laws will not go unpunished; Claudian, On the Fourth Consulship of Honorius [104-6]: 'Build up mighty cliffs, raise towers, girdle yourselves about with rivers, place before you tangled forests. You will not give wickedness a wall.' And although the advantage which follows upon the observance of natural law and the evil which attends its violation, as they concern the advancement or hindrance respectively of every man's happiness, show clearly enough the benefit accruing¹ from men living as social creatures rather than otherwise; yet even with this made clear, natural law is not strong enough to secure the peace of mankind. And this is true for the reason that the mass of men order their lives not by reason but on impulse, and trust their lust as reason, chiefly by the fault of their education and habits, whereby the force of reason goes, as it were, unheeded; and then because a great part of mankind are concerned only with the present and give little heed to the future, are usually stirred only by what strikes their senses, and rise to higher things with difficulty. Hence it is that most of them entertain a greater fear of punishment at the hands of men than of God, and yet His punishment should be feared above all else. This is, I suppose, because the divine vengeance usually moves with slow foot and often unfolds itself in hidden ways. Caesar, Gallic War, Bk. I [xiv. 5]: 'It was the wont of the immortal gods to grant a temporary prosperity and a longer impunity to make men whom they purposed to punish for their crimes smart the more severely from a change of fortune.' (E.) And this gives evil men an excuse to refer the misfortunes of wicked souls to other causes (add Ecclesiasticus, viii. 11), especially since the most scoundrelly often possess an abundance of those things by which the common sort usually measure happiness, while righteous men are often the victims of many calamities, which wicked men and fools delight to use as a proof that virtue alone does not bring happiness. This is illustrated by the words of Plutarch, De Sera Numinis Vindicta [ii, p. 548 D E]:

¹ [For 12 read 11.—Tr.]

That revenge which follows injury closest at the heels presently puts a stop to the progress of such as make advantage of successful wickedness. Therefore, there is no debt with so much prejudice put off, as that of justice. For it weakens the hopes of the person wronged and renders him comfortless and pensive, but heightens the boldness and daring insolence of the oppressor; [. . .] [p. 549 B]. And I am apt to persuade myself that upon these and no other considerations it is, that wicked men encourage and give themselves the liberty to attempt and commit all manners of impieties, seeing that the fruit which injustice yields is soon ripe, and offers itself early to the gatherer's hoard, whereas punishment comes late, and lagging long behind the pleasure of enjoyment. (G.)

A further consideration is that the pricks of conscience which precede a crime do not appear so strong as those that follow, when the crime cannot be undone. Curtius, Bk. VIII, chap. ii [1]: 'The human mind is unhappily endowed in this: We for the most part neglect to weigh the consequences till we have acted.' (A.) Again, though before the deed the stir of our passions drowned out the voice of reason, when they are allayed it resounds like thunder in our mind. And so Plutarch

659 continues, in the passage just cited [xi, p. 555 E]:

Yet when a man, either out of avarice or ambition of civil honour and power, or to gratify his venereal desires, commits any enormous and heinous crime, after which, the thirst and rage of his passion being allayed, he comes to set before his eyes the ignominious and horrible passions tending to injustice still remaining, but sees nothing useful, nothing necessary, nothing conducive to make his life happy; may it not be properly conjectured that such a person is frequently solicited by these reflections to consider how rashly, either prompted by vain glory, or for the sake of a lawless and barren pleasure, he has overthrown the noblest and greatest maxims of justice among men, and overflowed his life with shame and trouble? (G.) (As the same author says, loc. cit. [ix, p. 554 A]): Just as when criminals are led out to corporal punishment each man carries his own cross, so wickedness of itself fashions particular torments for particular crimes, skilled as it is in making life miserable <as well as disreputable>. In wickedness there are, in addition to moral baseness, many fears, profound disturbances of the soul, repentance, and constant turmoil. (G.)

¹ [For aut read ut.—Tr.]

But these inner agonies, by reason of the fact that they are not experienced by others, are so much the less effective in restraining their wickedness. Indeed, Hobbes rightly says in his Leviathan, chap. xxxi:

There is no action of man in this life that is not the beginning of so long a chain of consequences, as no human providence is high enough to give a man a prospect to the end. And in this chain, there are linked together both pleasing and unpleasing events; in such manner, as he that will do anything for his pleasure, must engage himself to suffer all the pains annexed to it. Thus the violence of others punishes those who practise it, diseases punish intemperance, &c.; and such are what I call natural penalties.

Yet such is the stupidity of most men and the violence of their passions, that only a very few accord all these matters the consideration due them. Therefore, there remained no more effective remedy to curb the wickedness of men than what is supplied by states now that they have been established. Thus Plutarch, Against Colotes [xxx], goes beyond¹ his right in censuring these words of Colotes:

Those who have established laws and ordinances and instituted monarchies and other governments in towns and cities, have placed human life in great repose and security and delivered it from many troubles. And if any one should go about to take this away, we should live the life of savage beasts, and should be every one ready to eat up one another as we meet. (G.)

For surely Plutarch had given but a passing glance to man's nature if he believed that, in case civil laws were dispensed with, the order and peace of mankind could abide 'by the rules of Parmenides, Socrates, Plato, and Heraclitus'. And even if the statement of Aristippus were true, as given by Hesychius Illustrius [Diogenes Laertius, II. 68], who, when asked, 'What advantages have the philosophers?', replied, 'If all the laws should be destroyed we would continue to live as we do at present.' Yet what will become of the larger part of mankind, who when left to themselves guide their lives by their passions and lusts? Surely the better conclusion is that of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. XII, chap. vii [2]: 'Since those who cannot be brought to a better way of life by reason, can² be kept in order only by terror.' (W.)

¹ [For aut read haut.—Tr.]

² [For possumi read possunt.—Tr.]

CHAPTER II

ON THE INTERNAL STRUCTURE OF STATES

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. A defence against the wickedness of men must be sought from men themselves. | 11-12. An answer to his reasons. |
| 2. To this end many should band together. | 13. The definition of a state. |
| 3. This large number should be in agreement. | 14. In a monarchy the will of the king is the will of the state. |
| 4. How a swarm of bees differs from a state. | 15. In other kinds the majority regularly has final power. |
| 5. A union of wills and strength is required for a state. | 16. But this admits of limitations. |
| 660 6. That union is made by intervening pacts. | 17. On equality of votes. |
| 7. The first pact and the decree following upon it. | 18. On uniting and dividing votes. |
| 8. The second pact giving perfection to a state. | 19. The number of men required for a council. |
| 9. The reason why Hobbes recognizes but one pact. | 20. The definition of a citizen. |
| 10. Its insufficiency. | 21. The different kinds of subordinate bodies. |
| | 22. The right belonging to those bodies. |
| | 23. On illegal bodies and factions. |
| | 24. On the special functions of citizens. |

OUR next task is to examine in some detail the intrinsic structure of states. Now in order that men might gain for themselves as much security against the wickedness of their fellows as pertains to their condition, no other device could be invented than for each of them to provide for himself sufficient protection, by which the attack of one person upon another would be made so dangerous, that the attacker would feel it safer to restrain himself than to fight, to live at peace with another, than to engage him in war. For the wickedness of man's character and his proneness to injure others can in no way be restrained more effectively, than by thrusting in his face the immediate evil which will await him upon his attacking another, and by removing every hope of impunity. And such defence cannot be offered by any fortified place, whether strengthened by nature or by human device, for if one man remain in such a place it becomes nothing other than a prison, nor can a man easily defend it by his own strength alone. And yet if you open the gates to allies, there will be danger from them as well, unless you guarantee yourself by some further defence against them. Some defence of course, can come from arms, yet not so much that a single man can promise himself any abiding security thereby against the assaults of a host. So also any defence that can come from animals is little enough or uncertain, and not sufficient to repel such perils as we have named. Although Gomara, Historia Generalis Indiae Occidentalis, chaps. xliv and lxy, tells of two cases where a dog was of aid against the Americans; and it is said that the emperor of Ceylon in his royal city of Candy has a body-guard, as it were, of one hundred elephants which serve as the city watch at night, and as the executioners of criminals. But the help of many men is required to train them for such services.

We conclude that no better guarantee could be found against the dangers that threaten from man than that afforded by man himself, in pooling resources, mutually intertwining their safety, and warding off perils by a common confederacy. Compare Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vi.

2. It is clear that a confederacy of two or three men could offer little of this security, because the addition of a bare handful of men on the side of the invaders would spell certain victory, giving them also confidence in their attack and promising success and impunity in their undertaking. Therefore, in order to obtain the security which we seek, it is necessary that the number of those who agree to mutual aid be so great that the addition to the enemy of a few men will not appear of outstanding consequence for victory, and that, therefore, a considerable number of men band together. For this reason Plato also, in the Laws, Bk. V [p. 737 D], requires for his state a number of citizens 661 sufficient to repel any injuries from their neighbours, and to offer them succour when they are in turn the victims.

A further conclusion from all this is, that the just size of a state should be measured by the strength of its neighbours. And so what were large states in antiquity, when mankind was divided into a great number of states, are smaller than is just, now that great empires have arisen. For 'bodies, no matter how tall and lofty, decrease in size when juxtaposed to still higher ones'. Pliny, Panegyric [lxi. 2].

3. In the next place the many who come together for this end must agree on applying the means suitable for that end. For no matter how great the number of them be, nothing will be accomplished unless they agree on the best way in which that common defence should be established, and prevent each and every man from desiring to direct his strength as he sees fit. For they will be but a hindrance to each other, torn by conflicting opinions and working to opposite ends. Or even if they do by impulse or design agree sufficiently on one line of action in hope of victory, booty, or revenge—such as is sometimes to be seen with an infuriated mob, as in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. [I], chap. xxxii, lines 6 and 7—yet later they are so torn apart by differences of character and counsels, by rivalry or envy in which men naturally contend with each other, or finally by fickleness and inconstancy, that they are henceforward unwilling either to render mutual aid or to live at peace with one another. Compare what is set forth on the weaknesses of the Athenian democracy in Polybius, Bk. VI, chap. xlv. And so such unions of many men will be the least likely to prevail for any length of time, unless they are held together by some common fear, so as to prevent their being able later to depart at their pleasure from what they had once agreed to.

It follows from this that the mere consent of several men, although confirmed by a pact, cannot give that security which we seek; that it is not enough merely that several form a society for mutual aid, and exchange promises that they will direct their actions and strength to the same end and the common good. But something else must be added in order that those who have once agreed to peace and mutual aid for the sake of the common good will be prevented by fear from later departing from that agreement, when they conclude that their own private advantage differs from that of the group.

4. To illustrate this point Hobbes examines in some detail the nature of certain animals which appear to lead some kind of a social life, of which the most conspicuous are bees and ants. For although these animals lack reason by which they can enter into pacts and submit themselves to government, nevertheless, by agreeing together, that is, in their case, by desiring and avoiding the same things, they so direct their actions to a common end that their groups are not subject to conflicts. The reason why this is not true of men, and why a great number of men cannot dwell together in peace for any length of time without sovereignty, will be a matter well worth inquiring into.

Now the reason why a most provident nature has joined those little creatures into groups, seems to be because they live on and are sustained by food through the winter, while practically all other animals either perish in the winter or pass through it without going out for food. Moreover, the food for these animals can be gathered and preserved much more easily, if several join their efforts, than if each works for himself alone. From which it is patent that the groups of these little creatures have an end different from that of states, although there is to be seen in them a kind of society of all possessions, in that they all labour for and are maintained from a common store. Hobbes offers as a further reason for this difference, the fact that the govern-662 ment of these animals is only an agreement, or many wills with but one object, not a single will, as is the case with states; that is, that every one of them agrees to do his task along with others, and to gather the food into one store, but that the wills of all have not combined into one will, as always happens in states, with the result that the decision of a single man or council is held to be the will of all.

Now the reasons why, in the case of these animals, living, as they do, by mere instinct and appetite, the simple agreement of their inclinations is so persistent that it requires nothing further, are in general as follows.

I. Among men there is a struggle for honour and dignity, among animals there is not; and so there is not observable in the latter the envy, rivalry, and hatred that among men issue from that source.

II. The natural appetite of bees and their sense-judgement, so to speak, are uniform and directed to the common good, which with them does not differ from private good. 'That which is not in the interests of the hive cannot be in the interests of the bee.' (H.) Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. VI, § 54. Their single desire is to have full hives, while with men there are as many feelings as there are heads, and practically nothing is thought good unless its possessor secures thereby some distinction and preferment above others.

III. Animals without reason either see or think they see no defect in the administration of their groups, since they established them not upon deliberation, but by mere natural instinct, and know not how to compare them with others. Nor does it occur to any bee to form a cell in any other shape than that of a hexagon. But in a group of men there are any number who in scorning their present condition lay claim to more knowledge than all others, and undertake to establish new forms of government. And because of the diversity of their conclusions every innovator strikes out a different path, to the rending apart of the state, and finally to civil war.

IV. Although animals have some use of the voice, being at any rate rather quick to show their feelings to each other, still they lack that power to gloss over facts by the enticements of language, which is a necessary requirement for one who would arouse and excite the mind, and by which, for instance, a good is represented as better or worse, an evil as more or less heinous than they actually are, or both are given a very different face from what they really bear. In fact a man's tongue is only too often a kind of trumpet of war and sedition, which can not only sound forth false rules of life and conduct, but also suggest and commend them to others with great enticement of language, and mould them into characters most inimical to the genius of a peaceful society. And it was not without justice when the comic poet [Aristophanes, Acharnians, 530] once said that Pericles had thundered¹ and lightened and confounded all Greece.

V. Brutes draw no distinction between contumely or contempt and actual damage, or rather they cannot feel contempt. Therefore, so long as they find the necessities for their bodies, they raise no complaints over their associates. But those men are the greatest bane of the state who are permitted to enjoy the greatest leisure. Nor do animals come to blows over position or dignity, before they have been victorious over hunger and bad weather.

VI. Finally, the agreement of those brute creatures is natural, while that of men rests upon a pact, that is, is artificial; or rather it is moral, enforced only by moral ties, which are far from doing away with the natural diversity and severity of men's characters, and their power to take a different course. It may be added that in a hive of bees there is properly no sovereignty, and for that reason their ruler carries no sting, although sovereignty is the very soul, as it were, of a state. And yet it is surely a marvellous miracle of nature that 'while the king lives they are all of one mind; when he is gone they break faith'. [Vergil, Georgics, IV. 212 f.] Add Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. V.

¹ [For tenuisse read tonuisse.—Tr.]

663 We should, however, carefully note that the foregoing comparison between bees and a gathering of men is made for the sole purpose of setting forth why no hope need be held out for continued agreement and concord in a great group of men, when there is no sovereignty. But we would not be understood as saying that these inclinations which contain the seeds of discord are found to the same degree in all men alike, or that sane reason does not suggest such arguments from the very nature of man, as command him to incline more than any other animal to concord and mutual helpfulness. And so our purpose is not at all frustrated by Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 22, when he undertakes to refute those six reasons of Hobbes by pointing out, that man loves honour, which naturally arises from beneficence; that he understands more perfectly the power of the public good to safeguard his own private good; that he enjoys the use of reason which disposes him equally to obey and to command, as chance may require; that he understands how to sharpen or grace the force of his reason by the most appropriate words; that he recognizes law, by the force of which he distinguishes an injury from a loss incurred without injury; that, finally, there is added to the agreement once arrived at by men, not only a steadfastness derived from nature, but that also art, as the assistant of nature, supplies various safeguards against unforeseen accidents, and a duration, by means of writing, beyond man's span of life. All this is of no consequence until he has shown that a great multitude of men, free from all sovereignty, cannot be disturbed by only a few, and that all men recognize and understand quite fully the dictates of sane reason, and have fully subdued all their passions and base lusts. And surely those men erect states upon shifting foundations, who show too great respect for men's moderation and weigh all other men, and especially the vile mob, upon the scales of their own probity.

5. Now what that is which is fitted to bind for a long time the consent of many men, will be clear enough to the person who fully investigates the mental constitution of mankind, in which two faults meet us which more than all others prevent any large number of men from being able to agree for long upon a common end. The first is the diversity of inclinations and of judgement in discerning what is of most advantage to a common end, to which is joined in many people a slowness to apprehend which one of several things is most advantageous, and an obstinacy to maintain to the bitter end what has once pleased a man's fancy. The second is sluggishness and aversion to do of one's own accord what is useful, when there is no incumbent necessity which will force such slackers¹ to perform their duty. The first of these evils may be cured by uniting the wills of all in a perpetual bond, or by so constituting affairs that there will be for the future but one will for all in those matters which serve the end of society. The second may be alleviated if some power be established which is authorized to inflict upon those who hesitate before the common advantage some present evil and such as will impress itself upon their senses. Here belongs the passage in Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. IV [xx]:

They say that even grief [. . .] was appointed by nature, not without some good purpose: in order that men should lament when they had committed a fault, well knowing they had exposed themselves to correction, rebuke, and ignominy. For they think that those who can bear ignominy and infamy without pain, have acquired a complete impunity for all sorts of crimes. (Y.)

Now a union of wills cannot possibly be encompassed by the wills of all being naturally lumped into one, or by only one person willing, and all the rest ceasing to do so, or by removing in some way the natural variation of wills and their tendency to oppose each other, and combining them into an abiding harmony. But the only final way in which many wills are understood to be united is for every individual to subordinate his will to that of one man, or of a single council, so that whatever that man or council shall decree on matters necessary to the common security, must be regarded as the will of each and every person. For whoever voluntarily grants his power to another is held 664 to agree with his will. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xii [7]: 'The good man [. . .] has submitted his mind to Him that orders the universe, as good citizens submit to the law of the city.' (M.)

By a similar course of reasoning such power as may be feared by all, cannot be constituted in such a way that each and all shall physically pour their strength into one receptacle, and themselves remain thenceforth utterly weak. But one person is understood to possess the strength of all only in such a way that each and every one has obligated himself to apply his strength as that individual may desire. When such a union of wills and strength has been made, then there finally arises a state, the most powerful of moral societies and persons.

These matters will be understood more clearly, if we consider that subjects by the submission of their wills do not destroy their natural liberty of will, by which they are able in actual deed to withdraw what they once gave, and refuse the obedience which they promised; nor are the strength and faculties of subjects actually turned over to the sovereign in such a way, that, for instance, the strength which lay in the shoulders of all subjects passes to the shoulders of the sovereign. Therefore, the wills and strength of subjects, in order that they may be subject to the beck of their sovereign's will, are balanced, as it were, by two weights or considerations. The first of these is based upon the pact itself, whereby they submitted themselves to their rulers, to which the greatest strength is added by the command of God Himself, and the sacredness of an oath, in which there lies the greatest efficacy to move the minds of men, the more the latter have happened to receive good training from their youth, and the more they hold before their eyes the necessity and advantage of civil sovereignty. But those who strain against the pressure of this weight by reason of the wickedness of their minds, while they stupidly think of sovereignty as a thing to suit the fancy of a few, and found to be a nuisance to all others, or are slothful and averse freely to do what their duty requires, all such are forced to obey the commands of their rulers by the second weight, namely, fear of punishment and extrinsic coercion.

¹ [For tergiversante read tergiversantes.—Tr.]

Now since he who would coerce another should be the stronger, and since that strength wherein sovereigns exceed the strength of individual men arises from the fact that it is at their nod that citizens apply their strength, it follows that it is due to the obedience of good citizens that rulers are able to direct and coerce the evil. And it is easy for him who has legally secured sovereignty, and shows even a moderate interest in performing his duty, to bring it about that the greater part of the total strength of a state lie in the hand of the ruler. For he can always hope that the majority of the citizens will be mindful of the command of God, their pledged faith, and their oath, while it never fails to be to the advantage of the larger and better part of the people that the state be at peace and secure, and that the lawful sovereigns be established in their authority. But there is also at hand some machinery, as it were, by which the power of rulers is considerably increased, such as strong forts, and a standing army bound to their commander by special ties; and these can coerce almost any number of men, especially if unarmed and scattered throughout a large territory, provided, however, that sovereigns take proper precautions that their citizens do not combine into a faction.

6. That this union may be understood more thoroughly, we must recognize that so long as several physical persons have not united into one moral person, whatever they do, or whatever obligations they contract, they do and contract as individuals, and so there are as many actions and obligations in number as there are physical persons. And although many men are often described by the word 'multitude', which 665 apparently denotes a unity, yet, to be more precise, 'multitude' is not a collective word, that is, a word which denotes one thing composed of several, such as are, for example, the words army, fleet, assembly, senate, &c. But, as a matter of fact, it means nothing more than a number of things, without specifying whether they are homogeneous or heterogeneous, united or dispersed. And so a multitude of men is not actually a single body but several men, each one of whom has his own will and his own judgement on all matters to be laid before him. And therefore to a multitude, as distinguished from individuals, there cannot be attributed a single action and one distinct from that of the individuals within it, or a special right. Therefore, even though a man may be in a multitude, that is, have many men about him not united in one body, of whom the majority, or all the rest, do something or enter into some agreement, if he himself has not agreed to it or participated in some other way in that act, the act will in no way concern him. For a multitude, or many men, to become one person, to whom one action can be attributed and certain rights belong, in so far as this one person is distinct from individuals, and the rights be such as the individuals cannot attribute to themselves, it is necessary for them to have united their wills and strength by intervening pacts, without which a union of several persons equal by nature is impossible of comprehension.

7. The number and the nature of those pacts by the intervention of which a state is built up are discovered in the following manner. If we imagine to ourselves a multitude of men endowed with natural liberty and equality, who voluntarily set about to establish a new state, it is necessary for the future citizens, as the first step, to enter into an agreement, every individual with every other one, that they are desirous of entering into a single and perpetual group, and of administering the considerations of their safety and security by common council and leadership. (Although in such a pact the individuals usually reserve to themselves the privilege of emigration.)

Such a pact is entered into either absolutely or conditionally. Absolutely, when a man pledges himself to remain with the group, whatever form of government the majority may finally decide upon. Conditionally, when he stipulates that the form of government be such as he approves of. Furthermore, when this pact is entered into, it is necessary for each and all to give their consent. Whoever does not do so, for so long as he continues in the same place with the rest, remains outside the future state, nor is he required by the agreement of the rest, however numerous they be, to join their group at all; but he continues in his natural liberty, wherein he will be permitted to decide matters of his safety according to his own judgement.

But after such a group, already taking on the rudiments and beginnings of a state, has been formed by the pact mentioned, it is yet further necessary for a decree to be passed upon the form of government that shall be introduced. For until this decision is reached, it will be impossible to take consistent action on matters concerning the common safety. At this step those who have joined themselves to the group absolutely, will be forced by the agreement of the majority to consent to that form of government which these latter have agreed upon, although they might have preferred another, if, indeed, they wish to remain in the spot where the group is fixed. For in making no exception to the pact, they are understood to have submitted themselves to the will of the majority, at least in that point, for they can have no grounds for demanding that all the others prefer the judgment of a few to their own. But he who has joined the group conditionally will not become a member of the future state, nor be obligated by the agreement of the majority, unless he has expressly agreed to the form of government to be introduced¹.

8. After the decree upon the form of government, a new pact will be necessary when the individual or body is constituted that receives the government of the group, by which pact the rulers bind themselves to the care of the common security and safety, and the rest to render 666 them obedience, and in which there is that subjection and union of wills, by reason of which a state is looked upon as a single person. From this pact there finally comes a finished state.

But when a democracy has been established, this last pact does not appear so clearly, since the same individuals are in different respects both rulers and subjects. Yet a pact requires two distinct persons, nor does it seem to be sufficient if they differ in respect, for instance, one and the same Titius can in different respects be father, son, husband, son-in-law, father-in-law, merchant, &c., in which case it will surely be no pact if Titius, as merchant, promise something to the same Titius, as father. And so it must be understood that in popular government the individual citizens and the council, in whose hands lies the direction of the state, do not differ only in bare respect alone, but are actually different persons, although of a different kind, to whom belong a distinct will, distinct acts, and distinct rights. For the will of the individual citizens is not forthwith the will of the people as a whole; nor is the action of individual citizens taken without further ado as an act of the people, and vice versa. Nor do individuals hold the supreme sovereignty, or any part of it, but the people possess it; for it is one thing to possess a part of the sovereignty, and another to have the right to vote in the assembly in which is vested the supreme sovereignty. And so thus far nothing appears to prevent a pact from intervening between the assembly of the people and the individual citizens.

But it might perhaps be objected, with some point, that such a pact between a sovereign people and subject citizens would be useless, because each citizen in agreeing to a democratic form of government is understood to have subordinated his will to the will of the majority, while it appears that sufficient necessity is at the same time laid upon² each individual, by his love for himself and his possessions, to labour with all his strength for the public good, with which his own safety is also intertwined. And still, although perhaps it is not so necessary in democracies as it is in other forms of states, that that pact, or the mutual promise of sovereign and subject to perform his respective duty, be expressly stated, it must, nevertheless, regularly be understood to intervene tacitly, at least. For whether that decision to establish a democracy be conceived in the form of a bare agreement of many wills uniting into one, or of a pact of individuals with every other individual in the form, 'I will submit my will to the assembly of all, provided you also do the same,' yet from such a pact, exactly considered, there results no other obligation than that every individual is required to acquiesce in that form of state, so long as it remains unchanged by all the citizens.

¹ [For introduendā read introducendā.—Tr.]

² [For iniustum read iniunctum.—Tr.]

And yet a greater obligation is discoverable in the citizens of democracies. For they are obligated individually to abide by the decrees and orders which issue from the assembly of them all, and at the same time there lies upon each an obligation to exert all his strength for the care of the state, and to consider his own advantage after that of the state. For on what other excuse might a citizen be censured or fined for failure to attend the assembly frequently enough? But since there is such an obligation, it must also have some origin, and that can be nothing other than the pact which we have mentioned. Thus in¹ Thucydides, Bk. II [xl], a citizen of the democracy who was uninformed about the affairs of the state is denominated 'a useless citizen'. Add the argument of Socrates with Charmides in Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. III, p. 486 [vii. 2].

But when it is decided to establish a democracy, or a monarchy, this second pact is more clearly discernible. For upon the designation of nobles or a king, mutual faith is exchanged, and both parties undertake mutual engagements, for after the sovereignty has been proffered and accepted, the king and nobles, no less than the citizens, are bound to performances not before owed. Prior to that pact the citizens were no more obligated to obey one man, or a small group, than were they to look out for the safety of the state. From what, then, can mutual faith and an obligation to performances not owed beforehand, trace their origin, than from a pact?

What we have said thus far on the two pacts and one decree, can be 667 illustrated by what Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. II, at the outset of his history, recounts of the founding of the Roman state. For first of all a multitude of men came together to found a new home, between whom there intervenes a kind of tacit pact. The next step is for them to deliberate on the form of the state, and after they have agreed upon a monarchy, the sovereignty is then tendered to Romulus. Likewise, when an interregnum² occurs, they often deliberate again on the form of the state, since the group is then held together only by the first pact. See the deliberation of the Persian nobles in Herodotus, Bk. III, and of Brutus and his associates in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. IV.

¹ [For adud read apud.—Tr.]

² [For inter regno read interregno.—Tr.]

It should be carefully noted that this method of forming a state by the intervention of two pacts and one decree is in the highest accord with nature, and common to all forms of states. Yet it is possible for a monarchy to be established by a single pact, in case many men, before any preceding agreement between them, have, each of them for himself, put themselves under one person, whether all at one time, or at different times, practically in the same way as armies are gathered together which are composed of strangers and mercenaries. And, in the same way, those who join a state which is already established, have need of but a single agreement, whereby they ask to be received into the state, while those who represent the state receive the same after requiring of them obedience.

Now we would not have it thought that these remarks on the pacts which give rise to a state, are a creation of our imagination, because the origins of most states are unknown, or at least it is not entirely certain that they were established in that manner. For one thing is sure, namely, that every state had at some time its beginning. And yet it was necessary that those who compose a state be not held together before its establishment by the same bond as they are afterwards; and that they be not subject to the same persons to whom they are afterwards. Yet since it is impossible to understand that union and subjection without the above-mentioned pacts, they must have interposed, tacitly at least, in the formation of states. Nor is there anything to prevent men from being able to reason out the origin of a thing, despite the fact that there remain no written records upon them.

9. It may be worth while in this connexion to present a little more in detail the opinion of Hobbes, who recognizes in the formation of states but a single pact between individuals, and everywhere maintains that none passes between a king, or nobles, and citizens. And the reason that has led him to make such statements is clear enough from the scheme of his works on politics, as it is clearly set forth in his Leviathan. He attacked first of all those seditious men who in former years endeavoured to circumscribe the royal power, and to place it under the control of subjects, or even to do away with it altogether. To take from them their excuse for rebellion, namely, that the pledge between a king and citizen is reciprocal, and that when the former does not keep the promises he made by a pact, the latter are freed from obedience; and to prevent turbulent citizens from making a case of broken faith out of any actions of a king which do not suit them, he undertook to deny that there was any pact between a king and his subjects. And when he had conceived the idea to accord all kings as such an absolute and unlimited power, the result was that he did away with every pact, because it seemed to be the principal instrument in limiting that power.

But although it be the highest interest of mankind that the royal power be held sacred and free from the cavils of churlish men, yet that does not necessitate our denying matters as clear as daylight, and refusing to recognize a pact, when there exists a mutual promise about performing that which was not due before. When I subject myself to a prince, I promise him obedience, and stipulate for myself defence, while the prince in accepting me as a citizen promises me defence and stipulates from me obedience. Before that promise, neither of us was under an obligation, at least not a perfect one, I to obey him, or he to defend me. Who now would undertake to exclude such an act from the class of pacts? Nor is such a pact rendered superfluous because it appears that there was a prior agreement among those who voluntarily establish a king over themselves, to elevate this or that man to the throne. For as mere election, without the acceptance of the candidate, confers upon him no power over his electors, so it is easily understood from the nature of the matter, that those who voluntarily confer upon another power over themselves, wish that in its exercise he strive toward the end set for that power, and that he have accepted what was proffered him, on the understanding that his electors will not fail of their end through any fault of his. 668

Therefore, in the case of those who offer sovereignty to another, just as they promise what the nature of their subjection requires, so they also, on the other hand, bargain to secure from him the things for which civil sovereignties are established. What else is this than to enter into a pact?

10. Nor, indeed, when we admit the existence of a pact between king and citizens, do those inconveniences necessarily follow, which Hobbes seems to have had before his eyes. All pacts, for that matter, have this feature, namely, that they imply a necessity to do some particular thing. But there is the greatest difference possible between those pacts by which a man subjects himself to another, and those by which neither accepts any sovereignty over the other. The right of a master over a slave, at least over one who voluntarily accepts slavery, is established by a pact, as also the power of a father over him who offers himself for adoption, and the command of a general over mercenaries. And yet that does not prevent the former from having the faculty to command, and the latter from being under necessity to obey, nor can the latter throw off the restraint when the orders of their superiors do not suit them. Xiphilinus, in his Epitome of Dio, Life of Nero [LXI. vii. 3]: 'Every sovereign power, when given over by a private citizen, passes at once out of the hands of the giver, and comes to belong to the recipient to use against him.' That is, in pacts which contain no submission of the will and of strength, special and definite services are designated, to be performed by each party in accordance with the intrinsic quickening of the conscience, and when a man refuses to meet them of his own accord, no recourse remains but war, or coercion by a common master.

But in pacts whereby one person is subjected to another, it falls to the latter to define what the former should perform, while at the same time the faculty is conferred upon him of compelling his subject against his will to such performances, while such a faculty in no sense belongs to the latter over the former. Therefore, a ruler cannot be accused of breaking the pact unless he has renounced all care of the state, or has adopted the character of an enemy towards his own subjects, or has clearly with evil intent departed from the rules of government, on the observance of which as a condition, the citizens promised their obedience. These things any prince can avoid during his entire reign with the greatest ease, provided he is willing to remember that not even the highest of mortals are exempt from the laws of human destiny, and that 'no ruler was ever deceived who had not first deceived others'. Pliny, Panegyric, towards the end [lxvi].

Finally, that prince must be either a very great scoundrel, or fool, who cannot bring it about that it is to the interest of the greater or stronger part of his people for his position to be secure. And he should strain all his energies to secure this, if he heeds the reflection of Livy, Bk. VIII, chap. xxi: 'Could it be believed that any people or even any individual would remain, longer than necessity constrained, in a situation which he felt painful?' (S.) If, then, it is to the interest of the greater part of the people that the prince be secure in his position, as must needs be the case, if he receives justice and prudence into his 669 counsels, his fortune stands fixed upon a firm foundation. If a man cannot do this much, he is fit for any other business rather than bearing sway.

11. Let us examine more closely the reasons on which Hobbes builds his assertion. At the outset we hold it to be unfitting that he undertakes to derive the obligation of citizens to rulers from a pact, 'whereby each individual obligates himself to every other not to resist the will of him to whom he has submitted himself.' De Cive, chap. v, § 8. As it is, those who have agreed among themselves to confer sovereignty upon a person are understood also to have agreed that all subject their will to him, that is, that his will shall represent the will of all in the conduct of the state. Nor is it unusual for such an agreement about conferring sovereignty upon a person, and for the laws under which sovereignty is entrusted to some one, to be strengthened by mutual pacts and oaths on the part of the people. Yet to reach an agreement about conferring sovereignty upon Gaius, and to grant Gaius sovereignty upon an exchange of faith, are very different things.

Furthermore, there is nothing repugnant in citizens taking pledges of each other on granting obedience to a king, just as there are pacts where all obligate themselves for one, and one for all. Yet there is no necessity at all for that being done, and in practice it is rather rare. Whoever comes into a state as a stranger pledges faith to the king, but in no place, so far as we know, is he required to make an agreement with the rest of the citizens about his obeying the king.

Finally, it seems highly dangerous to derive the obligation to a king from a pact of this kind with every other citizen: 'Out of favour to you I transfer my right to the king, so that you as well, out of favour to me, may transfer your right to him.' For by this device every citizen will appear to have made his necessity to obey depend upon the obedience of every other citizen, and as a result, when any one of them does not render obedience, all the rest would be free from theirs. And yet for this reason alone it is necessary that every citizen be obligated to the supreme power for himself, and unconditioned by another's obedience, so that even if one or another chafe at their restraint, the sovereign can avail himself of the strength of the rest in reducing the refractory one to his place.

No less incongruous is what the same writer presents, chap. vi, § 13:

The obligation to show obedience to the supreme civil sovereignty does not arise immediately from that pact by which citizens have transferred all their right to the state, but mediately, namely, from the fact that without obedience the right of sovereignty would be vain, and in consequence a state would under no circumstances have been established.

But why use such crooked paths when one may walk a straight and level road? Surely the reason which seems to have moved him is an idle one. He tacitly presupposes that things which have been agreed upon by a pact cannot lawfully be refused; and yet that some things can rightfully be commanded by a king, which a citizen can rightfully refuse, for instance, if the king should command me to kill myself, or the king, or my father when sentenced to death, and that, therefore, the obedience of citizens must be derived from some other source than a pact with the king.

But we maintain that the legitimate power of a king and the duty of citizens exactly correspond, and we emphatically deny that a king can lawfully command anything which a subject can lawfully refuse. For a king cannot lawfully command anything more than agrees, or is supposed to agree, with the end of instituted civil society. If in evil design or open folly he orders something contrary to this end, he will by no means be held to be acting lawfully. Whether, however, subjects can lawfully resist any such commands is another question, which we shall discuss elsewhere. The examples which Hobbes adduces have nothing to do with the matter. If it should happen that the king can lawfully command a person to do such things as he mentions, that is, if for a citizen to do such a thing can appear to work to the safety of the state, the subject will not be within his rights in refusing to do it. See Judges, ix. 54; 1 Samuel, xxxi. 4. Zonaras, Pt. III, records that when the emperor Theophilus was standing held by a fear that was like chains 670 upon him, Manuel drew his sword and said, 'I will slay you if you do not follow me. For it is better that you die than be captured by the enemy, and bring such a disgrace upon the Roman state.' By these threats the emperor was with difficulty freed from his stupor, followed Manuel, and escaped. Nay, more: 'It is better for kings to die in battle than to serve their inferiors.' Quintus Calaber [Smyrnaeus], Bk. XIII [269 f.]. But when such commands are unreasonable, and a citizen is executed for refusing to perform them, no sane man, I imagine, would say that he was lawfully put to death.

What the same author presents in the final section of this chapter, to the effect that citizens make over their right to the king after the manner of a donation, is not even consistent with his own views. He says, chap. ii, §§ 8-9, that it is a donation when a right is transferred to another by only one of the parties. Yet when sovereignty is conferred upon a king there is a mutual transfer of right, or else a reciprocal promise: The citizens promise obedience, the king guidance of the state, duties to which neither was bound before that act. For just as before the conferring of sovereignty citizens could resist the commands of Gaius whom they later made king, so Gaius could likewise resist the same when they demanded his defence and care, or, in other words, could deny it as something he did not owe them. Compare Luke, xii. 13-14.

12. Nor is there any greater efficacy to destroy pacts between sovereigns and subjects, in the reasons which he later adduces, chap. vii, § 7 ff. He tries to prove, first of all, that a democracy is not established by pacts of individuals with the people as a whole, but by mutual pacts of individuals with each other. His argument is that in every pact the parties to it must be in existence before the pact itself; yet the people does not exist before the establishment of a state, when, that is, they were not a single moral person, but a multitude of individual persons. Therefore, before the establishment of a state, a pact could not have been entered into between the people and citizens. Yet after the state was established, it would have been useless to enter into such a pact, because the people embrace in their will the will of that citizen to whom, it is supposed, they are obligated, and therefore he can release himself at will, and is in consequence actually free.

But it is obvious that there is a third course still left open. Before a state is established, many men do not form a people, that is, a democratic group. Therefore, a pact cannot be entered into with it as such.

After it is established, it is idle to enter into a pact, in the sense that one citizen or another wishes to make a special agreement with the people about the administration of the state. For whoever approves of a democratic form of government is understood by that very act to have obligated himself to obey the decrees issuing from the majority of the people, which obligation would be impaired by a special pact. But, as a matter of fact, in the very establishment of a democratic state, a mutual pact could have been and actually was entered into between the people and individuals, the nature of which has already been set forth. It would be equally pointless were one to reason thus: A husband could never enter into a pact with his wife, because before their marriage she was not yet his wife, and there was no point in doing so after the marriage, when she had already subjected her will to the will of her husband. And yet a pact could be entered into by the very act of her becoming or being chosen his wife. Epicurus once toyed with a sophistry not so very different. Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. III, chap. xvii:

'When we are in existence, death does not exist: when death exists, we have no existence: therefore, death is nothing to us.' [Epicurus, in Diogenes Laertius, x. 125.] How cleverly he has deceived us! As though it were death now completed which is an object of fear, by which sensation has been already taken away, and not the very act of dying, by which sensation is being taken away from us. For there is a time in which we ourselves do not exist, and death does not yet exist; and that very time appears to be miserable, because death is beginning to exist, as we are ceasing to exist. (C.*)

Furthermore, however much a man may be unable to conceive of such a pact in a democracy, or may hold it useless, he will still not be allowed to exclude it from other forms of states, where those who rule and those who are ruled differ from one another as natural persons. For 671 in them, at any rate, a pact is required whereby the rulers are obligated to undertake the care of the state and to regard the safety of the people as the highest law, while the ruled promise them obedience. From this any one knows what is to be thought of the following thesis of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vii, § 9: 'Since citizens, by not entering into a pact with the people but into mutual pacts between themselves, were bound to everything which the people did, they were therefore bound to the deed of the people in transferring the sovereign right of the state to nobles or to a king.' For it does not follow that if a council of the people decided to transfer the supreme power to nobles or to a king, the individuals were bound to stand by that decree; therefore, no pact passes between the people transferring the sovereignty, and the nobles or the king to whom it is transferred.

Nor is Hobbes' next argument any stronger: A king, although chosen by a people, cannot be obligated by it to anything, for upon his being chosen, the people is at once dissolved and the consideration at once ceases which it held as a person; wherefore, the obligation which was entered upon to the person, ceases, and is dissolved along with it. Yet what foundation there is for such a theory as this, that when a person ceases, the obligation which concerned it likewise ceases, must be understood of those cases when a person ceases by natural death, or when that quality upon which alone an obligation was founded no longer exists. And yet when a free people transfers sovereignty to a king, that people does not cease by natural death, nor is the obligation of the king founded upon that quality of the people whereby it is understood to be free, but whereby it will thereafter continue to be a group of citizens subject to one man's sovereignty. Just as a suitor who agrees with a virgin about marriage cannot claim, after the consummation of the rite, that his obligation toward her has ceased, because she is no longer a virgin as she was when the pact was entered into. For the obligation was not based upon the quality of virginity, but he agrees with a virgin that she will enter upon the status of a wife. And when a king is set up a people is dissolved only in so far as that the supreme sovereignty is no longer vested in an assembly composed of all the citizens, but it is by no means dissolved into a multitude held together by no common bond; rather it remains one group, bound together by one sovereignty and by that original pact.

The fact is that Hobbes imposes upon the simpler minded by the ambiguous meaning of the word 'people'. In democracies 'people' signifies the entire body of citizens which in different respects rules and is ruled, while in aristocracies and monarchies it signifies the entire body of citizens which is ruled. See Idem, De Cive, chap. xiii, § 3. And yet who would undertake to deny that there can be an obligation towards such a people subject to a monarch or nobles, even though such an obligation had been contracted while it was yet free, but on contemplation and understanding of their future subjection?

Finally, Hobbes in the conclusion of his Leviathan expressly says that God was made King of the Jews by the force of a pact entered into between Him and them. Why then does he try to deny the existence of a pact between a mortal king and citizens? And in fact he had said a little before that when a man submits to his conqueror he is necessarily held obligated to him like a real subject, for a contract, lawfully entered into, cannot properly be violated or broken.

13. Now by such pacts as these a multitude of men unite to form a state, which is conceived as a single person with intelligence and will, performing other actions peculiar to itself and separate from those of individuals. And as it is distinguished and marked off from all individual men by one name (Statius, Achilleid, Bk. I [457-8]: 'A scattered and confused mass came together into one body and countenance, and was arranged in order under a single monarch'), so it has its own laws and property, which neither individual men, nor groups, nor all together 672 can lay claim to, save him who holds supreme sovereignty, while from it, in the same way, there proceed actions peculiar to it which individuals can neither hold for their own use, nor claim as their own. Digest, I. viii. 6, § 1; II. iv. 10, § 4; III. iv. 7, § 1; XLVIII. xviii. 1, § 7. Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VI, chaps. xix-xx. And so the most convenient definition of a state appears to be this: 'A state is a compound moral person, whose will, intertwined and united by the pacts of a number of men, is considered the will of all, so that it is able to make use of the strength and faculties of the individual members for the common peace and security.' For the definition given by Dio of Prusa [Chrysostom, Orations, xxxvi. 20]: 'A city is a number of people living in the same place and regulated by law' (M.), is based upon the political principles of the Greeks, and will perhaps be better discussed in another connexion. Not much better than it is that of the Platonic state as the most perfect form, in Apuleius, De Philosophia [II. xxiv]: 'A state is a union of a considerable number of men, among whom some govern and others are governed, but all cleave together in harmony and mutually give help and assistance to one another; they guide themselves in the performance of their duties by the same laws—which, however, must be just—; † they govern a society which is contained within the same walls, † and are accustomed to have the same desires and aversions in all things.'¹

Hobbes, in the introduction to his Leviathan, has very ingeniously depicted a state as an artificial man, in which 'he in whom is vested the supreme power' is considered the 'soul', which imparts life and movement to the whole body; the 'magistrates and governors' are the artificial 'joints'; 'penalties and rewards', as attached to the supreme power and used to quicken each member to the performance of its task, are the 'nerves', which perform the same function in a natural body; 'the wealth of individual men' is a man's 'strength'; the 'safety of the citizens' his 'occupation'; the 'councillors' who call to the attention of the state what it should take cognizance of, a man's 'memory'; 'justice and laws' his 'artificial reason'. The 'concord' of a state is a man's 'health'; its 'tumult' his 'sickness'; its 'civil war' his 'death'. Finally the 'pacts', by which the various parts of this political body are joined together, are the counterpart of that divine command, 'Let there be', or 'Let us make men', that issued from God in the beginning, when He created the world. Hence it is apparent at a glance that Isocrates in his Areopagiticus and Panathenaic Oration is wrong when he proposes the form of a state as its soul, whose power is that of the mind in the body, for the form of a state corresponds better to that which in a human body is the structure and arrangement of all its members and parts.

¹ [Pufendorf's quotation varies considerably from modern texts. In particular the passage between †† is hopelessly corrupt, and what is printed here aims only in general to give the probable sense.—Tr.]

14. Now the will of a state functions either through one simple person or through a single council, according to whether the supreme control has been vested in the former or in the latter. When the sovereignty is vested in one man the state is understood to desire in every business which concerns the end of states, but no other, whatever is his will, it being presupposed that he is of sound reason. So, for instance, if the king proclaims war, if he concludes peace, if he makes a treaty, the state is said to have wished and done it; not so, if he eats, drinks, sleeps, marries, or indulges in vices¹. Euripides, Suppliants [1188 ff.]:

Let yon Adrastus swear—

He answereth for them all, despot of their folk,
For all troth of the land of Danaus' sons. (W.)

Therefore, a distinction can be drawn between the public will of a monarch which represents the will of the state and his private will, which expresses itself, like that of any other man, in matters not concerned with the state.

The question now arises: In case he in whom is vested the will of the state reaches some other decision than that which he should, and so 673 is guilty of error in the exercise of the public will, is the action which proceeds from such a depraved will to be regarded as the action of the state? For in submitting his will to the will of his prince, a man is understood to have done so with the thought in mind that his sovereign would will nothing but what is just and for the advantage of the state. On this point it seems we must say, that an action which proceeds from an abuse and debasing of the public will, is still in itself a public action, belonging to the state, because it is performed by the sovereign as such. Thus, if a monarch or senate passes bad laws, pronounces wrong judgments, appoints unfit officials, or starts unjust wars, they are still acts of the state, just as when a driver overturns his chariot, it is the act of the driver, although he may be pronounced unskilled or careless. Yet in the sight of God no man is responsible for such an action, unless he has contributed to it by his positive and effective consent. Therefore, subjects are not accountable for a misdeed of the state, nor are those who voted against it in the sovereign assembly and were defeated by the majority. The inconveniences which fall upon innocent citizens from such public misdeeds are to be classed among those evils to which man in his mortality is exposed, and which he must bear, like drought, floods, and all other acts of nature. Although no little precaution against such inconveniences is furnished by basic laws, good education, and especially religion.

It follows, on the other hand, that whatever has been planned or done by individual citizens, or a group, even all of them apart from the king, either without or contrary to his authority and command, whether on matters that concern the state or are purely private, is under no circumstances to be regarded as the will or action of the state, but as the will and action of private men; indeed, there will be as many wills and as many actions, as there are men who are said to have willed or done something. The same conclusion must be reached regarding what is done by individual citizens or groups on their own initiative, without the authority and command of that council in which resides the supreme control. Therefore, among seditious ideas and such as work to break up the inner unity of a state, and especially in a monarchy, Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xii, § 8, includes the fact that the common sort do not distinguish clearly enough between a state or people and a multitude. For a people or state is a unit which possesses a single will, and to which a single action can be attributed, neither of which can be said of a multitude of subjects as opposed to a man or council endowed with sovereignty. Although the statement which follows, namely, that 'the people rules throughout the entire state', comes to nothing in a display of idle subtleties. For the word 'people' signifies either a whole state, or else the multitude of subjects. In the first sense his statement that 'the people, that is, the state rules in every state' is meaningless, in the second sense it is false that 'the people, that is, the citizens as distinguished from the king, rule in every state'. In place of his next statement, that 'in monarchies the people rules, for the people expresses its will through that of one man', it would have been simpler to have said that in a monarchy the state¹ is held to have willed what the monarch willed. Nor is the old paradox, 'The king is the people', to be explained in any other sense. His other remarks are true enough: That the common sort always speak of a great number of men as a people or state, and say that a state has rebelled against its king, which is impossible; and think that the people or state desire or refuse what is desired or refused by some troublesome and grumbling citizens, who under the name of 'the people' incite citizens against their state, and subjects against their sovereign.

¹ [For vitiat read vitia.—Tr.]

15. But when the headship of a state reposes in a council composed of a number of men, each of whom retains his own will, a decision must be reached, first of all, as to how great a part of it, when agreed, shall represent the will of the entire council, and so of the state. For just as otherwise no man is bound to follow another's opinion any more than his own, unless he has subjected his will to the other's, so if a man has made the express reservation, when entering a society with others about conducting some undertakings in common council, that he is unwilling to be bound to anything to which he has not himself consented, under no circumstances does he bind himself to the decision of the majority. And so there are bodies where the dissent of one person can render void an agreement of all the rest. Although when a man is unwilling even to listen to reason, and out of mere stubbornness obstructs the proper conclusions of all the rest, he may be cast out of the society as a hindrance, or at times even threatened with ill. For although such a person is not bound by his own consent to follow the opinion of the majority, yet he is bound by the general law that a man should deport himself to the advantage of others, and that a part should conform to the good of the whole.

¹ [For citas read civitas.—Tr.]

In this connexion we may add the argument of Petrus Suavis, History of the Council of Trent, Bk. IV, p. 788, that the French were not bound by the decrees of the council, because they had protested against them, where he adds the decision rendered by the Parlement of Paris: 'The authority of the whole body is transferred to the majority when the cause of all is common and does not concern the individual members; but when the whole cause concerns every member and each one is owed his share, universal assent is required and the side of the negative is the stronger, nor are absentees obligated in any way unless voting. Of this nature are ecclesiastical gatherings, by the decrees of which, however well attended the council may be, those churches are not obligated which are not represented, unless they please to accept them.'

Although it must be confessed that in such councils, especially when they are composed of many men, business is carried on with the utmost difficulty, and often they can have no outcome at all, because of differences in opinions arising from the invincible obstinacy of some members. And when a man joins some group or council absolutely and without exception, it is regularly presumed, that, since he cannot demand of all the rest that they follow his views, or give up what they think useful or necessary, because of one man's opposition, he has obligated himself to follow and approve what the great majority of his associates have agreed upon. For if he regard this concession as a great hardship, he should have stated his exception to it at the outset, when he joined the society. After he is in, it is surely too haughty and grasping a thing to vaunt his own wisdom above that of all others. Yet if it is a trial to a person to be unable to force his opinion on all the rest against their will, he will be free to leave the group in question. But it is never right when you have been outvoted to follow the example of the incident recorded in Agathias, Bk. IV [v]:

Every one of them, displeased that his own view had not prevailed, went about his duty in a very careless and lazy fashion, and was the happier at all misfortunes, so that he might be able later to brag and more freely to boast among his friends, and prove that there was no other reason for the piece of bad luck, except that they had not taken his particular advice.

Therefore, in all councils the votes of a majority have the force of those of all the members, not because there is any necessity by nature for it to be so, but because there is scarcely any other way for them to carry on their business. See Digest, II. xiv. 7, § 19; II. xiv. 8; L. i. 19. Pliny, Letters, Bk. II, ep. xii:

675

Votes go by number, not by weight; nor can it be otherwise in a public assembly, where nothing is so unequal as the equality which prevails in them: for although every member has the same right of suffrage, not every member has the same strength of judgment to direct it. (B.*) Idem, Bk. I, ep. xiii: Individual members are at liberty to express dissent; but when once carried, the whole house was bound to support the decision of the majority. (M.*)

It is by this general rule that we must understand the passage in Aristotle, Politics, Bk. IV, chap. viii: 'In all of them there exists the right of the majority. For both in an oligarchy, and a democracy, and in the gatherings of a people, whatever seems good to the majority of those who share in the government¹ has authority.'² (J.) Although it sometimes happens that the opinion of a few may be defeated, although it is a course more to the interests and honour of the state; for since in all such universal establishments for carrying on the affairs of men, it is impossible to devise means that will have no possible shortcomings, the best course is to follow what is for the most part expedient. Add Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. III, chap. iv, p. 456.

Hence it is idle to maintain that since it is agreeable to nature that what proceeds from the more prudent should prevail over that from the more imprudent, it is repugnant to nature that the more imprudent will of a majority should prevail over the more prudent will of a few, and that in this way the former can obligate the latter to undertake some act of folly. Indeed, in deciding upon the theoretical truths opinions are rated not by number but by weight. Nay, the very multitude of those who approve is treated as an indication of error. Seneca, On the Happy Life, chap. ii:

When we are considering a happy life, you cannot answer me as though after a division of the house: 'This view has most supporters'; because for that reason it is the worse of the two. Matters do not stand so well with mankind that the majority should prefer the better course; the more people do a thing the worse it is likely to be. (S.)

Plutarch, Apophthegms [p. 188 A], tells us that once when a remark of Phocion was received with general applause, he turned to his friends and inquired: 'Have I not unawares spoken some mischievous thing or other?' (G.) Idem, The Education of Children [ix, p. 6 B]: 'For to please the many is to displease the wise. To this saying of mine that of Euripides himself bears witness:

'I'm better skilled to treat a few, my peers,
Than in a crowd to tickle vulgar ears;

¹ [For ireip. read reip.—Tr.]

² [Pufendorf has taken considerable liberty with the text.—Fr.]

Though others have the luck on't, when they babble
Most to the wise, then most to please the rabble.' (G.)

For that reason, according to Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. X, chap. vii [21]: 'And those who wish to appear learned to fools are decidedly pronounced fools by the learned.' (W.) And 'A few good judges are far more formidable to a man of sense than many fools.' (J.) Plato, Symposium [p. 194 B]. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. III, chap. vii, § 1 ext. Dio Chrysostom [Orations, xi. 145], De Ilio Non Capto: 'Long-continued belief by foolish men does not make a thing true.' (M.)

Yet such a rule as this cannot be applied to the conduct of business in a council the members of which enjoy equal rights. For who will render the decision as to which opinion is the more prudent? Surely not the parties to the contest, for no man on one side of a question will submit to the judgement of one who is intent upon the other side, and upon carrying out his own desires. And how rare a man is he who is not better pleased with his own prudence than with another's? Nay, how numerous are those who delight to cavil at the finest project for no other reason than because they were not the authors of it! Nor is it such an easy matter to leave the decision of such controversies to a third party, since it is no trouble to question the prudence or integrity of the arbitrator, with the result that another one is needed to settle this further dispute. Nay more, usually these matters are of such a nature that they cannot conveniently be referred to arbitrators outside a society. Therefore, it is considered the most convenient thing to follow a method which admits of no difficulty or obscure judgement, than 676 which none can be found more practicable than to count the number of opinions. Pliny, Panegyric [Lxii], toward the end: 'It is better to trust men as a whole than singly. For individuals can deceive and be deceived: No single person ever tricked all, or all a single person.'

Furthermore, whoever is accorded a vote in any council is held to have enough prudence to enable him to understand the matters discussed by it. And this is true at least of those councils to which men are not admitted without some choice or election. Nor would it always be a wise thing if some one man of the council, for example, the presiding officer, should be given the power to declare by his vote which plan is the better. For by such power he will be permitted to favour the minority over the majority, nay, even to reject them both on the plea that neither is worthy, and in that way the actual control of affairs would be in the hands of such a president, just as absolute princes can follow even the minority of the counsellors, yes, and follow an opinion which is different from any that has been proposed.

16. But it is to be observed, in connexion with the matter of a majority of votes, that in some bodies it is not enough for one opinion to prevail by one or a few votes, but in some cases it must exceed the other by a certain number. Thus in [the Canon Law] Decretals, I. vi. 6, a pope is elected upon receiving the votes of two-thirds of the cardinals, as appears to have been the case in the election and decrees of the decurions. Digest, III. iv. 3, 4, and Digest, L. ii. 45. Prudentius, Against Symmachus, Bk. I [604 ff.]:

Decrees of the senate were made in this fashion. In early times a law was not valid unless three hundred of the Fathers had agreed on a matter. Let us maintain our ancient laws: that the weak voice of the minority shall yield, and, when it represents but a small fraction, keep silent.

According to Andrea Maurocenus, Historia Veneta, Bk. XVII, to a decree of the senate banishing the Jesuits from the territory of the state, the clause was added that the decree could not be annulled, unless there were one hundred and eighty senators present, and five-sixths voted for it. But when there is no special agreement on that point, the opinion which has but one vote more shall be considered the stronger, and the view of the whole body. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 17, and his notes, and the remarks of Boecler; Digest, IV. viii. 17, § 6. It is idle to advance in opposition the statement in Sext, V. xii. 29: 'It is just that what concerns all should be approved by all.'¹ For it does not follow therefrom that it is unjust for the more convenient dispatch of business, that a few dissenters should yield to the majority. Furthermore, that rule does not concern societies or councils which have the administration of public affairs, but private societies are based only upon a pact or a partnership to hold something. Such a partnership, of course, gives no right to the partners to decide upon some policy with relation to their common holding, against the will of one of their number who feels that it will be to his prejudice. On this principle is to be explained Digest, VIII. iii. 11, and X. iii. 28. But the statement of the Canon Law, Decretals, I. vi. 6, that the regulation requiring a two-thirds vote for the election of a pope, should not be used to the prejudice of other churches, in whose elections the opinion of the larger and 'saner' party should prevail, is based upon the consideration that a superior, that is, the pope can, by their theory, decide which is the 'saner' side, when any question arises. Therefore, no consideration can be given the 'saner' side when it is not the more numerous, save when there is provision for appeal to a superior. Add Decretum, I. lxiii. 36.

17. But if the votes are equal, no action will result, and the matter will stand as before, because the movement is not strong enough to warrant a change, and the equal weight on each side holds the matter in suspense. So also in trials before a court, the defendant is acquitted when the votes are tied, although penalties for suits of slander and libel appear not to fall under this rule. Quintilian, Declamations, ccliv: 'A tie vote favours the defendant.' Antiphon, Orations, xiv [v. 51]: 'A stand off arms the defendant rather than the plaintiff, since also in counting votes a tie helps the defendant rather than the plaintiff.' Add Aristotle, Problems, Sect. xxix, chap. 13; Digest, XLII. i. 39; Seneca, Controversies, Bk. I, cont. v [3]: 'One judge condemns, the other acquits; among discordant judgements let the milder prevail.' This right the Greeks call the 'vote of Minerva', upon which one may consult a dissertation of Boecler. Although the Hebrews even held that the accused was not found guilty, if only one more vote was cast for his condemnation than for his acquittal. The reason for this doubtless was, that, because the judges were supposed to vote with the same religious scruple as the witnesses gave their testimony, in view of the fact that one witness was not sufficient to secure conviction, so one judge was not sufficient to condemn. For the rest of the judges by opposing each other had, as it were, mutually destroyed their authority.

¹ [The exact words in the original are: 'Quod omnes tangit debet ab omnibus approbari.'—Tr.]

We should make this further observation, that when the voting is by companies or tribes, the minority of any tribe cannot increase the number of their side in other tribes.

18. Finally, when there are more than two opinions, the question arises as to whether they are to be voted upon separately, so that the one is carried which commands more votes than each of the others, or whether two or more, though opposed, may be combined¹ to beat a third, upon the elimination of which the others may then be taken up, so that the one of the remaining questions is carried which has the majority of the votes. If we fix our eyes upon mere natural equity, without reference to agreements or special laws, it appears that we should distinguish between opinions which are entirely different from one another, and those where one includes a part of another, or which, in other words, differ only in quantity, so that they can be united on the points in which they agree, while the former cannot. Thus those who fix a fine upon a man, at twenty units of value, may be united with those who fix it at ten units, against such as would acquit him altogether, and the defendant will be fined ten units, because this is agreeable to the majority of the judges, in view of the fact that those in favour of the twenty, are included with those in favour of the ten. Here belongs Digest, XLII. i. 38, § 1, and IV. viii. 27, and Sext, I. xxii. 1. It is to no avail that Grotius, Sparsio Florum [p. 98, ed. Amst.], differs from the decision in the passage cited (27), in that he feels that a defendant should be fined ten units, because the majority agreed to that, while what they disagreed on should be rejected. For, I would urge in reply, they all agree upon a fine of five units, and the majority is decisive only when there is a difference of judgement. This was the reason for the custom of the Roman senate of bidding a member to 'divide the motion', if it embraced two parts, only one of which was favoured. See

¹ [For pussini read possint.—Tr.]

Cicero, Letters to Friends, Bk. I, ep. ii. Seneca, Letters, xxi [9]: 'I think we ought to do in philosophy as they are wont to do in the Senate; when some one has made a motion, of which I approve to a certain extent, I ask him to make his motion in two parts, and I vote <for the part which I approve>'.¹ (G.)

But if, for example, the judges be divided about a defendant, a part voting to banish, a part to execute, and a part to free him, surely those in favour of banishment will not be able to unite with those who would condemn him to death, against those who would free him; nor these last with the ones in favour of banishment, against those who would have him die. For² these sentences are entirely different from each other, since there is no banishment in death, nor is it a part of death. And although the banishers and acquitters should agree that the accused should not be slain, their sentence does not produce this effect directly, but only by consequence. Yet they are in themselves, as a 678 matter of fact, different, for whoever votes for acquittal frees him of all punishment, while a banisher favours a punishment. See Pliny, Letters, Bk. VIII, ep. xiv. Polybius, in Selections on Embassies, 129 [XXIII. i. 5 ff.], reports that when certain Achaeans were held captive in Rome, and what should be done with them was laid before the senate, there were three opinions: One to release, another to condemn, and a third to hold them for a while; and the senators were so divided that those in favour of freeing them were more numerous than the others taken separately. Whereupon Postumius the praetor, who was presiding, an enemy of the Achaeans, employed a trick to their prejudice. For when the time for voting came, the praetor passed over one opinion, and asked for a vote on only the two, in this way, by ordering that those who wished the men who had been summoned before them to be released, should pass to one side, and those who opposed that view to the other side. Thus it turned out that those who wished them held for a while, joined with those who did not wish them cleared, and the two prevailed over those who had urged their release. In Gellius³, Bk. IX, chap. xv, the following is given as the outline for a debate:

Suppose seven judges try a prisoner—that judgement is to prevail which the greater number shall determine—the seven judges presided—two of them thought the prisoner should be banished; two of them that he should be fined; the remaining three that he should be put to death. Punishment is demanded according to the decision of the three, from which the prisoner appeals. (B.*)

This was put forth at the time as a problem that was ἀνόπος (insoluble). The same argument is found in Quintilian, Declamations, ccclxv, where he says, quite rightly, among other things: 'You cannot add together those who disagree. Compare those who agree.' See also

¹ [The last six words (quod probō of the original) seem to have been omitted by accident.—Tr.]

² [For Mam read Nam.—Tr.]

³ [For Gallium read Gellium.—Tr.]

the argument of Libanius, Declamations, xxx. In Heliodorus, Ethiopica, Bk. I, Cnemon is said to have been condemned to death by 1,700 votes, to banishment by 1,000. But since some of the former had voted for stoning, others for casting him into a pit, the thousand who voted for exile formed the larger number. Add Cujas, Observations, XII, chap. xvi; Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 17.

It is also observed by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 22, that when several persons do not constitute an all-inclusive body, properly speaking, but are only joined together in consideration of a certain thing in which they do not all share equally, not only should their order be fixed in accordance with the manner of their participation, but their votes should be counted in a geometric proportion.¹ Here belong Digest, II. iv. 8; XVI. iii. 14; XLII. v. 16. Where we should observe that since such a society is based only on some thing held in common, and not on such a pact as established some all-inclusive organization, and one whereby every man has subjected his will to that of the majority, so the vote of him who holds a larger share prevails over that of him who holds a lesser share, yet so as the former can under no consideration deprive by his vote² the latter of his right, or act to his prejudice. And on this basis we are to understand what is the will of the state, when the control of affairs lies in the hands of more than one individual.

19. It is obvious that a council which must deliberate and legislate on the affairs of a state must be composed of at least three members. See Digest, L. xvi. 85. For if there were only two, there would be no one who could see that one side carried, in case they happened to disagree, and so in such a case nothing could be done. See Decretals, I. xliii. 1. Nor does it make any difference that even two men, for instance, the Roman consuls, are called colleagues, for that term often denotes an equality only in numbers. See Digest, L. xvi. 173; XXVI. vii. 14; XLVI. iii. 101. So the Latin writers speak of the college of the tribunes, although one of them by his veto could make void a decision of all the 679 rest. Nor do those who call each other by the name of 'colleague' always constitute a council, in which the wills of all have by a pact gathered into one will. It may happen that several men form a society, and yet each man keeps his own will entirely free from that of others. Therefore, the fact that a contract for a society can be entered into between two persons has nothing to do with the case. Digest, III. iv. 7, § 2, does not mean that a college can be established at the very first by one person, but that upon failure for some reason of the rest of the members, a college already constituted can be continued for a time by one man, until others are chosen to take their place.

It is a rule that no consideration is given to absent members in such councils, when they have been legally notified (see Decretals, I. vi. 36), but their right is added, as it were, to that of those who are present. Here one may apply the saying of Seneca, Controversies, Bk. VII, cont. iv: 'Whenever two form a partnership, complete control is in the hands of the one who is present,' although it would be my judgement that this should be restricted to routine business, and such as can suffer no delay. It is likewise an exception, if the laws require a definite number of colleagues. See Digest, III. iv. 3; L. ii. 45. In some places the absent members are able to delegate their powers to those who are present, and to vote either through these or in writing. See Sext,¹ I. vi. 46.

¹ [That is, as they share in some common element.—Tr.]

² [For suam nequam read suum nequaquam.—Tr.]

20. When a state has been formed in the way described, the person or persons on whom devolves the sovereignty, is called a monarch, senate, or people, according as this sovereignty rests in a single man, one council, composed of a few members, or of all the citizens; while all others are known as subjects. Here we must observe that a man may become a member of any state in two ways: by an expressed or by a tacit pact. For those who establish states in the first place are surely not held to have done so with the thought that they would cease with the death of their founders, but they had before their eyes the obtaining in this way of advantages which would be lasting and perpetual, and would be a source of gratification to their children and all their posterity. Therefore, it is held that they also had in mind that their children and descendants should upon birth enjoy the common advantages and rewards of the state; and since these cannot be secured without sovereignty, which is, as it were, the soul of a state, all who are born in a state are also understood to have subjected themselves to that sovereignty. Hence it is that those who have once accepted the sovereignty in a state are under no necessity of requiring anew an express subjection from each newly-born child, although all of those who first conferred sovereignty upon them may be dead.

Furthermore, since every state is situated upon some certain part of the surface of the earth, in which the citizens have gathered themselves and their property for safety, and since this safety would be easily imperilled, if men could come and go there who did not recognize the sovereignty of the state, it is understood as a common law of all states, that, whoever has passed into the territory of any state, and all the more if he wishes to enjoy its advantages, is held to have given up his natural liberty, and to have subjected himself to the sovereignty of that state, at least for so long a time as he desires to remain there. But if he refuses to recognize this, let him be regarded as an enemy, to the extent that he can lawfully be expelled from the borders of the state. In this way it is obvious also that those who come to a state after its establishment, are no less subject to its sovereignty than those who first joined together to establish it.

¹ [For Vltio. read VI.30.—Tr.]

Finally, it should be observed, in this connexion, that some scholars are not entirely agreed upon the meaning of the word citizen. Indeed, Hobbes, De Cive, chap. v, § 11, appears to make subject and citizen equivalent terms, so that women, boys, and slaves would also 680 be citizens. But it is my opinion that since a state is established by a submission of wills to one man or to a council, those, or their successors, are primarily citizens, by whose pacts a state was first formed. And since this was done by fathers of families, it would be my judgement that the name 'citizen' belongs to these first of all, but only indirectly and through them to the women, boys, and slaves of their establishments, whose wills were included in the will of the father of the family, in so far as they enjoy both the common protection of the state, and some rights by reason of that relation. But lodgers, foreigners, and such temporary inhabitants are not citizens, because they wish to remain only for a time, but not to secure there a fixed protection and location for their fortunes. The definition of Aristotle, Politics, Bk. III, chap. i, whereby he measures a citizen by his 'sharing in the administration of justice, and in offices' squares only with democracies. As he himself adds: 'The citizen then of necessity differs under each form of government; and our definition' as given above, 'is best adapted to the citizen of a democracy; but not necessarily to other forms' of commonwealths, namely, that he share in magistracies and judicial procedures. Idem, Politics, Bk. III, chap. viii [III. v]: 'Since there are many forms of government there must be many varieties of citizens.' (J.)

21. Now we observe that in states two kinds of special bonds in particular are added to citizens, by the first of which some of them gather into special bodies, which are still subordinate to the state, while by the second they are included, by those vested with the supreme power, in some part of the public administration. These bodies which are subordinate to the state, whether coming under the name of colleges, or societies, or some other such designation, can be divided first of all into those which preceded states, and those which followed upon their establishment. Bodies older than the state are families whose measure of power and right, as granted to their heads, has been already set forth. Of which right so much remains to them as is not taken away by the nature of the state, or by civil laws or public manners.

Of the bodies which arise after the formation of states, some can be called public and some private. The former are such as are established by the authority of the supreme civil power. Private bodies are such as either have been formed by the agreement of the citizens themselves, or depend upon some external authority which in another state can be held only as some private right and undertaking.

Private bodies are again either legal or illegal, of which the former are, or should be, countenanced¹ by the state, the latter not. I say 'should be countenanced', for if, in a state where the worship of God is corrupted, some who are filled with the spirit of the true religion hold their own private gatherings without disorders and plottings against the state, surely no one would call such meetings unlawful, however much the supreme powers may disapprove of whatever does not agree with their belief, since they themselves are obligated to recognize and acknowledge that truth. So if, in a barbarous state which scorns every form of learning, some individuals meet privately to follow that pursuit, surely no one would call their association unlawful.

Both are again divided into regular and irregular. They are the former, when the will of all members is united in accordance with certain agreements; the latter, when there is observable not so much a union of wills as a consent or agreement without any bond, such consent arising from some common affection, such as hope, desire for gain and revenge, ambition, anger, and the like.

22. It should be observed, with regard to all lawful bodies, that 681 whatever rights and whatever power they have over their members are all defined and limited by the supreme power, and cannot be opposed to or prevail against it. For otherwise, were there a body not subject to limitation by the supreme civil power, there would be a state within a state. Therefore, if any state was ever formed of several absolute and independent bodies, it was first necessary for them to have given up so much of their former power and right, as the genius of a state required, since they would otherwise have fallen short of the end which they proposed for themselves.

But we must see what the supreme authority had in mind to accomplish, in a state already constituted, by forming and licensing such a body. For if, in express terms, it contributed to and confirmed in that body an absolute and independent right in a certain kind of business, which concerns the status of the state, it most certainly relinquished a part of its sovereignty, and created an irregular and two-headed state, a thing no sane man would do, except when driven to it by necessity. But when the sovereign wishes to retain his power unlimited and undiminished, he must see to it, that such a subordinate body so controls its right, that it works no prejudice to the supreme sovereignty, and that it does not extend and amplify itself in ways that tend to release it from its position as a subordinate body.

Now the argument by which the power of such bodies is circumscribed, is to be sought in the documents by which one of them is organized or confirmed, or even in the general laws of the state, which are held to bind each and every citizen in so far as they have not been expressly repealed. Hence it follows that, if the administration of that body be gathered into one person, whatever he does in accordance with its constitution, or the common laws of the state, will be considered as the action of the entire body, but all else done by him is his own action, which does not concern others, and for which he alone is accountable. But if the administration of that body is vested in a group of several members, and it does something contrary to the laws and its constitution, those alone who agreed to it are liable to the penalty on that account, while those who opposed it, or were absent from the meeting, are innocent. And it is well that these last for their own security protest against the decision of the rest, and enter their objection in the minutes, so that they may not by any chance be involved in the punishment of the rest. But, on the other hand, a member may not protest against a decision of an independent assembly, since that involves a denial of its supreme power.

¹ [For probantur read probantur.—Tr.]

Regarding the debts of such bodies, one must inquire, in the first place, in whose name they are contracted¹, for the debt of one of its members, on his own account, is not a debt of the whole body. Although when he has been condemned to pay something, execution may be taken not merely on the rest of his property, but also on what is his by virtue of that body. The debts contracted by one or more of the directors of the body in accordance with the laws of its foundation are binding upon the whole body as such, and upon the individual members in proportion, provided the body have no common resources. Yet there is this exception, that the creditors of that body who live outside the state may, when payment is refused them, treat whatever members of that body they may seize, as if they had individually obligated themselves for the entire amount, just as in other matters any citizen in foreign lands may suffer reprisals for a debt of his countryman. But all debts contracted contrary to the laws of the institution lie upon those who gave their express consent to them, but not upon such as dissented, save in so far as they have shared in the profits therefrom; and since such debts do not concern the resources of the body, they must be met pro rata from the resources of the individuals who agreed to them. But if a member make a loan to the body as such, he has a claim on nothing 682 but the resources of that body, and if these prove to be insufficient, he has but himself to blame. Compare Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxx. If a controversy arise between a member and the entire body, the judge will be not the body but the state, to which the body is subject. For since they have at their services a common judge, it would be inappropriate for one to deliver judgement in its own case.

23. Unlawful bodies are not alone those which men form for the purpose of manifest² villainy, such as societies of thieves, beggars, gipsies, pirates, highwaymen, &c., but also any associations of citizens, held together by special pacts, entered into without the consent of the supreme powers, and repugnant to the end of states. These last usually are termed conspiracies or factions. Their purposes are of all kinds, for sometimes their members work to secure the control of the state, at other times they undertake to guide public affairs in a certain channel for their own pleasure and profit. Some would enrich themselves from the state's coffers, others seek from the faction impunity for their crimes. Nay, even those which parade some plausible excuse, such as defence, the cure of certain abuses, or the removal of evil officials, as well as those whose reason for existing is kept secret, are open to suspicion and are dangerous. For it is an invasion of the duty of the administrators of the states, and furthermore, when such men have grown confident of their power they can easily turn against the state itself. Otho remarks in Tacitus, Histories, Bk. I [lxxxiv]: 'You have transgressed thus in your zeal for me. But amidst that general hurry and confusion, and in the gloom of midnight darkness, an opportunity might have been given for an attack on me.' (O.) Therefore, it is unlawful to do many things under cover of a faction, which are otherwise fair and proper enough. Thus to petition one's sovereign, or to accuse a man, is not unlawful, but to gather a great body of men for that purpose looks like faction and sedition. It is usually forbidden in army regulations, under penalty of death, for soldiers to gather in a large throng and demand their pay. Add Acts, xix. 39-40; Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiii, § 12-13; Leviathan, chap. xxx, where he compares lawful bodies to the 'muscles' of the human body, and unlawful ones to 'tumours, abscesses, and sores, generated by the gathering of noxious humours'.

¹ [For contradicta read contracta.—Tr.]

² [For manifest read manifesti.—Tr.]

24. A special bond, in addition to the common one binding all citizens, is laid by the supreme powers upon those whom they select to direct some department of the administration in their name and with their authority, and who are designated public ministers and magistrates. These are different from the private ministers of the prince, who serve him, as they would any one else, in matters common to princes and subjects. But among those who serve the sovereign as such, some distinction is observable, in that some of them exercise a bit of sovereignty or of administration, and so after a manner represent the person of the ruler, being in consequence properly and rightly entitled to the designation of public ministers; while others are merely concerned with expediting and executing public affairs. To the first class belong the regents and administrators of the kingdom during a king's minority, captivity, or insanity; then those set in authority over provinces, cities, or districts, as well as the army and navy; treasurers¹, judges, public

¹ [For perfecti read praefecti.—Tr.]

prosecutors, censors of doctrines, ambassadors to foreign powers, and the like. To the second class belong counsellors, since they have no share in the administration, but merely advise their sovereign as to what they consider the proper course; likewise those who are engaged in the routine business of states, such as clerks, those who collect, keep, or 683 dispense the revenue; also soldiers, those who give manual service in the exercise of justice, and the like, whose positions and degrees in any state can easily be learned. Compare Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxx; Bodin, *On the Republic*¹, Bk. III, chap. vii.

¹ [For repul. read republ.—Tr.]

CHAPTER III

ON THE CREATION OF SUPREME CIVIL SOVEREIGNTY OR MAJESTY

- | | |
|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. Supreme sovereignty has resulted from the pacts by which a state was formed.2. This was done with the will and approval of God.3. Is majesty directly derived from God?4. How have some gone about to prove this belief?5. Civil sovereignty was not a product of wars. | <ol style="list-style-type: none">6. Can a prince develop from the father of a family?7. How may he who is freed from vassalage receive majesty?8. When a free people or a monarch resigns the sovereignty into another's hands, can that produce majesty?9. In whose power is it to grant the kingly title? |
|--|---|

LET us now see from what immediate and proximate source is produced that supreme sovereignty which is found in every state, and by which, as by the soul, it lives and is animated. And, at the outset, we presuppose that for sovereignty to meet its end, there is required, in the first place, natural strength, through which a subject can be coerced by the threat of some evil, in case he should presume to refuse to do what is commanded him, and, in the second place, a title, by which right others can be commanded to perform or omit something, and to which there corresponds in them an obligation to obey its commands. Both of these flow directly from the pact by which a state is formed. For although no man can transfer his strength in any physical way to another, yet the sovereign is understood to possess the strength of others, since they are so obligated to exert it at his direction, that there resides in them no power to resist or to refuse his command. Indeed, there is no other transfer of strength possible between men.

Now since all members of a state, by the act of submitting their wills to the will of another, have bound themselves not to attempt resistance, that is, to obey him who would direct their strength and resources to the public good, it appears that he in whom resides the supreme sovereignty has such strength that he is able to force whom he pleases to his orders.¹ Livy, Bk.² II, chap. lix: 'The effectiveness of authority all depends on the goodwill of those obeying it.' (F.) So also the pact in question supplies a clear title, whereby that sovereignty is understood to be lawfully established, not upon violence but upon the free subjection and consent of the citizens. This, therefore, is the most immediate cause from which supreme sovereignty comes about as a moral quantity, for upon the offer of submission by one person and its acceptance by another, there at once arises for the latter the right to command the former, that is, sovereignty. And as pacts can confer upon another a right over some possession of ours, so submission can give him the right to dispose of our liberty and strength. And so, for example, if a man of his own free will makes himself over to me by a pact to be a slave, he actually bestows upon me the power of a master.

¹ [For adjussa read ad jussa.—Tr.]

² [For lib. read lib.—Tr.]

684 Against this it is silly to repeat the old saying: 'A man cannot confer upon another what he does not himself possess.'

But if sovereignty is to secure a special efficacy and sanctity, there must be added to it some other principle beside the submission of subjects. Therefore, he who says that sovereignty results directly from pacts does by no means detract from the sanctity of supreme civil authority, or base the authority of a prince merely on human and not divine right.

2. Now it is unquestioned that sane reason has spoken plainly enough to mankind, to the effect that, after they had multiplied, they could not live in honour, peace, and safety, without establishing states, which are unintelligible without supreme sovereignty. And for this reason it is held that states also and supreme sovereignty came from God as the author of natural law. For not only are such things as God established by His intervention immediately, and without any deed of men, due to Him, but also what men have contrived under the guidance of sound reason, with due regard for times and places, in order that they might fulfil the obligation enjoined upon them by God. Compare 1 Timothy, ii. 2. And since, with a great multitude of men, natural law cannot be conveniently observed without civil sovereignty, it is patent that God, who enjoined the former upon men, also commands that civil societies be set up, in so far as they serve as the means to the observance of natural law. And therefore God expressly approves sovereignty in Sacred Scripture, acknowledges it as His own, and guards by the most severe laws its sanctity and veneration. But whether God ordered the establishment of a state at a certain place and time, is not clear. For the precept of the sons of Noah about courts, which may be advanced in this connexion, states no particular time and place for their constitution, and so it can mean that when the processes of law have been set up, they should be observed.

Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 6, does not differ much from this, when he speaks as follows, on the origin of supreme civil sovereignty:

The supreme power is to be sought not alone in an act of men but also in the command of God and the law of nature, or in such an act of men as is made in an effort to conform to the law of nature. For whoever enjoins society also enjoins an order in society; but the soul of society is sovereignty, and among societies the most perfect is the state.

Which is true enough, provided we add, that the command of God to establish states manifested itself through the dictate of reason, by which men recognized that the order and peace which natural law considers as its end, cannot exist without civil society, and especially after mankind has so increased in numbers. And in this respect the state differs from other human institutions, the introduction of which is likewise urged by sane reason, yet not in such a way as that, without them, the order, safety, and welfare of mankind could not be preserved.

With regard to the *fourth*¹ commandment, which enjoins obedience to the civil sovereignty, it is to be observed that it does not exclude the immediate causes whereby sovereignty was produced, just as the commandment forbidding theft in no way excludes the origin of dominion. And unless I am mistaken, the phrase 'God's viceregents on earth', who hold civil sovereignty, can conveniently be taken to mean that, in so far as mere reverence for the law of nature and its Author does not secure peace and seemly order among mankind, this end is now reached through the force of civil sovereignty. In which sense the following words are also plain: Therefore, 'in order that a state may be a state, and attain its end, there has been established by God through the law² of nature, an order of commanding and obeying, in which, by the very will of God and the dictate of natural reason, there is a something supreme and dependent upon no one, subject to no one's pleasure, which, as it is subject to God alone, so it is His counterpart and 685 representative; and this is the supreme civil power. But it is entirely in the hands of men to decide whether they will commit that supreme power to one or to several, and on what distinct plans they will undertake to outline the form of a state.'

The view of Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 7, on the origin of supreme sovereignty is not so irreligious but it can be tolerated if given an adroit interpretation. 'Men', he says, 'led not by an express command of God' (for of course none is to be found) 'but by their own volition' (yet not without the dictate of sane reason and the pleasure of God), 'having experienced the weakness of distinct families in warding off violence', (as their number increased) 'united into a civil society, whence arises civil power, which for that reason is called in 1 Peter, ii. 13, an "ordinance of man"' (as instituted directly by men). But what Grotius says elsewhere, to the effect that the state is called '“of God” because God approved a salutary institution of men,' I can by no means admit in the following sense, as if, namely, God approved the establishment of civil sovereignty, after it was done, and, as it were, in ex post facto fashion, as He deigns to sanction the condition of slaves, which is unquestionably an institution of man. Ephesians, vi. 5-8; Colossians, iii. 22; 1 Timothy, vi. 1; Titus, ii. 9. But it should by all means be added, that men were able antecedently to know the will of God, upon observing the condition of mankind as it multiplied; and that as their safety could not be secured by a separate life outside the bounds of states, so while following in this matter the guidance of reason, as it agrees with the purpose of natural law, men must be held to have fulfilled the will of God.

¹ [Commonly counted now as the fifth.—Tr.]

² [For lige read lege.—Tr.]

3. Although we feel that what has been said is sufficient both to impart a sanctity to the origin of civil sovereignty, and to secure the veneration of citizens for sovereigns, it may still prove to be worth while for us to consider what solid basis underlies the argument of J. F. Hornius, De Civitate, Bk. II, chap. i, who holds that we should take a loftier flight in these matters. He sets out with the statement that 'the cause of a state' (civitas) is not the 'cause of a commonwealth' (respublica) and of supreme sovereignty'; and so, although he admits that states are established by pacts, he asserts that supreme sovereignty is conferred immediately upon princes by God Himself, and that nothing proceeding from men has anything whatsoever to do with it. Therefore, when free peoples voluntarily select a king for themselves, they do not confer majesty upon him, but only designate the person upon whom it is conferred by God; just as in most cities the election of magistrates falls to a certain class of men, and yet they receive their power not from that class but from the sovereign power in the state.

Now although this assertion may entice many people by its show of piety, yet it quite obviously tears to shreds all the conventions and fundamental¹ laws which are agreed to between kings and subjects, touching the administration of sovereignty. And, first of all, he cannot be allowed to attribute majesty to kings alone, and withdraw it entirely from free republics. It is true that the usage of the last few centuries has restricted the word 'majesty' to a place among the titles of kings, and yet the supreme sovereignty in every form of state may receive the same designation. So also his definition of majesty, feeble though it be, as 'the supreme power everywhere over a state', applies as well to a senate or a popular assembly. Although there is some pre-eminence in kings, from the fact that the individual members of a senate or popular assembly are subject to the supreme sovereignty, while the person of a king recognizes no superior upon earth. Yet the actual force of sovereignty over subjects remains the same in every form of state.

Furthermore, he praises God as the sole cause of this majesty, who 'pours it forth directly upon kings after their election by the people'. I wonder, at this point, whether he has conceived majesty to be like a physical quality, a thing done quite obviously by those who designate civil sovereignty as 'a creation of God, so that no other creature in an equal or superior kind of causation, nor from any innate principle, has 686 made any contribution to the institution of this type of administration'. Such a statement only betrays a crass ignorance of moral matters. For an argument which sets forth how those who suddenly rise from an obscure position to the throne, are surrounded by an unwonted radiance and splendour, which could have had its source only in God, should be declaimed before those who cannot discern between empty verbiage and solid facts. That kings are the special care of God contributes nothing to the proof¹ of his thesis, while the divine providence has given no less evidence² of its care in the case of others as well, who were destined to be of signal service to mankind. Not a few kings have drunk poison from their jewelled cups, or fallen victims to the treachery of their own people. Upon the subject of the physical constitution of some kings, which was supposed habitually to produce effects not unlike miracles, the best course would be to consult physicians. Nor is there any proof, as he would have it, to be found in the punishment either of insolent kings, or of bold and rebellious subjects; or in the testimonies, collected in great numbers, which nevertheless recognize God as the author quite as much of aristocracies as of regal sovereignty; or in the divine prophecies about the accomplishments of certain kings, which are not wanting in the case of free peoples as well. And what was done in the instance of the Jewish peoples is no evidence at all for the origin of regal sovereignty in general, since there had been many kingdoms long before theirs was established. Nay rather, their experience touches more the manner of conferring the sovereignty upon one man or another in a particular people.

¹ [For fundamentales read fundamentales.—Tr.]

4. Let us weigh the arguments with which he endeavours to prove that all human causes are far too inferior to produce majesty, a quality most august. Among these the one that takes the prize is, that 'since neither individual men nor an unorganized multitude possess majesty, they cannot confer it upon a king'. And yet it can and often does happen that a moral quality, such as sovereignty, may be produced in another by the united action of those who individually do not possess it formally before that time, so that they are rightly regarded as the productive cause of that quality. See Digest, XLI. i. 46. In the same way the voices of many men, when modulated to each other, produce a harmony which did not before exist in the individuals. Therefore, I cannot give my approval to that reasoning of Socrates, whereby he endeavoured to encourage Alcibiades to pluck up courage to come before the public assembly: 'If you despise them individually, you should also despise them when they are gathered into a body.' Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. II, chap. i. Moreover, since sovereignty results from the non-resistance of subjects, and their willingness for the sovereign to dispose of their strength and property, it is easily seen that seeds, as it were, of supreme sovereignty, lie scattered in individuals, and that it germinates and grows by the pacts which bring sovereign and subjects together. So that it is extremely inept to deny that supreme sovereignty derives its origin from men for the reason that it is not observable in the natural faculties of an individual; as if one were dealing with some physical quality, or there were no moral qualities aside from physical!

¹ [For arobandum read probandum.—Tr.]

² [For specimica read specimina.—Tr.]

In fact I doubt if the wise Christian kings among this number are greatly taken with eulogies of this kind: 'God has transferred to a prince the right to rule man, which He always held alone by virtue of His creation,' yet in such a way that God still retains His first right, and thus has granted power to kings 'by imposition' and not 'by thorough-going abdication'; as well as with the other flatteries by which courtiers delight to exalt their princes to the dishonour of God. You might well believe that such men doubt whether God is still left any right over mankind after kings are established, and whether these kings should acknowledge their Maker as a superior! That supreme civil sovereignty is entirely different from the sovereignty of God, which He possesses by virtue of the act of creation, is perfectly clear, and so it is absurd and blasphemous to say that 'The sovereignty of God, which He alone holds by virtue of the act of creation, is communicated to men by His singular benevolence'.

87 In the next place, when he would prove further that God alone is the 'immediate' cause of majesty, he distinguishes between 'an efficient immediate cause, and an immediate method of establishing'. For he maintains that majesty is immediately established only by God, while most kings receive the sceptre mediately. Therefore, we should separate those formulas, 'God is the immediate cause of majesty', and 'God immediately constitutes a prince', or 'God immediately confers majesty'. For it may be accepted, if one says that God confers majesty by the intermediary vote of a people, by succession, or by seizure. To which effect Themistius, Orationes, xvi [vi, p. 73 c], says: 'Do not think that the soldiers were the cause of such an election as this. Rather, this decision came down from heaven; the public proclamation from above, and it was merely completed upon earth by the instrumentality of men.' But, continues Hornius, in the production itself of majesty God does not permit another secondary and proximate efficient cause.

Now if a man will consider this more deeply, he will see that such men as Hornius have conceived majesty to be a physical entity, which, upon being created by God, wanders about over the world with no home or resting-place until it lights upon a king, who has been selected by a people, and invests him with its august splendour. And such a man will surely be in difficult straits if he should be pressed as to whether that majesty, before it finds a seat in some king, is substance or accident, and if the latter, how it can exist without a subject. Furthermore, when was it created, at the beginning of the world, or later? Is there also but one majesty in the entire world, bits of which are distributed to individual kings? Do different kings have their own special and entire majesty? When a king dies does his majesty perish with him? Or does it survive him, separated like the soul from the body, or finding by a kind of metempsychosis a dwelling in a new king? Add the account in Petrus Suavis, History of the Council of Trent, Bk. II, p. 213, of the disputes over the nature of the character sacramentalis, where the fathers twist and turn in a remarkable manner, because of their ignorance of moral things. But it is idle to inquire about the immediate cause of majesty, or supreme sovereignty, abstractly considered, since it exists only in a concrete form. It is as if I should wish to inquire in a special way about the cause of human nature abstractly considered, once the cause of men concretely considered was definitely known. And since Hornius leaves power to the people, before any one person has yet acquired sovereignty, to decide what king they want and when, or to introduce any form of state they please (see *Deuteronomy*¹, xvii. 14), I should like to know what would become of majesty, if all peoples would decide upon an aristocratic or democratic form of government. We realize, of course, that election is properly and exactly but a form of securing sovereignty, and yet nothing appears to prevent a certain person from being selected, and sovereignty, now first coming into being, from being conferred upon him by one and the same act. For surely it is childish to hold that in moral things, when some right or moral quality is said to be conferred upon another, it must first have existed somewhere in separate form. Nay rather, it is clear to all that rights and other moral qualities come about by pacts from a mutual agreement of wills. Compare Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 4; and above, Bk. III, chap. v, §§ 2-4.

Nor is it difficult to remove his other scruple: 'If a people is the secondary cause of majesty, it will have to have received of God the power which produces sovereignty. But that fact cannot be proved.' And yet since God has implanted in men a care for themselves, and has enjoined upon them the preservation of peace and seemly order, endow- 688 ing them at the same time with reason, so that they can discern the means which make for that end, among which the establishment of civil sovereignty holds first place, who will question further whether God has granted men the faculty to establish it? The philosophic axioms which the same writer interposes here and there are in part of trifling value, in part crudely transferred from natural things to moral, which we have no time at present to discuss one by one.—The account in Ovid, Fasti, Bk. V, of the origin of majesty is a poetical fiction.

5. The author goes to no less trouble to confute the views of those who have derived supreme sovereignty from a different source, where much that he has to say is correct enough, although some points deserve censure. He is correct in his opinion that wars, as engendered by the ambition or lust of tyrants, have in no way given rise to supreme sovereignty. For the very phrase 'wars engendered by tyrants', presupposes the existence of states. And yet the wide spreading of violence on the part of many men, and their craving to oppress others, could have been the occasion for the fathers of families, scattered about as they were, to join together to found states. It is clear enough that most, if not all, large empires are indebted to war for their additional territories. Although this should not lead us to assign the beginning of supreme sovereignty to wars. For at least that first band, which, at the beginning, agreed to an attack upon others, voluntarily consented to the command of a leader, while no lawful sovereignty arose over those who were attacked, until by a pact they had promised the victor obedience and had pledged faith.

¹ [For Deuterno. read Deuteron.—Tr.]

6. Yet it is not entirely impossible for this sovereignty to have arisen from that of the father of a family who ruled over several small settlements. Of course the paternal sovereignty primarily concerns the rearing of children, and that of the master the securing of property, nor are they changed by any increase in the number of children or of slaves. And yet the gulf between the sovereignty of the head of a family and that of a state is not so great that no transition from the former to the latter is discernible, save through the creation by God of a new majesty. For if a father of a family, endowed with a large household of children and slaves, should, by some form of emancipation or manumission, allow both classes to hold property in their own name, and to establish their own families, upon the condition that for their common security they should thenceforward submit themselves to his government, I do not see what he would need further¹ for the dignity of a prince, provided he have so much strength as is needed to attain the end of a state. And if at his death he had made some disposition as to his successor, and surely if his sons gave their consent, that disposition would have to be followed. If he had not, they would all decide, as at an interregnum², what form of government or head they wanted for the future. Nor would there be any violence offered to the law of nature, if the free vote of all should call a younger son to the place of his father. See Genesis, xxvii. 29, 37.

7. The same author attempts to show further, that not even he can be called a cause of majesty, who, although having it himself, confers the royal dignity upon some subject of his, setting him free³ for the future from every bond of subjection to himself; for instance, if a king should release a vassal from his feudal dues, and allow him as a full lord to rule over what he formerly held as a fief; or if he grant a citizen of his a province, which is at the same time freed from all future dependency. For a cession of this kind is merely a manner of securing sovereignty, and can be classed as a form of election.

¹ [For de futurum read defuturum.—Tr.]

³ [For remissio read remisso.—Tr.]

² [For integerrimum read interregnum.—Tr.]

But the source of sovereignty in such a case will be clear enough to one who looks into it more closely. The king, by his right of freeing a vassal and subject from his duty toward him, makes one man capable of exercising supreme sovereignty, and creates others over whom it can be exercised. For that fief cannot henceforth be under the vassal as an absolute and independent prince, unless it has been freed from subjection to the lord. Because of this fact the supreme sovereignty does actually arise from the consent of the people. For if that lord can by his own authority confer this province on whomsoever he please, he received that power at the first with the consent of the people, whether freely given, or elicited by the violence of a just war. But if the lord cannot do that by his own authority, then such a transfer will require the express consent of the people. 689

8. Finally, this writer concludes with the contention that not even when a people had formerly lived under a democracy, and then chosen a monarch, is this act the cause of the majesty of a king. For sovereignty is not conferred upon a monarch until the people has surrendered its own right; and yet at the moment when a people renounces its right, it has no longer that sovereignty; therefore, it only chooses one, who, receiving his power from God, reigns for the future. But by the same argument one could deny that dominion passes from one man to another. For another person cannot become the owner of some possession of mine, unless I have renounced my dominion over it. But when that is done I myself hold no dominion, and consequently cannot transfer it to another; I but choose a person upon whom dominion must be conferred, such dominion arising anew, whence I know not.

He passes the following judgement on the voluntary abdication of monarchs: 'When territorial sovereignties are abdicated, and sworn faith returned to peoples, majesty itself returns to its first author, to be returned again and bestowed upon the designated heir.' This is clearly metempsychosis of majesty, about which no man in his senses will expect us to waste any words. Nay, whoever abdicates sovereignty gives an opportunity to his successor, whereby a people can confer sovereignty upon him by submitting themselves anew, or whereby he may actually lay hands upon the sovereignty, a right to which had been given him by a decree of the people sanctioning the order of succession.

9. It may not be inappropriate, in this connexion, to inquire briefly whose right it is to confer upon a person the royal title and insignia, or whatever be the name whereby the highest and independent power belonging to one man over a state is expressed. Here it is clear that to confer a name and title lies with the same persons as can confer the thing itself, that is, the supreme sovereignty. And so a people which either first comes together to form a state, or, leaving a previous form of state, desires thereafter to be under a king, by the act of conferring upon one person sovereignty over itself also gives him the right to bear the name and title of king, and to represent his exalted position by fitting insignia. And just as such a king owes his sovereignty and majesty to no one outside his realm, so he need not obtain the consent and approval of other kings or states, before he may carry himself like a king and be regarded as such. But, in the same way, as it would entail an injury for the sovereignty of such a king to be called in question by a foreigner, so it would also be an injury to deny him the royal title. Nor does the fact that such a ruler may hold sway in a state which is content with modest bounds, militate against this view, for a kingdom signifies not a specific quantity of land and power, but a certain form of state, which can be great or small.

But if a man who, at the time, recognized the sovereignty of another as his superior, is to be able to become a king, he must secure the consent of that superior who will free both him and his dominions from the bond by which they were tied to him. Hence also he who is under a feudal tie may not comport himself as a king without the consent of his lord. And unless he is loosed from that bond, he will have 690 but a weakened royal dignity, even though he secured his lord's consent to the name. Thus the successors of Alexander the Great did not dare to assume the royal title, until his family, to which the sovereignty rightfully belonged, was extinct. And even then that act required the consent of the subject people, who were not allowed by the military forces at the disposal of the generals to deny it. See Cornelius Nepos, Eumenes [xiii]; Plutarch, Demetrius [p. 896 D]; Justin, Bk. XV, chap. ii; Appian, Syrian Wars [lii]; Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XX, chap. liv-lv. Thus, just as the man who subdues a territory by arms, can by right of war take over the sovereignty, so can he assume the name of king. Justin, Bk. XLI, chaps. iv-v.

Now a king can convert one of his provinces into a kingdom, if he separates it entirely from the rest of the nation, and governs it with its own administration, and one that is independent from the other. It is a commonplace of history that the Roman senate used to bestow as an honour the title of king and friend, which could rightfully be done in the case of those to whom it had itself given the kingdom, or over whose kingdoms it had obtained some superior right. But to confer that title upon other independent princes was an insolent claim of unjust authority. And yet the pope has not blushed to claim that very authority even over free and independent European states. See Petrus Suavis, History of the Council of Trent, Bk. V, p. 354, where he recounts the basis upon which Paul IV raised Ireland to the status of a kingdom; and De Thou, History of His Own Time, Bk. XLVI, on the title of Grand Duke conferred upon Cosimo de Medici.

CHAPTER IV

ON THE PARTS OF SUPREME SOVEREIGNTY AND THEIR NATURAL CONNEXION

-
- | | |
|---|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The sense in which supreme sovereignty may be said to have parts.2. The legislative power.3. The power to inflict penalties.4. The judicial power.5. The power of war and peace, and of concluding treaties.6. The right of setting up magistrates.7. The right to levy taxes.8. The examination of opinions. | <ol style="list-style-type: none">9. Sovereignty is a stronger obligation than a pact.10. Who may properly be said to have a part of sovereignty?11. The connexion of the parts of supreme sovereignty is set forth,12. And illustrated.13. Although many would separate those parts;14. Grotius also among the rest, and his opinion is examined. |
|---|---|
-

ALTHOUGH supreme civil sovereignty is in itself a single and undivided thing, yet because it functions in different acts, according as it is concerned with the different means necessary to the preservation of a state, it is commonly understood to have several parts, on the analogy of what are called potential parts. For supreme sovereignty as a whole is not such a thing as is made up of heterogeneous parts, which may coalesce into one thing by being joined to each other, and held by a certain bond, yet so that the individual parts may also subsist separately. But just as the soul is one thing, pouring out life and vigour into the whole body, and is conceived of as having potential parts, according as it produces diverse operations in proportion to the diversity of its objects and organs, after the same image supreme sovereignty also, as it is concerned with prescribing general rules of conduct, is called the legislative power; in so far as it settles the controversies of citizens 691 by those rules, it is the judicial power; when it arms citizens against foreign foes, or orders them to keep the peace, it is the right of war and peace; in so far as it takes to itself ministers for the business of the state, it is called the right to set up magistrates; and similarly in its further functions.

2. What these parts of supreme sovereignty are, can be most clearly seen from the nature and end of states. A state is a moral body which is understood to have one will. But since it is made up of many physical persons, each of whom has his own will and inclination, and since these wills cannot be physically compounded into one, or combined into a perpetual harmony, it follows that the one will in a state is produced in the following fashion: All the persons in the state submit their will to that of one man, or of a council, in whom the supreme sovereignty has been vested. And since the individual citizens must comport themselves in accordance with the will of the state, that will must be set before them by clear signs. Therefore, it is understood to be the task of the supreme sovereignty to make clear and to prescribe what should be done or avoided. And since it would be impossible to issue special commands for each act of each citizen in so great a multitude of men, general rules are prescribed whereby what must be done, or what must be avoided, is made known to all men and for all time.

Furthermore, since the greatest diversity of judgements and desires is to be observed among men, because of which an infinite number of disputes can arise, the interests of peace also require that it be publicly defined what each man should consider his own, and what another's, what should be held lawful, and what unlawful, in the state, what honourable, and what dishonourable. So also what a man still retains of his natural liberty, or, in other words, how every one should temper the use of his right to the tranquillity of the state. And, finally, what every citizen can by his right require of another and in what manner.¹

3. Moreover, the chief end of states is that men should by mutual understanding and assistance be insured against losses and injuries which can be and commonly are brought upon them by other men, and that by these means they may enjoy peace or have sufficient protection against enemies. Now the first requirement for peace is that every man be so protected from the violence of others, that he can live in security, which means, that he have no just cause to fear others so long as he has not provoked them by injuries. Of course the state of human affairs does not make it possible for men to be guaranteed freedom from injuries, so that, in other words, they can never experience such in any way. Yet they can see to it that there be no probable cause for fear, and this security is the end for which men subject themselves to others. And if this be not greater, as a result of union with others, than if one is protected only by his own strength, it would be folly to turn one's back upon natural liberty, in which every man chooses his own means of defence.

Now it is not sufficient for this security, if each of those who would gather together into a state, should agree in word or writing with all the rest, not to kill them, rob them, or do anything from which they would suffer harm. For the proneness to evil of the minds of most men is manifest, and it is only too well known from experience, what little strength there is, in the mere respect for one's own word and in the dictates of sane reason, to hold most men to their duty, when you have removed the fear of punishment. For this reason it is not enough to have one who will prescribe laws of conduct, if he holds no further power. Here you may apply the rule of Columella, On Farming, Bk. I, chap. iii: 'The field should be weaker than the farmer, for, if he has to struggle with it, and the farm prevail, the owner is crushed.' Therefore, in order that men may observe both the common precepts of natural law, and the regulations of each state for its good, there is need of fear of punishment and the power to inflict it. That the punishment may meet this end, it should be made so severe that it obviously involves a greater hardship to have broken the laws than to have observed them, and that in this way the severity of the punishment surpasses the satisfaction or gain which is secured or anticipated from an injury. For of two evils men cannot avoid choosing what appears to be the lesser. And thus the heads of other men protect my own. And although sometimes rashness, or an extraordinarily violent emotion, may lead some men to prefer the perpetration of a crime to refraining from wrongdoing, yet that may be considered one of those unusual things which it is beyond the condition of man to avoid. 692

¹ [This last sentence was added by Barbeyrac from the author's De Officio Hominis et Civis, 2, 7, 2, in order to fill out the thought of this paragraph, which is obviously incomplete, and was so recognized by Pufendorf himself in the above-mentioned later work.—Tr.]

Now this faculty to inflict punishments on those who transgress the commands of the ruler, is understood to have been given by the act of individuals in submitting to the state the use of their strength. By which also they obligated themselves at the command of the ruler to coerce wrongdoers, or at least to refuse to defend those who are to be punished. For it is idle for a person to obligate himself to face punishment without shrinking, because of man's natural aversion to whatever destroys our life. In general Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vi, § 6, is correct in denying that any greater power belongs to man over man, than that by which one person can prescribe to others whatever¹ he thinks is to the advantage of the state, and can by punishments compel the recalcitrant to observe it. But to his statement, that 'whoever rightfully inflicts punishments at his judgement, can rightfully force all men to all that he himself wishes', some limitation should be added on the basis of the end of states. This is, that he who holds supreme sovereignty is not understood to be able to will anything but what sane reason can discover to be appropriate for that end.

4. Moreover, since even when the most explicit laws are put into writing, time and again a dispute can arise over their proper application to particular cases, and since there are many things to be considered, if it be said that some offence was committed against them, it follows that the judicial power is understood to come to the assistance of both the powers just mentioned. Its function is to take cognizance of and to decide between disputes of citizens, to examine individual cases which are accused of being unlawful, and to pronounce a sentence appropriate to the laws. Hobbes (chap. vi, § 8), however, appears to entertain an improper idea of the judicial power, since the faculty of passing judgements about the use and exercise of any part of sovereignty is understood to be in each part.

¹ [For quae cumque read quaecumque.—Tr.]

5. Now although by this means the security of citizens is preserved against fellow citizens, still that is not enough to obtain the end of states. Because it is idle for men to foster peace among themselves, when they cannot protect themselves against foreign foes, which those certainly cannot do whose strength is not united. For it is due to union that many are stronger than one, since otherwise even a thousand, if separated, are no stronger than one. And so, for the security and safety of all mankind, there must exist in a state a power whose function it is to assemble, unite, and arm as many citizens, or hire in their place as many mercenaries, as seem required for the common defence against the unknown numbers and strength of enemies, and also, when it seems advantageous, to conclude peace with enemies. And since leagues are serviceable in periods both of peace and of war, in order that both the resources of different states may be better combined, and a stronger foe be either repelled by united opposition, or reduced to order, it shall lie within the province of supreme sovereignty to enter leagues which are serviceable in both periods, and to require all subjects to observe them, and at the same time to secure from them some advantages for the state.

693 6. And since a state's business, which goes on in time both of war and of peace, cannot be carried on and executed by a single man without the aid of subordinate ministers and magistrates, a state will also need such power as may constitute men to look into the disputes of citizens (see Exodus, xviii. 15; Philo Judaeus, On the Creation of the World, beginning; Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. III, chap. iii), to search out the policies of neighbouring nations, to train soldiers, collect and dispense the resources of the state, and, finally, in every way to look out for its advantage. And this power can also compel officials already constituted to fulfil their functions, and demand of them an accounting for their administration. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 6, p. 218.

7. Furthermore, since neither in time of peace nor in time of war can the business of a state be carried on without expense, the state requires a power which may reserve for such uses a certain part of the wealth, or the produce of the country held by a people, or may require individual citizens to contribute as much of their wealth as is judged necessary to meet the expenses; and in the same way it may command and exact whatever services are required of citizens. Here belongs also the power to superintend other lawful means whereby the wealth of a state is increased, among which the most important is the right to levy taxes on all imports and exports, as well as to appropriate some moderate part of the cost of goods consumed at home.

8. Finally, although it be beyond the power of man to take away the intrinsic liberty of the will, and at the same time by some intrinsic means to compose men's judgements about things into a lasting harmony, every precaution should be taken that such judgements, however much they vary, should not disturb the tranquillity of the state. For since all voluntary actions take their beginning from and depend upon the will, while the will for action, whether positive or negative, depends upon the opinion of that good or evil, of that reward or punishment, which every man thinks will be his lot because of something he does or avoids, and so the actions of all men depend upon their own individual opinions, there will surely be need of external means to make those opinions and judgements, so far as possible, agree, or to prevent at least their differences from disturbing the state. Therefore, it is desirable that a state openly profess, as it were, such beliefs as agree with the end and use of states, and that the minds of the citizens be filled with them from childhood on, inasmuch as most mortals are accustomed to think about matters as they have been trained, and as they see the men about them are persuaded. Only a very few are gifted enough to sift out by their own wits what solid facts underlie human affairs. In fact there is practically no dogma concerned either with religion or science, which cannot give rise to dissensions, discords, recriminations, and ultimately wars. And this does not happen because of the falsity of the dogma, or because to admit its opposite would bring such calamities upon mankind or upon states, but because of the nature of men, who seem wise in their own eyes, would appear so to all others, and are most highly incensed at all who disagree with them. Any one will appreciate this who has done no more than observe the quarrels of scholars over some trifling matter, quarrels of as great heat as if they were battling for their altars and firesides. Now although quarrels of this kind cannot be checked at their outset, the supreme sovereignty can still prevent them from disturbing the peace of the state, by enacting penalties for the offenders. Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [pp. 934 E-935 A]:

No one shall speak evil of another; and when a man disputes with another he shall teach and learn of the disputant and the company, but he must¹ abstain from evil speaking; for out of the imprecations which men utter against one another, and the feminine habit of casting aspersions on one another, and using foul names, beginning in words light as air, they proceed to deeds, and the greatest enmities and hatreds spring up. (J.)

However, our concern is not properly about these dogmas, but rather about those which, thrusting themselves forward under the guise of religion, or in some other way, overturn the law of nature, and the principles of sound politics, and so are of a nature to infect the state with mortal diseases. Nor is there any danger for any true doctrine from the enactment of such penalties, for no true doctrine disturbs the peace, and whatever does disturb the peace is not true, unless it be that even peace and concord are opposed to natural laws. Therefore, surely the examination of such beliefs, and the power to drive¹ them out of the state, can rightfully be assigned to the supreme civil sovereignty.

¹ [For prusus read prorsus.—Tr.]

According to Diogenes Laertius, in his life of Theophrastus [38], Sophocles the son of Amphiclides had a law passed, 'That no one of the philosophers should preside over a school unless the council and the people had passed a resolution to sanction their doing so; if they did, death was to be the penalty.' (Y.) Plato, Laws, Bk. VII [p. 801 c d]:

A poet shall compose nothing contrary to the ideas of the lawful, or just, or beautiful, or good, which are allowed in the state; nor shall he be permitted to show his compositions to any private individuals, until he shall have shown them to the appointed judges, the guardians of the laws, and they are satisfied with them. (J.)

Here belongs what is set forth in the preface of Casaubon, Exercitationes contra [in] Baronium, and in his letter to Fronto Ducaeus, no. 624 ed. Graevius. Nor is the observation of Hobbes, De Homine, chap. xiii, § 8, beside the point:

There are writings of Roman citizens in the period of the democracy or soon thereafter, as well as of Greeks in that of the Athenian republic, filled both with precepts and examples designed to infect the minds of the common sort with hatred for their kings, and this for no other reason than because they see in such writings praise of the wicked deeds of perfidious men, such as murderers of kings, provided they call them tyrants, before they do away with them. But the mind of the masses is to this day more corrupted by reading books and listening to the orations of those who desire a kingdom within a kingdom, one, namely, of the church within that of the civil state. For from this source there arise in place of a Cassius and a Brutus, men like Ravalliac and Clement, who in serving the ambition of others by assassinating their own sovereigns, thought they were serving God.

Add the same writer's preface in his De Cive, and his Leviathan, chap. xxi, where the evils are recited which have arisen from the theory of Aristotle on liberty; likewise chaps. xxix, xlvi, xlvii. Compare De Cive, chap. vi.

9. Our next task is to show that these parts of supreme sovereignty are naturally so united and bounded up with one another, that, if we should imagine some of them to be independently within the control of one man, and some within the control of others, the regular form of a state would be entirely destroyed. To understand this more thoroughly, we should observe that there are two chief bonds by which the wills of several men or groups are intertwined, so that they think together as one, namely, pact and sovereignty, of which the latter binds far more closely than the former. Those who are held together only by a pact, are bound by the law of nature, that they will willingly perform what has been agreed upon, while in all else their mutual equality remains unimpaired. And so long as each party keeps to its agreement, there can be concord and unity among them to a sufficient degree. But when one of them with evil design goes back upon the pact, he is guilty of breaking natural law, true enough, but for the other parties to the pact, who were interested in its observance, there is left nothing by which they may reduce the violator to order save war, in which the guilty party is often as strong as the injured. Thus between such as are joined by treaty on equal terms, there is concord so long as each one willingly performs what he promised, but when one of them acts with perfidy, the bond ceases to exist, and cause is given for war. It appears from this that mere pacts are not strong enough bonds to hold many men together in one body for any length of time, especially since it is not always the fewer and weaker that break from a pact to the hurt of the more numerous and stronger, but often the majority to the hurt of a few. And even should we assume that to the principal pact there has been added a clause to the effect, that all the rest shall fall with their united strength upon a violator of the pact, yet, aside from the fact that this will be useless when a number have together left it, unless the men thus allied set 695 up a democratic sovereignty, that is, unless those who were allied before, unite into one state, there will be need of another pact on the question, how that person is to be coerced who refuses to stand by this additional pact, and so on ad infinitum.

¹ [For pro scribendi read proscribendi.—Tr.]

But sovereignty is a far stronger bond to bind several persons into one body. For whoever are controlled by the same sovereignty are no longer the equals of him in whom is vested the sovereignty, for in that power is conferred on one man or council to set some evil, and inflict it by way of penalty upon those who have failed to meet their requirements, a far greater necessity of obedience lies upon all than if they were bound together simply by a pact, which had not done away with the equality among associates, and then had to decide on their own affairs according to their own judgement.

10. It should also be observed that, if any undertake to maintain that the potential parts of sovereignty, as they call them, in one and the same state are entirely vested in several distinct persons and councils, they also admit it to be necessary for him to whom belongs some part of the sovereignty, to be endued with power both to require citizens to observe the decisions and ordinances of that part, and to defend that right of his; and, finally, to be able to ordain, by his own judgement and right, when and how that part of the sovereignty should be exercised. For it is anything else but sovereignty to have only the right to indicate to others what you want done by them, and still to be lacking in power also to compel them, when recalcitrant, to observe what was laid down. And it is but a precarious hold which we have on a thing, when we cannot defend it against another, while he who exercises a right at another's dictation, is only his minister and executor.

11. With this much settled, it will easily appear, so close is the union between all the parts of supreme sovereignty, that one cannot be torn from another without destroying the regular form of a state, and creating an irregular body which will be held together by nothing but an insecure pact. For if we allot one person legislative power and another punitive, to each independently of the other, the former power will necessarily be empty and hollow, or the latter will but minister to it, inasmuch as to enact laws which you cannot enforce is arrant folly. And it partakes of the character of a mere minister and executor to have strength with which you may compel others, but which can be exerted actually only upon another's decision. But if, on the other hand, you should give the latter final judgement regarding the application of his powers, you would by that act reduce the legislative power to nothing. Therefore, each power must necessarily depend upon one and the same will.

It is also clear that the right of war and peace, as well as that of raising money, cannot be separated from this judicial right. For no one can rightfully force citizens to take up arms, or to assume the costs of war and peace, but him who can rightfully punish those who refuse. Furthermore, it would be absurd to assign the right to strike treaties which concern peace and war, to any other one than him who holds the right to decide upon peace and war. For otherwise this latter will be a mere minister, or else the former, in encompassing the means that serve the execution of his right, will have to consult and will depend upon the decision of another. Thus, if you would turn some business over to a man, and yet not give him at the same time the power to appoint his assistants, without whom the business cannot be carried out, and to require an accounting of them, you have made him in fact no more than their equal. Therefore, the power to appoint magistrates cannot be separated from the other parts of supreme sovereignty.

696 Finally, in the same power will be vested the examination of beliefs, especially of such as in any way concern the end of states, and exert some influence upon the consciences of men, by quickening or obstructing their obedience to the supreme sovereignty. For if a man commands citizens to do something upon penalty of natural death, and another persuades them that by such a deed they will incur the penalty of eternal death, and each of them does this by his own right, which belongs to him apart from others and independently, it follows that not only can citizens, although innocent, be rightfully punished, but that the commonwealth will be dissolved into an irregular status with two heads. For a man cannot serve two masters, and yet he whom we feel we must follow, in fear of eternal damnation, is no less our master than he whom we obey in fear of temporal death. And if the right to regulate beliefs is lost, superstitious citizens will be moved to rebellion by spectres of their own making. Compare Hobbes, loc. cit.; Leviathan, chap. xxix; J. F. Hornius, Bk. III, chap. i, § 3. What other power over matters of religion belongs to the supreme civil sovereignty in Christian states, we leave to others to determine in greater detail. Add especially Grotius, De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, chap. i. Nor have we time at this point to discuss the passage in Philo Judaeus, De Praemiis et Poenis [ix], who, after pointing out that the same man Moses was king, lawgiver, prophet, and priest (adds): Now since all these things belong to one class, they ought to be held together and united by mutual bonds, and to be perceived in the same man, since he who is deficient in any one of the four is imperfect in his authority, as he is consequently invested with but crippled authority over the common interests. (Y.)

12. These points will come out more clearly if we examine the different kinds that there are of such a division of prerogatives. Let there lie, therefore, with the prince the power of war and peace, with the senate the right to pass laws and execute justice, with the assembly of the people the right to levy taxes. Now if the king calls the citizens to arms, and they refuse obedience, either the king will have the right of himself to force them by punishments, or else he will have to hand them over to the senate for judgement. If we admit the first alternative, it is not clear how he who does not have the execution of the laws will exact punishment of citizens who are not as yet under military law. If you say that in this case alone the king possesses the right to lay penalties upon the disobedient, you thereby give a king the right to proceed against every citizen at his pleasure, and so you reduce the right of all others to nothing. For when he has ordered them to take up arms, he will punish them unless they obey, and when he has led them into the field, military law will give him the right of life and death over them. And nothing is easier for a commander than to make away with a soldier whom he hates. See Livy, Bk. II, chaps. xxiii, xxxii, lviii; Bk. III, chaps. x, xx, xxiv; Bk. IV, chaps. i, v, lviii; Bk. V, chaps. ii, x, and passim; Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIV, chap. lxxiii; Curtius, Bk. VII, chap. ii; Polybius, Bk. I, chap. ix.

But if the king finds it necessary to bring the objectors before the senate, it will either condemn them, and exact punishment simply upon the order of the king—which is contrary to our supposition, since it is a sovereign body—or else it will take under consideration the crime with which they are charged. This examination is useless, unless that body can inquire as to whether or not the war now undertaken by the king is in the interest of the state. But in that case the king's right is reduced to nothing.

If, with the powers outlined as above, we compare the right of the king with that of the people, we shall observe the same inconveniences. For the words of Tacitus, Histories, Bk. IV, chap. xxxiv [IV. lxxiv], on the manner in which wars are waged between most nations, hold just as good to-day as they ever did: '⟨To maintain the tranquillity of nations⟩ arms are necessary: soldiers must be kept in pay; and without a tribute supplies cannot be raised.' (O.) Therefore, if the king has no power by virtue of his sovereignty to require his citizens to pay taxes, his right to wage war will resolve itself into nothing more than the mere faculty to persuade them, that, at the moment, it is to the advantage of the state to take up arms. But if the people on its side is not empowered 697 to investigate as to whether or not the war for which they must contribute taxes is advantageous or not, then what else is theirs but the laborious drudgery of levying and collecting taxes, both of which duties are opposed to our original hypothesis? Nor will things move any better, if we distribute the parts of supreme sovereignty in some other way. Add Bodin, Republic, Bk. II, chap. i, p. 287, with, however, the valuable comments upon him by Arnisaeus, De Republica, Bk. II, chap. vi, sect. 1, § 56. On this point we may well bring to bear the remark of Asinius Gallus in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. I, chap. xii: 'The State has but one body, and must be governed by the mind of a single' (R.) man or council.

These matters can be illustrated by the example of the soul of man, the function of which is much the same as that of supreme sovereignty in a state. For if we imagine the potential parts of a rational soul, the understanding and the will, to exist separately in different subjects, of which the one would be endowed only with intellect, and the other only with will, such a subject could not be called a man, nor could the actions of a man be expected of it, the one always dull as if immovable, the other accomplishing nothing as though blind. On which point there is bearing in the epigram of the Anthology, Bk. I [IX. 11]: 'One man, crippled, and another blind supply for each other that of which fortune has deprived them. For the blind man takes the burden of the lame upon his shoulders, and at his direction makes his way.' (P.) These two could in some way supply the defects of nature, so long as each was willing to help the other. But had they disagreed and broken their agreement, neither of them could have held further to the right path.

Therefore, if any man should want entirely to separate the parts of sovereignty, he will under no circumstances establish a regular state, but an irregular body, the members of which, in possessing separate parts of the sovereignty, are held together not by a common sovereignty but only by an agreement. It will be possible, after a fashion, to preserve concord in such a group, so long as the opinions of the members of the state agree after a friendly manner on the public good, and every citizen is ready of his own accord to do his part towards meeting this end. But when dissension has arisen, nothing is left but to turn to arbitrators, or to decide the issue by war.

13. Although these matters are evident enough, yet there are not a few who still defend a division of the parts of supreme sovereignty, so that they may thereby conjure up I know not what mixture of states, which, upon being properly adjusted and applied, are fit to produce the most auspicious state, if the gods so will. It is idle for them to call upon the authority of Aristotle, who in his Politics, Bk. IV, chaps. viii and ix, discourses upon a mixed state, something very different from that which is concerned in a division of the parts of supreme sovereignty. And stranger even than this is the fact that some of his interpreters on that passage, and among them Michael Piccart, have from that mixed form scrambled up such others as very likely never even occurred to Aristotle. The same commentator maintains that the mixture quite the most desirable and most to be coveted is: 'If the king should have the right to conduct war, coin money, negotiate treaties, levy taxes, and distribute rewards; the senate should exercise those rights which require wisdom, for example, pass and execute laws, and administer public justice; the people, finally, should handle those things of which it has intimate personal knowledge,¹ namely, control the accounts in the public treasury, supervise the assignment of lands, elect magistracies, oversee buildings, highways, aqueducts, food production, and other resources of the Commonwealth.' Thus it does not imply any division of supreme sovereignty, if, for example, the senate be empowered to condemn, and the prince or assembly to pardon, for in this case the prince can by his right pardon all on whom the other party has pronounced sentence, while the latter acts the part of only a petty judge, and its sentences will receive confirmation from the former. Hence it is clear enough, that if, in any state, capital sentence lies within the power of the senate, and with the king the right, as they call it, of granting grace, in actual fact the senate holds only from the king the power to 698 take cognizance of crimes and to pronounce sentences in accordance with the laws—and this in order to keep justice clear both from favour and from hatred, and to divert unpopularity from the king—but that the right of life and death lies originally and fundamentally with the king.

Some find a division in the judicial power itself, in case the king have the right of life and death only over foreigners, and the assembly over citizens. But if such power of sentencing citizens lie with the assembly, as though with petty judges, nothing is withdrawn from the power of the king; while if the assembly hold it independently and without restriction, the king will wear an empty title, and exercise but the function of a judge over aliens. What is added on a division in the right of issuing money is too inept to warrant our repeating it.

¹ [Reading rationem domi didicit, for rationem didicit, as Barbeyrac quotes the passage.—Tr.]

Arnisaeus, Relectiones Politicae, Bk. I, chap. vi, § 1, devotes great pains to this subject, and besides giving many other accurate observations, is correct in rejecting some spurious forms of a mixed state. But at the end of his work (§ 57) he could¹ conjure up no better example than to assign to the king the right of war and peace, of levying taxes, of coining money, and of distributing rewards, while he orders the senate to concern itself with judgements and appeals, assigning to it also the reform of morals through legislation, and the right of life and death; to the assembly he assigns the care of the treasury and the appointment of magistrates. Judgement can be passed on this example in the light of what has already been said.

14. Grotius, also, Bk. I, chap. iii, §§ 9 and 17, makes his own contribution upon the division of the parts of supreme sovereignty. He is right enough when he denies that a division of supreme sovereignty can be made between the king and the people, on the basis of a simple agreement, that if the king governs well, the people shall obey him, but if ill, it will be possible for the people to bring him to order. His position is, that such bounds should rather be assigned to the power of each as can easily be recognized by distinctions of times, persons, or duties; but that an act's mere goodness and badness, consisting in the application of a means suitable for the public safety, over which there is often good ground for argument, are not of such a nature as to distinguish parts of sovereignty. That it would surely engender the greatest confusion, for in any inquiry about the same matter, on the score that the action of the king concerning it had been beneficial or otherwise, the king would pull one way, the people another.

Another position also is well taken, to the effect that, if a king makes his people promises under oath, even such as concern the administration of his sovereignty, the supreme sovereignty is not thereupon divided.

But in all the rest he falls into the common error. So one way in which he thinks the division of the parts of sovereignty can be effected, is, 'if a partition is expressly established'. He offers by way of example, that, in the time of the emperor Probus, the senate approved the laws of the rulers, took cognizance of appeals, appointed proconsuls, and gave the consuls assistants. As if it were not known how the Caesars, who wished to hold themselves in the background, exercised their sovereignty under the guise of the old republic, leaving the senate the conduct of a few affairs and such as were of little concern in the government, but carefully keeping in their own hands the real power of sovereignty, which lay first of all in the control of military affairs.

His second manner of dividing sovereignty he expresses in this way: 'If a people while still free shall lay a reservation upon the future king by way of a permanent command.' But it is not clear what sort of a thing a permanent command is, at the time when a person no longer has the power to command. For every command presupposes a coercive force, to be exerted when it has been violated. Therefore, a people in establishing a king will either retain, or not retain, that power over him. If they do, the king will hold an empty title, the people the power of sovereignty; if they do not, the command will be vain. He should, therefore, have said that a people, while still free, can bind a king to observe certain rules in his administration of the state. But that this will not lead to a division of sovereignty we shall show below. 699

¹ [For potuit read potuit.—Tr.]

Finally, he thinks that sovereignty is divided, 'if in its transfer an additional stipulation is made, from which it is understood that the king can be constrained or punished'. Yet the sovereignty is not divided, for the people has it entirely in its own hands; if a people has the right to compel and punish a king, no matter what the cause, there is put into his hands by that exalted title only the function of an eminent magistrate, since a punishment proceeds from a superior as such. Now coercion may be of two kinds, moral and physical, that is, by reason of sovereignty or of violence of war. But there is no sovereignty over an equal as such. Therefore, when Grotius maintains¹ that a people is at least the equal of its king, because it can in a particular case coerce the king, he must at the same time admit that neither has sovereignty over the other, which is repugnant to the nature of a state. But coercion by violence of war can take place only between equals, that is, two parties neither of whom has sovereignty over the other. And it is in the sense of such coercion that we must understand the illustration given by Grotius, that a creditor has naturally a right to coerce his debtor. Surely a creditor cannot naturally coerce a debtor by reason of sovereignty residing in him, for otherwise every one who wished to become the debtor of another would first have to submit to his sovereignty. Yet the only way a debtor can be coerced by his creditor to pay his debt is either by calling in the aid of a judge—and there is no such person between a king and a people—or by appeal to the violence of war, if they live in natural liberty. And yet if we should allow a people this last method of coercion, we would have to admit that a king, as well as a people, lives in natural liberty, that is, that the state is dissolved.

In conclusion, we agree with Grotius, that there is nothing in civil institutions which is entirely free from disadvantage, and therefore one should not infer at once that, because of the inconveniences certain to arise from divided sovereignty, the question is to be decided not by what appears best to one man or another, but by the will of him from whom the right arises. But it will have to be granted us in our turn that, if such a division may strike the fancy of a people, it is not establishing a regular state, but an ill-adjusted and sickly body.

¹ [For insert read infert.—Tr.]

CHAPTER V

ON THE FORMS OF STATES

- | | |
|---|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Accidents of states do not establish a new species. 2. There are also irregular forms and systems of states. 3. There are three forms of a regular state. 4. Democracy appears to be the oldest form of state. 5. There is supreme sovereignty no less in democracy than in monarchy. 6. How a democracy is established. 7. The ordinary requisites of democracy. 8. How an aristocracy is established. 9. How also a monarchy. 10. In states there are faults of men and of status. 11. Yet these do not establish a peculiar species of state; | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 13. On the mixed state of more recent writers. 14. Wherein consists the nature of irregular states. 15. Irregularity is best observed in examples. 16. Empires which have provinces are not by that fact alone systems. 17. On systems which arise because of a common king. 18. On systems which have been formed by a treaty. 19. How the affairs of state are managed for all in such bodies. 20. Whether in such bodies a majority obligates a minority. 21. How such systems are dissolved. 22. On a comparison of the forms of government. |
|---|---|
- 700 12. No more than do various accidents of democracies and aristocracies.

Just as supreme sovereignty is found in every state as in a common subject, so, in so far as it resides either in one man or in one council composed of a few, or in all the citizens, it gives rise to different forms of states. And on this subject we feel, first of all, that we will be suffered to use the word form to express that nature or arrangement of states, which results from the diversity of the subject in which the supreme sovereignty is fully vested. That there is often a great departure from this in the actual administration of a state is a well-known fact; thus, for instance, in a democracy some things are administered as in a monarchy, some as in a polyarchy, when the performance of certain tasks is turned over by the people to one man, or to a few men. And because it is a matter of great concern, whether a man exercises his own power, or what is really another's, and held by him but for a time, from which he may be thrust at any moment by the rightful holder, a person speaks most ἀκρίτως [improperly] when he declares: 'It is in reality a polyarchy when a king allows himself to be led about by the nose at the bidding of a few men who abuse his long suffering, or a monarchy when a popular assembly suffers the same of a demagogue, or even when in a supreme senate one man by his prudence, eloquence, or influence, controls the rest'; and in the first case there remains but the empty name and outward form of a monarchy, in the second of a democracy, in the third of a polyarchy. Just as no man of intelligence would believe that the form of state had been changed by a change in the persons or number of ministers, any more than that an interregnum takes place when a minister who had been empowered with the administration of affairs under a prince is suddenly unseated by the latter's successor. The capacity and inclination of one or more men, who exercise sovereignty by their own right, or as it is delegated to them, do indeed affect and modify the administration, but in no way the form of a state. Thus even though sovereignty may be administered in some places excellently, in others corruptly, no new form of state is, without more ado, produced as a result of the different exercise of the same power. And so just as a healthy man does not by that fact alone differ in species from an invalid, nor do misshapen limbs create a new species of mankind, so the faults of governors or governed, or the corruption of laws do in no wise constitute a different form of commonwealth.

2. It should also be observed that most writers who have discussed political science have concerned themselves with explaining the regular forms of commonwealths, while many have apparently not even thought of irregular forms, and only a few have touched upon them in a perfunctory manner. Hence it was that if there ever was found a civil body which did not square with one of those three forms which are commonly called simple, scarcely any other name was left for it than that of a mixed state. And yet, not to mention the fact that such a designation is imperfectly applicable to some commonwealths, it is naïve indeed to hold that, besides those three regular forms, there are no other irregular ones. For even were it true that the laws of architecture require some certain type of buildings, not all men have constructed their dwellings 701 by those laws. We hold that the regularity of states lies in this: that each and every one of them appears to be directed by a single soul, as it were, or, in other words, that the supreme sovereignty, without division and opposition, is exercised by one will in all the parts of a state, and in all its undertakings. From this it is not difficult to gather what an irregular state is. Furthermore, there are also systems made up of several perfect states, which, in the eyes of those who are not versed in these matters, assume the false form of one state; and these also must have their place in our explanation of the forms of commonwealths.

3. There are but three forms of a regular state, based upon the subject proper of the supreme sovereignty, according as that subject is one simple person, or one council, composed of a few, or of all the citizens. For supreme sovereignty is committed either to one man or to one council composed of a number of men. This council, again, is composed either of all the citizens, or of a smaller but select part. Therefore, the first species is when the supreme sovereignty is vested in a council which is made up of all the citizens, and in which every citizen has the right to vote; and this is called a democracy. The second, when the supreme sovereignty is vested in a council made up of select citizens, is called an aristocracy. The third, when the supreme sovereignty is vested in one man, is called a monarchy or kingdom. In the first that which holds the reins of government is called the people, in the second the nobles, in the third the monarch. Pindar, Pythian Odes, ii [87-8]: '[. . .] Whether at the tyrant's court, or where the boisterous host, or where the wise, have care of the State.' (S.)

4. We shall, first of all, examine a democracy; not, indeed, because we hold that it surpasses the other two forms in dignity, outward splendour, or convenience (Philo Judaeus, On the Creation of the World, censures polytheists as 'men who do not blush to transfer that worst of evil constitutions, ochlocracy, from earth to heaven' (Y.)), but because that was certainly the oldest form among most nations, and reason likewise shows it to be more likely that when a number of men, endowed with natural liberty and equality, decided to unite into one body, they first wished to administer their common affairs by a common council, and so to establish a democracy. Nor is it to be presumed that a free father of a family, who voluntarily gathered together with others like him into a state, after having observed the disadvantages of a separate life, could in a moment, as it were, so forget his former status, in which he used to dispose at his own pleasure all matters touching his safety, as to be willing to submit himself all at once to the judgement of one man on common affairs, with which also his own safety was involved. Nay rather, it must have been held at the beginning to be the fairest procedure, that what concerned all should be the care of all, until the majority had relinquished that status, either voluntarily, or by compulsion, at the hands of some citizens or foes. What Plato has to say on the Athenian state in his Menexenus [pp. 238 E-239 A] makes for this conclusion:

The basis of this our government (where the sovereignty resides in the people, but the magistracies are conferred upon the best) is equality of birth; for other states are made up of all sorts of unequal conditions of men, and therefore their governments are unequal; there are tyrannies and there are oligarchies, in which the one party are slaves, and the other masters. But we and our citizens are brethren, the children all of one mother, and we do not claim to be one another's masters or servants; but the natural equality of birth compels us to seek for legal equality, and to recognize no superiority except in the reputation of virtue and wisdom. (J.)

702 Now it appears that, at the first, most states were formed by those who were of the same blood. Isocrates, Panegyric [iv. 105]:

It seemed unjust to us (the Athenians) for the many to be ruled by a few; that those who in property, indeed, were poor, but in other respects were not inferior, should be excluded from offices and honours; and that, although it was a common fatherland, some should bear rule, while others should be treated like foreigners, and men who were citizens by birth should be excluded by law from public activities.

Add Libanius, Progymnasmata, Loci Communes, Contra Tyrannum [iv].

Nor is this denied by ancient history, which, while speaking often of kings, shows that the majority of them enjoyed more the authority of persuasion than the power of command. So also Justin, at the opening of his first book, describes the kingdom, called by Aristotle that of the heroes, which can by no means be considered inconsistent with democracy. Thucydides, Bk. I [xiii], says of the oldest kingdoms: 'Before that there had been hereditary kingships based on fixed prerogatives.' (S.)

And so, in general, nations lived under a popular regimen and in liberty, until little by little that enormous mass of petty states was reduced, usually by force and warfare, into a few large ones.

The antiquity of the kingship is, indeed, upheld by Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. i [I. ii]: 'And this is the reason why <Hellenic> states were originally governed by kings; as the barbarians still are: because they were under royal rule before they came together. For every family is under regal authority.' (J.*) These last words are illustrated in the answer returned by Lycurgus to one who advised him to introduce a democracy into the state: 'Go thou and first establish democracy in thy household.' (P.) Plutarch, Lycurgus [xix]. But the argument of Aristotle is not conclusive. Rather is it more likely¹ that, because those ancient fathers of a family were already accustomed to sovereignty, they inclined more to democracy, in order that they too would have the opportunity to express themselves upon matters.

Nor is the question settled by those who argue that a paternal kind of sovereignty was the most ancient among men, which, although mild at its outset, developed into the right of life and death, as families and vices increased; that this sovereignty in families was continued in the first-born, to whom belonged, as though by natural right, the oversight of religion and of civil administration. In this way, they continue, the heads of families gradually developed into petty kings, proof of which contention is to be found in the fact that of old such a multitude of kings was found in Canaan. See Joshua, xii; Judges, i. 7. But, as a matter of fact, the force of primogeniture was not so strong that it conferred also regal sovereignty over brothers without their consent, and required them to have their families joined with that of their elder brothers. And those oldest men who passed under the name of kings were usually but the principal and eminent magistrates in democratic groups, although that honour was very often accorded to the head of the race, especially when the group was composed of families of the same blood; yet not in such a way that the right of primogeniture and, as it were, of majority was always observed.

5. At this place we must bring up again for examination the opinion of Johannes Friderich Hornius, De Civitate, Bk. III, chap. i, where he expresses himself in the following fashion on aristocracies and democracies, which he embraces under the name of free states: 'There is a form of state which avoids the confusion of a promiscuous multitude, and attains some settled order, looking by pacts and conventions to the common safety of all, without subjection and the loss of that liberty which a monarchy destroys.' Here there is almost a mistake for each word: That the order observed in free states is all that avoids the confusion of a promiscuous multitude; that free states are held together by pacts and conventions without sovereignty; that the individual 703 citizens are less strictly subjected to a council of the people or of nobles than to a king in a monarchy; that all the parts of supreme sovereignty are exercised less in the former kinds than in the latter; that a people exercises less right of life and death over individuals than does a king.

¹ [For verosimile read verisimile.—Tr.]

There is as little truth in the next statement, namely, that 'certain fathers of a family, while yet scattered about, learned from neighbouring kingdoms the form of a state'. The truth is rather that, in the first union of nations, most of the groups were popular in form; and that, upon observing the inconveniences of this regimen, part of them, of their own accord, some sooner and some later, chose the sovereignty of a single individual, while others became subject to it under compulsion.

His next statement is also futile. 'Just as art attempts to copy nature, but never equals or improves upon it, so in these artificial forms of states there is represented after a fashion the genius of kingdoms, as it turns to the securing of the common benefit; but the true force of sovereignty which surrounds monarchy, being as it is a creation of Almighty God, could not have been produced by men.' We have already discussed the origin of majesty; and why it may not belong as much to a moral compound person as to one man. And surely there is no contradiction in all the nobles being equal, and yet each one of them being under the supreme sovereignty of their entire body. Moreover, even a man of little wit can comprehend the difference between all the people and individuals, between a council of the people, and the members as they scatter to their homes.

His next argument also comes to nothing: 'When sovereignty is assigned to all, then it belongs either to all, or to some. If to all they will have no one subject to them, because sovereignty and obedience cannot reside in the same person. If the individuals are made subject, then all cannot command, for the reason that a multitude must also be subject when made up of individuals that are so, inasmuch as the individuals can contribute to the whole nothing but obedience.' Yet in compound moral bodies something can be attributed to the body which cannot be attributed to all the members, that is, to them taken individually, or to any one of the individuals; and, therefore, the whole is an actual moral person distinct from the individual members, to which a special will, as well as actions and rights, can be attributed, which do not fall to the individuals.

Those scruples also vanish which are raised about the point that, in popular assemblies, the will of the majority prevails. For it is a moral affection of all large bodies that the consent of the larger part of those who gather in the council should be taken as the will of all, for in no other way can the will of several physical persons unite morally into one will, in case the wills of all¹ the members do not precisely agree. Therefore, the subject of the supreme power in democracies and in aristocracies is by no means obscure or vague, although those individuals whose votes at one time contributed to the majority, may, under other circumstances, be among those who muster the smaller number. For all these considerations do by no means destroy the unity of will which may be attributed to the entire body. If it happen, for instance, that in a senate not enough members agree as are required for a majority, the senate is understood to will nothing, and so nothing new is to be undertaken. And although this may often work some hardship on the state, it does not follow that the senate does not hold the supreme sovereignty.

Furthermore, the following statement is false: 'True sovereignty cannot be attributed to a multitude, since a multitude is not obligated to observe for ever what once pleased them, and the multitude of all members of a state is not obligated.' But just as the sovereignty of a king is not destroyed by the fact that the king may change his will and rescind his former decree, whereby the obligation of the citizens to that decree perishes, so although an entire body can change its own decrees, they are still as much bound by them as by the decree of a king. If this is not so, let it be shown that lawbreakers are not punished as much in free states as in kingdoms. Add Livy, Bk. II, chap. iii. So it is idle to say that, 'If majesty resides without division in several, each of them will necessarily have some portion of it, which portions when all gathered together then make up majesty. And yet each portion will have to be supreme. Therefore, in one state there will be more supreme sovereignties than one, which is absurd.' Yet in moral matters it is not absurd for those particular wills, from the agreement of which there results a will of them all, to lack some faculty which lies in the latter. Therefore, it is a faulty argument to say that majesty is supreme right, and therefore each man holds some part of it, which is itself also supreme, any more than is such a statement as this logical: 'The votes of individual persons considered by themselves and distinctly are without force to make a law; therefore, if a number of their votes combine, they cannot avail to make a law.'

Finally, he adds: 'Since there is no one in a senate of nobles who cannot be brought to punishment by his colleagues, if he offends against the state; therefore, should all the nobles offend against the state, their punishment would have to be taken from their hands by the citizens. And yet were every one of them removed from office and punished, there would be no place for the sovereignty of them all to reside.' A reply to this is easy if what constitutes an offence against the state is properly explained. It is committed in its proper sense by one who perpetrates something which tends to the state's hurt against the commands and laws of him in whom is vested sovereignty. Therefore, the entire number of nobles cannot sin against the commonwealth, unless they either violate the laws, the observance of which is a condition of their having sovereignty conferred upon them, or else adopt a hostile attitude toward all the citizens, in which case they will stand on an equal footing with kings who so offend against their people.

¹ [For singulorum read singulorum.—Tr.]

All else which he devises to the prejudice of free commonwealths is manifestly¹ false. 'There is the greatest difference between the sovereignty exercised by monarchs and that to be seen in free states, although their effects may be similar. Inasmuch as monarchs', beside their personal dignity and splendour, which is such as no one in a free state possesses, 'are attended with a majesty which free states lack.' But it is our opinion that God cannot be claimed with greater right to be the author of monarchies than of free states, and that the former are no less produced by pacts than the latter, from which pacts there at once results sovereignty, the immediate cause in both forms of government of the obedience of citizens; that a citizen as such lies under the same obligations in a republic as in a kingdom; that he who lives in a free state is no less strictly obedient and subject than he who lives in a kingdom; and that in both punishment is exacted by equal right. For who would believe without question that 'in a kingdom punishment is exacted by the right over a citizen's life, which is not the case in free states, where offenders against the laws of the state are punished as enemies'?

6. We must now inquire into the constitution of a democracy, and at the same time into the special features that distinguish it from other species of states. Now when a multitude of free men gather into one place to enter into a pact regarding their coming together into one state, such a group already has somewhat the form of a democracy, properly by reason of the fact that each person is at liberty to suggest what in his eyes is for the benefit of their common interests. Yet no member will be bound, against his dissent, by a vote of the majority, to what they may decide, before a democratic form of government shall have been sanctioned by a second pact. Since Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vii, § 5, does not distinguish these two pacts, he handles this matter in a somewhat confused fashion. For we have shown above that a man is not at all bound by the votes of the majority, before he has given his agreement to such a form of administering the common interests. Therefore, the following statement of his is false: 'By reason of the fact that they have voluntarily convened, they are understood to be obligated to that which will be decreed by the agreement of the majority.'

¹ [For manifestissima read manifestissimae.—Tr.]

705

What he goes on to say in the same passage may be more clearly explained in this way. When many men have met together, binding themselves by mutual pacts to combine their strength and resources, either they reach some decision in that gathering about the form of state to be introduced, or they do not. When they have neither reached a decision about the form of the state, nor set a time or place for a second meeting, the assembly is understood to be void, and every man remains as before in his natural liberty. For several men cannot unite into one body unless they have agreed upon a settled manner in which to administer their common interests. But when they stand adjourned with that point still undefined, yet with a time and place set for their further deliberations and decision, only the first rudiments of a state exist, which no one will as yet be able to call a democracy. For it is not yet a democracy when every man has a right to advance his opinion, or when the time and place are appointed for another meeting, inasmuch as this is the settled procedure in the establishments of all societies and associations. But such a gathering finally becomes a democracy when the right to decide upon matters touching the common welfare has been conferred for all time upon a council made up of all the citizens, that is, an assembly.

7. Now the following appear to be the prime necessities of a democracy: First, that a certain place and time be set for the meetings, where they must deliberate and decide upon the affairs of state. For men's private business does not allow them to attend for ever upon that assembly, and, unless there is an agreement upon the place and time, the members of the same body can either meet at different places and times, whereby factions arise, or else not meet at all. And in that case it will not be a people (δημος), but a scattered multitude, to which can be attributed neither the action nor the right belonging to one person. Here belongs the statement of Thucydides, Bk. II [xxii], that when Pericles observed that the Athenians were in an ugly mood about the conduct of the war, he never called an assembly of the people, or meeting of the council, lest they should fall into error by deliberating in anger rather than with reason.

Second, the votes of a majority must pass for those of all, unless the unusual should happen, and a great multitude of men should agree on the same matter.

Lastly, since some business of a state is concerned with daily occurrences and minor matters, and some with more unusual undertakings, and such as have a bearing on the prime concern of the state; and since it is not convenient for a whole people to be in constant session in council to attend to the former concerns, or at such frequent intervals that none of those matters can escape their attention, it is therefore necessary for certain magistrates to be established, as delegates, to carry on the daily business with the authority of the entire people, to examine more fully into matters of importance, to lay before the assembly any affair of serious consequence, and at the same time to execute the decrees of the people, since any large gathering of men is almost entirely unsuited to that duty.

8. An aristocracy is established when a group, which has united by the first of the two pacts into some rudimentary form of a state, comes to the decision to commit the direction of affairs to a council composed of a select number. After these members have been through that gathering designated by their names, or by their position, or some other sign whereby they can be distinguished from the rest, and have also accepted that designation, upon every one submitting himself to their will, they are understood to accept the supreme sovereignty. And in this connexion we must observe that Hobbes, ibid., chap. vii, § 8, is 706 incorrect in seeking the origin of aristocracy in democracy, if his meaning is that all aristocracies were establishments from and changes of perfected democracies. For experience proves, and reason does not deny, that from that first pact, and without the intervening step of a democracy, men were able to pass to aristocracy or monarchy. And we have shown before that Hobbes but toys with his words when he denies that a pact passes between citizens and a senate, because, upon the transfer of sovereignty to the latter, a people, as one person, no longer exists. For in order that a man may be under obligation to another, it is enough if the latter still exists as a physical person, although the moral person which he carried beforehand may have expired. Consider also, that, although a people upon giving up sovereignty does not, indeed, thereafter exist as a perfect person, in comparison with their newly chosen head, it still does not for that reason become a loose multitude, because assuredly in combination with the senate as its head it now constitutes a person.

But the inference which the same writer draws, in the following section (9), is likewise false: That, as in a democracy the people, so in an aristocracy the body of nobles, is free from every obligation. For even should we admit the former contention, for the reason that perhaps that respect between a body and its members may not seem sufficient to warrant a mutual obligation between them, it does not follow therefrom that no mutual obligation exists between a senate and the citizens. Just as there is no logic in the following argument: I am under no obligation while I am myself carrying on my own business; therefore, if

I transfer the supervision of it to another, he also will be under no obligation.

But he is right when he observes, in the next section (10), that an aristocracy has this in common with a democracy, namely, that unless an appointment be made of times and places at which the nobles may gather, there is no longer a council or a single person, but a loose multitude without supreme sovereignty. For since without a meeting of the individuals from the agreement of whose wills the will of the council is understood to result, their will cannot be determined, inasmuch as it is a very great inconvenience to circularize the senators in order to ascertain their votes. In the next place, it is as necessary in an aristocracy as it is in a democracy, that the times of meeting be not too far apart, unless the exercise of the supreme sovereignty, at least in matters of daily concern, be transferred to one or to a few magistrates.

9. Finally, a monarchy is established when the supreme sovereignty is conferred on one man. That this is done by means of an intervening pact has already been sufficiently demonstrated, despite what Hobbes says.

In this connexion we should take note of the pestilent belief of an anonymous Dutch author¹ in his Bilanx Politica, which runs as follows: Since every transfer of supreme sovereignty is made for the more convenient avoidance of evils from within and without, it cannot be presumed that a democratic group ever bestowed it upon one man and his descendants for all time. For since a hope of more satisfactory protection would better be based on virtues which were observable in the person selected, and every one knows how changeable and mortal men are, and that in a short time, due to old age, they will either be unfit for rule, or else will have no heir, or one who is not of age; or, if adult offspring survive, it will have no outstanding natural aptitude for sovereignty above that of others, or will show no desire to afford the group adequate protection; therefore, it can in no way be presumed that it was ever the intention of a popular group to take from itself the power to choose a better ruler in place of an incompetent or base one. But that when they had once secured the sovereignty, and had drawn around themselves a great part of the people, and especially soldiers, they were so able to secure themselves and their posterity in their power that they were able to retain the sovereignty, even against the 707 will of their subjects.

To this we reply that, if it occurred to any group to confer sovereignty upon a person, on the condition that whenever the people decided that he was not so successful in procuring the common protection as their democratic government had been he could be removed from his office, there was established not a monarch but an eminent magistrate, who depends upon the fickle breath of the people, and therefore such a ruler had never received the supreme sovereignty. Furthermore, since it is well known how injurious to a state are frequent changes of princes, and that in general there is a change more of men than of manners, and what a serious blow commonwealths receive in casting out those who have found opportunity to strengthen their own resources while administering those of the state, it can easily be presumed that a people decided to settle their fate once and for all by establishing a permanent house, since those ills which are likely to rise from such a wavering and uncertain status are more certainly to be feared than any that a degenerate king can cause. Especially since his unreasonable inclinations may be held in check by fundamental laws. Finally, not all the acts which do not turn out precisely in accordance with our expectations may be revoked, since in human undertakings there is always a large element of chance, and there is nothing which does not have some seamy side. Add Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 9.

¹ [As yet unidentified.—Tr.]

A monarchy differs from the two species already presented, in that the latter require appointed times and places for deliberation and decision, that is, for the exercise of sovereignty, while in an absolute monarchy deliberation and decision are possible at every time and place. (Herodian, Bk. I, chap. vi: 'Rome is wherever the Emperor is.') For a people and nobles, the two having no single physical body, need to assemble. But a monarch, who is also one physical person, is ever endowed with a power sufficient to¹ exercise acts of sovereignty. Hobbes also correctly observes that, if a decree has been passed in an assembly of the people, or a council of nobles, contrary to natural law, it does not constitute a sin for that state, that is, for that moral person, but only for those citizens by whose votes the decree is passed. For sin attends the natural and expressed will, not a moral or political one, which is only artificial. Were this not so they also would sin who voted against the decree. See Luke, xxiii. 51. But if in a monarchy the ruler has issued some decree opposed to natural laws, he himself sins because in his person a civil will coincides with a natural one.

10. To these regular forms of a state most authors have commonly added some termed 'vicious' or 'corrupt'. Now on this point it is certain that there is as rich a field of corruptions and vices in many commonwealths as in individuals, so that to be afflicted with the very fewest may be considered as almost equivalent to perfection. Moreover, of the corruptions with which states are afflicted, we see some come from the depravity of men, and some from the evil institutions of the state itself. Therefore, some may be called the vices of men, some the vices of status. We shall touch upon a few for the sake of illustration.

In a kingdom it is a vice of men, if he whom chance of birth or the unfortunate votes of citizens has called to the throne, is lacking in the arts of ruling, shows little or no care for the commonwealth, and prostitutes it to the ruinous ambition or avarice of depraved public officials; if his savagery or wrath is a source of terror; and if he fails to bear in mind that he is a man and is put over men; if he delights needlessly to expose the state to disaster; if he wastes what is paid in for the necessary expenses of the state, upon his luxury, or in ill-advised bounties (Drepanius, Panegyricus [xxvii. 1]: 'The last defence of wicked princes is to plunder some for donations to others'); if he hoards to no purpose what he has extorted from his citizens; if he is arrogant and unjust (that is worth remembering which Philostratus, On the Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. III, chap. ix, records of the ancient Indians: 'Heirs to the throne are shown no honour,' adding as the reason [III. xxx]: 'It is seemly that by being despised themselves they should be taught not to despise others'); and if he is guilty of any of the other practices by which a prince comes into disrepute. Claudian, War with Gildo [157 ff., 163 ff.], cites some of the particular vices of princes:

¹ [For ab read ad.—Tr.]

Whatsoever his bottomless greed has stolen, a yet more insatiable profligacy squanders. He is the terror of the living, the heir of the dead, the violator of the unwed, and the foul corruptor of the marriage-bed. He is never quiet; when greed is sated lust is rampant; day is a misery to the rich, night to the married. (P.)

Here also belongs the passage of Themistius, Orations, x [p. 131a]: 'He is a mutilated king and law-giver, who is skilled in war but unable to keep the peace.'

The following are the vices of men in an aristocracy: If through scheming and low practices dishonest or ignorant men, to the exclusion of their betters, find their way into the senate; if the nobles are torn by factions; if they treat the citizenry like slaves, and study to turn the wealth of the state to the increase of their own fortunes.

The vice of men is seen in a democracy when unfit persons are always noisily and persistently maintaining their own opinions; if unusual virtues and such as would not be too dangerous for a state are held down by envy; if laws are lightly made and unmade with an easy temper, and those which have been passed one moment are later repealed without reason; if low and unfit men are put in charge of public affairs. In Plutarch, Dion [xlvi], a 'hunt for mob-favour' is called 'a raging dis-temper, no less than tyranny'. (P.*)

Again, a vice of men, which may be found in any species of state, is when those upon whose shoulders falls the administration of sovereignty are negligent or corrupt in performing their duties, and when the citizens whose sole glory is but obedience, chafe at restraint. Add also Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxix, towards the end, where he speaks to good purpose about some affections of states.

One may speak of vices of status in general, when the laws and institutions of a state are not tempered to the character of the people, or to the region in which it is situated; when they lead the citizens to internal disorders and make them incur the just hatred of their neighbours; when they make the same unfit to undertake the duties necessary for the preservation of the state, if, for instance, because of the laws of the state they cannot avoid sinking into effeminate weakness, or being rendered unfit to endure a life of peace; [or if the fundamental laws are so drawn up that the business of the state must necessarily be impeded or rendered difficult];¹ or, finally, when they interfere with the principal tenets of true political theory, in which case they will be all the more dangerous when they assume some religious guise. Of such a nature was the authority of the priests of Meroë to whose will even the life of the kings was subject. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. III, chap. vi; Strabo, Bk. XVII [ii. 3, p. 823].

11. Now although there is the greatest difference between a healthy and a sickly state, yet the kinds of states should not be multiplied on that account, or one or two vicious ones be opposed like true species to each right form, for such vices change neither the nature of power itself nor its proper subject. And to this extent Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vii, § 2, is correct in denying that 'anarchy, oligarchy, and tyranny, as opposed to democracy, aristocracy, and monarchy respectively, are three other species of states'; and in Leviathan, Bk. II, chap. xix [chap. ii, § 19], he says, 'I imagine that no one believes that a vicious government constitutes a new and special form of commonwealth.'² But his further statement, in the same connexion, is true only in some cases and not universally: 'Anarchy, oligarchy, and tyranny are three distinct names, invented by such as did not like a government or its heads. For men commonly signify by names not only things, but also their own affections, such as love, hatred, and anger'; and, we might add, how 709 high they rate such things! Just as in other matters it is common enough for one man to love what another absolutely abhors, so the same form of state pleases one person and offends another. And this not merely because some find a greater advantage in one form of state than another, but because of every man's own distinct inclination. And so the statement of Lysias, Orations, xxiv [3], cannot be sealed with universal approval: 'It is not by any instinct of nature that a man loves democracy or oligarchy³; but whatever form of government best comports with his own interests, this any man tries to establish'; with which Isocrates, On Peace [133], agrees: 'Neither of them is by nature the friend of either oligarchy or democracy, but each party is desirous of introducing that form of government which offers them the best chance of advancement.' (F.) Proud men and such as hate equality in a state, upon seeing all the citizens of a democracy casting their votes with equal right on the affairs of the commonwealth, since the plebs are always more numerous in every state, give it the designation of an ochlocracy, as if to call it a condition where the vile rabble controls affairs, and where no prerogative is left to men of parts, such as they think themselves to be. And yet that name, which denotes contempt, may not improperly be given to such a state as was that of the Ephesians, who when banishing Hermodorus said: 'Let there be among our number no man of outstanding worth. If there be one such let him go elsewhere and dwell amongst others,' and who, said Heraclitus, were all worthy of death on that score. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, V; Diogenes Laertius, Bk. IX [2], Heraclitus [2]; Strabo, Bk. XIV [p. 441].

¹ [This clause was added by Barbeyrac from the author's De Officio Hominis et Civis, II. viii. 10, in order to fill out the argument, which is manifestly incomplete.—Tr.]

² [Hobbes's own words are: 'And yet I think no man believes that want of government is any new kind of government.' In most other cases our author paraphrases the Leviathan.—Tr.]

³ [For pourorum read paucorum.—Tr.]

Again, whenever a man feels hurt at being shut out of the senate, since he feels that he is in no wise inferior to many senators, he calls them, in contempt and envy, ὀλίγοι [the few], as if to say that some few, who are in no respect superior to any one else, exercise sovereignty over their equals or betters. And so such a man commonly voices the complaint of Ajax in Quintus Calaber [Smyrnaeus], Bk. V [478 f.]:

[. . .] The brave no more Hath his due guerdon, but the baser sort
Are honoured most and loved [. . .] (W.)

So also prouder and more sensitive nations call the kings of peoples who are accustomed to a more strict obedience lords and masters, although it is the same power when a father treats a stubborn child with more and a tractable one with less severity.

The same attitude should be taken on the use of the word 'tyrant', which is ever attended with lasting hatred in the usage of the Greeks, who held almost universally that a state's greatest happiness lay in the freedom of a democracy. Hence we find the statement in Lucian, Phalaris, I [vii]: 'Peoples in general, without trying to find out what sort of man the head of the state is, whether just or unjust, simply hate the very name of tyranny.' (H.) Nay, many Greeks consistently designated the rule of a single man by the word τυραννίς [tyranny]. Thus Aeschines, Against Ctesiphon [6]: 'There are [. . .] three forms of government in the world; tyranny, oligarchy, and democracy.' (A.) Add Cornelius Nepos, Miltiades, chap. viii. So also Memnon,¹ chap. v, in Photius, when speaking of the tyrants of Heraclea, says of the fourth in order, Dionysius: 'After he had arrived at a high position of glory, he felt that the title of tyrant was unworthy and assumed in its place that of king'; as though the latter term connoted less hatred and a greater dignity¹. And yet there is scarcely a person who does not recognize that at times such invidious terms are used not improperly to distinguish the government of base princes and nobles from that of worthy ones, the rule of a turbulent and fickle rabble from that of a dignified citizenry. Nor are such conclusions much at variance with Aristotle, who calls tyranny, oligarchy, and democracy (for he regularly designated the sane commonwealth of the people a πολιτεία [polity]) παρεκβάσεις, or 710 deviations and degenerate forms of a kingship, a status of nobles, or one of the people, respectively. See Politics, Bk. III, chaps. vii, viii. Yet who would hold that a mere παρεκβάσις [deviation] is sufficient to establish a distinct species of state? Although, since the word εἶδος [form] may allow a rather loose interpretation, we feel that a man should not stickle too vigorously on that point. Add also Sallustius the philosopher, De Diis et Mundo, chap. xi, and the remarks of Themistius, Orationes, xvi, p. 336 ed. Petavii, to the same effect.

¹ [For Mnemon read Memnon.—Tr.]

12. But when some form of commonwealth is found which cannot be referred to regular and sound forms, and whose difference from such cannot be explained as any mere disease or παρεκβάσις [deviation], students must needs give it a closer study. Most of them feel that the easiest way to resolve the difficulty is to call such states mixed, as if they were compounded of simple forms that have turned in upon themselves and modified their elements. And since many undertake to construct these mixed forms after the manner of Aristotle, I feel it will be worth while for us to examine his own ideas on the matter.

Now, in the first place what is set forth by Aristotle in his Politics, Bk. IV, chaps. iii ff., on the different species of democracy and aristocracy, has nothing to do with the ideas of recent writers on mixed² forms. For in this passage he only enumerates certain accidents or qualities to be found in those who are to be admitted to a council of the people or of the nobles, by which there is no variation of any kind in the sovereignty, its parts are not torn asunder, nor is the state divided into two or more bodies; but aristocracies and democracies vary only by some accidents. Thus, although it is called a democracy, when the control of affairs is vested in a council of all the citizens, and the well-being of the state is of as much interest to children and women as to others, yet who will say that a new form of state is established when women, sons of a family, and slaves, are excluded from the public deliberations? And yet we feel that it is sufficient for the establishment of a democracy if those who at the first joined to form that state, and the successors to their position and rights, possess the right of suffrage. And yet it is manifest that states were at first established by fathers of a family, who held under their domestic sovereignty their wives, children, and servants, and who did not think it fit to acknowledge such as equals, or to relinquish all power over them. Therefore, they had to be excluded from the right of suffrage by the fathers of a family.

¹ [For cignationis read dignationis.—Tr.]

² [For mixturam read mixturam.—Tr.]

When a democracy was once established, it lay, of course, within the power of the citizens to receive others into their state with full or limited rights, or not to, and to make such their equals in the conduct of the commonwealth, or to exclude them from it. Hence it may happen that not a few in free states lack the right of suffrage, although the form of the state remains democratic. Yet it is also possible that, if a state which was originally democratic afterwards excludes new-comers from the suffrage and from honours, and acquires large increases, it finally takes on the form of an aristocracy. In the same way we will not allow that there are different species of aristocracies, if in one place virtue is the only requirement for a senator, while in another he must have in addition a certain wealth and rank. Just as there will not be several species of democracies if a man in order to enjoy the right of suffrage must in one place be free born, in another have a certain amount of property, in still another follow some specified calling.

Much less do different species, properly¹ so called, of states emerge from a divergence of the laws about the election of officials, as they vary in different democracies; if, for instance, in one state the way to office lies open to all citizens, in another only to those of a certain degree of wealth. Just as it does not lead to any mixed form of a state or a new species if, for instance, the rich and not the poor may absent themselves from the public assemblies, or vice versa.

But, in fact, these matters are all plain enough. What must be our judgement on the mixture in the states of the Spartans and Cretans, as described by Aristotle, will be unfolded in another connexion. The commonwealth of Athens which is described and approved by him in his Politics, Bk. II, chap. x, and by Isocrates in his Areopagiticus, was in every respect truly democratic. We will set forth in another connexion the views of Polybius, Bk. VI, on the mixture in the Roman republic. 711

13. A number of the more recent writers imagine many kinds of mixed states, and yet in such a way that they in general reject the most of them as unsuitable, but commend especially two kinds. One kind is when the parts of supreme sovereignty are dividedly and independently in the hands of different persons and bodies of the same commonwealth, in such a way that each of them holds that part which they possess in their own right and administer it according to their own judgement, but in respect to the other parts of sovereignty are like subjects. This is much the manner in which, we are told by Appian, Bellum Libycum [Punic Wars, xvi. 106 f.], the affairs of the kingdom of Numidia were arranged by Scipio after the death of Masinissa, whereby the three legitimate sons bore the title of king, but the eldest of them, Micipsa, held Cirta, the capital, the second, Gulussa, controlled questions of war and peace, while Manastabal presided over justice. The second is when the supreme sovereignty is without division in the hands of more than one, yet so that neither a large majority can pass any final action or exercise parts of sovereignty against a small minority, nor even all against one. And this may be of two kinds, when either all are equal, or one or another possesses some extraordinary rights, which he can exercise without the approval of the rest. Many ancient authorities are cited, in whose works frequent mention is to be found of mixed states. But on these we have already observed that most of what they say about such states has no connexion at all with the division of supreme sovereignty among different persons or with councils, but that it concerns either the proper fixing of the qualifications of the persons of whom the sovereign council is composed, or the best combination of the institutions of different commonwealths.

¹ [For proprie read proprie.—Tr.]

Furthermore, it would be my feeling that some examples of such mixtures may be easily explained by drawing a distinction between actual sovereignty and the manner of administration. So that those commonwealths may be said to have some mixture from others, when it appears that their manner of administration was sought from another form; if, for example, in a state where the sovereignty is in the hands of the people, most of the affairs of the state should be carried on by a principal officer or a senate; or if in an aristocracy one magistrate should enjoy unusual authority, or the people should be consulted on many matters, or if in a monarchy difficult matters should be referred to a senate, or to the people. But if this explanation does not square with some cases cited by ancient writers, what follows will clear the matter up.

We have shown before that the essentials of a perfect and regular state require that in it there be such a union as makes everything which works to its administration appear to come, as it were, from one soul. It is, therefore, perfectly clear that by the first mixed form of state there is constituted a body which is held together not by the bond of a single sovereignty but only by a pact, and that it must, therefore, be classed not among regular states but among irregular commonwealths, being weak and extremely open to internal disorders. Regarding the second mixed form of state I feel that we should consider whether those in whom is indivisibly vested the supreme sovereignty constitute a permanent senate, which is to govern the entire state as a single and permanent body. In this case it will be an aristocracy, but one very ill-adapted to transact business, in that one or but a few, by interposing their votes in opposition, can render void the will of all the rest. But if, on the other hand, there belong to those individual members, who enjoy in other respects entire equality, and to them alone entire parts of the commonwealth, yet no one of them can exercise the functions of supreme sovereignty without the unanimous concurrence of all the rest, it will be a system, in the proper sense of the word, yet such as will likewise be highly unsuited to transact business, because of its great and undue inflexibility. But when one man signally outranks 712 all others in authority and in some matters of the sovereignty, it will be an irregular commonwealth, thrust in, as it were, somewhere between a monarchy struggling up out of a mass of nobles, and a system. And the irregularity will be all the greater when several overtop all the rest.

14. Now just as we envy no man who remains set in his determination to retain the term of mixed commonwealth his praise for constancy, so it appears to us more convenient and clear, and at the same time more suited to the explanation of some phenomena in certain states, if we choose to call those states irregular, in which no one of the threeregular forms is observable, nor any mere shortcoming or *παρέκβασις*¹ [deviation], and which cannot with accuracy be referred to the form of systems. On these in general it should be observed that they vary from a regular state in that not everything appears to proceed from one soul and will, nor is each and every person to be controlled by virtue of sovereignty. And they differ from systems in that they are not, like these, composed of distinct and perfect states. They likewise are foreign to diseases and aberrations, in that a disease always betrays itself by some show of illegitimacy and shame, since it arises from the evil administration of some worthy form, or from ill-conceived laws and institutions. But the irregularity affects intrinsically not the very form alone, but also dares to show itself openly and without shame, as though publicly and, as it were, legitimately sanctioned. And for this reason a disease should have been absent from the intention of those who established the state, and always appears in it as something base, while an irregularity arose from or was confirmed by the will or approbation of those who go to make up a commonwealth. It is just as in one building, the plan of which, indeed, agrees with the rules of architecture but the material of which is faulty, or the tenants negligent, the roof comes apart, the walls threaten to fall, the beams creak, and the foundations settle, while in another the architect himself departs from the common rules and makes a form to suit his fancy, or remedies a threatening defect by some unusual device.

Moreover, some irregularities have appeared at the very formation of the state, while others have crept in with the passage of time and at unguarded moments. It was also possible that, at the time of founding, or when some great change was being made, those concerned with the initial or the second step were unable to introduce a regular form, either through their lack of skill, or because the state of affairs did not suffer consideration of a settled and orderly status. Add Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxix, a little way past the beginning. Sometimes also those who were the chief assistants and leaders in securing the kingdom, bargained for such jurisdictions and privileges for themselves, that they cannot be regarded as true subjects. Often also a state is seized with sickness because of the slothfulness of its governors, or for some other reason, and when this has struck such deep root that it cannot be torn up without entailing the ruin of the state, nothing is left but for that sickness to put off, as it were, its evil force by receiving public sanction, and for what was formerly nothing but usurpation, faction, or contumacy, to pass thereafter as right or privilege.

¹ [For παρέχσις read παρέκβασις.—Tr.]

15. Now of the irregular forms of commonwealths no certain number can be tabulated or species set up, because of the great variety which either actually exists or can be imagined. Therefore, little remains to us but to observe more in detail the nature of irregularity in some famous examples. Such an instance we have endeavoured to set forth in the Roman Republic; another Severinus de Monzambano has undertaken in the case of the German Empire. At this time it may be enough to make some observations on the irregularity which some 713 observe in the case of the ancient Roman Empire, in that at one time it appeared to have two or three bodies, when one of the Augusti held the East, the other the West, or even three Augusti held the Roman world in as many divisions. Sometimes again it appeared to have two or three heads, when two or three Augusti controlled it without division as colleagues.

Now, on the first case, it is to be observed that whenever two emperors held the empire, one the East, and the other the West, so that the state was divided, and each was independent of the other, then there were, as a matter of fact, two distinct kingdoms, which still retained the name 'Roman Empire', because they had both sprung from it. There was, furthermore, a similarity in laws and customs, a relationship between rulers and between peoples, and a mutual league and exchange, which gave somewhat the appearance of union. But how that may be called a form of state, when two or three Augusti held the empire without division, is not so easy to decide. Certainly two rulers cannot constitute an aristocracy. For since they both are vested with equal power (as is understood), they must necessarily be bound to each other by a pact; and there is no way to transact business in case they fail to agree, when there is no one who can add his voice to one side or the other. And although the same inconvenience may appear to attend a college which consists of an equal number of members, yet it will not so often happen that, upon a division of opinion, the votes will be equal; while it is easy among a number for one to be drawn over to the other side. Or when that cannot be done, the next course will be for that opinion to prevail which favours no innovation but a continuation in the beaten path.

Furthermore, not even when three Augusti held the empire at the same time does it appear that we may properly say that an aristocracy was established. For not even that triumvirate, or three Augusti, organized into such a body or college that a decision could be reached on affairs of state by a majority vote, and the agreement of two could authoritatively require the third to abide by their decision. But if there is a college where the majority cannot carry with it the minority, it appears to be held together by the bond of a mere pact rather than by sovereignty. We will conclude, therefore, that the supreme command lay actually and fully in the hands only of him who took the second to him as a colleague, although in external trappings they appear to have been equal. Julius Capitolinus, Life of Lucius Verus [i], says of him that 'he enjoyed not unrestricted power, but a sovereignty on like terms and equal dignity with Marcus'. (M.) Nor was there any need to fear that a man would be so ungrateful as to oppose the will of the one by whom he had been raised to such an eminence. It is a further consideration that usually a son was taken as a partner by his parent, a son-in-law by his father-in-law, or a brother by a brother, so that the subordinate was restrained by the further bond of a relation in blood or marriage from misusing the power given him against the giver. Therefore, that selection of a colleague was not a division of the supreme power, but merely the designation of a general assistant, as it were, or representative as well as successor, who was thereby admitted by the other to a share of the cares of the state, and in association with him administered the affairs of the empire, being also adorned with the insignia of the ruler. The fickleness of the legions also had its influence on this device, since they often saluted their leaders as emperor. Themistius, Orations, xvi [vi, p. 76 B], says of Valentinian, who had associated with himself in the sovereignty his brother Valens: 'He who had received the whole and then dispensed it, brother and father at the same time, the former by nature, the latter by his own act, made a gift of equal power. And yet he still holds supreme control, by reason of the obedience of his consort.' Solinus, chap. viii [ii. 14], says of Aeneas: 'Then for three years 714 he ruled with Latinus, associating him in the supreme authority.'

But if this explanation does not satisfy some persons, or cannot be applied to each instance, nothing remains for us but to say that there intervened in that empire at that time an irregularity, in that several men, who were joined either by a pact or a faction, held the throne undivided. And if there arose between them dissension or enmities, then suspicions, mutual plottings, and finally civil wars were unavoidable. Lucan, Bk. I [92 ff.]: 'No faith is there in partners in rule, and all power will be impatient of a sharer.' (R.) Statius, Thebaid, Bk. I [130]:

'Such discord rises from divided sway.' (L.) It was clearly such an irregularity at Rome when Romulus and Tatius were co-rulers. See Plutarch, Romulus. Add Erycius Puteanus, Historia Insubrica, Bk. II, on Pertharitus and Gundebertus who reigned together over the Lombards. Here belongs a passage in Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. I [i. 24 f.]:

The Goths [...] and the followers of Odoacer [...] came to an agreement with each other [...] that both Theoderic and Odoacer should reside in Ravenna on terms of complete equality. And for some time they observed the agreement; but afterwards Theoderic caught Odoacer, as they say, plotting against him, and bidding him to a feast with treacherous intent, slew him. (D.)

Much the same is in Euripides, Andromacha [471 ff.]:

Never land but hath borne a twofold yoke

Of kings with wearier straining:

There is burden on burden, and feud 'mid her folk. (W.)

Pliny, Panegyric: 'How little difference there is between laying down and sharing the sovereignty! Unless the latter be more difficult.' Add Herodian, Bk. IV, chaps. i ff.

In general such divided sovereignty is well described by the remark of Selim, who compared the German Empire to a harp, which after great labour finally is tuned into a harmony that does not endure for long. We do not feel that we need class under an irregularity what Francis Carron recounts of the Dayro in Japan, who was the lawful heir to the throne, but was granted by the actual holder of the sovereignty nothing more than the splendour of majesty and office. Thus, as we are informed by Alexander of Rhodes, Divers Voyages, Pt. II, chap. vi, in the kingdom of Tonquin there are two kings with the titles of Bua and Choua, but the former holds the title, while the latter has the actual sovereignty; save that the Bua confers the title of doctor and receives the oath of the citizens, which is renewed each year, spending all the rest of his time in an old palace with nothing to bother him.

16. We speak of systems of states when more than one are so held together by some special and strict bond that they appear to form one body, each of whose members, however, retains supreme sovereignty over its own affairs. From this it appears, first of all, that if some state is composed of several subordinate bodies, it must not for that reason be at once classed among systems, although Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxii, includes such under that term and compares its parts to the muscles of the physical body. Just as great states, which have taken on additional territories by absorbing other states, and reducing them into one body with themselves, are not for that reason systems. Such an increase we see taking place in two ways. By the first the victor state transfers the citizens of conquered states to its own territory, or gives them the same rights with its own citizens; by the second the conquered states are left their old boundaries, and the sovereignty which was first vested in them is lost, while their citizens become subjects of the conquering state. In both cases the conquered state exists no longer, but in the former case the conquered are given equal rights with their conquerors, while in the second they are usually required to live in a worse condition, and the state is reduced to the form of a province. Yet at times such subdued provinces are left some of their ancient privileges or laws, however much they differ from those of the conquering state. See Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxvi. For the unity of a state does not require that all its integral parts have the same positive laws, or that all its 715 citizens enjoy equal rights, but it is enough if all of them acknowledge a single sovereignty. And often it is one of the arts of a conqueror to make no change in the former customs of the conquered, and even to adjust himself to them for a time.

Now on this matter we should examine what is said on the administration of provinces by Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xix:

Whereas heretofore the Roman people governed the land of Judea, for example, by a president; yet was not Judea therefore a democracy; because they were not governed by any assembly into the which any of them had right to enter; nor an aristocracy; because they were not governed by any assembly, into the which any man could enter by their election: but they were governed by one person, which as to the people of Judea, which had no right at all of participating in the government, was a monarch. For though where the people are governed by an assembly, chosen by themselves out of their own number, the government is called a democracy or aristocracy; yet when they are governed by an assembly not of their own choosing, it is a monarchy; not of 'one' man over another man; but of one people over another people.

So, then, Hobbes appears to regard as monarchies even such provinces as are under an aristocracy or democracy. Now although we readily admit that it is more common for provinces to be ruled by one man than by an assembly of all the citizens, as he himself shows at length (loc. cit., chap. xxii), it still appears idle to us to inquire into the form of government in any province. For provinces no longer exist as states and are become but the appendages of other states, having no sovereignty in themselves. And it has no bearing on the question of sovereignty itself whether such a province is ruled by a single governor or by a council, since the former as well as the latter enjoy only a delegated power. So that the sovereignty exercised over the provinces or appendages of states appears to be the same as that of the mistress state, and can only with impropriety be called that of a monarchy or aristocracy, since such distinctions in the forms of a state belong to states properly so called, such as possess in themselves sovereignty over themselves.

17. We apprehend¹ that there are two species of systems properly speaking: one where two or more states have one and the same king; the other where two or more states are joined by a pact into one body.

¹ [For deprehendimus read deprehendimus.—Tr.]

As to systems of the first kind, it should be observed that it is possible with moral bodies for several to have but one head, and so for one person to be the head of several distinct bodies, which in the case of natural bodies would result in a monstrosity. But since a union of such systems is based solely upon the person of the king, or upon his family, it follows that when this dies out there returns at once to each of the peoples the right to decide as it will on its form of government, nor do they need any longer to be under one head. Nay, even while that head lives, the individual states remain entirely distinct.

Now such systems can arise for various reasons, of which the most common appear to be the marriage of princes and the right of inheritance. For there are states in which the supreme sovereignty falls also upon women of the ruling house, not only when there are no males in the family, but also when there is none of a closer or of the same degree of relationship. Therefore, should a woman, who is the ruler of a kingdom, marry one who is likewise a king, there would be a union of the two kingdoms in their offspring. For in such marriages there is no necessity for a wife subjecting herself along with her kingdom to the sovereignty of her husband. So in case it should happen that in an indivisible kingdom where the line of succession is fixed as simple or 716 direct, one of the more distant heirs of the kingdom should in some way acquire for himself another kingship, and the law of succession, upon lack of nearer heirs, should call him to the throne, he will unite the newly acquired kingdom with that which was his own before. The same thing happens when a people select as their king one who already holds another throne, or whom another succession awaits. So also two or more kingdoms may enter into an agreement to select one ruler by their united suffrage, and yet to remain in other respects separate states, and not even to carry on their affairs of state in a common council. Finally, such a system also arises if a king, constituted by the free will of a people, subjects to himself in war another people, in his own name, at his own risk, and at his own expense, not involving at all the name or resources of the people over whom he reigns. That this can happen despite the remarks to the contrary of Hotoman, Quaestiones Illustres, qu. 1, is sufficiently established by Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 12.

Such systems may be dissolved by the death of the king on whose sole person the union was based, or by the extinction of the royal line, in case the individual kingdoms belong to it by hereditary right. For in this case there returns to each kingdom the separate right to set up a new king over itself, or to introduce whatever form of commonwealth it desires without consulting the others, inasmuch as we assume that those kingdoms were held together by no further bond. Thus should it happen that a king holds one kingdom by hereditary right, but is put over another merely by free election, the consequent union of the kingdoms will be dissolved at the death of that king, nor will the second kingdom have to accept as its ruler the son of the deceased monarch.

But if the union in question depends upon a treaty between the two states, it is obvious that when that treaty has been violated, at least in its principal heads, the union can be broken off by the injured party. Yet here a careful distinction should be drawn between an obligation binding separate kingdoms to a ruler, and one which binds the states to one another. When a king has once been elected and received a pledge of good faith, it will not be possible to dethrone him for any depraved deeds or such as run contrary to his agreement, so long as he does not show himself an open enemy to his kingdom. Unless it be that a commissory clause was expressly added to the pact between a king and his subjects, to the effect that all their obedience depends upon the fulfilment of each and every section of the pact as a condition. But the mutual obligation which lies between united kingdoms can be broken off on the side of the one which has been injured by a violation of the laws of that union, even though the hurt may be of little consequence, provided the other kingdoms concurred in that injury, or it is undertaken for or turns to their advantage. Consequently, upon the death of a king the injured kingdom will be able to renounce the union, reserving the right of an action against the authors and abettors of the hurt, and a claim to property lost. But if several states are united by the marriages of their rulers, who are hereditary princes in each land, and yet they observe a different order of succession, the union will be dissolved if such a case arises as that the same person is not fitted by the public laws to succeed to the throne of each nation. Let us suppose that two kingdoms are united, in one of which the succession is in line of agnation, in the other of cognation. In this case, upon the death of their common king without a son but with only a daughter, the second kingdom will fall to the daughter, the first to the nearest male relative. But if a union, which was at first occasioned by marriage be later confirmed and ordered to be perpetual, each and every kingdom entering into a treaty with one another, or approving a decree to this effect of their common king, it is understood that some such act disposes of the difference in succession which previously obtained. Thereafter that order of succession will have to be followed which is expressly set forth in the treaty or decree, or which is known to have met the approval of the author of the union, or which is most highly agreeable to reason and the welfare of the kingdoms. But in case one kingdom becomes subject to another as a province, the union resulting from the treaty expires, and its place is taken by a closer coalition into the same state. 717

18. The other kind of a system is that which consists of several states bound to each by a perpetual treaty, and which is usually occasioned by the fact that the individual states wished to preserve their αὐτονομία [autonomy], and yet had not sufficient strength to repel their common enemies. In this treaty there is commonly an agreement that one or other part of the supreme sovereignty should be exercised at the consent of all. For a treaty that gives rise to a system seems to differ from those treaties which are otherwise most commonly drawn up between states, chiefly in this: That in the others each people of the league agrees to certain mutual performances, yet in such a way that they are on no account willing to make the exercise of that part of the sovereignty from which those performances flow dependent upon the consent of their associates, nor to limit in any degree their complete and unlimited power to conduct the affairs of their state. So also simple treaties have usually before their eyes only the particular advantage of the different states, as it happens to coincide, and do not produce any lasting union in matters which concern the chief object of states.

The case is entirely different with the treaties that appear in systems, the purpose of which is that distinct states may intertwine for all time the prime interests of their safety, and on that score make the exercise of certain parts of the supreme sovereignty depend upon the mutual consent of their associates. For there is a great difference between 'I will bring you aid in this war, and we will consider in concert how we shall attack the enemy', and 'No one of us who have entered this society will exercise his right of peace and war, save with the common consent of all'.

We have said that in treaties of this kind the exercise of only certain parts of the supreme sovereignty is made to depend upon the consent of the associated states. For it hardly seems likely that the affairs of several states could be so closely interwoven that it would be to the advantage of one and all of them that no part of the supreme sovereignty be exercised without the consent of all. Or if there were any such, it would have been more to their advantage to unite in one state than to be joined only by a treaty. Therefore, it is convenient that the individual states reserve for themselves liberty in the exercise of those parts of supreme sovereignty, the manner of conducting which is of little or no interest, at least directly, to the rest. The same is true as well of such business as is of daily occurrence, or will not suffer the delay consequent upon a discussion of it with others. But matters upon which the safety of the entire league depends may with entire fairness be considered in common council. Of these war occupies the first place, both defensive and offensive, and that wherewith it is drawn to a close, even peace. To which should be joined taxes, in so far as they minister to war, and treaties with foreign powers looking to the common safety. Here also belongs the consideration that, if any controversy arises between the allies themselves, the others who have no direct interest in it may at once interpose as mediators, and not allow it to come to open warfare. In Polybius, Bk. IV, chap. xxiv, Philip of Macedon says:

In the case of injuries inflicted by the allies upon each other separately, his intervention ought to be confined to remonstrance by word of mouth or letter; but¹ that it was only injuries affecting the whole body of the allies which demanded joint intervention and redress. (S.)

The other matters which apparently do not demand so much exercise of common counsel, such as commercial treaties, taxes which are required for the needs of the individual states, the appointment of magistrates, laws, the right over citizens of life and death, matters of religion, and the like, can without difficulty be left in the province of the individual states. Although every state will so control them that they will in no way disturb the entire system. From this it is evident that one or another of the allies cannot be prevented by the rest from exercising at their own pleasure those parts of the supreme sovereignty on the conduct of which by common counsel there was no special agreement in the treaty. 718

Yet on the right of life and death some scruple can arise regarding the ruling in Digest, XLIX. xv. 7, § 1 [XLIX. xv. 7, § 2]: 'But citizens of states allied to us are put on trial in our courts, and punished when found guilty.' Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 21, has gone to great trouble to explain this, and yet any one who has examined the passage with much care will readily admit that he makes no progress. For he certainly makes no answer to this question: How can that state maintain its liberty unimpaired whose citizens another state can rightfully call before its tribunal and there inquire into their conduct? Surely it was held that the liberty of the Achaeans had suffered the grossest affront when, by the treachery of Callicrates, the most eminent men of that people were accused of favouring the cause of Perseus against the Romans, and were haled to Rome to plead their cause, the Romans seizing as an occasion a statement of Xenon, who, fully confident in the consciousness of his innocence, had said that if any one wished to accuse him he was ready to stand trial in the common assembly of the Achaeans, or even before the Romans. On this incident we are fully informed by Pausanias, in his sketch of the history of Achaea [VII. x. 9], and it is mentioned also by Polybius in Selections on Embassies, cv [XXX. xxxii]. So also the Achaeans appear to have transgressed the laws of a regular state in demanding that those Spartans who had been responsible for the attack upon Las, a village in their territory, be handed over to them for punishment. Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. xxxi. For the cause should first have been discussed in the common council, and after the guilt had been determined, notice should have been served on the Spartans, either to punish the offenders or else to surrender them.

¹ [For atque read at quae.—Tr.]

In our opinion the clearest reply to the passage in the Digest appears to be that, since in the preceding sections it had been set forth what the nature of treaties allows, and what should be done, it was stated in those words what had actually occurred in later times, when the Romans, as their fortune gave them haughtiness, fell into the habit of treating their allies who had of their free will sought their friendship by treaties, in the same way as if they had been subjugated in war. Of this injustice Cicero himself complains in his On Duties [II. viii]. Add the example of Decius Magius being put in chains by Hannibal, as recorded by Livy, Bk. XXIII, chaps. vii and x, and how Scipio urges that the Romans should give no audience to informers against Hannibal. Idem, Bk. XXXIII, chap. xlvii.

19. Since in such systems certain matters expressed in the treaty should be made the business of all, and since this cannot be done so conveniently sending around letters, it is necessary that a set place and time be appointed for holding assemblies, and that one or more be designated who shall be empowered to summon the confederates, in case something unusual arises that will bear no delay. Although it would be far more convenient if some permanent council, composed of delegates from each of the states, sit in a designated place, with the power to transact affairs of daily occurrence, or of minor importance, in accordance with the nature of their commission, while if anything of serious consequence arise, it can refer this to the individual states and publish as well as prosecute what they have decided. Such a body may also receive reports from the common ministers of the confederates who represent them among other nations, and may also treat with the ambassadors of foreign states, and conclude negotiations with them in the common name of all the confederates. But it may issue no decree exceeding the bounds of its commission, unless the matter has first been brought to the attention of all the states. How much power belongs to such a council of deputies will have to be discovered from 719 the treaty itself, or the commissions of such bodies. Whatever such power may be, it is entirely from another source, and delegated from the confederates, and although the decrees which it issues may bear only its own name, all of their force and authority flows from the confederated states which appointed it. And so those deputies are no more than ministers of the allies, and can no more enjoin anything upon them with authority than an ambassador can give orders to his master.

20. But the question may still be raised as to whether all the allied states, or the majority of them, have power over one, or a small number of their members, in those matters for which the league was formed, and which it was expressly stated in the treaty should be conducted by common counsel, in so far as that a small minority is bound, whether it will or not, to abide by the decision of the majority. This, it seems to us, must be answered in the negative, if we are concerned with regular systems and those where every state reserves to itself its liberty unimpaired, although there is nothing to prevent such a rule obtaining in an irregular system, and one that approaches more closely to the nature of a state. For the liberty of a state, which is nothing other than the power to decide on its own judgement about matters pertaining to its self-preservation, is unintelligible in case it can be forced by another, acting with authority, to undertake something against its will. Nor is it any objection that it was agreed in the treaty to exercise certain parts of the supreme sovereignty only by common counsel. For it is one thing if I say, 'I will not exercise my right unless you are willing,' and another to say, 'You will have the right to require me to exercise my right, even though I be unwilling.' The first, but not the second, is contained in the treaty of union.

In order to understand this more thoroughly, it should be carefully noted that, when the wills of several men are required to combine into one, this is due either to a mere agreement, or to the fact that one man has submitted his will to the will of another. A union of wills based upon mere agreement does not at all destroy that liberty of which we just spoke. For whether any decision is made beforehand, by common agreement, about matters to be carried on in common, or if the decision must be reached afterwards, the individual members wish to be led to it not by authority but by reason¹ alone. Yet when I have submitted my will to that of another, and have thereby conferred upon him sovereignty over me, I can be obligated even to what perhaps displeases me.

Nor is it of any use for one to harp to us on the 'right of the majority'. See above, Bk. VII, chap. ii, § 15. For, in the first place, the majority draws to itself the minority only in constituted groups, not in those which must yet be constituted. Furthermore, it is an institution and convention of men, not a natural law, that in constituted groups the majority obligates all, though natural reason urges it as a most convenient rule in large groups, and where varied and routine business must be transacted. And yet, in order that this be done, it is necessary for each individual to submit his will to the will of the entire body or of the majority, to the extent that even when they dissent, they must under all conditions follow what the latter determine. And this is unintelligible without postulating the authority of the majority over the minority. Nor, as a matter of fact, does there seem to be any need in the assemblies of confederates of that right of the majority, since they are not usually made up of many peoples, and are met for the prime purpose of the common advantage, which it is presumed no sane man will persistently oppose. Yet if any one, maintaining a perverse stubbornness which refuses to yield to reason, scorns to join with the salutary counsels of the rest, and sets about to betray in this fashion the common safety or advantage, it will be lawful to employ against him such means as those who live in natural liberty may use against the 720 violators of pacts, unless it please them better entirely to exclude such an unreasonable person from the league.

¹ [For rationes read rationes.—Tr.]

Another consideration is that it would often involve great injustice in a system of confederates, for the vote of a majority to bind the rest, when there is a great difference in resources, and so one contributes more to the common safety than another. For despite the fact that those who contribute in proportion to their wealth appear to bear equal burdens, it may frequently happen that one man is readier to expose his own modest fortune to risk than another his, a large one. Thus supposing that one state of a system contributes more to the common defence than all the others together, it would be manifestly unjust for it to be possible for the rest to force such a state to undertake something that would devolve the chief burden upon it. See Grotius, Apologeticus, chap. i, towards the end. But yet for the votes of each state to weigh in proportion to its contribution to the society would grant such a powerful state sovereignty over the rest. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XV, chap. xxviii.

The conclusion from all this is, that whenever affairs are decided on the principle of a majority of votes, so that the opposition is also obligated, it constitutes a departure from the regular form of systems, and the establishment of an irregular body, or of a single state.

21. Such systems are dissolved when some of the confederates voluntarily leave the league and administer their states to themselves, which usually happens from the consideration that they hope for more advantage from separation than from union, and that they feel their allies to be more of a burden than an assistance. Add Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chaps. xxxi-xxxii. Internal wars also break them up, unless the agreements of the covenant are again renewed in the peace. When a system has had the worse of a foreign war, it is sometimes one of the stratagems of the victor to dissolve the league, and to command each state to exercise αὐτονομίαν [autonomy] in the way that the Romans once did to the Achaeans. Compare Xenophon [Greek History], Bk. III, chap. v [IV. viii. 14; V. i. 28], where he discusses the Peace of Antalcidas.

It should furthermore be observed, touching the dissolution of systems by external force, that when one or more of the confederated states has been seized by an enemy, he does not in this way secure any right over the rest, nor must he at once be received into the league by reason of the treaty which joined the rest of them to it. But an entirely new treaty is needed for another state to join a league in the place of a conquered state. Thus we are informed in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XVI, chap. lxi, that by a decree of the Amphictyons Philip took over the seat in their council formerly held by Phocis. For although the treaty by which several states are united into a system seems to be a real one, and a state does not cease to exist because it has changed its form, yet such a treaty will be held to have expired when a state has been brought under the yoke by force, or been made an appendage to another's sovereignty. For since a league is entered into by states as such, what ceases to exist as a state drops from it. And even though every precaution be taken in the articles of confederation, that there be no withdrawal from the League¹ because of a change in the form of government, yet it is presumed that such a change be made in a legitimate way, by the voluntary consent of its people. And so there will be no place in the council of the league for either an unjust usurper or an external enemy.

But it is possible for such systems to combine into a finished state, if all the confederates voluntarily submit themselves to the supreme sovereignty of a single council or man, or if one people, excelling the others in strength, reduce them to the state of provinces. This last usually happens when the weaker ones offer some permanent preferment to a stronger and are confederated unequally. See Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 21, towards the end. Finally, such systems become perfect states if some one man seizes the sovereignty by the favour of the soldiers, or on a wave of popularity, or by the influence of a faction.

22. Lastly, it is customary in this connexion to discuss the comparative excellence of forms of states, and what form should be preferred to another by reason of the fact that it procures more easily and surely the safety of the state, or that the force of sovereignty is less open to abuse. Now on this point so much is patent: That no form of state can be so thoroughly buttressed with laws but that, from the very form of government which is established for the safety of the citizens, some inconveniences can befall them by reason of the slothfulness or the wickedness of the rulers. The reason for this is that, although supreme sovereignty is established to repel the evils which threaten men from their fellows, yet that sovereignty had to be conferred upon men who are themselves not immune to the vices by which men are incited to do each other harm. 'There will be vices so long as there are men.' [Tacitus, Histories, IV. lxxiv.] And so we sometimes experience from men the very thing against which they should have defended us. Hence, it also happens that 'for every folly of their princes the Greeks feel the scourge'. [Horace, Epistles, I. ii. 14.]

Therefore, as the condition of human affairs does not allow full perfection, so many disagree on what form of state allows one to fear the minimum of evils. Now looking at it in this light the majority record their vote for² a monarchy. See Isocrates, Nicocles; Herodotus,

¹ [For foepere read foedera.—Tr.]

² [For per read pro.—Tr.]

Bk. III, where the Persian princes after killing the Magi debate on the form of state to be introduced; Euripides, Suppliants, lines 405 ff.; Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. VI, chap. iv; Arnisaeus, Relectiones Politicæ, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 2; and many others. On the other hand, nothing that can be said out of hatred or envy of monarchs seems to have been overlooked by the Dutch author of the Bilanx Politica,¹ although many of his arguments can be turned against him by what Hobbes sets forth, De Givæ, chap. x; Leviathan, xix.

It is not our purpose to discuss the various positions, but we may only observe that there is no such force in their arguments that conclusions drawn from them should necessarily hold everywhere and always. Nor should the deeds of one or more governors lay any necessity upon all others of their type to follow their example. But I should suggest that every good and loyal citizen should meditate upon the remark of Marcellus in Tacitus, Histories, Bk. IV [viii]: 'He was not unmindful of the times on which he had fallen, of the form of government established by their ancestors: he admired the past, and accommodated himself to the present system, devoutly wishing for virtuous princes, but willing to acquiesce under any sort.' (O.)

It may not be foreign to our purpose, in this connexion, to show briefly why the ancient Greeks were so hostile to those who had seized a monarchical power in democracies and aristocracies, and why these men undertook to maintain their position by such evil practices as are found described in Aristotle and other writers, which caused a lasting hatred to cling to the word 'tyrant'. Now the Greek states usually held themselves to the limits of a single city; and to such states the most agreeable form is a democracy, or a mildly administered aristocracy, or, finally, a kingdom such as Aristotle calls the 'heroic' type, that is, a principate which relies not so much upon sovereignty as the authority of persuasion and a reputation for outstanding virtue. Furthermore, the Greeks as a whole, because of their proud and restless nature, especially loved that status in which every man could form a part of the commonwealth. Therefore, whoever in such a state had seized the monarchy, a thing hateful to the citizens, and done so against their will, was forced to overawe the city with a fortress, surround himself with a strong body of troops, and these of foreign extraction, since he could not trust his own citizens, or by transferring troops from different places coerce one province by means of another. Then the loyalty of such mercenaries was only to be purchased by high pay, and to meet this expense the citizens had to be reduced to straitened circumstances by taxation, while it was also necessary for them to be disarmed, and to be reduced to a state in which they were unable to carry on war, that 'the heads of the poppies be cut off' [Livy, I, liv and lvi], that public meetings be forbidden, and that a secret service be maintained. And so those tyrants were not only unjust but also insane, who aimed at such power as had to be preserved by evil practices which could not make for permanence, and afforded them no opportunity to win the love of their citizens. And it is quite as absurd to establish a monarchy in a state which consists of but a single city as to establish a democracy in a nation that occupies a large territory. But since monarchies of wide extent have no need of such arts for their self-preservation, inasmuch as one province can be balanced off against another, those who suggest the exercise of the arts of tyrants to the monarchs of great states are guilty of no less heinous a sin than those who ceaselessly pour out the odium due those petty tyrants of Greece upon all monarchs. 722

¹ [See above, note on p. 1032.—Tr.]

It is patent also from these reflections that monarchs live far more securely in a large state, because refractory citizens have no such easy opportunity to communicate and join with each other, and by contact¹ to infect all other citizens, as they do in a state which consists of a single city, where a few can spread their fury to all in a moment's time, and before their prince is aware of it.

¹ [For contractu read contactu.—Tr.]

CHAPTER VI

ON THE CHARACTERISTICS OF SUPREME SOVEREIGNTY

- | | |
|---|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Why the sovereignty in a state is styled 'supreme'. 2. He who holds it is ἀννεύθυνος¹ [not accountable]. 3. And is superior to man-made laws. 4. On the distinction between real and personal majesty. 5. It is shown that kings can be superior to an entire people. 6. Arguments to the contrary are refuted. 7. What is absolute sovereignty? 8. It is not found equally in all forms of commonwealths. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 9. The source of limited sovereignties. 10. The pacts by which they exist. 11. The basis upon which the different parts of sovereignty are limited. 12. On the powers of orders. 13. A reply to Hobbes. 14. The number of ways of holding sovereignty. 15. Can there be a temporary supreme sovereignty? 16. On patrimonial kingdoms. 17. On kingdoms established by the free consent of a people. |
|---|--|

FIRST among the characteristics of sovereignty is that it is supreme and is so styled. The chief reason appears to be the fact that no greater power than the following belongs to one man over another: That the latter is obligated to apply his strength and resources to the public good at the pleasure of the former, and is liable to the right of life and death. A further consideration is, that, as no greater liberty, setting aside the sovereignty of God, can be understood as belonging to individual men, than the ability to dispose of their actions, strength, and faculties at their own judgement, so the fullest liberty for any group must be measured by the extent to which it can decide upon such matters as it thinks will make to its advantage and safety, upon its own judgement, the same acting freely and independent of any other authority. From this it also follows that because this sovereignty is supreme, that is, is not dependent upon any superior man upon earth, its acts cannot, for that reason, be made void at the discretion of any other human being's will—for a man's ability to change the decisions of his own will is, in fact, a proof of liberty.

- 723 2. For the same reason also, whoever holds the supreme sovereignty will be ἀννεύθυνος [not accountable], that is, not liable to the giving of reasons for his actions, or to punishment at the hands of men. For both of these limitations presuppose a superior, such as cannot be understood without a contradiction, since there cannot be in the same order of existence a thing superior to what is supreme. Sallust, Jugurtha [xxxi]: "To do with impunity what one fancies is to be a king." (R.) Pliny, Panegyric [vi. 1]: "The happiest feature of the principate is that it is beyond the reach of compulsion." But we should observe that a reason may be rendered in two ways: Either to a superior, who may rescind my acts and punish me in addition, unless I have shown my reason to his satisfaction, or to an equal and one whom I desire merely to approve my acts, to the end that he may regard me as an upright and prudent man. Now supreme sovereignty is not bound to show reason to any man in the first way, although princes who are careful of their reputation often undertake in the second way to show reasons for their management to the eyes of the world, that they may guard their esteem, a conduct, however, which implies no subjection. Thus I am free to do what I please with my own earnings, and yet I am at times willing that my reasons be aired, so that I may not be taken for a dissolute or foolish manager.

¹ [For ἀννεύθυνος read ἀννεύθυνος.—Tr.]

Nor can any punishment be meted out to him for whose trial there exists no court or judge that can render and execute a judgement. For the courts which are to be found in states concern only subjects, and obtain all their authority from the supreme sovereignty itself. But if the princes in some nations are willing to appear in one of their own courts on questions of debt and the like, that is not done as if they recognized that court as their superior, and as able to exercise compulsion upon them, but they merely desire clearly to take cognizance of the claim of the other party, which they are ready and willing to meet as their obligation, once it is established. Yet what is here said concerns properly human punishment, which a human judge inflicts as a superior. For the punishment of God is usually visited in different ways upon the violators of natural law, who otherwise need have no fear of the judgements of men. Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode i [6]: 'Over the kings themselves is the rule of Jove.' (B.) The custom of the Egyptians of denying the honour of burial to kings who had governed wickedly in their lifetime can scarcely be taken as a punishment. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxii.

3. The very fact, also, that civil sovereignty is called supreme, argues that it is free from civil laws, or rather is superior to them. To raise any question regarding divine and natural laws would be folly. Plutarch, Ad Principem Indoctum [Ineruditum, iii, p. 780 c]:

Who, then, shall have the power to govern a prince? The law, without doubt; which, as Pindar saith, is the king of mortal and immortal beings; which is not written without in books, nor engraven on wood or stone, but is a clear reason imprinted on the heart, always residing and watching therein, and never suffering the mind to be without government. (G.)

Seneca, Thyestes [612]:

Every power
Is subject to a greater power. (M.)

Now human laws are nothing other than the decisions of the supreme sovereignty on such things as subjects must observe for the welfare of the state, [for such laws depend upon the supreme sovereignty both for their source and their duration].¹ It is patent that the supreme sovereignty cannot be directly obligated by such as these, for it is supreme. Therefore, no obligation can be laid upon it by a superior man, and no man can obligate himself, by way of a law, that is, acting as his own superior. See Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vi, § 14. Although a legislator may sometimes be obligated by his own law in a reflex manner, as it were, on the grounds of natural equity, and public seemliness, so that he himself will also observe what he requires in the acts of citizens, as serving the public good, in order that he may quicken the obedience of subjects, and so that he may not, in forbidding vices in which he himself indulges, appear to envy others their enjoyment of the same. See 1 Samuel, xiv. 40. Pliny, Panegyric [xlv]:

The life of the princeps is a censorship, and that perpetual. By it we are directed, by it we are guided; nor have we need so much of his commands as of his example, for fear is an untrustworthy guide of rectitude. Men are better instructed by examples, which 724 possess this merit beyond all others, namely, that they show men the possibility of accomplishing what they are ordered to do.

Nor have kings any need to blush at what is told by Athenaeus, Bk. X [x], on the authority of Ctesias, namely, that among the Hindus a king was not allowed to drink to excess, and among the Persians he was allowed to do so only on the day when sacrifices were offered to Mithras. Claudian, On the Fourth Consulship of Honorius [296 ff.]:

If thou make any law or establish any custom for the general good, be the first to submit thyself thereto; then does a people show more regard for justice nor refuse submission when it has seen their author obedient to his own laws. The world shapes itself after its ruler's pattern, nor can edicts sway men's minds so much as their monarch's life. (P.)

Livy, Bk. XXVI, chap. xxxvi: 'If you would enjoin any duty on an inferior, and would first submit yourself and those belonging to you to the obligation, you will find everybody else more ready to obey.' (S.) Pliny, Letters, Bk. IV, ep. xxii: 'It is in the body politic as in the natural, that disorders are most dangerous that flow from the head.' (B.) Justin, Bk. III, chap. ii, § 8. [Sadi] A Persian Rosegarden, chap. i: 'If a king eats one apple from a subject's garden, his slaves will root up the tree. If a king allows the unjust robbery of five eggs, his soldiers will thereupon spit a thousand hens.'

4. To vindicate the supremacy of this sovereignty, especially in monarchies, we must set forth the common distinction of majesty into real and personal. The application of this distinction to sovereignty we hold to be not only absurd but also baneful, if its sense be that a monarchy offers an opportunity for real and personal majesty at the same place and time, and that therefore the ruler of a kingdom may be accorded personal sovereignty, and the people, as distinguished from their prince, real, this being equal or superior to the former, according as real rights are usually considered superior to personal. For that this involves a contradiction, and endows every state, to its certain destruction, with two heads, is clear on the face of it. There is no necessity to create a double majesty, for the reason that at the death of the king, or the extinction of the ruling house, the people regains its right, in so far that it may, as it sees fit, set up another king, or establish another form of state. We could as well conjure up a real sovereignty in a slave, in contradistinction from the personal sovereignty of a master over him, because of the fact that at the death of his master without an heir, the slave becomes free.

¹ [This clause was added by Barbeyrac from the author's De Officio Hominis et Civis, II. ix. 5, in order to fill out the otherwise incomplete expression of the thought.—Tr.]

Nor is the point before us touched by the allegations of Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 7, and others, who make two subjects of the supreme power, a common and a proper, of which the former is the state, the latter a single man, or a council composed of all the citizens or of a few. For the meaning of that distinction is this: If one inquires in a general way where the supreme sovereignty lies, the reply is made that it lies in the state; if one inquires more specifically what¹ person in the state holds the sovereignty, the reply is made, the king, or senate, or assembly. But who would infer from this the existence of two distinct sovereignties, of which the real one is vested in the state, the personal one in the king? It would be just as absurd for a man to try to imagine two distinct sights in a man, one which resides in a man as in a common subject, a second which resides in the eye as in a proper subject.

5. There have been those who have not hesitated to assert that the sovereignty of a king neither can nor should be superior to that of all the people. No little support for this is apparently offered by Aristotle, Politics, Bk. III, chap. xii [towards the end], and again in chapter xi [xv], when he says: 'The king must have such force as will be more than a match for one or more individuals, but not so great as that of the people.' (J.)

Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 8, has taken upon himself to refute such writers. He shows first of all that it was permitted a people to transfer to others sovereignty over themselves fully and without exception, since individuals are allowed to make themselves personal slaves of another. See Exodus, xxi. 6; Leviticus, xxv. 39; add Selden, Bk. VI, chap. vii; Digest, XL. xii. 37; Code, VII. xvi. 10; Digest, XL. xii. 7, § 3; XL. xii. 33; XL. xiii. 4; Institutes, I. iii, § 4, and Digest, XXVIII. iii. 6, § 5; Leo, Novels, lix. Caesar, Gallic War, Bk. VI [xiii. 2], says of the ancient Gauls: 'The more part of the common people, oppressed as they are either by debt, or by the heavy weight of tribute, or by the wrongdoing of the more powerful men, commit themselves in slavery to the nobles, who have, in fact, the same rights over them as masters over slaves.' (E.) Although in other respects it appears unbecoming to compare citizens who live under an absolute monarch, with slaves. Claudian, On the Consulship of Stilicho, Bk. III [113 ff.]: 'He errs who thinks that submission to a noble prince is slavery; never does liberty show more fair than beneath a good king.' (P.) A saying on this point of Apollonius of Tyana is found in Philostratus, Bk. V, chap. xii [xxxv]: 'Just as a man who is excellent beyond all others changes a democracy into the appearance of the rule of the one best man, so a monarchy which makes all provision for the common welfare is essentially a democracy.' Add Hobbes, De Cive, chap. x, § 8.

¹ [For quae nam read quaenam.—Tr.]

In the next place Grotius offers the occasion and reasons on the compulsion of which a people will be able to renounce every right of government and hand it over to another. Most of these are included in the following words of Cicero, On Duties, II [vi]:

Now, mankind submit to the command and power of another for several reasons. For they are induced by benevolence or by the greatness of his benefits; or by his transcendent worth, or by the hopes that their submission will turn to their own account, or from the fear of their being forced to submit, or from the hopes of reward, or the power of promises, or, lastly (which is often the case in our government), they are hired by a bribe. (E.)

The following occasions are advanced by Grotius: If it happen that a people be threatened by an enemy¹ with destruction, which can be avoided in no other way than by yielding unconditionally to another's sway. See Livy, Bk. VII, chap. xxxi. If it should be poverty stricken, and have no other way to sustain itself. See Genesis, xlvii. 19. If the head of a family with large estates be unwilling to allow any one to live on them without first making such a tenant his subject. Or if a man free many of his slaves, on the provision that they subject themselves to him. Nay more, such a form of government may entirely suit the genius of a people. Nor is it, indeed, always an indication of a weak or abject mind for one to be pleased with an absolute monarchy, as most of those born under a democracy hold, who scorn the Cappadocians because of the fact that they refused their liberty when it was offered them by the Romans. See Strabo, Bk. XII [ii. 11, p. 540]; Justin, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. ii. Euripides, Helena [286], voices the opinion of all Greeks:

For midst barbarians slaves are all save one. (W.)

Yet to all peoples in which many men are to be found who are headstrong, ambitious, puffed up, and impatient of equality, the liberty of a democracy is a most dangerous thing, and yet the same men easily put up with a king. For they prefer obeying one man and outranking the rest to spending their life in the same class with all in the state; and 'they are willing to serve so that they may be able to rule',¹ Ausonius [Eidyll. xv. 37 f.]. Nay, the Orient from time immemorial to the present has been so accustomed to kings that Neuhoof, Legatio, reports: 'The Chinese were unable even to conceive of the nature of the states of Holland', because they were acquainted with no form of government except a monarchy. Caspar Balbi of Venice, in his Viaggi, tells us that when the king of Pegu was told that in Venice sovereignty was vested in a senate, he burst into hearty laughter, as though it were perfectly absurd. On the other hand men cannot easily bear a democracy unless they be of even temperament, calm passions, and willing to be ruled in the same way as their neighbours.

¹ [For abhoste read ab hoste.—Tr.]

Finally, free states are often reduced by internal disorders to the point that they cannot survive save under the absolute sovereignty of one man; and so 'in the wake of that peace comes a master'. Lucan, Bk. I [670].

6. It is a better course to discuss the reasonings of those who 726 delight to exalt above kings that real, as they imagine it, majesty of the people. They claim that all kings are created by the people, and that it is in accordance with nature for the creator to be superior to his creation. But granted that the consent of the people is concerned in the establishment of all kings, there is still a difference between the ways in which that consent is given. For some people choose a king of their own volition, while the rest are forced by war, or some other necessity, to accept a king whom they would never have desired except for some such chance. And yet it accords with the common use of speech to say that only those men are kings by the constitution of a people, whom it chooses of its own volition. Whoever extort that consent by the violence of war, or some similar means, are not said to be constituted by the people, but to have made a people their subjects.

Furthermore, he who constitutes a person is superior to him only when it always lies within his power to stipulate how long the other should hold the position in which he is placed. But sometimes at the first it is a matter of free choice, whom you may wish to set up, and yet, after the appointment has once been made, it becomes a matter of necessity to bear it.

Others answer in this way. A man constitutes a person either over another person, or over himself. In the former case he is surely superior to the one whom he appoints, for it is supposed that the third person was and remains under the power of the appointer. And for the same reason the appointed must necessarily likewise depend upon his will. For since no one man can serve two masters, not subordinate one to the other, I cannot impose a master on my subject without reserving power over him, and so he is made but a subordinate master. Thus a free people which sets a general over its troops is and remains the superior of them both. But whoever constitutes one over himself, or confers upon another sovereignty over himself, can no more remain his superior than he can command and obey at the same time.

¹ [The punctuation should be: et dominari ut possint, servire volunt.—Tr.]

But they go on to say that, since all government is for the sake of those who obey, not of those who command, that is, since the king exists for the people, not the people for the king, the people are superior to a king; for that, because of which another is created, surely appears worthier than that which is constituted for its sake. Yet not every sovereignty as, for instance, that of a master, is introduced for the sake of those who obey. Although, of course, if a master wishes to gain any profit from his sovereignty, he has to show some care for his slave. Moreover, the question is not, which is of greater value, the person of the king, or the entire people, if one or the other must perish, but whether, in view of the fact that civil sovereignty has been invented for the profit of all, the decision as to how to secure that end resides in those who have subjected their will to the will of a king, or in him to whose judgement and conscience the government has been entrusted.

Some infer, because they read that peoples are punished for the sins of their kings, that peoples were empowered to coerce them when they sinned, which is unintelligible without a power which surpasses the right of kings. For I cannot have imputed to me another's deed to which I have made no contribution. But it is inconceivable how a people could share in the guilt of their king's sin, especially if it was not to their liking, save by virtue of the fact that it failed to punish him. But for our part we hold it certain that the sins of kings do not on their own account entail any guilt upon subjects, unless the latter have positively contributed something to them. Euripides, Suppliants, [879-80]:

Seeing the guilt is nowise in the state

That through an evil pilot wins an evil fame. (W.)

But they may not themselves contract any guilt because they failed to forbid or punish such sins, since as inferiors they are neither able 727 nor bound to forbid or punish the sins of kings. For the obligation to prevent another's misdeeds, like the faculty, springs from power over another, or from sovereignty, which involves the right to direct another's actions. Therefore, the others could not be held for a deed of his before he was crowned, since equals have no authority over one another, nor can they after he has been constituted king, for it is an absurd statement that they, who, before conferring sovereignty upon a man as an equal, had no power either of authority or of violence to prevent his sins, received it after they had given him sovereignty over themselves. Nor can the sins of kings be imputed to subjects by reason of that pact by which they conferred sovereignty upon a king. For the citizens did not by that pact confer impunity upon the king, but only left him so much as he held before by reason of natural¹ liberty, since on no account could he exercise supreme sovereignty, were he not exempt from human punishment. Grotius, in the passage cited, has made a sufficient answer in the case that comes up in 2 Samuel, xxiv. A passage worth mentioning, as bearing on the seventeenth verse of that chapter, is found in Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. III, chap. i.

The statement made by some, that, as he who gives himself into slavery, retains the right to release himself again from those bonds, so an equal right belongs to a people which has submitted to the yoke of a monarch, would be admitted by no man in his senses, unless it be added that it may be done with the permission of the master or king, who thereby voluntarily yield up the right they had acquired. Add Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. III, at the beginning.

False also is the belief that, when a people whose nature was once suited to bear an absolute sovereignty has, in the course of time, put off its servile nature, it is within its rights in throwing off the sovereignty and regaining its natural liberty. For if such a case arises, it will be incumbent upon the prince prudently to temper his government to the changed character of his people. Silly also is it to say that, since a master who misuses his property can be restrained or deprived of his possessions, so also a prince who makes a wicked use of his power can be reduced to order. Because the reason why the former is possible is that there belongs to the prince a superior right over the property of citizens, it being to the interest of the state that it be not squandered to no purpose. But who would maintain that to subjects belongs some more eminent right above the rights of the prince, that is, that they are masters of their master? To the contrary remarks of princes, some of which are framed in a spirit of boastfulness², the reply may be made, that of course a prince should judge every matter with an eye to the welfare of the people. But this does not lead to the conclusion that citizens can coerce a prince, when they have concluded that he is employing means little suited to that end.

It is an absurd statement, that, since a people has no right to destroy itself, or to vent a savage rage upon its own body, such a right cannot be transferred to a king. For who would ever assign to a king the right to destroy his people? It will soon be shown that absolute sovereignty is not so formidable a thing, and we shall inquire in another connexion what a people may do when a king openly seeks their ruin. It is of no use to cite the cases of consuls, and such other magistrates who are likewise said to be set over a people, and yet have sometimes been reduced to order by the people.

¹ [For naturali read naturali.—Tr.]

² [For adjactantiam read ad jactantiam.—Tr.]

The argument advanced from sacred history, to the effect that the Hebrews threw off the yoke of the neighbouring nations, after it seemed to God that they had been sufficiently punished, must be regarded as not bearing upon the case. For they were still in a state of war with those peoples, and had never subjected themselves to the king, as citizens, by pledging their faith, and in that case were able by the right of war to treat their oppressors as enemies; or else they had received in this matter the express command of God, which may not be imitated by others, when it digresses from common right. Add Robert Sanderson, On the Obligation of Conscience, Prelection IX, §§ 16 ff.; Prelection X, §§ 13, 16, 22, 23.

728 7. Furthermore, it is clear enough that in some states sovereignty, especially that of kings, is free in the exercise of its acts, while in others it is restricted to a certain manner of procedure. From this arose the division of sovereignty into absolute and limited. In this connexion we should state, first of all, what the word 'absolute' properly denotes, which is loaded down with great hatred among those who have been reared in free states. Also the word, when taken in a sinister sense, can stir up wicked princes to vex a commonwealth and to practise every kind of knavery, flatterers being ever ready secretly to cast aspersions¹ upon princes, as they find it easy to feed their ambition and other vices by ostentatious repetition of that word. 'You are absolute,' they will say; 'therefore, it is allowable, if you wish it; therefore, waste your citizens and your neighbours with unnecessary wars, that you may be famed as a mighty warrior; therefore, insult and abuse whom you will; therefore, exhaust your citizens with exactions and plunderings, that there may be the means to serve your ambition or luxury.' Of this class was the flattery by Anaxarchus of Alexander, when he was grieving over his murder of Cleitus, as recorded by Plutarch, Ad Principem Indoctum [Ineruditum, iv, p. 781 B]: 'Justice and right sat as assistants by the throne of Zeus, so that whatsoever was done by a king might be accounted lawful and just.' (G.*) So also that in Sophocles, Antigone [506 f.]:

Manifold

A king's prerogatives, and not the least

That all his acts and all his words are law. (S.)

Nay, there exist some who undertake to buttress the absolute right of kings by arguments and statements of such a nature that they appear to measure it only in terms of impunity for crimes, and licence to vex a people. Therefore, to make our meaning clear, we will say at once: Just as it is understood to be the highest and absolute liberty of individual men, when they can decide upon their own affairs and acts in accordance with their own wish and judgement and not those of another, while always observing natural law, and that liberty belongs by nature to all men who are not subject to the sovereignty of another man, so when several men have come together into a perfect state, in it, as in a common subject, there must likewise be found the same liberty, or faculty to decide by their own judgement about the means that look to the welfare of the state. And this liberty is attended with absolute sovereignty, or the right to prescribe such means for citizens, and to force them to obedience. Therefore, there exists in every state in the strict sense of the word, an absolute sovereignty, at least in habit and theory, if not always in practice. For it is a contradiction that a man should be obligated to no one, and at the same time not have the right to come to a decision upon his own affairs by his own judgement and choosing. Yet that such absolute sovereignty on its own account involves nothing unjust or intolerable, is easily observable from the end of established states. For surely we do not establish states to the end that we may neglect natural law, and do everything according to our wicked lusts, but that the security and safety of every man may be better guarded by uniting the resources of many, and that therefore there may be opportunity for the safe exercise of natural law.

¹ [The phrase is from Plautus, Cistellaria, 35, a context that gives the key to this passage which has apparently been misunderstood by Barbeyrac and Kennet.—Tr.]

8. But when supreme sovereignty is considered as it is vested in one man, or in one council composed of a few or of all the citizens, as though in a proper subject, it is not observed to be everywhere so absolute and free, but sometimes to be limited by certain laws. Indeed, in democracies the distinction between absolute and circumscribed sovereignty is apparently not so clearly discoverable. For although in every democracy there must exist certain institutions established by custom, or sanctioned by written laws, namely, when and by whom the people shall be called to assembly, and the public business laid before them, and turned over for execution (for a state cannot be understood without such provisions), yet since that council in which is vested the supreme sovereignty is composed of the entire body of citizens, and so no one outside it secures any right from its decisions, nothing will prevent the same people being able to abrogate and modify them at any time. Add Andrea Maurocenus, Historia Veneta, Bk. XIII, p. 517 ff. This is illustrated by the story given in Plutarch, Solon [v], that Anacharsis laughed at Solon because he thought that he could curb the injuries and lusts of citizens by writings, which had no more strength than cobwebs. To whom Solon replied that men usually stand by pacts agreed upon, which neither party would profit by violating, and that he would so temper the laws to all citizens, that it would be clear to them, that it was more profitable¹ to cultivate justice than to break the law. But the outcome confirmed the judgement of Anacharsis more than the hope of Solon. And such will be the general fate of laws, unless a people bind itself by an oath to their perpetual observance, as was done at Rome in the matter of never tolerating another king. Although whether such an oath is binding, when no one survives who took it in the first place, is a question which has already been discussed, Bk. IV, chap. ii, § 17.

¹ [For antiquis read antiquius.—Tr.]

In this connexion we should note the cavil¹ of Caesar when he carried off the state treasury. This had been² set aside with a curse in the name of the state upon any one who dared use it save for a war against the Gauls. But according to Appian, Civil Wars, Bk. II [xli]: 'He claimed that the state had been freed from the obligation of this oath since he had subdued the Gauls, so that there was no longer any danger from them.' Herodotus, Bk. I [xxix], records that Solon bound the Athenians by an oath not to repeal any of his laws for ten years. Others, however, have tried to protect laws of this origin from being changed, by fixing a penalty upon the one who moved their abrogation, although such a penalty can be abrogated no less than the original law. Thus the people of Thasos passed a law: 'Whoever introduces a measure providing for a treaty with the Athenians shall be guilty of death'; Polyænus, Strategemata, Bk. II [xxxiii]; the Athenians one to the effect that no one should ever make a motion to recover Salamis; Plutarch, Solon [viii]; and Charondas among the Thurians that whoever wished to change a law should come to the assembly with a halter about his neck. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. xvii. In Xenophon, Anabasis, Bk. VI [iv. 8], it was decreed: 'Let the man be put to death who speaks of dividing the army.'

But in aristocracies and democracies, where there are some who command, and some who obey, and when, therefore, the latter can secure some right from the promises and pacts of the former, there is clearly to be seen a difference between absolute and limited sovereignty. In such he is absolute who administers sovereignty according to his own judgement, not in accordance with a norm of definite and perpetual statutes, but as the present state of affairs seems to require; and who, therefore, on his own judgement secures the welfare of the common wealth, as the times and conditions may demand. Thus, so far is the word 'absolute' from concealing anything hateful and intolerable for free men, that it lays upon princes who would satisfy the demands of their position and conscience, a necessity for far greater care and circumspection, than it does upon those who must conduct the affairs of state by set rule. Dio Chrysostom, Orations, lxii [3]:

A good prince covets nothing, because he feels that he has everything; he refrains also from sensuality, because there is none beyond his power, if he so desire; he is more just also than others, because he displays justice to all men; moreover he takes pleasure in toil,

¹ [For cavilatio read cavillatio.—Tr.]

² [For tuerant read fuerant.—Tr.]

because he toils voluntarily; and he loves the laws, because he does not fear them. And in all this his judgement is correct. For who needs more wisdom than the man who is to deliberate upon these themes? Who needs more rigid justice than the man who stands above the laws? Who needs more self-restrained temperance than the man who may do anything? And who needs greater courage than the man who keeps everything safe? (M.)

9. But since the judgement of a single man may be easily misled in seeking out what is for the welfare of the state, and not all are gifted with such soundness of mind that they know in such great liberty how 730 to control their lusts when they battle with reason (Herodian, Bk. I, chap. iv [6]: 'It is hard to lay out and maintain¹ bounds for the passions, when they are served by uncurbed power'), it has appeared advisable to many peoples not to commit in so absolute a fashion such power as this to a single man, whose judgement is not immune to errors, and whose choice easily turns to base desires, but to prescribe for him a definite manner of holding the sovereignty. Especially is this true after it has been observed that certain institutions and a particular manner of conducting affairs are best suited to the genius of a people and the conditions of a state. Nor does such a limitation of sovereignty work² an injury to princes who are raised to their eminence by the will of a people, for if they thought it a hardship to accept a sovereignty which they could not exercise as they pleased, they could have refused it. And their given pledge, by which they are bound when they accept such a sovereignty, in no wise allows them later to undertake to subvert the laws of the state by secret plottings, or deeds of violence, and to make themselves absolute³, for, as we are told by Pliny, Panegyric [lxv]: 'No one should guard his oath with greater scruples than he who is most concerned in not forswearing himself.'

Surely it is a trite and banal statement of some men, that, since kings are constituted by God, and He has enjoined upon them the proper conduct of their office, which is impossible without the exercise of supreme sovereignty, the conclusion is that God is held to have contributed to kings a certain measure of power, which neither they themselves should allow to be weakened⁴ or impaired, nor may the people rightfully demand such a thing, or enjoin it upon the king. Is it not as decent, they say, for a husband to agree with his wife to connive at her furtive amours, 'well trained to keep his eyes upon the ceiling, or to snore with wakeful nose over his cups?' [Juvenal, Satires, I, 56-7]. Or the bargain might run: '[...] That you were to go your way and I mine.' [Juvenal, Satires, VI. 281-2]. But, as we have already fully shown above, that civil sovereignties are derived from God, so it was left to men's free choice, at least to such as received no civil laws from the hand of God, what form of state they might desire to establish

¹ [After ἔπον read ἐνυβείων.—Tr.]

³ [For absolutus read absolutos.—Tr.]

² [For sii read fit.—Tr.]

⁴ [For delibitur read delibeitur.—Tr.]

over their group. It is a measured saying of Philip Melanchthon, Epitome Philosophiæ Moralis: 'We must recognize that there are different forms of kingdoms, and everywhere distinct degrees of liberty. Yet God sets His seal upon all forms of sovereignties which are agreeable to reason and nature.' In the same way, I should think, there can nowhere be found any command of God, to the effect that, when a free people is on the point of acknowledging a king, it should, for example, select not Gaius but Titius, or not set any procedure sanctioned from above, to be used in imposing sovereignty upon all rulers.

Nor can men with such views discover any support in the passage in 1 Samuel, viii, where some would find a description of a mere particular case, in which the royal power entailed some injury, and others of a true right, and such as belongs to all kings. But Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 3, following a middle course, holds that the action of a king is pointed out, but only such as has an effect consequent upon a right, namely, the obligation of non-resistance; or, in other words, although, when a king does such things, he is acting contrary to his duty, still his subjects cannot resist him any more than if he were doing such things with the fullest right. And for that reason it is added that the people beneath those injuries should implore the help of God, because there is no deliverance humanly possible. Therefore, he calls such power 'the right of a king' just as 'a judge is said to render justice (reddere ius), even when his decision is unjust'. Digest, I. i. 11.

731 But, in my opinion, the real sense of the passage can be arrived at in this manner. Up to that time the Hebrews had lived in a democracy, yet such as often had the appearance of that kingship which Aristotle calls the 'heroic'. A number of Judges, at the call of God, delivered them from the oppression of their enemies, or in times of peace rendered judgements, yet more with the authority of persuasion than any power to command, while their style of living was not better than that of other citizens, since they levied no taxes with which to meet the expense of the same. Add Grotius on Judges, i. 1. But the people, wearied with such conditions, desired a king on the model of the other nations, such a one, that is, as would be adorned with outward pomp and idle ceremony, and would maintain a standing army, or at least train the citizenry in the use of arms, so that they could face their enemies at the first onset. See 1 Samuel, xiii. 2; xiv. 48, 52. At this stage Samuel pictures to them the right of such a king and the disadvantages attendant upon such a new condition, in order that the people may give the matter due consideration before the final step. You wish, he says, a king with all the royal trappings. And yet he will be surrounded with a numerous retinue, and so 'he will take your sons and appoint them for his chariots and to be his horsemen, and to run before his chariots'. You wish a king who shall be surrounded with a standing army. But in that case he must 'appoint him captains over thousands and captains over fifties', of your sons, who before were free to give their services to the increase of your own property. The affairs of state will not permit such a king to look after his own fields. Therefore, he will take your sons 'to plow his ground and to reap his harvest, and to make his instruments of war and the instruments of his chariots', that he may equip his army. Since, furthermore, he will need ample service for his court, and it will not accord with the dignity of the wives and daughters of the royal house to have the care of so large an establishment; therefore, 'he will take your daughters to be perfumers, and to be cooks, and to be bakers'. Moreover, there will be need for many public servants to carry on the business of peace and war; therefore, 'he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your oliveyards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants.' For this use he will require even 'a tenth'. Nor less, when he has need, will he use 'your servants and your asses and put them to his work'. In a word, what he says is this: If you wish to have a king, you will have to support him in a kingly manner, and settle certain revenues upon him for that end; and if you afterwards chafe at this burden you will never be able to deprive him of his sceptre, when once by your election he has secured to the kingdom a right which may not be taken from him against his will.

From this it is manifest that this passage offers no protection to wicked princes, nor dictates any set measure, as it were, of kingly sovereignty, as by a law of God, a measure which can neither be added to nor diminished by agreements of men, but that it is no more than an outline of the burdens and expenses of the royal degree, whether absolute or limited. Therefore, it lies entirely within the will of free peoples, when they grant a king sovereignty, as to whether they wish it to be absolute or restricted by certain laws, provided, of course, such laws have in them nothing impious, and do not obstruct the end of sovereignty itself. For although at the first men enjoyed entire liberty to come together into a civil society, yet they were still subject to natural law, and so were obligated, of course, to draw up only such rules of sovereignty and civil obedience as were agreeable to that law and the lawful end of states.

10. But in order that we may correctly apprehend by what promise of a king (and the same is true of an aristocracy as well) sovereignty is no longer absolute (for it has not such power in every government), we must recognize that when a king accepts a throne he binds himself to administer it justly, by a promise which is either general or special, and is usually strengthened by an oath.

A general promise can be given either tacitly or expressly. A tacit promise to govern justly is understood to accompany the very acceptance of that function, even if no express mention be made of it. To this should be applied the remarks of Grotius on 2 Kings, xi. 17: 'The people promised to undertake the care of the king's welfare. This is what Josephus says. For it was not customary among the Hebrews for the king to make any promise to the people.' This means an express promise, and such as was made at the coronation. But the most usual procedure was for the promise to be made expressly, accompanied by an oath and certain formal rites. Nor is it unusual for the duties of the 732 king to be described in that promise in some general statement, or in an enumeration of the principal parts: for instance, that he undertakes to provide with due diligence for the advancement of the public welfare, that he will protect honest men and restrain scoundrels, that he will administer justice without favour, that he will oppress no one, and the like. Such promises do in no way impair the absoluteness of sovereignty. The king is, of course, thereby obligated to exercise his sovereignty justly, but what method or means he will take to secure that end is left to his judgement and choice.

A special promise, and one in which are expressed the manner and means of administering sovereignty, appears to have a twofold force, for it may bind only the conscience of the prince, while again it may make the obedience of citizens depend upon its fulfilment as upon a condition. It is the former kind of a promise, if the king undertakes, for example, not to appoint to office a certain kind of men, to grant no man special privileges which will involve a burden upon the rest, to pass no new laws, not to impose taxes or custom dues, not to employ foreign mercenaries, and the like, while at the same time no council is set up which the king must consult, in case the condition of the state urges him to depart from such promises (for these are always understood to contain this exception: Provided the public safety, which is the supreme law in laws of this nature, does not require otherwise), and such a council as could of its own right, and not precariously, take cognizance of such matters, and without whose consent citizens are obligated about such matters by the orders of the king. In such a case the administration of sovereignty is restricted according to certain laws, and when the king breaks them without necessity, he is unquestionably guilty of breaking faith. Yet citizens have no power to disobey the orders of the king on that account, or to make his acts void. For if the king says that the safety of the people, or the real welfare of the state, demands that (and such a presumption always attends the acts of a king), the citizens have nothing to reply, since they have not the power to take cognizance as to whether or not the necessity of the state demands such measures.

From all this the further point appears, namely, that a people does not take sufficient precautions for its own safety, if it is willing to accord a king only a limited sovereignty, and yet does not establish a council without whose consent those acts which have been excepted cannot be exercised, or if the king is not required to call it into assembly, where a debate may be held on the exercise of those acts. This last is better than if the king had to consult a council composed of only a small number of citizens, since it may happen that the personal advantages of those few may not coincide with what is to the public good, and that therefore they may, from private interests, not agree to the salutary proposals of the king.

The sovereignty of a king is more strictly limited, if, at its transfer, an express convention is entered into between king and citizens that he will exercise it in accordance with certain basic laws, and on affairs, over the disposal of which he has not been accorded absolute power, he will consult with an assembly of the people or council of nobles, and that without the consent of one of the last two he will make no decision; and that if he does otherwise, the citizens will not be bound by his commands on such affairs. The people that has set a king over them in this way is not understood to have promised to obey him absolutely and in all things, but in so far as his sovereignty accords with their bargain and the fundamental laws, while whatever acts of his deviate from them, are thereby void and without force to obligate citizens. Nor, on the other hand, is supreme sovereignty crippled by such fundamental laws. For all the acts of sovereignty can be exercised as well in such a monarchy as in an absolute one, save that in the latter the king follows his own judgement, at least in the ultimate decision, while in the former there lies within a council a concomitant cognizance, as it were, on which the force of sovereignty depends, not entirely but as on an absolutely necessary condition. Nor are there two wills in such a state, for whatever the state desires it desires through the will of the king. Although the result of such a restriction is that, except under a certain condition, the king cannot will some things, or else wills them to no effect. 733

And yet in such a monarchy the king does not cease to hold supreme sovereignty, nor is the council superior to him. For the following are faulty conclusions: 'This person cannot do everything as he pleases; therefore, he does not hold supreme sovereignty'; or: 'I am not obligated to obey this person in every respect; therefore, I am his superior or equal'; or: 'I cannot command this man in any way I please; therefore, he can lay positive commands upon me.' Furthermore, these two statements are very different things: 'I am bound to follow what this man decides, because I have obligated myself to it by a pact'; and 'I am bound to follow this man's will, because he can enjoin obedience upon me by virtue of his sovereignty'. Supreme and absolute are in no way one and the same thing. For the former denotes the absence of a superior or equal in the same order, but the latter the faculty of exercising every right on one's own judgement and choice.

But what if a conditional clause was expressly added, to the effect that, if the ruler did otherwise, he lost his throne? (We say 'expressly', for the force of a conditional law (lex commissoria) is not discoverable in such a clause as: 'If he does otherwise, I am not bound.') Yet among the Sabaeans their king was otherwise ἀνυπεύθυνος [not accountable], yet if he set foot outside his palace, he was stoned by the people in obedience to an ancient oracle. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. III, chap. xlvii; Agatharchides, De Mari Rubro, chap. 1. Here may be referred the account of Strabo, Bk. XV [i. 55]: 'If any woman in India has killed a king when he was intoxicated, she is married to his successor by way of reward.' The people of Aragon, after their king had taken an oath to preserve their privileges, used to promise him obedience in this fashion: 'We, who have as much power as you, make you our king and master on this condition, namely, that you maintain our laws and privileges, and not otherwise.' See Hotman, Franco-Gallia, chap. xii. Thus the emperor Severus at the opening of his reign not only swore that no senator would be put to death at his orders, but also commanded that a decree be issued to the following effect: 'If the emperor has caused the death of a senator, both he and the man whom he instigated to the crime, together with their children, should be regarded as enemies of the state.' Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio's Life of Severus. And yet not long after, Julius Solon, the very man who wrote that decree at the emperor's orders, was put to death.

Now it appears certain that he to whom a kingdom is committed with such a conditional clause, is not an absolute prince. Yet apparently nothing prevents a prince from holding in this manner a sovereignty that is limited and yet truly monarchical. For although we should grant that a temporary sovereignty cannot be recognized as supreme, yet you would scarcely call that one temporary which depends on a condition which is potential and within the power of the king to perform. Nor is such a king subject to the judgement of the people¹, as though it were empowered to inquire into whether or not he has broken his faith. For beside the fact that such a conditional clause usually includes such matters as are obvious upon the face of them, and so are not open to any uncertain argument, such an inquiry does not have the nature of a judicial investigation whereby the action of a subject is probed and sounded, since it is nothing other than a mere formal declaration, which a man calls to witness that his manifest right is violated by another, a thing which is possible also for an inferior. Compare Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 16.

Grotius in the passage just cited speaks rather obscurely when he says that, by the promises of kings, an obligation lies either upon the exercise of the act, or even upon the faculty itself; and that an act contrary to promises of the former kind is called unjust but valid, but one against those of the latter kind is even void. It is as though he would say: 'Sometimes a king promises that he will make no use of a part of his supreme sovereignty save in a certain manner, and sometimes he entirely renounces a part.' On this point two remarks should 734 be made: In the first place, acts can still be void which are performed contrary to an obligation of the first kind; for instance, if a king should promise that he will not levy new taxes without consulting the representatives of the people, I should judge that any levy which he made on his own decision would be void. The other is, that, by the second kind of a promise, the parts of supreme sovereignty are split up or mutilated.

¹ [For popouli read populi.—Tr.]

II. But for the more thorough understanding of the nature of limited monarchies, we should know that the matters which come up in the administration of a state are usually of two kinds. For some can be decided in advance, by reason of the fact that whenever they arise they are of the same nature, while on others a judgement as to whether or not they are to the advantage of the state can be reached only at the time they arise, because it cannot be foreseen what circumstances will attend them. With both of these kinds a people which has decided upon a limited monarchy could take due precautions that no hurt be done the state; in the case of the former kind of business, by passing permanent laws which the king would be required to observe, in the latter kind, by specifying that he consult with the assembly of the people, or the council of nobles. Thus a people which is satisfied of the truth of its religion, and that the manner in which it is organized and conducted is that which is best suited to its genius, could lay down a law for the king, when they crowned him, that he would not on his own authority make any change in matters of the religion of the land. Again, who does not know how often justice is handicapped, when it is meted out, without written laws, on the sole judgement of the sovereign, and by what is equable and right, which, however, is frequently not by reason but by passion or ignorance? See Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIII, chap. iv, § 2. To avoid such an inconvenience a people can obligate a king either to enact equable laws himself, or to observe those already in existence, and order that justice be delivered in accordance with those laws by certain bodies, and that only the most serious cases, or such as are appealed, be laid finally before the ruler. Although, for that matter, it is often the practice of a king to leave invidious cases to the decision of others. Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. XII [626 ff.]: 'To escape the hateful burden of a choice between them, Tantalides bade the Grecian captains assemble in the midst of the camp, and he referred to all the decision of the strife.' (M.) Furthermore, this is often a convenient excuse to turn off the persistent intercessions of men of influence on behalf of guilty persons. 'The severity and authority of the laws are stronger than my will and purpose, and the sentences of judges prevail over my judgement', was a common expression of Andronicus Comnenus¹, according to Nicetas Acominatus, De Imperio Andronici, Bk. I.

So also, since it is well known that what has been won through the sweat of others is easily squandered by ambition and luxury, some peoples have taken measures against wealth being the means by which kings may give free rein to their vices, by wisely assigning their rulers a certain income, such as they thought sufficient for the ordinary expenses of the state, and designated that, if more was desired, the matter should be laid before the council. Moreover, since some kings are more eager than is just in their desire for glory in warfare, and by rushing into unnecessary wars hazard both their own lives and the existence of the commonwealth, proper caution was displayed by those who, in conferring sovereignty upon their kings, stipulated that they should first consult a council, especially if they planned an offensive war. Franc. Lopez de Gomara, Historia Indiae Occidentalis, chap. xcv, writes that the inhabitants of Borneo hated war and war-loving kings, and for that reason regularly station them in front of the first line of battle. To conclude, on these matters and also on others, a people may decide upon what it has observed to be for the benefit of the commonwealth, lest if the king be allowed absolute power over their disposals, he may possibly give too little heed to the public welfare.

From what has been said it is clear in what sense is to be taken the statement of the ancient Greek writers on politics and their followers, namely, that the government of a state should be committed to laws rather than to men. For that can have no other fit meaning than this:

735 Care should be taken that those who rule should govern the commonwealth according to the direction of established laws, rather than by their own private and uncircumscribed² pleasure. For otherwise mere laws are no more suited to govern a state than a mariner's compass without a skipper to direct a ship. It was on this theory that, as is shown in detail by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxi, the royal power in Egypt was limited. Add also what is recorded in Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VII, chap. xxii, at the end, and Solinus, chap. lxvi, concerning the king of Taprobane. So in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius, Bk. III, chap. x [34], it is said: 'The law of the (Hindu) sages did not allow a king to be with them more than one day.' (C.) Even more unusual is what is told by Solinus, chap. xxxv [xxii. 13 f. addit., p. 219 Mommsen], of the king of the Hebrides:

¹ [For Commenus read Comnenus.—Tr.]

² [For in circumscripto read incircumscripto.—Tr.]

The king has nothing of his own, but all things are held in common. He is bound to equity by strict laws. And in order that avarice may not turn him from truth, he learns justice by the aid of poverty, in having no single possession of his own. However, he is maintained at the expense of the state. No wife is given him, but he may take for his pleasure, in turn, whomsoever his desire falls upon. In this way he may neither pray for children nor hope for them.

A hard lot was that of the king of the Mossynoeci, who was shut up in a tower on the day he pronounced an unjust sentence and starved to death. Apollonius Rhodius, Argonautic Expedition, Bk. III [II. 1026-8].

12. But since in most cases a king who is limited in those acts which a people was unwilling to leave to his absolute sovereignty, has to seek the advice of an assembly of the people, or of representatives of the estates into which it is divided, we should observe further that the power of such a gathering is not everywhere the same. For in some kingdoms the king himself, who is absolute in all other matters, appoints a council or senate, without whose approval he is unwilling for his laws to be valid. Under this head I suppose should be classed the Chinese monarchy as described in Neuhoof, Generalis Descriptio Sinae, chap. i. Of course such a senate will have the authority only of a group of advisers, and will criticize the decrees of the king and reject what it deems less advantageous¹ for the commonwealth, not by its own right but only by a power granted it by the king himself, who took this way² to avoid making any decisions through imprudence, or on the urge of flatterers, that would be prejudicial to the state. On this point bears a passage of Plutarch, Apophthegms [174 B; 183 F]:

The Egyptian monarchs maintain a certain law of theirs, by which they bind their judges with an oath that they are not to gratify the king himself, if he demands of them an unjust judgement. (And further on he records): Antigonus the Third, (as it is said), wrote to his city-states, that, if he ordered them in writing to do anything illegal, to pay no attention to him, for it meant merely that he had made a mistake through ignorance.

See Code, I. ix. 7. This is at times also a way of avoiding importunate demands, in that the prince may make a show of granting what he knows the senate will reject. See Code, X. xii. 1; Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. III, chap. iv, p. 455; Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. V, p. 277 ff.; Iohannes Labardaeus, Historiae de Rebus Gallicis, Bk. III, pp. 13-133 [132-3], ed. Paris, 1671.

But when the king is bent upon having his will prevail, and feels that the reasons advanced by the senate are of little weight, that body can proceed no further in opposing the king's power. For it is not presumed that the king in appointing a senate of this kind wished entirely to renounce his right of absolute sovereignty, and of his own accord made conditional the obedience which he was otherwise able to require of citizens without recourse. And so the power held by that senate is only delegated by the king, and can be limited at his pleasure, although he should not do so save for very grave reasons. And yet this much is possible, when such a senate has once been voluntarily constituted by a king, namely, that his successors on coming to the throne may be bound by an oath not to dissolve it.

¹ [For ex pedire read expedire.—Tr.]

² [For mod read modo.—Tr.]

736 Yet the sovereignty does not cease to be absolute by the establishment of such a senate, especially when power is still vested in the king to dissolve it. For the nature of absolute sovereignty is not that a king may do whatever he pleases, in blind lust or upon hasty impulse, but that he has the final decision on his own judgement in matters which concern the commonwealth, or a power which is not incompatible with a necessity to heed sound reasons. Therefore, although the advice given a king by such a senate does not obligate him of itself, and by the power residing in it, it nevertheless furnishes the occasion for an obligation, in so far as it calls to his attention the manner in which he can fulfil his duty in the matter at hand. In the same way a doctor cannot of himself lay an obligation upon a patient, and yet after he has shown him what is for his health, the sick man is obligated to follow his counsel in accordance with the law of nature which enjoins upon every person the care of his life and health. Add 1 Kings, xii, 7-8. Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. V, chap. xxxvii, p. 122, writes: 'It is a custom observed almost regularly by Chinese kings of the better sort, when they are admonished by philosophers and worthy men on the avoidance of vices, the pursuit of virtue, or any matter whatsoever, to receive it with bent knee.' Add Idem, Bk. VI, chap. i, p. 204 ff.

The same conclusion must be reached about the assemblies of the estates which only serve the end of being a larger council for the king, through which the complaints of the people, which are often unexpressed in a private council, may reach the ears of the king, who is thereupon free to do what seems best to his ends. See Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 10; and Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxx, where he is correct in observing, that, if supreme sovereignty should reside in a king, and unless a state has two heads, such a body cannot undertake the conduct of more business than the king lays before it, since such deputies of the people could have been instructed on nothing more than is contained in the letters by which they were summoned. So also the assembly is dissolved, when the king serves notice that, for the present, there is no further business for them. Yet it is not forbidden to give the king advice in the form of petitions.

But a monarchy is actually limited when the citizens have conferred it upon a king, with the condition that in certain spheres of action he confer with a council of the estates, without whose consent no decrees of the king will be valid. Although the king ought still to be empowered to call and dissolve that council, and to present to it the matters to be discussed in it, unless we wish to leave him the mere name of king, or to form an irregular state. And even if such orders when summoned may on their own initiative offer some suggestions looking to the kingdom's safety, yet their decrees on such matters will secure force only from the king's ratification. Such estates differ from counsellors properly speaking in this, that, although both can treat with the king only through advice and suggestion, he can reject the suggestions of the latter but not those of the former. Nor will a king take it as an affront, if the estates do not accept some of his proposals, for he has promised always to hold before his eyes the welfare of the state, on which the judgement of a number of picked men is presumed to be better than that of one. Therefore, in case the estates happen to differ with him, the king may blame his own imprudence, or base passions, or the unhappy state of the commonwealth. And it is also patent from this, that it is an empty fear when some think that by this arrangement it will lie in the hands of the estates, whether or not the state be safe. For surely we cannot reasonably expect such folly of the king, that he will be unable clearly to set forth to the estates the needs of the commonwealth, or of the estates, so that, when they have observed them, they will persist in betraying their own safety.

But this is certain, that, since they who have conferred a limited sovereignty upon a king are in no way presumed either to have wished to destroy or to dissolve the state, or to draw up their pacts in such a fashion that it is impossible to attain the end of states, agreements of this kind are always to be interpreted in such a way as to contribute to the common safety of all, and on no account to oppose it. And there- 737 fore, in every agreement it should be held that they intended those conditions and agreements never to lead to the commission of anything which would prejudice the common safety of all, and the public welfare, or lead to the overthrow or dissolution of the state. But in the event of such things happening, it would be agreeable, if the matter admits of delay, that such a proposal be made in the gathering of the people or estates; and if this is impossible the king will be empowered carefully to correct pacts which are destined to lead to the destruction of the state. And this applies even to laws of the state of long standing, which sometimes lie dormant at the bidding of the safety of the state, which is the highest law of all. An instance is found in Plutarch, *Agerilau*s [pp. 612-13], when that general commanded that the laws of Lycurgus sleep for one day, so that the soldiers who had fled from the field of Leuctra might return without suffering disgrace. So also the observance of ordinary legal procedure in a state is often not permitted by the times, or by the condition of the offending persons, who, if they were to be tried as criminals, would first have to be vanquished with arms. So we must accept with a grain of salt the statement of Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxix, when he calls what is inflicted by public authority, an act against an enemy, not a punishment, unless it is preceded by a public condemnation. That is true enough when no offence preceded. But when an offence has so preceded, the evil inflicted will be a punishment, even though the times have not allowed the guilty person to be condemned by orderly process.

13. Hobbes apparently does not want to recognize any distinction between supreme and absolute sovereignty, but feels that all supreme sovereignty is likewise absolute. In this connexion we should observe, that in all the statements which he couches in too crude a manner, the restriction should be added, 'as becomes the end of states'. So, for instance, when he says in his De Cive, chap. v, § 6, that he to whom belongs the right in a state to exact punishments 'rightfully compels all persons to all things which he himself desires'. Just as he himself expresses a limitation (chap. v, § 6), in defining 'all things' as 'what are necessary for peace and defence', and again (chap. v, § 9), as 'for the common peace and defence'. And again (chap. vi, § 13) he says that there is connected with the right of the supreme sovereign so much obedience on the part of citizens 'as is necessarily required for the government of a state'. Thus when he says in the same section: 'Whoever has so subjected his will to the will of a prince that the latter can do whatever he pleases, declare laws, settle disputes, inflict punishments, use the persons and wealth of all at his pleasure, and all these things rightfully, has surely granted him the highest sovereignty which can be granted'; we must bear in mind the intention or thought with which men made up their minds to establish states. Therefore, it is held that no more power was voluntarily bestowed upon that prince than what a man of reason may judge to make to that end; although what may at any particular moment work to that end is a matter for decision, not by those who do the transferring, but by him on whom that power was transferred. Therefore, the supreme sovereign can rightfully force citizens to all things which he judges to be of any advantage to the public good. But to force citizens to such things as are repugnant to the safety of a state, or opposed to natural laws, should be a thing never even contemplated, and if he has undertaken any such enormity, he oversteps without a doubt the limits of his power.

Let us also consider the arguments by which the same author in his De Cive, chap. vi, § 17, endeavours to prove that it would be useless to undertake to limit sovereignty. He says: 'That gathering', which prescribed laws upon a future king, 'had an absolute power' at least actually or virtually. 'If that gathering continues or adjourns from time to time to meet at a certain time and place, that power will be continuous', and so the king will not have supreme sovereignty, but will assemble by its own right and to pass finally upon any business of the commonwealth, and if the king is responsible to it.) 'But if it once fully dissolves itself, and if the state is not dissolved at the same time, there must be left somewhere a power to punish those who break the laws, which is impossible without absolute power.' But this is false, as is likewise the argument by which he would prove his statement: 'For whoever has so much strength rightfully allotted him that he can restrain any citizen by punishments, has such power that a greater cannot be conferred upon him by citizens.' But whoever has thought upon the end of states, and considered that citizens by submitting their will and strength have not been made into immovable things without nerves of their own, and that they can grant another the use of their strength upon condition, decide whether that condition exists, and, in case it does not, withdraw their strength; such a person will easily perceive the weakness of this argument.
738 be only a magistrate. (This we concede, if that gathering is able to

It is likewise clearly untrue that there is not more guarantee against the abuse of sovereignty when limited, than if it be left absolute. For he who has sufficient strength to defend all (a thing which all citizens not downright stupid freely grant their king), has not always sufficient strength to destroy them. The commands of a general, strong enough though they be to incite his soldiers to a vigorous attack upon the enemy, are found nerveless in case he commands them to turn their weapons upon one another. And in general wise princes, although they be absolute, adapt themselves to the genius of their citizens, and often urge with moderation matters that are to their advantage, when they cannot be forced to their duty without that act entailing some peril to the state. But no less prudent are those citizens who, knowing well what would not prove expedient to the state, have, by fundamental laws, put it out of the power of the king to constrain them in such matters.

14. Finally, it is another characteristic of supreme sovereignty, especially as it resides in monarchs, that the manner of holding it be either plenary or more or less limited. For some kings are said to hold their kingdom by way of a patrimony, while others are said to keep it in the way of use only, and with a kind of right of usufruct, and this either for life, or to transmit also to one's descendants under a certain law or condition. In the case of still others a certain period is fixed for their holding the sovereignty, at the end of which they lose it and return to the condition of private citizens. In fact, Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vii, § 16; chap. ix, § 11, calls such as have received the sovereignty only for their lifetime, 'temporary' monarchs, and regards them all not as monarchs but only ministers of the state. Yet it is opposed to common usage to call him who loses his sovereignty only at the end of his life, a temporary prince, since the term is properly applied only to those whose power expires at a distinct and definite point of time, by its own right and not by chance.

15. But scholars are not as yet agreed as to whether there can be a temporary monarch. Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 11, would pass off the Roman dictator whose sovereignty ended after six months, as a genuine monarch, maintaining that the dictator during his period of office performed all acts by virtue of the same legal right which a king has who possesses absolute power; and his acts could not be rendered null and void by any one. (And yet) the character of immaterial things is recognized from their effects, and legal powers which have the same effects ought to be designated by the same name.

Yet there is no question but a greater¹ dignity attends a perpetual sovereignty than a temporary one, for men regularly accord those who, they know, will never return to the position of a private citizen, a deeper respect than those whom they will see a little later on their own level. In fact Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. I, chap. viii, before his time, and learned men after him, have shown that the dictator was not a monarch but only an extraordinary magistrate. Nor does that axiom of his stand on very firm ground, that 'those faculties are the same which seem to produce the same effects'; for one must also consider whether a man exercises that faculty as his own, or as delegated to him by another. For the same reason Grotius is scarcely correct in the same passage in listing in the class of temporary monarchs those 'who are made regents of a kingdom before a king has attained to his majority, or while the king is prevented from reigning by madness or captivity. Under such conditions regents are not subject to the people, and their power is not revocable before a time fixed by law.' (K.) For these exercise supreme sovereignty not in their own name but in that of another, and so can no more be called monarchs than a guardian can be called the owner of his ward's property. Furthermore, no one acquainted with Roman history would admit that each and all of the parts of supreme sovereignty were at one time so entirely in the hands of a dictator, that for his period of six months he could exercise them as he wished. Nor is it an absurdity for there to be a magistrate from whose decision, at least in certain matters, there could be no appeal. See Genesis, xli. 40, 44; Code, VII. lxii. 19; I. iv. 8; VII. xlii. i; Digest, IV. iv. 18. Add also Livy, Bk. VI, chap. xxxviii; VIII. xxxiii; XXII. xxv; Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 8, at the end.

It should be observed, in this connexion, that the power of dictators and such other magistrates who rule for a definite length of time, expires when such time is past, and that by the law of their office they retire to a private station; and so any act of theirs after that time is to be held that of a private citizen, to whom every one may rightly deny obedience, whatever external signs of power they may still actually retain. Therefore, no new decree of the people is needed to abrogate the sovereignty of such magistrates, but if they refuse to lay down their office, action can be begun against them upon the basis of the old decree. For rights, the validity of which depend upon a certain length of time, expire the very moment it has arrived, but if a legal action is to be instituted where there is a question on the quality of certain performances, there is then need of inquiry and judgement. The reason for this distinction is that no question can arise as to whether a set time has elapsed, while something can be said on both sides of the question, whether or not an action was undertaken rightly. See Livy, Bk. III, chaps. xxxviii ff.

¹ [For najor read major.—Tr.]

Now some hold it impossible to find an instance of temporary sovereignty, if one is to discuss supreme and not vicarious sovereignty. For the fact recorded by Dio, Bk. LIII, that Augustus wished the imperium granted him for only ten years, and then extended another ten, was but a jest. According to what is given by Curtius, Bk. V, chap. ix [45], Nabarzanes mingled villainy with his jesting:

Resign for a while the government and chief dignity to another, who shall continue king only till the enemy withdraw from Asia; then the conqueror will restore to you the sacred deposit. [. . .] Let us inaugurate Bessus, the satrap of Bactriana, temporary king. At the happy termination of our perplexities, he will transfer to you, his liege sovereign, the chief authority assigned to him on trust. (A.*)

More plausibility can be claimed for an instance of a kingdom in trust, in what is recorded by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. IV, chaps. xxiii, xxxiii. So also we read in Nicephorus Gregoras, Bk. IV, that Michael Palaeologus was obligated by an oath to administer the empire until his legitimate heir and successor had come of age, whereupon he was freely to withdraw in that son's favour alone from the royal throne and from all the insignia of sovereignty; although that oath was never kept. On the pact of Eteocles and Polyneices, that they would reign alternate years, it may perhaps be said that they did this so that they might keep the kingdom undivided, in thus administering it every other year. See Euripides, Phoenician Maidens; Statius, Thebaid, Bk. I.

16. Upon that manner of holding the throne, whereby monarchies are said to be in the patrimony of their kings, it should be observed, at the outset, that a man's patrimony is not so much what he holds in the way of inheritance from his parents, as what he possesses in plenary dominion, no matter how he obtained it. Furthermore, as dominion is properly understood to have to do with things, so they are also said to be in a patrimony because they have no inherent right to prevent their owner being able at his pleasure not only to use but to misuse them. At a later time slaves began to be classed as things belonging to a patrimony, since their masters came to assert such a claim over them that they were understood to live or die not so much to their own gain or loss as to that of their masters. And to such things as these were the patrimonies of the father of a family confined at the beginning. For although the right to control wives and children belonged to them alone, yet since that right also concerned the safety of the latter, the heads of families did not include them in their patrimony, or wish them to be included among their wealth. See Digest, L. xvii. 126, § 1, with the comments of Jacques Godefroy; Digest, IX. ii. 33. So also the learning and skill of free men are not properly listed among their goods, no matter how great a source of profit they may be. Philo Judaeus, On Noah's Planting [xvii]:

Paintings are said to be the inheritance of painters, and, in short, any art is said to be the inheritance of the artist, not looked at as an earthly possession, but as a heavenly prize; for none of such things is the property of any master, but still they are an advantage to those who possess them. (Y.)

Yet for many men such possessions take the place of a patrimony. Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. III [588]: 'His craft was all his wealth.' (M.)

But when later the ambition of rulers began to list among their chief possessions sovereignty over men, and many had grown accustomed to misusing the property of their subjects to the satisfaction of their lusts, those kingdoms were included in a patrimony, of the alienation of which at their pleasure rulers had received the power to dispose, because this was understood to be a part of the highest force of dominion. And other kings who were not conceded so great a power over their kingdoms were commonly said to hold them as a personal possession, and by a kind of right of usufruct. The origin of this distinction seems to be traceable in the main to different ways of acquiring a kingdom. For although the consent of the subjects is required for the lawful crowning of all kings, yet there are certainly different ways in which that consent is secured. Thus in some instances a king favours his subjects by being willing to gather them into his kingdom, while in others a king is greatly indebted to his subjects for their elevating him to the throne. Again, those who gave cause for the undertaking of a just war against them, could, upon being defeated, lose by right of war their lives, or personal liberty, and all their possessions. Surely whatever condition they are left in may well be regarded as an act of generosity on the part of the victor. If the king leaves to the vanquished personal liberty and private ownership of property, he is at least understood to claim in a full and irrevocable manner sovereignty over them for himself and his family. If a question arises, it is presumed that a prince did the same thing when he took under his protection those who were threatened with destruction. What is urged against patrimonial kingdoms by Francis Hotman, Quaestiones Illustres, I, is met by Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 12. The effect following upon this manner of holding sovereignty is seen clearest in the fact, that not only is the condition of subjects fixed at the will of kings, but also that a king can transfer his right over such a kingdom to whomsoever he pleases, and so establish a manner of succession at his pleasure.

17. Now when a king is named by a people on their own volition, each person is presumed in that act¹ to have reserved for himself all of his rights which are consistent with the nature of a state. And so the condition in which the citizens in such kingdoms live, depends not so much on the choice of the king as on that of the citizens themselves, who, however, had of necessity to give up of their natural liberty so much as the form of the commonwealth which they were to introduce regularly demands. Furthermore, since most men are usually moved to the voluntary bestowal of a kingdom by some special consideration which is not found in every ruler, and since whoever voluntarily subjects himself to the sovereignty of a man, is willing to be under this person, indeed, but not necessarily under another, it is regularly understood of such a kingdom that the question to whom it shall fall at the death of the elected king, depends upon the will of the people. And if in such a case the people does not desire to select each successive king by a special election, it will still be empowered to decide upon the order of succession and the power of the king will have no force in opposing the will of the people. It is primarily on this consideration that such kings are said by some writers to hold their kingdoms by a right of usufruct, because they can institute no change in the intrinsic structure of the state, nor take any part in the transfer of it to another, on their own initiative, against the wishes of the people. Compare Digest, VII. i. 13, § 8; VII. i. 15, § 1; Code, III. xxxiii. 9. 741

Yet I should be unwilling to carry any further the comparison between a king who is crowned by the will of a people, and a man who enjoys only the usufruct of a thing. And so I could on no account give my approval to the following statement of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vii, § 16:

If we grant that the people departed not from the election of a temporary monarch (that is, one on whom sovereignty has been conferred only for his lifetime), before they decreed a certain time and place of meeting after his death; then the monarch being dead, the authority is confirmed in the people, not by any new acts of the subjects, but by virtue of the former right. For all the supreme command, as dominion, was in the people; but the use and exercise of it was only in the temporary monarch, as in one that takes the benefit, but hath not the right.

Indeed, this statement, if taken in such an unmeasured form, we hold to be highly prejudicial to all monarchs who are set up by the free will of a people, and who are bound by certain 'fundamental laws', as they are called. Especially, since, if he who is crowned only for his lifetime can be called a temporary monarch, they also can deserve this name who have received a sovereignty which is to continue only in their family. And since Hobbes does not state how far he will carry this comparison of a king with a usufructuary, it will be easy to entangle him in dangerous conclusions. For since dominion is in itself a nobler right than temporary usufruct, one could easily conclude that a people is superior to a king, and can degrade him, if he has not administered the kingdom according to its wishes.

¹ [For ubi read ibi.—Tr.]

For the same reason we must also reject his view in Leviathan, chap. xix, that kings who have been elected do not possess supreme power. And his other opinion, that, whoever has the power to appoint the successor upon the death of a king, also holds the supreme power during his lifetime, since a man cannot give another what he himself does not already have. For as to the force itself of sovereignty over subjects, it is a matter of little moment what is agreed upon in any kingdom in case of an interregnum. Even when that has been provided for, citizens can still render the strictest obedience and can, with nothing to hinder, be excluded from every power in the state; nor will they be permitted to consider a new form of state or a successor during the lifetime of their king. It does not follow, because an elected king is unable to name his successor, that he holds only the usufruct and not the dominion, as it were, of sovereignty, and that he is but the administrator of another's property. For it is not necessary, in order that the power to look out for my welfare and to direct my actions as I choose (which power was for a time in the hands of another) may return to me, that the sovereignty be, as it were, so torn asunder that its κτῆσις [possession] lies with one, while only its χρῆσις [use] is transferred to another. When he to whom belonged even absolute sovereignty over 742 another, perishes, natural liberty is, as it were, born again of its own nature. Who, for example, would attribute to a father only χρῆσις [use] of paternal sovereignty, because at his death his children become their own masters (sui iuris), or allow a master but the χρῆσις [use] of his master's sovereignty, because when he dies without any heir his slave regains his liberty?

CHAPTER VII

ON THE WAYS OF ACQUIRING SOVEREIGNTY, ESPECIALLY MONARCHICAL SOVEREIGNTY

- | | |
|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The way of acquiring sovereignty in a democracy is uniform;2. But it varies in an aristocracy and in a monarchy.3. How far sovereignty may be seized by just force;4. How far by unjust force.5. How a person may be freed from another's sovereignty.6. The different kinds of election.7. The definition of an interregnum¹,8. And of interreges². | <ol style="list-style-type: none">9. An examination of the position of Hobbes.10. What if a posthumous successor is 'expected'?11. On succession in a patrimonial kingdom;12. And in kingdoms established by the will of a people; and if it be a simple hereditary succession,13. Or lineal,14. Or by transverse degrees.15. On the judge of disputes about successions in kingdoms. |
|--|---|

SINCE in our discussion of how a man acquires sovereignty, it is regularly presumed that he who is said to acquire a kingdom is different from those over whom it is acquired, it is obvious that this question has little to do with democracies, since in them those who command are distinguished from those who obey, not in a physical but only in a moral respect. For even though it may sometimes happen that a democracy is established by revolution and the overthrow of the nobles or of the king, yet since the sovereign and the subject in it are always the same, in no sense will it be said that a people acquired sovereignty in a violent fashion, or that it constituted sovereignty over itself by such violence as belongs to subjects. And so in democracies, which differ in this respect from monarchies, the way of holding sovereignty is always uniform. And yet democracies, like other states, may receive their increases by the violence of war.

2. But in aristocracies a distinction is observable in the way of acquiring sovereignty not only in the fact that in some cases it has been delivered to nobles by the voluntary consent of a people, and in some has been secured by force, but also because to fill the places made vacant by death in that council, election is used in some places, while in others birth alone elevates a man to membership. In monarchies this distinction manifests itself far more clearly. For although all monarchs have need of the consent of a people if their sovereignty is to be made legitimate, still this consent is secured in different ways, and those who gain their sceptres by the free consent of a people, owe this elevation either to election or to succession.

3. Now a violent way of acquiring sovereignty is usually called

¹ [For inter regnum read interregnum.—Tr.]

² [For inter reges read interreges.—Tr.]

seizure. On this we should observe that it differs from that seizure whereby we make things that have no master our own by merely laying 743 hands upon them. For since no right inheres in such things to prevent any man being able to claim them for his own (unless some civil law interfere), no special title is needed to secure dominion over them, but mere physical apprehension with the intention to keep them for one's own is enough. But since men are by nature all equal, and so no one is subject to another's sovereignty, it follows that mere force and seizure are not sufficient to constitute legitimate sovereignty over men, but that there is need of some other additional title. Therefore, when Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iii, § 4, lays it down that, 'Of things, which properly belong to no one, two are capable of seizure, sovereignty and dominion, in so far as the latter is distinguished from the former', the word 'sovereignty' should not be taken in its proper sense, and as that which is exercised over men, but of sovereignty over territories, the effect of which is that no one should settle in them against our will, unless he is willing to become our subject. For otherwise a man is not included in those things which belong to no one, but he who is not another's is his own. Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. IV [iii. 10], says: 'No one is so devoted to us as we are to ourselves.' Therefore, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ix, § 1, is correct in saying that, 'If a man dies without any heir his servants become free and the peoples subject to him become their own masters (sui iuris)', because these two classes are not by their own nature subject to seizure. Yet I should have preferred that he had omitted that limitation, 'unless they renounce their liberty of their own accord'. For what man will we find who would hold his liberty derelict, that is, who, although unwilling to go without a master, feels that it is immaterial whether he be the slave of one man any more than of another? We conclude, then, that only such seizure may constitute sovereignty as presupposes a just cause for attack, and is strengthened by the consent of subjects and a subsequent pact. The rule of the Incas of Peru is justly to be commended. It was to advance their sovereignty by degrees and without violence, winning new subjects preferably by the clemency of their sway. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. II, chap. xix. And, indeed, if there is no pact, a state of war continues, and no obligation, trust, and hence even no sovereignty is intelligible.

In this connexion we should examine the view of J. F. Hornius, De Civitate, Bk. II, chap. ix, § 2, who writes as follows: 'If a man conquers in war one who has attacked him unjustly and deserves his fate for other injuries, he has a perpetual and lawful power over his foe, and need not wait for his consent.' And yet how can one change from a state of war to one of peace without an intervening pact? How will faith and obedience be due to a man who has not bargained for them?

The only advantage the victors obtain by a just war is that they do not have to elicit the consent of the conquered by flattery or entreaties, but can extort¹ it by the threat of extreme penalties. And so Hornius achieves nothing in asserting: 'If the consent of the vanquished were necessary, a lawful victor could never secure sovereignty by seizure, because seizure would have no efficacy if the vanquished should not consent.' And yet since this seizure presupposes a victor of superior strength, and hence able to threaten the vanquished with some evil, that very seizure will have the effect that the vanquished cannot refuse the victor their consent. For although there is no one who would not prefer victory to defeat, yet every sane man will prefer to get off with a lesser evil, when he sees himself overcome²; nor will he hold his consent to his victor's sovereignty a thing to his own hurt, since he can thereby escape death.

4. But what if a man has seized sovereignty by unjust force? Now, without doubt, to avoid a greater evil, whatever be the source of the threat, a democratic people³, or the majority of them, may renounce their liberty, and agree to the sovereignty of one man or of a council. So also all men confess that a people subject to a king can submit to another in order to avoid destruction, and after no further defence is to be found 744 in their sovereign. But it is a question of greater compass, how, in view of the fact that an unjust fear renders void a pact, and that whoever causes another's loss by injuring him is obligated to make restitution, the consent of subjects, when wrung from them by fear of a greater evil, can confer lawful sovereignty upon their attackers, to such a degree that the latter can find peace of conscience in a consent secured in this way. For such statements as the following of Hornius are arrant nonsense: 'Since an attacker did not take the sovereignty, which he accepted with the consent of a people, from the people, but received it of God over the people, it follows that if it were to be returned, it must be returned to God, not to the people.' But since Hornius himself grants a people the power to designate the subject upon whom God may pour forth majesty from heaven, it will be enough if the oppressor return that power to the people. For if a people has recovered the faculty to choose any man king whom it pleases, it will, I imagine, decide that it is of little interest to them whether the assailant keeps that majesty as his own, or resigns it to God.

Therefore, I should feel that we must first inquire as to whether the assailant has forcibly turned a democracy into a monarchy, or has ejected a monarch and put himself in his place. In the latter case the obligation to restore the throne does not expire until either the king and his⁴ heirs, for whom there had been acquired a right to the kingdom,

¹ [For extroqueri read extorqueri.—Tr.]

³ [For populus read populus.—Tr.]

² [For succumbre read succumbere.—Tr.]

⁴ [For ipsius que read ipsiusque.—Tr.]

are dead, or the king himself renounces his kingdom and leaves it derelict. And it is presumed that he has done the latter when he makes no attempt over a long period to recover it. See Justin, Bk. XL, chap. ii. But in the meantime, even while the conscience of the assailant is still unsettled, their given¹ word is fully binding on the subjects, after their consent has been given, provided they gave their pledge only after they had done for their former monarch whatever could have been expected of them. Regarding the former case, the most reasonable thing apparently to be said is, that, since a people² can be as happy in a monarchy as a democracy, it is easy for them to swallow their desire³ for the liberty of a free state, if their new king governs the commonwealth well. And this also can be presumed if they bear it for a moderate period as a matter of course, which, furthermore, is understood to wipe out the taint attaching to the way in which the kingdom was acquired. No attention need be paid to a few grumblers, who are not lacking in every form of state, even when the citizens have established it of their own accord. But if a new monarch, after altering a state in a violent manner, abuses and mistreats his citizens, I should scarcely feel that the citizens are under any intrinsic obligation to him. For I doubt if we should take at its face value, without further proof, the assertion of J. F. Hornius, De Civitate, Bk. II, chap. ix, § 4, that 'the manner in which sovereignty has been secured has nothing to do with its nature, since it everywhere and always demands a corresponding obedience'. For surely if a man has not only seized sovereignty by force or fraud, but even in addition to cruelly oppressing the citizens centres all his thoughts upon open violence, his fault is not removed by the passage of time, which is otherwise judged sufficient to remove every scruple; since in this case continued possession denotes nothing more than injury continued over an extremely long⁴ period. See Justin, Bk. III, chap. v; compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iv, § 14; Bk. I, chap. iv, § 19.

5. In this connexion the further question may be asked, namely, how and when a state, upon having got rid of a monarch, may be established⁵ in the liberty of a democracy. Here it appears that we must pass distinct judgements in different cases. I. If a city or district has for any reason whatsoever cast off the sovereignty to which it was formerly subject, seized its liberty, and begun to conduct itself as a distinct commonwealth, so soon as it shall then have come to an amicable understanding with its former lord, and been recognized as a free commonwealth, it holds its liberty in plenary right, and for its 745 confirmation has no need to wait upon the delay of usucapion⁶.

II. If any one has been deprived of his sovereignty for just reasons,

¹ [For datae read data.—Tr.]

³ [For desiderim read desiderium.—Tr.]

⁵ [For confermentur read confermetur.—Tr.]

² [For populos read populus.—Tr.]

⁴ [For logissimum read longissimum.—Tr.]

⁶ [For nsucapionis read usucapionis.—Tr.]

the liberty is sound and legal so soon as it has been asserted. Nor is there any need for a continued¹ possession of it, or for its being recognized by its former master as lawful², except in so far as this last acknowledgement may entirely preclude unjust disputes which he might later raise. See Baudius, De Induciis Belli Belgici, Bk. III, p. 178.

III. When a rebellion has arisen for unjust reasons, the liberty remains unlawful so long as the former lord is engaged in reducing the rebels to obedience, or has at least kept his right over them intact by protests, until it may be concluded, from his continued silence, that he treats his right as derelict.

IV. In case a region or city, when threatened by enemies, seeks aid from its king in vain because of his lack of power, so that it is forced to find safety in its own resources and counsel, we feel that the right of the former lord expires, when it has managed its affairs separately for a considerable time, and has had no further business with its former lord. For this shows a manifest dereliction on his part, it being understood that even if sometimes such necessity lies upon a king or a commonwealth that they are forced to leave a city or region without help, and thrown upon its own resources (see Livy, Bk. III, chap. vi; Bk. XXIII, chap. xxi), when that necessity has been removed, they should at once³ return to the exercise of the former sovereignty. Surely a man can no longer⁴ pose as my prince, who, when he may do so easily enough, takes no interest for a long time in fulfilling toward me the duties of his position. See Livy, Bk. XXXV, chap. xvi.

6. Sovereignty is established by election when a people to be constituted or already constituted, of its own accord designates a certain man as in their judgement capable of sovereignty. When he has been notified of the decision of the people or of their representatives, and when he has acquiesced in it, the people promise obedience and confer sovereignty upon him.

This election is commonly divided into free or restricted. It is the former when any one at all and without exception can be designated, who already naturally is, or, it is hoped, soon will be, fitted for sovereignty. It is the latter when a man only of a certain nation, or family, or endowed with a certain quality can rightly be designated. Yet if we consider the right of election, as it is understood to be inherent in a people fundamentally, every election is in itself free. For even if the decision has once been made, whereby a certain group of men is excluded from sovereignty, nothing prevents that decision from being changed. But if a people has conferred upon a few representatives the right to elect, in most cases they bind them by express rules as to the requisites which should be observed in designating a prince. In some places election is

¹ [For dinturna read diuturna.—Tr.]

³ [For potinus read protinus.—Tr.]

² [For ligitima read legitima.—Tr.]

⁴ [For aplius read amplius.—Tr.]

found mixed, as it were, with succession, when a kingdom regularly passes to the sons of the deceased ruler, while the consent of the people or nobles is given at the outset of the reign. This consent does not appear to be a mere ceremony of inauguration, or offering of homage, but to have the force of a negative vote. It is as if a people had conferred the sovereignty on the head of a reigning house, with the condition that it should also be transmitted to his offspring, provided they are not unfit for the throne. Therefore, in such kingdoms the people or nobles assemble, not so much to elect a king, as to declare that they find nothing in a son to prevent his being able to succeed his father.

7. Now election may take place either in a state just rising, or in one of long standing. In the former case, after the first pact and a decree on the form of commonwealth to be introduced, the next step is the election, either by all the citizens or their representatives. When 746 the election is over and its decision accepted, upon the conclusion of a pact between the man elected king and the people, a complete monarchical state comes into being. But it may happen, in a monarchical state already established, that the monarch dies without his successor being appointed, in which case things are said to return to an interregnum.

It is an easy matter to understand what form should be assigned a state during an interregnum, if one considers the bonds which hold together a complete state. That is, since the intrinsic completeness of a state and supreme sovereignty arise through the latter pact entered into between king and citizens, it follows that, with the passing of the proper subject of sovereignty, the kingdom slips back into an incomplete form, so that it holds together only by that original pact of states, whereby each individual is understood to have agreed with every other to the establishment of a single group. Although no little firmness for the binding together of citizens during an interregnum is added to that pact by the thought of a common fatherland, and the indefinite relationship that arises therefrom, and the further fact that the fortunes of the majority of them are connected with that spot and cannot easily be removed elsewhere¹. Lysias, Orations, xxx [xxxi. 6]:

Those who are native born citizens, but feel as though the whole world, wherever they can themselves prosper, is their fatherland, these clearly are the men who would be ready to abandon the common interest of the state and seek their own private profit, and this because they regard not the state but their property as their fatherland.

So also Livy, Bk. II, chap. i, correctly observes: 'The pledges of wife and children and love of the very place and soil (an affection of slow growth) firmly unite the aspirations of citizens.' (F.*) Antiphon, Orations, xvi [v. 76]: 'He could not readily² leave the city; too powerful for that were the pledges which were held there—his children and his property.' Thus in Plutarch, Marius, [ix], 'it is said that the Romans chose their soldiery according to their wealth, each soldier being supposed¹ to put his substance in pledge to the state.' (P.) This is the reason why a state that falls into an interregnum still holds together more firmly than an army which has lost its general, especially if the latter be composed of mercenaries, the most of whom 'have no fatherland or else another'. And so in order to preserve all these things that have been mentioned, and to see that they have a safe abiding place, citizens of means are the more eager to live at peace in such a period, and set about with greater zeal to put into operation a form of government.

¹ [For aliorum read aliorum.—Tr.]

1569.71

² [For καλῶς, which has no authority, read εὐπρόως.—Tr.]

Now although in general we can with Livy, Bk. I, chap. xvii, call a kingdom during the period of interregnum a 'state without government, and, as it were, an army without a general', yet since states in the process of formation, before sovereignty has been vested in a certain man or council, have the form of democracies (see Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vii, § 5, at the beginning), and since, furthermore, it is natural that at the death of him to whom all have committed the care of themselves, they should themselves look out for their own interests, it follows that any interregnum has regularly the appearance and nature of a temporary democracy, in so far, at least, that for a time the administration of common affairs must be decided upon, and a new king crowned with the consent of all, unless they prefer to introduce another form of state. Yet an interregnum is not a complete democracy, since a decree has not yet been sanctioned that the control of the state shall be vested for all time in a popular assembly, and because the laws and public institutions are still adapted to a monarchical regimen. Although the further possibility may arise, that, when a kingdom consists of important and integral parts, such as different peoples, provinces, and large cities, an interregnum may cause it to assume the appearance of a system.

It is patent from what has been said, in what sense must be taken the statement of Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 7, and others, that, 'at the death of a king without a successor the sovereignty reverts to the people'. That is, although during an interregnum the sovereignty is not vested in the people, because it has not yet by common decree been conferred 747 for all time upon a council, yet a people will be able during that period to exercise by themselves, or through certain delegates, all the acts of supreme sovereignty that they think will make for its preservation. For those writers are in some error who hold that upon the extinction² of the royal house there reverts to the people, not the power of governing, but only that of electing and designating another king. As if upon an interregnum a people had no choice but to create a king! And as if thereupon the sovereignty could not be conferred upon the nobles, or a permanent democracy be established!

¹ [For δοκῶντες read δοκῶντος.—Tr.]

² [For extincta read extinctio.—Tr.]

8. But their peace has been best secured by such states as have appointed in advance, in order to avoid the disadvantages usually consequent upon an interregnum, the persons in whom shall be vested the administration of the commonwealth while the throne lies vacant. Such persons, whether they be known as interreges, or by some other designation, are temporary, or, if I may use the term, provisional magistrates, who exercise by the authority of the people the acts of supreme sovereignty, at least such as are necessary to hold together the group for the time being, but are required to give to the people an account of their deeds, which also sometimes the new king requires, as in the name of the people. The power of such ceases immediately upon the creation of a new king, or when another form of state has been decided upon.

But when there is in a kingdom a standing senate, yet such as does not hold the sovereignty during the lifetime of a king, the supreme power does not at the death of the king fall to it of its own right. Although it is very convenient for it to become for a time the acting head of the state in the event of an interregnum, just as it was previously summoned by the king as a minister to share in his cares. But whatever power such a senate has exercised during an interregnum, is understood to have been conferred on it by the entire people. For if it had obtained before, as a magistrate, any power from the king, that is lost when he dies without a successor (see Connestagio, De Unione Lusitaniae, Bk. III, p. 116), and, if it is allowed to continue its former function, that is no longer a concession from the dead king but from the people. Add Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. III, chap. ii, p. 417. Therefore, a senate of this kind, serving the function of an interrex, can on no score hold power longer than the body of citizens wishes, much less lay claim to a lasting sovereignty or establish an aristocracy on its own authority. For it is a prerogative of the citizens as a whole to decide on the form of the commonwealth, and that as it may please them, unless they happen to be bound by an oath. See Livy, Bk. I, chap. xvii, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. II, where he records that, when the frequent changes in interreges became distasteful to the Roman people, and because they felt that they had a hundred kings in place of one, the senate referred the matter to the pleasure of the people to consider the form of the commonwealth, namely, whether they preferred to entrust its care to kings, or to annual magistrates. Although the people returned the choice in the matter to the judgement of the senate. Add also the account of the interregnum in Poland after the death of Sigismund; in Paulus Piasecius, under the year A.D. 1632.

9. In order to illustrate these points, it may be worth while to have observed what is set forth by Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vii, §§ 15-16, where he imagines the following situation:

Suppose now the people had delivered up its power to some one man for term of life only; which being done, let us suppose in the first place, that every man departeth from the council without making any order at all concerning the place, where after his death they should meet again to make a new election. In this case [. . .] the people ceaseth to be a person, and is become a dissolute multitude, every one whereof hath a natural right to meet with whom he lists at divers times, and in what places shall best please him.

Therefore, he says, such a monarch is bound by the law of gratitude to take precautions that the state does not fall to pieces after his death, and this he can do, according as it shall appear to the advantage of the state, either by setting a time and place where the citizens who will may meet, or else by naming a successor. Here Hobbes falls into an error in 748 holding that, 'if upon being assembled they depart without setting a place and time for another meeting, they disband into a dissolute multitude', if this be understood of such as have constituted a complete state by the election of a king, and not of such as are still engaged in constituting a state. For it is obvious that those who gather to form a state and depart without setting a future time of meeting, are dissolved with the task unfinished, and so remain each of them in their former status. But those who have once gathered into a complete state, and subjected themselves to a king, cannot be presumed, after having once found an abiding place for their fortunes, to have been so foolish as to have wished that their newly established state shall be extinguished upon the death of their king, and that they depart into a natural status and anarchy, which will imperil their present safety. Therefore, when sovereignty has not been conferred upon a king with the right of inheritance, or with the power to decide upon his successor as he sees fit, it is understood that at least they have tacitly agreed to meet immediately upon the death of the king, and in that place where they were otherwise accustomed to hold their assemblies, or where the king had fixed his residence. Nor is it likely that there will be wanting in any people prominent citizens who may for such a period restrain the remainder by their authority, and force them to gather at the earliest opportunity to consult upon the commonwealth.

It is patent also, from what has been said, how far we can accept the statement of Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxi, that 'When a monarch relinquishes and renounces a kingdom for himself and his sons, the subjects revert to absolute and natural liberty'. For this is by no means true in the sense that they relapse into a loose multitude, but that they recover the absolute right to dispose anew of their status.

10. There arises also another form of interregnum in hereditary kingdoms, when a king dies leaving his wife with child, or under a fair presumption of being so. Nearly all nations are agreed that a right can be conferred upon such as are still in the womb, and that they are therefore capable of holding a right to κτήσις [possession], if not to use.

(Therefore, when Hormisdates died, leaving his wife with child, the Persians placed a diadem upon her womb, since they preferred to believe that it was a male child, proclaimed the unborn babe king, and even gave him a name, and he became Sapor, so renowned for his deeds. Agathias, Bk. IV [x].) Now when there exists a proper subject for the supreme sovereignty there is no actual interregnum. And therefore, neither the minority of a king, nor his captivity, constitutes an interregnum in the strict sense of the word, although captive princes have often been treated by their relatives as dead, when the government should really have been administered in their name, until they had either returned to their realms or died in captivity. See Justin, Bk. XXXVI, chap. i; Trebellius Pollio, Gallienus. Here belongs the following account in Dio Cassius, Bk. XXXVI [liii]:

Tigranes had his treasures deposited in forts—in the district of Sophene. [...] When Pompey demanded it of the guards they replied that the command must be given them from Tigranes. After Tigranes had reluctantly ordered them to open the forts, the keepers objected that he issued the command not of his own free will, but under compulsion. But soon thereafter, when Tigranes had been put in chains on that account, they opened the forts.¹

So also when Demetrius was held prisoner by Seleucus, he commanded his son, and generals and friends, who were in Athens and Corinth, to place no confidence in his letters or seal, but to keep the cities and the remnants of his kingdom for Antigonus, as if he himself were dead. Plutarch, Demetrius [p. 914 D].

Yet until the royal child is born, there can be no certainty whether it will come into the world alive or dead, and whether, in kingdoms where women are excluded from the throne, it will be a boy or a girl. And until there is certainty on these matters, a people never acquires 749 such rights as they secure in a clear interregnum, but the state will have to be administered just as it regularly is during a king's minority². See de Serres, Inventaire Général de l'Histoire de France, on Philip of Valois, at the beginning of the chapter.

II. When the right to a kingdom is once acquired by or conferred upon a person by succession, it is continued in his posterity. This succession is constituted at the pleasure either of the king or of the people. There also belongs to kings who hold a kingdom in their patrimony, the right to dispose of the succession as they choose, and when they have once expressly declared their will concerning the succession, it must be as closely adhered to as the last will and testament of the father of a family. In this case he will also be able to divide such a kingdom in equal shares among his children, and even without distinction of sex, and also to give it to a natural son, in case he has no legitimate issue. It was on this basis, according to Guicciardini, Bk. V, that Alphonso of Aragon conferred upon his natural son Ferdinand the kingdom of Naples which he had won in war, although others maintained that it belonged to Aragon since that state had borne the expense and labour of its acquisition. Nay, he may leave it to an adopted son, and even to one who was in no way related to him. Add Justin, Bk. XLI, chap. v, n. 10.

¹ [No more than a paraphrase of Dio.—Tr.] ² [For minnorenmitatem read minorenmitatem.—Tr.]

But when such a king has made no provision about his successor, the question must then be considered, who is called to the succession by natural order. For if the king in his lifetime has declared his will neither by testament nor in any other way, it is nevertheless presumed that he did not want the state at his death to return to anarchy, which would entail the ruin of his citizens, whom considerations of humanity would not suffer to leave to such a miserable fate. And especially is this true, since, had that been his intention, he could easily have served notice of it, so that the citizens could have had time to prepare for such a situation. And it is as fair to presume of kings as of other men that they are unwilling to see the possessions which they have gained perish, or to leave them upon their death lying exposed for any to seize, but that they would have them fall to those whom they held dearest in their lifetime. Therefore, under such circumstances the same order will be preserved in the successions of patrimonial kingdoms as in other inheritances of private citizens, save in so far as the nature and safety of kingdoms may justify some departure. For although a father may have an equal affection for all his children, he will still, if he be wise, know how to restrain and guide it, so that the patrimony with which the safety of the family is usually connected be not rendered less stable; and it will be presumed that he wished this when he has made no declaration to the contrary.

From these conditions it follows that such a king wishes the monarchical form of government continued after his death, since he himself commended it by his example, and left behind him no stricture upon it either in deed or in word. And then since all men are naturally inclined to prefer to favour those from whom honour and glory redound rather to themselves than to others, and since these fall to every man after death more through the agency of his children than of any other men, it is held that a father wishes well to his children above all others. For if he does not wish this he should have expressly signified it, since it is never believed that such madness has seized upon a man that he would deprive his children of so distinguished an advantage, and leave it open to all as a source of quarrels. And Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ix, § 15, is mistaken in classing among the signs whereby a father shows his unwillingness to pass the kingdom on to his sons, that of 'long custom' after several successions, since, as he says, whoever maintains silence about his successor is understood to acquiesce in the custom of the kingdom, inasmuch as that custom, whether originating with the founder of the house, or with one of his descendants, has passed into the force of a fundamental law. But we are here concerned with the 750 order of succession, when the king has made no disposition, and there exists no law or custom of the kingdom.

It is another fair presumption, that such a king not only wished that the kingdom retain its regular form, that is, that the parts of the supreme sovereignty be not distributed among several brothers, or among those related to the king in the same degree, nor that such administer it as a body, with undivided and equal power, but also was unwilling that the kingdom be divided into several parts, and that there be henceforth several distinct kingdoms in place of one. For both of these courses would involve the greatest harm to the kingdom, and the break-up of the royal family itself.

A presumption closely related to the foregoing is, that even in these kingdoms, despite the prerogative of age, male heirs, when there are several children, are preferred above female, because the male sex is regularly more suited for command, and a government of women is usually attended by certain disadvantages, which will be all the greater if brothers must be excluded from their father's throne by such female rulers.

A further rule is, that among several children of the same sex, the eldest shall succeed to the throne, and this not merely because he is held to excel the younger in age as well as in prudence, but also because brothers are otherwise equal in their relationship to their father, and if the kingdom were to be conferred upon the most worthy of them, they could not avoid becoming entangled in fatal quarrels. An excellent example of such a thing can be found in the confusion which not so long ago reigned in the kingdom of the Great Mogul, as it was so excellently described by Bernier. The best way to avoid this is to commit the decision to the chance of birth, which is followed regularly by the consent of practically all nations, as a rule suggested by nature herself. Add Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VIII [vii, §§ 9-11], in the last speech of Cyrus. Yet under this procedure it would be necessary for the eldest brother to provide that the other brothers have an honourable means of support; but that he should pay them as much as would have been their portion if the kingdom had been divided, is neither necessary, nor in fact possible. For let us suppose that there are four brothers. Where will the eldest secure as much money as is equivalent to three-quarters of his kingdom? Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 13.

But if in such monarchies the king be without offspring, his brothers or sisters will succeed, and upon lack of such the nearest relative of the deceased, the prerogative of sex and age being always observed. Nay, the kingdom may finally pass even to the relatives of the last owner, although they may be in no way related to the founder of the line, not only when the deceased had so desired it, but also if such be the established custom of succession among the citizens of the kingdom in matters of inheritance. For it will be presumed that, if the king made no express disposition at variance with the practice of the state, he wished it observed in his own patrimony. But the statement added by Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ix, § 19, is not so clear. 'The manner of succession to sovereignty', he says, 'is the same as that to right of succession. For it will be held that although the eldest son die before his father, he has transferred his right of succession, unless his father rule otherwise, to his children; and therefore the nephews and nieces will take precedence in succession to their uncles on their mother's' (he should have said 'father's') 'side'. We do, indeed, confess that this right to represent and take a father's place has much in its favour, lest the children suffer some loss in being so inopportunately deprived of their father. And yet since a son during the lifetime of his father has but a hope of securing his property but no plenary right to it, and it does not appear so necessary that a hope, which is not yet quickened, as it were, into a right, should descend to children like a right, nephews will scarcely by the bare law of nature take precedence over their father's brothers, unless they can base their claim upon the law or custom of the kingdom. Add Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. VI, chap. v, p. 1144 ff.

12. But in kingdoms which were from the first constituted by the free will of a people, the order of succession will depend originally upon the will of that people, and if it has expressly conferred upon its king not only the sovereignty but also the right to name his successor (which is not usually done very rashly), he shall succeed whom the king has named. But if the people itself ruled upon the succession, it wished it to proceed either like other inheritances, so far as such rules can be successfully applied to a kingdom, or laid down some special regulation for it to follow. 751

Now the safety of a state usually requires that the simple hereditary succession to thrones depart from successions of private inheritances in the following respects. I. A kingdom is not divided between several brothers or heirs who are in the same degree distant from the deceased, because such a rule makes for the highest safety of the realm and the concord of the citizens. See Justin, Bk. XXI, chaps. i, ii.

II. Succession is confined to those who are descended from the first king, and there should be no passage to a lateral degree, and much less to connexions by marriage. For a people declared its desire to bestow the kingdom upon that particular king and his posterity, and on the failure of that line the right returns to the people to decide again upon the kingdom. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 15.

III. Only those shall succeed who are begotten in accordance with the laws of the country. On this basis natural, that is, bastard sons are excluded, although their father may have loved them as much as his legitimate offspring. For at least among the more advanced nations those children are open to scorn, whose mother their father did not dignify by lawful marriage, and treated more as the object of his wandering lust than as a helpmate for his life. And, indeed, there can be no absolute certainty as to the fathers of such natural sons, because of the lack of any marriage pledge and of continued association. But it is of the highest expediency in kingdoms that the person of the king be worthy of respect, and at the same time be the least possible subject for disputes. Add the interesting example of this point in Martinus, Historia Sinica, Bk. VI, chap. i, p. 202. Livy, Bk. XXXIX, chap. liii: 'Although Demetrius was younger than Perseus, he was born of a lawful wife, the latter of a mistress; the latter, as though begotten of a common body, carried no mark to show an unquestioned father, while the former was the very image of Philip.' (M.) Add also what is told of Ferdinand, king of Naples, by Giovanni Pontano, Neapolitan History, Bk. II. Under this head falls the custom of some nations for the queen to be delivered in an open chamber, that none may regard the birth as fictitious and the child not hers. Thus Constance gave birth to Frederick II, after she was fifty years of age, in a pavilion erected in the public square, and in the presence of many gentlemen and ladies of the nobility. Pandolfo Collenuccio, History of the Kingdom of Naples, Bk. IV. Also adopted sons are excluded not alone because the nobility of truly royal birth adds to the veneration of kings, and a livelier hope is conceived of them that they will be endowed with the virtues of those from whose blood they are sprung, but also because the people conferred the kingdom upon the natural line of a king, and in the event of its dying out wished the power to return to them of deciding upon the form of government which should follow. And this power could be evaded forever if it were allowed that adoption granted any right to a kingdom.

IV. Males of a like degree in fact, or inheriting through a deceased father of like degree, shall be preferred to females, although the latter have the advantage of age. Compare Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 17.

V. Among males, and, when they are wanting, among females, the eldest in the same degree shall be preferred. In Livy, Bk. XL, chap. xi, Perseus urges against his younger brother Demetrius: 'He hastily overleaps the order of age, of nature, of the Macedonian custom, and of the law of nations.' (M.) Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 18.

VI. Finally, such kingdoms differ from the common form of inheritances in this, that although they pass to another only upon the death of the former possessor, and are not passed by the latter to the former as though from hand to hand, yet they pass to another from the former owner acting as an occasion, and do not pass like other inheritances by the right, will, and free grant of the former owner. For succession in these kingdoms does not depend upon the choice of the last possessor, but is continued in accordance with the constitution of the people in the royal line. Therefore, it is also not necessary for a successor, even though of the nearest degree, to take over the obligations 752 or burdens which lie upon the private patrimony of the deceased prince, but, if he think best, he may take the kingdom and refuse to inherit the private estate, since the kingdom is a noble possession of itself and an inheritance separated from a prince's private estate. For it is held that it was the people's wish to turn over a kingdom with the fullest possible right, and that it has no interest in what may happen to a king's private affairs. Nay, it would constitute a burden as well for the people, if his successor were required to pay the private debts of the king, for they would finally have to be met by the state treasury, if the private estate was not solvent.

Now, in brief, the people chose the order of succession described above for the following reasons: That the successor should always be known, and in order to avoid the disadvantages of elections; that at the same time reverence might be paid the king because of the splendour of his birth; that there might be hope of outstanding virtue by reason of his descent and rearing; and that the holder of a throne might care the more for it and defend it with greater zeal, if he knew that he would leave it to those for whom he holds the strongest natural affection. It is an unusual custom which is described by Procopius, Persian War, Bk. I, chap. xi: 'It is illegal for the Persians to make king a one-eyed man, or a person who is maimed in any other respect.'

13. But since it can frequently be the case in successions of persons far removed from the founder of the line, that it would not be altogether clear what succession is to be preferred to another, if simply the one who happens to be nearest of blood to the deceased king should be the one to be called to the throne, especially since the favour of succeeding by right of one's parents ceases in the more remote degrees, many nations, in order to avoid controversies of this nature, have adopted a succession which is called lineal. Its nature is this: All who are descended from the founder of the dynasty are understood to constitute perpendicular lines, of which each is nearer to the throne according as each one in the same degree enjoys the two prerogatives of sex and age. Nor does the claim to the throne pass to another line until all members of the former are dead. Therefore, those who will come to the succession on this plan have no need to count how many degrees they are removed from the late king, nor to appeal to the right of representation; but as each one is born, so the law confers upon him a perfect right to the throne as held in his order, which right each man passes to his children in equal order, even if he himself did not hold the throne. Therefore, by this plan those first called are always the children of the last holder, yet so that account is taken of the dead, if they are survived by descendants of any degree whatsoever; and if the line of the deceased be the nearer, his descendants exclude all others, provided, however, that in like degree of the same line the prerogatives of sex and age are always observed. (For surely no examples are to be found anywhere of the mere prerogative of age surpassing that of sex.) If there were no children to the last possessor, the succession passes in ascent from him (for it does not return to the founder of the dynasty and commence again with him) to the nearest line and so on, the two prerogatives of sex and age being maintained in the equal degree of the same line.

Now the most common species of lineal succession are two, the one cognate and the other agnate. The former is also called 'Castilian', because it is followed in that kingdom, and its distinguishing feature is this: In the same degree of the same line males are always preferred to females who may be older, and yet there is no passage from one line to another for mere reasons of sex. Therefore, females are not excluded 753 but only placed after males in the same line, and the succession even returns to them, if there are no males of either prior right or equal right, or heirs descended from males. The result of this is that the daughter of a son is preferred to the son of a daughter, and the daughter of a brother to the son of a sister.

Agnate succession differs from this, in that females and their offspring are forever excluded from succession. The reason for this is to prevent a kingdom from passing to foreigners by their marriage with the women of a dynasty, and the ancient royal house from being degraded through reception by marriage into the royal family. The name given to this is the 'French succession', since it is the accepted rule in that kingdom. Some variation is made in this, when, upon the failure of all males in the royal house, the throne finally falls to females. See Guicciardini, History, Bk. XII, p. 367.

Now since lineal succession is a perfectly clear matter, it might be well, whenever a controversy arises, to inquire first of all into what species of succession is customary in that kingdom. This was a matter for long discussion in the last century in the case of the kingdom of Portugal, since Raynutius of Parma maintained that it was lineal, and all other writers that it was simple and hereditary. See Connestagio, De Unione Lusitaniae, Bk. III.

14. Another way of succession can be constituted, whereby he who is nearest to the founder of the royal line is called to the throne. By this method all the sons in order of age succeed to the king, after them his nephews in order of age, with regard also to the age of their fathers, upon their death the grand-nephews, and so on. Such a method of succession, according to Livy, Bk. XXIX, chap. xxix, used to be followed in Numidia, and a similar one is also observed in the kingdom of Siam, as we are informed by Iodocus Schouten, Descriptio Regni Siam [vol. I of the French translation]. We are informed of the custom in Fez and Morocco by Thuanus, Bk. LXV, on the year 1578, and Connestagio, De Unione Lusitaniae, Bk. I, who, however, appears to suggest that it was a special agreement between the brothers. Garcilaso de la Vega, Bk. IV, chap. x, records that this was the method of succession among the Peruvians only among the petty kings called Curacae. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 24. Among many peoples of India, and in particular along the entire coast of Malabar, this is the common manner of succession, so that a father is not succeeded by his son but by his sister's son, because they believe that they are far more certain of the royal blood flowing in the latter than the former. See among others Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. III, ep. vi, and Jeronimo Osorio, passim; add Philip Balde, Description of the Island of Ceylon, Malabar and Coromandel, chap. xvii, p. 102. Although among the natives of Hispaniola the sons of free sisters succeed for the same reason only upon failure of the direct line, as we are informed by Francisco Lopez de Gomara, Historia Indiae Occidentalis, chap. xxviii, while the same writer (chap. xii) says that even in private succession nephews by one's sister are preferred to own children, save in the family of the Incas, where the son succeeds his father. Franc. Creuxius, Historia Canadensis, Bk. I, writes that it is also the custom among the Canadians for the sons of sisters to be preferred to those of wives in the inheritance of property and dignities. Strabo, Bk. XVI [iv. 3], describes a strange manner of succession among the Chatramotitae, a nation of Arabia:

A son does not succeed his father on the throne, but the first son to be born to a great nobleman after a man has been made king. For as soon as a new king mounts the throne, all the pregnant wives of the great nobles are recorded, and watchers appointed to observe which one is the first to give birth, and it is her son who is selected by law and educated in a princely fashion so as to succeed to the kingdom.

15. The question arises in this connexion as to who is competent to render the decision, if a dispute arises between two or more in a kingdom, especially if it be not patrimonial, for the law of nature would not permit them immediately to take up arms over a cause which is not yet clear. In this case it is certain, at the outset, that the nature of such controversies does not allow them to be decided by the method of jurisdiction or through sovereignty, and that they must, therefore, be settled in the manner in use among such as live in natural liberty and are subject to the jurisdiction of no man. In this sense is to be taken the position of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 27. 754

Now those persons are said to live in a state of nature who neither are subject to one another, nor recognize a common lord. And although those who are disputing among themselves may be under the sovereignty of one man while they are thus disputing, the nature of this cause is such as not to admit a sentence from a superior as such. No one outside the nation over whose sovereignty the dispute rages can act as judge. Nor will the king himself be a competent judge, if the controversy began to stir during his lifetime, since it is presupposed in such kingdoms that the people had never submitted to the king the method of succeeding to the sovereignty; although there are not wanting examples of kings who, out of confidence in their authority and merits, have assumed to themselves a broader authority in such cases than the nature of free kingdoms otherwise permits. So when a dispute arose between the sons of Darius, according to Herodotus, Bk. VII [ii, iii], the father took the decision into his own hands, although Justin, Bk. II, chap. x, relates that it was referred by the brothers to Artaphernes, who acted as a domestic judge. Likewise their father settled a quarrel between Arsicas and Cyrus. Plutarch, Artaxerxes [ii]; add 1 Kings, i. 5 ff.; Justin, Bk. XVI, chaps. ii, vii. And it can be affirmed that not even a people is empowered to settle such controversies as with sovereignty, although not for the reason given by Grotius, loc. cit., because, namely, a people has transferred all jurisdiction from itself to the king and the royal family, and so while the latter endures has none of it vested in itself. For the cause concerned in succession does not belong to the person in whom that jurisdiction lies, which was conferred by the people upon a king, and when such a controversy is raised during an interregnum, surely the people cannot be denied at least temporary jurisdiction. The true reason is to be sought in the nature of those controversies. For the effect of the exercise of judicial power over subjects is this: That they are fully obligated to acquiesce in the sentence delivered, and that they can be constrained by authority if they are unwilling to do so; this because it is a part of civil subjection to await from the sovereign power the decision of controversies which arise between them and their fellow citizens.

And yet, if we consider all possible cases of such disputes over succession, it will be clear that none of them is so framed that it can be decided by any authority residing in a people, as the disputes of citizens are settled by a common judge. For if the right of a king who already holds a throne by the will of the people is challenged by another member of the royal house, on the ground that the throne belongs to him, because he is of nearer degree, the claimant will certainly be unable to recognize the people as judge, since it must necessarily defend its decision whereby it has already recognized the present king as its lawful sovereign, while he who is at the head of the state will under no circumstances submit himself to the judgement of those who agreed to be his subjects. Much less will a people be held a competent judge, if there comes forward as the heir of a kingdom a man whom it refuses to recognize. But if two candidates offer themselves for a vacant throne, quarrelling over which has the better right, and the people be ready to recognize as their sovereign the one who proves that he deserves the throne above the other, there is no need of a judgement in the proper sense of the term, such as settles the cases of subjects within states. For either the controversy is only over the question by what grade each is separated from the throne ¹, or else the question is, which grade is to be preferred. In the former case it will be a question of fact ², for the contenders to give clear proof of their descent, and he will be successful whose lineage appears to the people to be the clearer. Yet in this case the judgement of the people does but give added force to his actual success, and their decision will not be delivered as though in a court of 755 law by a judge over those who are subject to him, but after the manner of mere approbation, just as a debtor stands ready to pay and only desires to see the bill of his creditor.

But if the question be as to which degree or line is to be preferred, the declared will of the people will end the dispute, since every one is presumed to know what he wishes to do, and the people as now constituted is understood to be the same as that which originally settled the order of succession. Thus the controversy between Edward, King of England, and Philip of Valois, as well as the earlier one between Joan, daughter of Louis Hutin, and her uncle, Philippe le Long, was argued in the assembly of the French Estates. See those who have written on the history of France, and Polydorus Virgilius, Historia Anglica, Bk. XIX, at the beginning. Thus we read in Juan Mariana, History of Spain, Bk. XX, chaps. ii and iii, that nine special judges pronounced judgement upon the succession to the throne of Aragon. In Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I [lxx], the people decided by vote the rivalry between Sylvius and Iulus, the son of Ascanius, for the succession, moved chiefly by this one reason: 'That Sylvius' mother was sole heiress of the kingdom.' Although such a declaration has no more the nature of a judicial opinion than if a person who makes a grant clears up some obscure or ambiguous phrases of his own making.

When one of the candidates complains that the favour of the people inclines more to his opponent than to himself, the best course would be to refer the matter to arbitrators, who favour neither party and have no interest in which of them secures the throne. See Connestagio, De Unione Lusitaniae, Bks. III and V. For the more common controversies on this matter see Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, 28 ff.; Arnisaeus, Relectiones Politicae, Bk. II, chap. ii, §§ 10 ff., and other writers.

¹ [For solido read solio.—Tr.]

² [For fati read facti.—Tr.]

CHAPTER VIII

ON THE SANCTITY OF SUPREME SOVEREIGNTY IN STATES

- | | |
|--|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The lawful commands of the supreme sovereignty should not be resisted. 2. Whether a citizen can suffer an injury from a state. 3. Citizens often complain unjustly of civil sovereignty. 4. In how many ways can the head of a state injure a citizen? 5. Whether the extravagant injuries of a prince can be resisted. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 6. Citizens may not lawfully use force against a man merely because he is called a tyrant. 7. The opinion of Grotius. 8. Only actual kings are sacrosanct. 9. When is an invader to be considered a lawful prince? 10. The extent to which the commands of an invader obligate citizens whose king is still living but has been driven from his realm. |
|--|--|

Just as supreme civil sovereignty is established for the preservation of mankind, and in order to put an end to the infinite miseries of a state of nature, so it is to mankind's greatest interest that it be held sacrosanct and inviolable by all its members. Add Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xc. And surely no sane man will at all doubt that it is wrong to resist rulers so long as they stay within the limits of their power. For it is patent from the end and genius of sovereignty that there should necessarily be joined to it the obligation of non-resistance, that is, of immediate obedience in doing or not doing what it commands. The most important question is, then, whether, in case a supreme sovereign lays an unlawful command upon a subject, or threatens him with any injury, his person is at that time so sacrosanct that the subject can in no way repel that injury by force.

2. The position of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. viii, § 7, is that 'a state can not do an injury to a citizen, just as a master can not do an injury to his slave'. His argument is, that there intervenes no pact between a state and a citizen (in his opinion every injury is but a violation of a pact), and that the will of a citizen is subject to the will of a state in such a way that whatever is done by a state is understood to be done with the citizen's consent; and of course it is a maxim that no injury is done him who is willing to receive it.

But we have already shown that an injury does not consist in the mere violation of pacts, and, furthermore, that there is a pact between a monarch and citizens. And when citizens subject their will to a state, that act must be interpreted and limited by the end of a state. And so the case really comes back to this: All citizens have subjected their will to the will of the state in matters which make for its preservation, and no injury is done a citizen if he does not fancy some act of the state which falls under that head. And yet, since commands can be laid upon citizens or things done to them by the sovereign power, whereby violence is done a right secured to them by a special pact or the common law of humanity, there seems to be no reason why a citizen may not receive an injury from a state.

3. But we must be careful to observe that turbulent or querulous citizens commonly represent many deeds of princes as injuries, which are far from being such. That is, whatever does not fit in with their fancy is damned as an oppression. Even Jupiter does not suit everybody, whether he sends fair weather or foul. [Theognis, 25 f.] And yet just as the variety of man's humours and the ill-advised desires of many make it impossible for the administration of a commonwealth to suit all citizens equally well, so, if a man would take everything which does not strike his fancy as an injury, he is either seeking the overthrow of the state, or else wishes himself to rule. And certainly not a few find the sole cause for their complaints in the fact that they are not the ones who are ruling. Of this number was Avidius Cassius, who, in Vulcatius Gallicanus's life of him, chap. i, boasted that he took up arms against M. Antoninus 'because he did not like the latter's rule and could not bear the title of Imperator'. The same pretext was used against Septimius Severus by Pescennius Niger (in Aelius Spartianus) and by Clodius Albinus (in Julius Capitolinus). Many find a cause for their complaints against a prince in his use of unfit ministers, but when one seeks out the true origin of their discontent, it is found to be the fact that they themselves are not holding the same position. The common people often feel indignation at the burden of taxes, even when no more are demanded than the present requirements of the state, or its probable necessities in the future, appear to warrant. The reply that should be made to them is pointed out by Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xii, § 9. No one will be able rightfully to complain that the penalties set forth in the laws are severely enforced, except a man who would demand licence for his crimes. And, after all, if any man feels that all such burdens which the business of the state requires are intolerable, he is able to take up his residence elsewhere, while if this recourse does not please him, he may blame the common condition of mortals, to whom is granted no felicity unalloyed. For a man to hold that for these reasons he may throw off by force the lawful sovereignty of the state, would be the same as if he undertook to increase his fortunes by rapine, because it appears too great a hardship to maintain himself by his own labour.

4. Although all this is true enough, there is still no question but that an injury can be done a citizen by a state and its head, since there exists between them a community of natural law, at least, which is sufficient to make one of them capable of being injured by the other. Now it appears that a prince may do an injury to his subjects in two ways: If in his relations with them he violates the duty either of a prince or of a man, or, in other words, if he treats them either not as citizens or not as men.

The duty of a prince concerns his subjects either as a whole or individually. He owes them as a whole his care for the safety of the whole state, and this, if he is absolute, according to his own judgement, if he is limited by certain laws, according as they define the manner of his government. Therefore, a prince does an injury to the citizenry as a whole if he abandons all care of the commonwealth and makes no effort to carry on the affairs of state even with the aid of ministers. Such would be the case if he neither undertakes to defend the state against foreign foes, nor guards its domestic peace by enforcing its laws, while despite such neglectful conduct he continues to enjoy his dignity and the imperial allowance, and measures the fortune of his position only by his luxury and the licence of his desires. For when along with the care of his kingdom he lays aside the royal position and income, he will certainly be held to have resigned his sovereignty, which privilege is allowed him unless he happen to have brought the commonwealth into grave difficulties by his evil counsel, and then wish like a deserter to leave it to its fate. And it is unlawful, without a doubt, to be recreant to his every duty and still to be desirous of enjoying their emoluments. And it is an even greater injury, if a prince studies with hostile intent directly to subvert the safety of the entire state, and puts on the guise of an enemy, which can certainly not be consistent with that of a prince. Although such a case can never happen when a prince is in his senses. For what sane man would want to destroy all that he has? Or who is there for a prince to rule over if he treats his citizens as enemies? Unless it be that he rules over two peoples at the same time, so that he may build up the one state at the expense of the other. And yet there is an instance of such insanity given us in John Moquet, Itinerarium, Bk. IV, in the case of a certain king of Pegu, who in the last century, as they said, was seized with such a hatred of his citizens, by the arts of medicine men, that the whim seized him utterly to destroy them, and to this end he forbade them upon pain of death to till their fields for a period of three years, as a result of which such a famine arose that the people of Pegu fell to killing one another for food. So also a prince does an injury if he subverts basic laws, or undertakes to change the manner of holding the sovereignty, against the will of the people and upon the urge of no necessity. So also if he destroys the patrimony of the state, if he mulcts the citizens of their fortunes by laying heavier taxes than the state needs, spends them to no purpose, gives them to a foreigner, and the like. To all this you may apply the lines of Antipater in the Anthology [IX. lxxii]: "He keeps off the wolves," you say. What's the difference, if the sheep must die either from the wolves or the shepherd?"

The prince owes his citizens as individuals to allow them the enjoyment of the right each holds in common with the rest, to defend them, and to administer justice, in so far as he can do all this without prejudice to the state. If a prince does not do this for each of his citizens, when the condition of the commonwealth permits him, he is guilty of an injury. See Justin, Bk. IX, chap. vi, towards the end, although the act of Pausanias should by no means be approved of. Thus we are told by Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio [on the year 118], and Zonaras, Bk. II, that when the emperor Hadrian once told an old woman that he had no time to hear her, she turned upon him with the angry response: 'Then don't pretend to govern.'

The duty which a prince as a man owes his individual subjects, he can violate in different ways: If, without cause, he disgraces an honourable man; if he denies that he owes a promised reward or a debt, or if he refuses to fulfil other promises; if he is unwilling to atone for some loss done them in passion¹; if he assaults the virtue of honourable virgins; if he pollutes the beds of others in adultery; if he hurts their bodies; seizes or destroys their property; and, finally, if he takes the life of an 758 innocent person by open violence or by suborning false accusers, or by inducing judges to render an unjust decision either by intimidation or promise of reward, and the like. Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXVI, chap. xiii [x. 10]:

For amid arms and trumpets the equality of every one's chance makes danger seem lighter; and often the might of martial valour obtains what it aims at; or else a sudden death, if it befalls a man, is attended by no ignominy, but brings an end to life and to suffering at the same time. When, however, laws and statutes are put forth as pretexts for wicked counsels, and judges, affecting² the equity of Cato or Cassius, sit on the bench, though in fact everything is done at the discretion of over-arrogant power, on the whim of which every man's life or death depends, the mischief is fatal and incurable. (Y.)

5. But it is more difficult to settle the question whether citizens are obligated to bear any of these injuries without complaint, or are able in some cases to use force in warding them off. Our feeling on this matter is as follows: Since such is the condition of human life that it cannot do without some inconveniences, and since there can hardly be found a man on earth whose manners are so regulated that he can satisfy every one to a nicety, it would be foolish as well as impudent to wish to rise in revolt against a prince for merely any kind of grievance, especially since we ourselves are not always so exact in meeting our full duty toward him, and since the laws commonly overlook the lesser shortcomings of private citizens. How much more fair would it be, therefore, to overlook the slight shortcomings of a prince, in whose care lie the tranquillity of citizens and the security of their fortunes and life. And added weight is given this consideration by the fact that experience is witness to the great slaughter of citizens and mighty shock to the state with which the overthrow even of the worst princes has been attended. Therefore, the lesser injuries of princes should be overlooked out of consideration for the nobility of their position and their other benefits, and, indeed, for the sake of our fellow-citizens, and of the entire state. See Justin, Bk. XV, chap. iii, n. 9 ff. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XII [xi]: 'They ought to put up with kings as they were: no good could come of constant changes.' (R.) And in the same author (Histories, Bk. IV [lxxiv]) Cerialis uses these arguments to the rebellious Treveri:

¹ [For perpetulantiam read per petulantiam.—Tr.]

² [For per lit read perlit.—Tr.]

In the same manner as you submit to excessive rains, and barren seasons, and all the other calamities of nature, so also put up with the avarice and prodigality of princes. As long as human nature remains there will be faults. But even these are not unvaried; but are compensated by the occasional display of better qualities. (O.)

Plato, Epistles, vii [p. 331 c d]:

'The same policy should also be a rule of life for the wise man in dealing with his city. If he thinks that the constitution of his city is imperfect, he should say so, unless such action will either be useless or will lead to his own death; but he must not apply force to his fatherland by revolutionary methods. When it is impossible to make the constitution perfect except by sentencing men to exile and death, he must refrain from action and pray for the best for himself and for his city. (P.)

This passage is reproduced by Cicero, Letters to Friends, Bk. I, ep. ix. Nay, a man gives heed to his own interests when he only murmurs to himself about the injuries of his betters, rather than courts greater evils by ill-timed complaints. Under this head fall the sayings quoted by Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 4. Aeschylus, Prometheus Bound [324-6]: 'Therefore [. . .] kick not against the pricks, seeing that a harsh ruler now holds sway who is accountable to none.' (S.) Moreover Sacred Scripture and sane reason persuade one to bear with patience the ill-humour of parents and lords. Pliny, Letters, Bk. III, ep. xiv: 'It is malice and not reflection that arms such ruffians against their masters.' (B.)

But this also is certain: that even when a prince with hostile intent threatens a most frightful injury, to leave the country, or protect oneself by flight, or seek protection in another state is better [than to take up arms against a harsh lord, it is true, and yet the lord of one's fatherland].¹ But what if a prince undertakes with hostile intent to slay an innocent citizen, and there is left him no place to flee to? Many writers simply cannot conceive how the same person can sustain at the same time toward a citizen the person of a prince and of an enemy, and with what face he who burns to sacrifice to his passion an innocent citizen, as if he were a poor beast, can require that he himself be sacrosanct. Nay rather, they suggest that if he who owes another protection, 759 assume a hostile attitude toward him for no reason at all, or an unjust one, the former does at the same time release the other from the obligation of a client, at least to the extent that the latter can make use of force to protect himself against the former's downright injuries. And this defence wins all the more favour the greater the number is of those whom the prince would destroy by his injury.

¹ [These words were added by Barbeyrac from the De Officio Hominis et Civis, II. ix. 4, in order to complete the meaning.—Tr.]

But since there are scarcely to be found any instances of princes who have undertaken to kill innocent citizens with an open profession of mere wantonness, a greater difficulty arises over what is permissible when a prince undertakes to vent his rage under a plea of right, on the excuse, for instance, that his citizens have failed to obey some unjust command. On this point we take it as established that, since every power is understood to be conferred upon any person without prejudice to the rights of a superior, so also upon the establishment of a supreme civil power citizens were neither able nor willing to renounce God's sovereignty over them, and are, therefore, not bound by any commands of the civil sovereignty, which are confessedly and openly repugnant to a command of God. What a citizen should do under such circumstances, if he is threatened with violence because of his profession of the Christian faith, it is not ours to define, since every man can learn out of the writings from which that faith is derived how important it is that one neither act nor appear to act contrary to his faith. See Matthew, x. 32. That when threatened with death a man may without sin undertake some course of action repugnant in itself to the law of nature, we shall show later. But if the execution of the act is such that I cannot undertake it without bringing sin upon my head, or that the performance of it is adjudged to be worse than death itself; and no reason is shown or even seen to be probable, either from consideration of some misdeed of mine, or of the public good, why such a necessity should be laid upon me to do something which could as well be done by another, or else should not be done at all, it is surely obvious that what is involved is that I, an innocent person, am to perish because of the mere whim of the prince, or his enmity toward me. In assuming by this act the role of an enemy instead of a prince, he is understood to have released the citizen also from the obligation by which the latter was held bound to him. Yet in such a case there should be resort to flight, so far as possible, and the protection sought of some third person who lies under no obligation to that prince. Nay, if flight be not possible, a man should be killed rather than kill, not so much on account of the person of the prince, as for the sake of the whole commonwealth, which is usually threatened with grave tumults under such circumstances. But when the head of a state undertakes to punish a citizen for some misdeed, although the latter is not obligated to draw the punishment upon himself of his own accord either by surrendering himself or by voluntarily appearing, yet the reason why he may not defend himself by force is, because the sovereign is using his own right, and on that score it would certainly be an injury to offer him violence under any pretence whatsoever.

The further point should be observed, that, even if it be granted that sometimes it is not wrong for some one citizen to defend his safety by force against the most open injuries of a superior, yet it will not be allowable for the rest of the citizens on that account to drop their obedience and protect the innocent person by force. For in addition to the considerations that they are not permitted to inquire into the acts of the prince which he exercises by virtue of his judicial power, and that guilty men often plead their innocence in order to stir up hatred against the prince, an injury done to one citizen in no wise releases all the rest from their obligation towards their prince. The reason for this is that each citizen bargains originally on his own behalf for the prince's care and protection, and does not lay down as a condition of his subjection, that he will treat each and every other citizen justly. Nor is the fear that the prince's injustice will move on to himself sufficient to put an end to his obligation, since that is uncertain, and since there could have been special reasons for hatred in the case of the wronged citizen, which are not discoverable in another. And so long as the obligation of a 760 citizen toward a prince remains in force, it will not be lawful for the former under any pretext to oppose the latter with violence.

6. Now just as there are not a few who feel that what we have mentioned does not at all detract from the sanctity of a prince, so those are surely not to be borne with who state in a general and ill-considered fashion that, when a king has degenerated into a tyrant, he can be stripped of his sovereignty and punished by the people. For because such obscurity usually surrounds civil acts that the common sort cannot recognize their equity or necessity, or often will not, because of the confusion of their passions, and since it is also to the best interests of a state that the reasons for its counsels remain unknown to many, it would be a matter of great difficulty exactly to point out the actions for the performance of which a man may rightly deserve the name of tyrant, against whom any violence offered by a citizen is lawful. Compare Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 14. Because of this it would be entirely possible for the hatred of that name to be poured out even upon a good prince by such as have no liking either for him or the present state of affairs, inasmuch as men have long become accustomed to designate by words not only things but also their own likes and dislikes. Certainly that private vices and a little too lax administration of the commonwealth do not constitute a tyrant, is generally held by all. Are the taxes too heavy? But a subject who is not admitted to the counsels is in no position to judge whether the necessity of the commonwealth demands them. Are punishments too severe? But if they are set in accordance with the laws and in proportion to the offence, no one can rightfully complain, even if clemency might better have been shown. Is the case one at which the common sort take the greatest offence, namely, that some great men are cut down, although innocent, because of private hatreds or suspicions? Yet if misdemeanours or plottings against the position of the prince are even imperfectly charged against them, or if the ordinary process of judicial procedure is observed, how can the rest be entirely certain about the facts, even if those who are done away with and a few others are convinced of their innocence? This is especially true because there is always a presumption of justice on the part of the prince. Promises are not kept or former privileges done away with. Yet if an absolute prince claims an offence, or necessity, or an outstanding advantage to the state, he will be held to have acted within his rights, while his subjects lack the faculty of judging clearly on such matters. And all privileges carry this exception: provided the safety or the necessity of the commonwealth forbid their observance.

No small part of the arguments marshalled in favour of the opposite view fall of their own weight, if it is observed that these two statements are by no means the same: A people has the power to use force against its kings and bring them to terms, if they have not ruled in accordance with its desires; and, There belongs to a people or to individuals, in the face of danger, and when the prince has become an enemy, the right to defend their safety against him. For the reasons which prove the latter do in no way likewise carry the former, although the two are confused by many. Thus, when the statement is made, that, although a people has accepted slavery, it has still not lost all its right to win its way to liberty and security, this can be taken only in the sense that a people can defend itself against the extreme and unjust violence of its prince, which defence, when successful, carries in its train liberty as well, since a lord in becoming an enemy appears himself to free a subject from obligation to him, so that the latter is under no obligation to put himself under the yoke again, even though the former wish to change his decision. But except for this case, a people which has consented to slavery, or rather has subjected itself to the absolute sovereignty of a single man, has no more right to regain that liberty by violence than I have to take from another by force a thing which was already given him by virtue of a pact. For this civil servitude of which we are speaking is not so foreign to nature as some fancy, so that, when a man has at one time felt it necessary to agree to it, so as to avoid a greater evil, he can later cast it off, when the opportunity arises, on the plea that nature gives him the right. And although this status may be opposed to the genius of a certain people, either at the outset or after it has developed, yet it may not for that reason alone any more snatch by force from the prince the right which he has acquired, than a seller can take from a buyer an article which he has acquired by a bargain, even though the seller may realize later that the bargain was not to his advantage.

7. What we have said does not differ greatly from the position of Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 7. He is right in suggesting, among other things, that it can be decided, first, from the nature of supreme sovereignty, and then, from the presumed will of those who were the first to unite to form a state, whether an extreme injury by a supreme sovereign can be repelled with violence. For surely it is by no means repugnant to the nature of supreme sovereignty that it should direct the acts of all citizens to the public safety, and that it should hold the severest punishment before him who flaunts its decrees, without also having the power to slay any one at its pleasure, and allow him no degree of resistance. Nor is there any natural connexion between the absolute power to secure a man's safety, and the absolute power to slay him at pleasure. And it cannot be shown that such a power in a sovereign, or that such an obligation in citizens, can contribute to the peace and security of a state. In this connexion it is clear how wrongly certain writers argue, when they say: Because supreme sovereignty can be accountable only to God, it is perfectly obvious that it was the intention of men when they gathered into a state, to leave to themselves no right as opposed to the supreme power. As though he who defends his life against a violent assailant does by that act summon him to a judicial action! Compare Boecler on this passage of Grotius. So also the scruples of those men amount to nothing, who will not grant the liberty of offering resistance to the brutal savagery of those in power, because 'there cannot be imagined a legitimate call of subjects to take up arms against a supreme magistrate, inasmuch as there belongs to no man jurisdiction over such a magistrate'. As though the right of defence were an effect of jurisdiction! or as though there were required in addition to the necessity of self-preservation a special call in him who would ward off from his head unjust violence, any more than in him who would keep off hunger and thirst by meat and drink! Compare Ziegler on this passage of Grotius.

But Grotius is right in saying, that if those, who at the outset gave rise to supreme sovereignty by gathering into states, had been questioned as to whether they wished to lay upon all the burden that they shall choose to die, rather than under any circumstances to repel with arms the unjust violence of superiors, they would never have replied that they wanted anything of the sort. For that would have been a greater hardship than what they were trying to avoid in the establishment of a state. For although they were beforehand exposed to injuries at the hands of many, they were still able to strike back, but by these terms they would have bound themselves to suffer without opposition any and every injury from the hands of him whom they had themselves armed with their own strength. Surely, they would say, a struggle is a less evil than certain death.

8. Now that sanctity which we have thus far been building up is an attribute only of real sovereigns. Therefore, it is not enjoyed by such as bear the name of king but are in fact subject to the power of a people, as were the kings of ancient Sparta, and many in other countries who rely more upon the authority of persuasion than the power of command. Such a ruler was that Mezentius in Vergil, Æneid, Bk. IX [VIII. 495], against whom 'Etruria rose in frenzy just: by instant war¹ the king for punishment they ask'. (B.) Such also are those who have relinquished their sovereignty or left their kingdom entirely derelict, against whom a man may use any defence he would against private citizens, in case they undertake to inflict grave injuries upon others. 762 Although in the case of Semiramis, who persuaded her husband to yield her the sovereignty for five days and then slew him, the folly of her husband is clearly no less than the wickedness of his queen. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. II, chap. xviii.

Yet it sometimes happens that to those princes who have either voluntarily left their kingdom, or lost it for some reason or other, there are still left by their fellows the formal respect usually accorded kings, and the external trappings. And just as this privilege is to be looked upon as the mere imagery and ornaments of royal power, so it must, unless confirmed by some convention, be held to depend solely upon the humanity of the rest. An example of this can be found in the case of the Dairo of Japan. Thus in Labardæus, Historiæ de Rebus Gallicis, Bk. X, p. 684, we have the account that since Sedan and its territories were subject neither to the Emperor, nor to the King of France, nor to any of their feudal lords, its lords were true princes. But after Frederick Maurice, Duke of Bouillon, had yielded the city and its territories to Louis XIII of France, and received in exchange other lands subject to the King of France, he asked that it be assured him and his descendants that they retain the marks of their former position; although this is to be held as a mere shadow, and not such actual independent dignity as accompanies² supreme sovereignty, since its effect means no more than a certain rank and other distinctions among the famous families of France. A proof of this lies in the fact that in ceding it the Duke of Bouillon asked that such position be 'assured' him, for whoever actually hold the dignity of a prince have no need of such assurance.

So also a king returns to the state of a private citizen if his kingdom be forfeited, either for some malfeasance against him whose fief it is, or because of a condition attached to the transfer of the sovereignty, to the effect that, if the king did this thing or that, his subjects were at once released from every bond of obedience. So also when in the transfer¹ of the kingdom it was expressly agreed that the king could be resisted if he did a certain thing, that agreement can be maintained. Moreover, if a king, who has been set up by a people, wishes to alienate his kingdom or to change the form of his possession of it, it is clear that he can in no way effect anything, and that the citizens will be able to oppose² him by force, if he should use violence in putting through his designs. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 10.

¹ [For moris read maris.—Tr.]

² [For commisatur read comitatur.—Tr.]

9. A further difficult question arises as to what may or may not be done against unlawful invaders of sovereignty, and that not after they have secured a true right of sovereignty by long possession or a subsequent pact, but while the cause of their possession is still unjust, and they apparently base their claim on force alone. Here we must, first of all, inquire as to whether the commands of such invaders have an obligatory force while they are in possession of the sovereignty. On this point we must recall, from what has already been said, that no obligation to obedience arises unless another has a lawful power over me. For some extrinsic necessity to perform something can be laid upon a man by mere violence, but not an obligation, since that is an intrinsic bond, so constraining the mind, that, if a man does not perform something, he is guilty of sin. Therefore, if a stronger threatens the use of force, a person is constrained, in order to avoid a greater evil, to do what he is not bound to do, and what his soul abhors; and if he can find a way out, he is not chargeable with a fault in case he throws off that unjust necessity.

But what if a man invades sovereignty by violence or evil devices at the outset, and yet later wishes to appear to hold it rightfully, and bears himself not like an enemy but a true prince, despite the fact that he still depends for his safety upon arms? On this point it seems to us, in general, highly probable that he who actually holds the supreme sovereignty should, despite the fact that he seized it by base methods, be held for the time by the citizens as a lawful prince, so long as there is none who can lay a better claim to the sovereignty. For it is reasonable 763 that the power of any possessor should be binding, provided he rule like a lawful prince, inasmuch as it is to the interest of all citizens for the state to be under the oversight of one man, rather than to be involved in constant turmoil with no certain head. Therefore, since citizens are understood to have given their consent, at least tacitly, to the sovereignty of such invaders, they will be fully obligated to accord them obedience. The words of Aristophanes, The Frogs [1431 f.], may be applied to this case:

'Twere best to rear no lion's whelp in the state;
But having reared, 'tis best to humour him. (R.)

¹ [For id delatone read in delatione.—Tr.]

² [For oppini read opponi.—Tr.]

Thus it is well known by what means the first Caesars attained the throne; and yet Paul in Romans, xiii [1 ff.], attributes ἐξουσία [authority]¹ to them, and holds that they should be obeyed 'for conscience sake'. And our Saviour orders us to 'render unto Caesar the things which be Caesar's' [Luke, xx. 25], for there was no individual citizen who could at that time claim the sovereignty as due him by a better right, and the Roman Senate and People had lost their ancient right, although that was due rather to fear or weakness than to approval of the new master. Here belongs a remarkable law of Henry VII of England: 'Let no one who took the side of the king then actually reigning, ever be proceeded against or condemned for that act as a crime, either by process of law or act of Parliament.' The grounds for such a law have been weighed by Bacon of Verulam, History of Henry VII, p. 242. In Nicetas Choniates, Irene says: 'Look not for an Emperor who is absent, nor drive out an Emperor who is present' [p. 9A]. So also, when, in a hereditary kingdom, the right of two or more candidates is in question, while the controversy still rages and is in process of being settled either by friendly parleys or by an appeal to arms, the safest course is to obey him who is in possession. An illustration of this is the defence of Cassius Clemens, who had taken the side of Niger against Severus: 'I recognized neither you nor Niger. Although I was caught on the other side it was my purpose, not to overthrow you, but to vanquish Julian. Since, now, both you and I had the same end in view, I was guilty of no wrong -- not even in my not coming over to you afterward. For neither would you have wanted any of your friends to pass over to Niger.' Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio [LXXIV. ix. 1 ff., on the year 194], and Zonaras, Bk. II. These conclusions are all the more to the point with respect to foreigners, who have no concern in examining the title whereby a man secures sovereignty, but merely follow along with the possession, especially when the usurper of the sovereignty can rely upon great resources.

10. But when a man seizes the sovereignty by driving out the lawful prince, and acts the king, although he is in fact a usurper of another's right, what should a good citizen do under such circumstances, who apparently still owes fealty to his lawful prince so long as he still lives? Here our decision must be that the matter may come to such a pass that it is not only lawful but also obligatory to obey as one's sovereign him who has possession, no matter how secured, of the kingdom, it being understood that the lawful lord is reduced to such a state that he can no longer fulfil any of his duties as a prince toward his subjects. For although the other's commands lack the force to obligate, because they lack lawful power, it is still the part of a prudent man to take counsel for himself and his affairs, and to watch out for the future, as well as cautiously to weigh his present condition, lest he rashly imperil his life and fortune. And this is what would happen should he by his vain refusal draw down the wrath of the possessor upon his head, and that all to no avail, either for the state or for the banished king. This is what some writers would gather from Romans [xiii. 5], where the Apostle says that obedience should be rendered οὐ μόνον διὰ τὴν ὀργήν [not only for wrath], as though he said that a man has little wit who would by his stubbornness provoke without necessity the wrath of him who is armed with a sword. Therefore, one should for his own safety render obedience to ταῖς οὐσαῖς ἐξουσίαις (the authorities that be [v. 1]), that is, those that are in possession. Moreover, since one's country 764 cannot do without some sort of sovereignty, and the possessor is after a manner guarding the public safety, a good citizen, and one who loves his country, should not furnish the cause for still further turmoil by useless stubbornness, when the state of affairs at the time demands such care.

¹ [Preferable to the word 'power' used in the standard English versions.—Tr.]

But the most difficult point is, how citizens can be obligated at the same time both to the banished lawful prince and to the possessor who has both forced them to swear fealty to him, and is at the time fulfilling the duties of a king. For how can a man at one time be loyal to two, who are bent upon mutual destruction? Nor does it appear that a pact and pledged faith given by citizens to an invader can destroy the right and claim of a lawful king, no more than the right of a landlord is destroyed by the pact of a tenant of his, which he makes with a highwayman, to avoid depredations upon the former's estate. This is the opinion of Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 15:

Now while a usurper is in possession, the acts of government which he performs may have a binding force, arising not from a right possessed by him, for no such right exists, but from the fact that the one to whom the sovereignty actually belongs [...] would prefer that measures promulgated by him should meanwhile have the force of law, in order to avoid the utter confusion which would result from the subversion of laws and suppression of the courts. (K.)

Add Idem, Bk. II, chap. vi, § 5. And surely it should always be presumed that every prince is humane enough to prefer that his citizens be preserved by any means whatsoever, rather than have them perish to no avail in uselessly struggling¹ against fate and showing him an ill-timed and ineffectual devotion. Compare 2 Samuel, xv. 25-6; 1 Kings, iii. 26. Thus in Livy, Bk. XXIII, chap. xx, when the Romans were asked for aid by the Petelini:

They were compelled to confess that they had no longer any protection for their distant allies, and bade them return home, and, having done everything which could be expected from faithful allies, as to what remained to take measures for their own security in the present state of fortune. (S.)

Add also the speech of King Ferdinand when he fled from Naples, in Guicciardini, Bk. I, towards the end.

¹ [For oblactantur read obluctantur.—Tr.]

Therefore it scarcely appears that anything more reasonable can be said on the point just raised than this: If a lawful prince is put into such a position that he, for his part, cannot furnish his citizens with the defence which he owes them, nor have they on their part sufficient strength to resist the invader without its meaning their immediate destruction, it is presumed that the banished prince has for a season remitted to his citizens their obligation towards him, until such a time as fortune opens to him again a way to his kingdom, this remission being so much as is necessary for their preservation and the avoidance of perils. And for such a period only does the faith which they pledged the invader appear to bind them, so that it is, as it were, temporary, expiring when the banished king is enabled to regain his kingdom, and such as is maintained not so much by the intrinsic demand of conscience as by present fear. Add Grotius, Bk. III, chap. vii, § 6, where I do not see, if we grant with him an external right and dominion, why some external obligation, which does not affect the conscience, may not also be allowed. See 2 Kings, xi. 2; [2] Chronicles, xxiii, on which story Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xlv, observes correctly enough that Athalia had been dethroned not by a right which the priest had as such, but by the right of her son the king. As to what should be one's opinion about laws which permit or offer rewards for the slaying of a tyrant, see Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 17.

On the whole there scarcely appears to exist a case where a private man can on his own authority rightly oppose even an unjust possessor of sovereignty, especially since experience testifies that by such undertakings invaders are the more incited to oppress a people. See Justin, Bk. XVI, chap. v, towards the end.

- | | |
|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. 'The source for the knowledge of the duty of supreme sovereigns. 2. 'That duty must be carefully learned by them. 3. 'The safety of the people is the supreme law. 4. Citizens are to be trained in good behaviour. 5. Fit laws should be enacted, 6. And enforced. 7. Punishments should be meted out with justice and reason. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 8. Citizens should be prevented from injuring one another. 9. 'The services should be secured of competent and honest ministers. 10. Taxes should be collected and spent with honesty. 11. 'The resources of citizens are to be increased. 12. Factions should be prevented. 13. Forces should be held in readiness against the attacks of foreigners. |
|--|---|

It remains for us to look at the duty of supreme sovereigns. This deserves to be done with all the greater care the more evils there are that result to men, if that duty be not conscientiously performed; and also because it properly belongs to our study to set forth that which passes beyond the purlieu of civil laws. But since this subject is treated by many other writers, it will be enough for us to present only a summary of the principal heads. By what rules this duty is fulfilled can be easily gathered from a consideration of the end and nature of states, as well as of the parts of supreme sovereignty.

2. Now it is necessary, first of all, that sovereigns themselves acquire with diligence all that pertains to the full knowledge of their duty, since no one can exercise in a praiseworthy manner what he does not thoroughly understand. See 1 Kings, iii. 9. Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. VI [852-3]: 'To rule the subject nations with imperial sway, be that your care, O Roman; these shall be your arts—to impose the ways of peace [. . .]' (B.) Isocrates, To Nicocles [10 f.]: 'For it has been demonstrated that their kingdoms will be such as they have made their undertakings; so that no athlete is so bound to exercise his body as kings are to cultivate their minds.' (F.) Moreover, the words of Persius, Satires, iii [71 f.], apply to all men and especially to kings: 'Learn [. . .] what part God has ordered you to play and at what point of the human commonwealth you have been stationed.' (R.) Add Philippe de Comines, Bk. I, p. 342, and Bk. III, p. 388; Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. III, chap. ii; Bacon, Essays, chap. xix. That the matters which must be learned if a state is to be governed, are not so thoroughly well known, can be gathered from the remarks of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. x, § 10. Isocrates, To Nicocles [6], says that the office of a king 'is of all human responsibilities the greatest, and requires the greatest forethought [. . .] and cannot, like that of a priest, be discharged by any man'. (F.*) Also Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. I [i. 3], rightly pronounces: 'To man, such is his nature, it is easier to rule every other sort of creature than to rule man.' (W.) Add the remarks of Socrates in his dialogue with Glaucon. Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. III. Yet many will hold that the Italian proverb applies here: 'It takes very little brains to govern the 'whole world'; and the other saying: 'The world never realizes how scanty is the wisdom with which it is governed.'²

A result of this is that a prince should eschew those studies which contribute nothing to this end, since the science of government is so 766 difficult that it requires all of a man's ability, however gifted he be, who should forget in some way himself and live for the people. All the more should princes put aside pleasures, delights, and trifling diversions, in so far as they interfere with that end, while for the same reason they should make friends of wise men and such as are skilled in human affairs, and hold at a distance flatterers, useless fellows, and all who have learned nothing but folly. Isocrates, To Nicocles [27 and 29]: 'Make friends, not of all who desire it, but of those who are worthy of your character, and not of those with whom you will most agreeably spend your leisure, but of those with whose help you will best order the state. [. . .] Accustom yourself to take pleasure in society whereby you will be both improved yourself, and will appear better in the eyes of others.' (F.) Add Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxi. The same writer (XII. xii) recounts that Charondas instituted an 'action for bad company',³ and a heavy fine was imposed upon those who were guilty of that offence. Although it were to be wished that the saying of Carneades, in Plutarch, How to Tell a Flatterer [xvi, p. 58 f], were not so often found true: 'Young princes and noblemen never arrived to a tolerable perfection in anything they learned, except riding [. . .] because a horse knows not how to flatter.'⁴ (G.*)

[Now that a prince may know how properly to apply the rules of prudent government, he should be thoroughly acquainted with the constitution of his state and the character of the people subject to him. He must, furthermore, study those virtues which are of greatest service in the administration of so great a charge, and order his conduct in a way consonant with the dignity of so lofty a position.]⁵

3. The general rule for the conduct of supreme sovereigns is: 'Let the safety of the people be the supreme law' [Cicero, On Laws, III. iii]. Plato, On the Republic, Bk. I [p. 342 E]:

¹ [For L read il.—Tr.]

² Often ascribed to Oxenstiern. See P. Bellaza, Atene e Roma, XXII (1919), 152-5.—Tr.]

³ [The 'evil communications' of St. Paul, 1 Corinthians, xv. 33, (quoting Menander.—Tr.)]

⁴ [Markedly condensed.—Tr.]

⁵ [The whole of this paragraph was added by Barbeyrac from the De Officio Hominis et Civis, II. xi. 2, in order to complete the expression of the thought.—Tr.]

There is no one in any rule who, in as far as he is a ruler, considers or enjoins that which is for his own interest, but always that which is for the interest of his subject [. . .] and that alone he considers in everything which he says or does. (J.)

For sovereignty is conferred upon them with the intention that through it there may be secured the end for which states are established. Therefore, they should hold that nothing redounds to their private advantage which does not also minister to that of the state. Socrates in Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. I [ii. 32]:

Doesn't it seem strange to you that a herdsman who lets his cattle decrease and go to the bad should not admit that he is a poor cowherd; but stranger still that a statesman when he causes the citizens to decrease and go to the bad should feel no shame¹ nor think himself a poor statesman? (M.)

4. It is necessary for the internal peace of states that the wills of the citizens be restrained and guided in such a way as will minister to the safety of the state. Therefore, it is incumbent upon supreme sovereigns not only to prescribe laws suited to that end, but also so to buttress² up public discipline that citizens will live in accordance with the commands of the laws³, not so much out of fear of punishment, as through a natural habit; for mere penalties engender not so much what is the real purpose of reason and discipline, that is, an interest in right conduct, as a precaution that one be not apprehended in some misconduct. Aristotle, Politics, Bk. V, chap. ix: '[. . .] That which contributes most to the permanence of constitutions is the adaptation of education to the form of government.' (J.) Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode xxiv [35-6]: 'Of what avail are empty laws, if we lack principle?', (B.) Isocrates, Arcopagiticus [39 ff.], thus describes the ancient Athenians:

They considered that those were in error who imagined that a community, in which the laws were framed with the greatest exactness, produced the best men. [. . .] They, on the contrary, knew that virtue is not promoted by the laws, but by the habits of daily life, and that most people turn out men of like character to those in whose midst they have severally been brought up. For where there is a number of laws drawn up with great exactitude, it is a proof that the city is badly administered; for the inhabitants are compelled to frame laws in great numbers as a barrier against offences. Those, however, who are rightly governed should not cover the walls of the porticoes with copies of the laws, but preserve justice in their hearts; for it is not by decrees but by manners that cities are well governed, and, while those who have been badly brought up will venture to transgress laws drawn up even with the greatest exactitude, those who have been well educated will be ready to abide by laws framed in the simplest terms. (F.)

767 To obtain this end the Christian faith, in states where it is professed, exerts the greatest single influence, in so far as it is pure, purged of the false inventions of men, and disseminated through the preaching and practice of pious and prudent ministers; for in addition to its teachings

¹ [For embiscat read erubescat.—Tr.]

² [For legem read legum.—Tr.]

² [For sancite read sancire.—Tr.]

that lead to eternal salvation, it contains the most perfect moral precepts which dispose the minds of men in a special way to lead a good civil life, and yet cannot be so conveniently set forth in civil laws. For this reason in all Christian states with which we are acquainted, that part of natural law which exhorts to its observance is left to the exercise of the clergy, while the dogmatic part belongs properly to those who are especially given to that discipline. Add Grotius, De Jure [Imperio] Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, chap. i, n. 13.

For this end public schools are of great service, provided they do not teach empty nonsense and the sophistries of idle men, the relics of a reign of darkness (see Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xlv; Lucretius, Bk. VI, lines 973 ff.), but solid learning and letters, the use of which permeates every phase of natural and civil life. Among the latter the most important is the branch which imparts sound doctrines regarding the right of supreme sovereigns, and its corresponding obligation on the part of citizens. See Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxx. There is also an excellent discussion on the subject matter in which youth is to be instructed, in the speech of Maecenas¹ to Augustus, as recorded in Dio Cassius, Bk. LII. Add the arguments set forth in Connestagio, De Unione Lusitaniae, Bk. VIII, in connexion with the suppression of the University of Coimbra. Not beside the point also are the comments in Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. III, about the number of schools.

But the greatest force is contributed to public discipline by the example of the sovereigns. Isocrates, To Nicocles [31]: 'The character of a whole state takes the likeness of its rulers.' (F.) Spartianus says, about the marriage of Caracalla with his mother-in-law, Julia [Caracalla, x]: 'He contracted a marriage, which, were he in truth aware that he made the laws, it were his sole duty to forbid.' (M.) To see, then, that all these forces are properly disposed in a state, is the task of supreme sovereigns.

5. It helps toward the same end to have a system of clear² and simple laws about the matters with which citizens are most frequently concerned. Isocrates, To Nicocles [17]: 'Seek for laws which are as a whole just and expedient with each other, and which, besides this, cause as few disputes as possible, and make the means of settling them as short as possible.' (F.) The same writer in his Panathenaic Oration [§ 144], gives the following marks of good laws: That they be 'few in number, but sufficient, and easy to learn for those who are to use them; in the second place, just, practical, and consistent with one another, and more concerned with public enterprises than private business'. Lycurgus, *Against Leocrates*³ [102]: 'Because of their conciseness the laws do not instruct' (as is regularly done in the actual study of law), 'but only set forth what must be done.' Quintilian, Declamations, cclxiv: 'What is the difference¹ between having no laws and laws which you can't understand?' In general no more should be stipulated by civil laws than is conducive to the good of citizens and the state. For since men, in their deliberations on what they should or should not do, are commonly guided more by natural reason than by the knowledge of laws, when there are too many laws for the memory easily to carry, and they forbid things which reason does not of itself prohibit, the result must be that subjects through ignorance, and without any evil intent, run afoul of laws as of so many snares. In this way sovereigns create for citizens a superfluous inconvenience which is opposed to the design of states. Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiii, § 15; Leviathan, chap. xxx. The course, also, of justice should be so regulated that a man may be able to secure 768 what is his right in a brief process, and with a minimum of expense. There is a Persian proverb: 'Better a temporary injustice than slow justice.'

¹ [For Maecenatus read Maecenas.—Tr.]

³ [For Leo. orat read Leocrat.—Tr.]

² [For per spicuas read perspicuas.—Tr.]

6. But since it is useless to pass laws if the supreme sovereigns allow them to be violated with impunity, therefore it is the task of the sovereigns to secure the execution of them, and to exact penalties in accordance with the circumstances of every act, and the intention and evil purpose of the offenders. In the prosecution of this they should so proceed that the severity² of the laws would be meted out not alone upon citizens of little means, but also upon the rich and powerful, whose wealth or position should never give them licence to insult the more humble with impunity, especially since the greatest peril commonly overhangs a state when the mass of its citizens are stirred³ to fury by severe oppression. Add Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxx. Nor should indulgence be shown without sufficient cause, since to treat unequally those who, in everything else, have equal merits is both unjust and a potent cause to incite the minds of citizens. Pindar, Olympian Odes, xiii [6 ff.]: 'Within her walls dwelleth Law, [...] the firm-set foundation of cities, Justice and Peace that is fostered beside her, those guardians of wealth for man, the golden daughters of Themis, who excelleth in counsel.' (S.)

7. And as nothing should be sanctioned by penalties which does not make for the advantage of the state, so penalties should also be so tempered and conformed as to fit that end, so that from them the citizens may not receive more punishment than the commonwealth receives in the way of advantage. In general, if penalties are to meet their purpose, it is obvious that they should be applied to such a degree that the bitterness which comes from them may suffice to outweigh the profit and pleasure which can follow upon a deed that is forbidden by the laws. Add Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxx.

¹ [For inter est read interest.—Tr.] ² [For se veritas read severitas.—Tr.] ³ [For datae read data.—Tr.]

8. To continue, since men have come together into a state to the end that they might gain security against the injuries of others, it is the task of supreme sovereigns to prevent citizens from offering injury to one another, and this with a severity proportionate to the greater ease with which their constant proximity gives them opportunity for doing mischief. Nor should differences in ranks and dignities be so influential that the more powerful can insult the less fortunate at their pleasure. Isocrates, To Nicocles [16]: 'You will be a good popular leader if you neither permit the multitude to commit outrages nor allow them to suffer them, but contrive that, while the best men take the honours, the rest shall suffer no wrong.' (F.) Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio, Life of Galba [LXIV. ii. 2]: 'Although private citizens do enough in doing no injury themselves, it is the duty of a ruler to see that others besides himself do none.' It is also opposed to the purpose of supreme sovereignty to allow citizens by private violence to take revenge for injuries which they think they have received.

9. Furthermore, although one prince is not sufficient to conduct in person all the business of a larger state, so that he must call upon ministers to share his tasks, yet just as those borrow all their authority from the supreme sovereign, so the responsibility for their good or evil deeds rests ultimately upon him. Isocrates, To Nicocles [27]: 'In the choice of men to be set over affairs which you do not personally transact, remember that you yourself will be held responsible for whatever they do.' (F.) Idem, To Demonicus [37]: 'If you are set in authority, do not use an inferior agent to conduct your administration; for wherever he goes wrong, people will lay the blame on you.' (F.) Themistius, Orations, xvii [viii, p. 117B]: 'When Satibarzanes once asked Artaphernes for the governorship of a certain province, for which he was most ill-suited, and three thousand darics, the latter gave him the money, but did not grant him the governorship. "For," he said, "in giving you the money I will be none the poorer, but in turning over a province to an unworthy person I would become a less just man."' Euripides, Rhesus [626]: 'Best set each man where best his help avails.' (W.) Libanius, 769 Legatio¹ ad Julianum [xv]: 'You may expect your chariot to be driven according to the skill of the driver to whom you entrust your steeds.' Martial, Epigrams, Bk. VIII, cp. xv: 'It is a prince's greatest virtue to know his own subjects.' For this reason, and because the affairs of state are conducted well or ill according to the character of the ministers in whose hands they lie (add Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VIII, after the beginning), supreme sovereigns are obligated to select, in order to carry on the affairs of state, honest and qualified men, and to inquire at times into the conduct of their office. Lucian, De Mercede Conductis [xxix]: 'The king has many eyes and ears, which not only see the truth but always add something more for good measure, so that they may not be considered heavy-lidded¹. (H.) And they must reward or punish them after the manner in which their reports show that they have conducted affairs, in order that the rest may know that public business is to be handled with no less fidelity and diligence than private. That no opportunity may be offered for favour or prejudice, the Chinese² regularly adopt the precaution of allowing no magistrate to serve in the place of his birth, because there are almost always people to be found there whom we particularly love or hate. So also since depraved men are enticed to the commission of crimes by the hope of impunity, which is most readily accorded them when the judges are open to corruption, it falls to the lot of supreme sovereigns to deal severely with such judges as abettors of crimes, by whom the security of citizens is lost (see Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chaps. lxxv–lxxvi), and overrule their unjust decisions. For the custom which is said to prevail among the people of Aragon appears unjust, namely, to punish the judges for an unjust sentence, and yet allow the sentence to stand. And even though the performance of the ordinary affairs of state is to be entrusted to ministers, the supreme sovereigns will never refuse to grant a willing ear to the complaints and desires of citizens.

¹ [For Legatis read Legations.—Tr.]

The two questions, namely, what qualifications supreme sovereigns should regard in those persons of whose counsels they wish to avail themselves in the conduct of public affairs, and how their opinions may be canvassed most conveniently, Hobbes treats in his Leviathan, chaps. xxv and xxx; and in the matter of the second question there is a notable example in Davila, De Bello Civili Galliae, Bk. XIV, p. 969, where the Pope consulted his advisors about the absolution of King Henry, not as a body but individually. Isocrates, To Nicocles [53], calls a good counsellor 'the most useful and princely of all possessions'. (F.) Neuhoof, in his Descriptio Generalis Sinae, chap. i, gives some very remarkable customs observed by the Chinese with regard to their magistrates. Nor should we pass³ over the admonitions of King James I of England, Donum Regium, Bk. II, that a prince should choose ministers entirely on his own judgement, not at the suggestion of others, and from every class of his people, since he is the father of all. In the same connexion he also advances reasons why men of limited means should be put in charge of the state treasury. Add also Libanius, Orations, v, De Assessoribus.

10. Since citizens are required to bear taxes and other burdens on no other score than because they are necessary to meet the expenses of the state in peace and in war, the duty of supreme sovereigns in connexion with them will be not to exact more than the necessities or the real advantages of the commonwealth require. See Cominaeus, Bk. X, towards the end. Grotius on Luke, iii. 13: 'It is the duty of princes' to accommodate the public burdens to the public necessities, so that the latter may sustain themselves by the public income in accordance with their dignity, and not to seek to measure them by their luxury and lust and that of the servants of the court, for such cravings know no measure.' Add also Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. I. Libanius, Orations, iii [lix. 15]: 'The dwellings of the wealthy make safe treasuries.' Furthermore, they should see that such revenues are justly proportioned, and that no citizens 770 be granted exemptions with the result that the rest are defrauded and overburdened. Add Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiii [xxiii], § 10. So also they should be collected with the least possible expense, and in such a way that no large amount may stick to the fingers of the collectors, lest the experience of the treasury be similar to that of jars and buckets which are drawn up full in order to put out a fire, but, in passing from hand to hand and being shaken down a long line, are scarcely half full by the time they reach the place where the water is to be poured on the fire. Nor should we pass over the answer made by the orator Hybreas to Mark Antony the Triumvir, when he ordered the taxes of Asia to be doubled, namely, that he should also order two summers and two autumns in the same year [Plutarch, Antony, p. 926 B]. Then what has been collected should be spent on the state and not dissipated on luxuries, largesses, vain parade, or empty trappings. Drepanius, Panegyric [xxvii. 1]: 'The final line of defence of wicked princes is to take from some in order to give to others.' Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. III, chap. vi, p. 175.

¹ [For domitare read dormitare.—Tr.]

³ [For hadenda read habenda.—Tr.]

² [For Chienses read Chinenses.—Tr.]

Finally, a prince should see to it that disbursements be measured by the income, and when that is not sufficient, the balance should be made up by economy and a reduction in the expenses. For splendour is fraught with ruin when it exceeds the income. Nay, he lives brilliantly enough who owes no man. Add Machiavelli, Il Principe, chap. xvi. Pliny, Panegyric [xli]: 'Let a ruler practice himself to take everything into reckoning in his administration; let him go out and come in as though he were to give an account for it; let him make a report on his expenses. This will mean that he will not spend what he is ashamed to report.' There is in Connestagio, De Unione Lusitaniae, Bk. I [p. 25], a notable passage on the bad financial policy of Portugal. Nor will any man be moved by the remark of Cicero, For King Deiotarus [ix]: 'To be called a thrifty man confers no great honour on a king.' This Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xi, explains in the following way: 'Thrift, although a virtue in a private man, lessens the ability of those who must perform such tasks as demand the united strength of many men. For it weakens their efforts, which should be incited and maintained by the hope of reward.' Yet without thrift the source of rewards easily dries up, although a king should not practise it for its own sake, and in order merely to store up wealth, but so that he may gather and preserve resources for the proper conduct of affairs.

* [For Principium read Principum.—Tr.]

11. Now, of course, supreme sovereigns are not required to support their subjects, save that charity recommends that they take special care of those who cannot maintain themselves by reason of some unmerited calamity; and, indeed, the Incas¹ of Peru used to find a special gratification in enjoying among their other titles that of 'Lovers of the Poor', as we are informed by Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. II, chap. xiv, who adds in another place (Bk. IV, chap. vii), that the fields of widows enjoyed more privileges than those of the Inca¹ himself. Yet because not only the revenues necessary for the preservation of a state must be collected from the wealth of its citizens, but also the vigour of a state lies in the strength and resources of the same, and because 'it is vexatious to a lord to be served by poverty' [Lucan, III. 152], princes will have to provide to the best of their ability that the private fortunes of their citizens flourish. Isocrates, To Nicocles [21]: 'Devote attention to the private means of your citizens, and remember that those who are extravagant are spending from your treasures, and that those who are industrious are increasing your resources; for all the private property of those who dwell in the state belongs to those sovereigns who reign well.' (F.) It makes for this end when citizens are encouraged to gather the richest possible harvest from field and water, to give every attention to the resources which lie at hand, and not to purchase the labour of others for what they can conveniently perform themselves. In this connexion it is of very great importance in maritime countries to foster commerce and navigation. An illustration of this are the efforts of Sesostris, as 771 described by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lvii, whereby he made Egypt capable of commerce and the exchange of products. Add also the rules laid down by Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxx, for observance in the case of trading companies.

And yet not only should laziness be proscribed, but citizens should also be recalled to frugality by sumptuary laws, which forbid superfluous expenses, and especially those which cause the wealth of citizens to pass out of the country. It is a saying of Maecenas in Dio Cassius, Bk. LII [xxxv]: 'Great wealth is gathered not so much by acquiring a great deal as by not spending a great deal.' (F.) Although in such matters the example of the supreme sovereigns is of greater efficacy than any laws. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [iv]:

But a great promoter of economy was Vespasian, who was himself a man of the olden type, both in his person and manner of life; thenceforth a feeling of deference toward the Emperor, and the desire to follow his example, proved more powerful for good than all the penalties and terrors of the law. (R.)

¹ [For Uncas read Yncas.—Tr.]

Add also what Bernier says, at the end of his description of the kingdom of the Mogul, on the causes which reduce the amount of gold in that kingdom. Yet if there be any country which abounds in population and resources, it is advantageous to allow the consumption of things that are not necessities, and, indeed, are practically luxuries, in order that the workers may find means to support themselves, and there be no surplus of idle money; provided undue luxury be not increased, and commodities be not wasted which could be exported with profit.

12. Moreover, since the internal health and stability of states comes from the union of citizens, and since the stronger this unity is the greater the efficacy with which the power of sovereignty makes itself felt throughout the entire body of the state, it is incumbent upon supreme sovereigns to see to it that there arise in the state no factions from which it is an easy step to uprisings and civil war, which is as much worse than a united war against foreign foes as war itself is worse than peace. Herodotus, Bk. VIII [iii]. Add Evagrius, Historia Ecclesiastica, Bk. IV, chap. xxxi, on the favour shown by Justinian to the Blues and its evil results; as well as Procopius, Secret History; Idem, Persian War, Bk. I, chap. xxiv; also Bacon, Essays, chaps. xv and xlix. Nor¹ should they allow certain citizens to bind one another by special pacts (see Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xxi), or permit all or some of them, under any excuse, whether sacred or secular, to depend more upon another man, either within or without the state, than upon their lawful prince, or to feel that a better defence is to be found in someone else than in their sovereign. Because they should take care that there are none to whom can be applied the lines of Seneca, Oedipus [542-3]:

There stands a mighty tree
And with its heavy shade it overwhelms
The lesser trees. (M.)

See Genesis, xxvi. 16; Bacon, Essays, chap. xxxv. Add Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiii, §§ 12-13; Cominaeus, Bk. X, p. 682.

13. Finally, since the relation in which states stand to one another is a peace none too stable, it is the part of supreme sovereigns to see to it that the valour and the skill in arms of the citizens is fostered, and that everything required to repel invasion stands in readiness, such as forts, arms, and troops. 'In readiness,' I repeat, for in the words of Plautus, The Haunted House,² Act I, Scene i [379 f.]: 'Oh, it's an awful business—waiting till thirst has you by the throat before you dig your well.' (N.) But one should not be the aggressor, even when there is just cause for war, unless there is a very fair occasion, and the condition of the state easily allows it. Also to this end the plans and undertakings of neighbouring nations should be carefully ascertained and observed (an end which is served to-day by permanent representatives at their courts; see Marselaer, Legatus, Bk. II, chap. xi), while friendships should be assiduously cultivated and prudent alliances contracted. Add Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiii, §§ 7-8; Bacon, Essays, chap. xxix.

¹ [For Nevequidam read Neve quidam.—Tr.]

² [For Mostillar read Mostellar.—Tr.]

SAMUEL PUFENDORF

772

ON

THE LAW OF NATURE AND NATIONS

BOOK VIII

CHAPTER I

ON THE RIGHT TO DIRECT THE ACTIONS OF CITIZENS

- | | |
|--|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. On the nature of civil laws in general.2. Whether a civil law can be repugnant to a natural law.3. Whether it can define crimes as it pleases.4. Whether the Ten Commandments are civil laws.5. Whether there was anything just before there were civil laws. | <ol style="list-style-type: none">6. Whether a man can ever carry out the evil command of a superior without sin.7. It is not right to commit a crime at the command of a superior.8. Whether it is right for a citizen to serve in an unjust war at the command of his sovereign. |
|--|--|

Now that we have unfolded the matters which concern in general the nature of supreme sovereignty, we must here set forth the most important questions which are raised in connexion with each of its parts. And since we put first the power to direct the actions of citizens, from which power civil laws proceed, therefore, to what we have set forth above about laws in general, we must now add what in a peculiar manner pertains to civil laws, and the commands of supreme sovereigns.

Now a law is called civil, either with respect to its authority, or in respect to its origin. In the former sense all laws can be called civil in accordance with which decisions are rendered in a civil court, whatever be their ultimate origin. Compare Grotius, De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, chap. iii, n. 3, 4 and 11; chap. iv, n. 1. Although, indeed, natural and divine laws obligate all men for whom they are promulgated, and a penalty awaits their transgressors, to be meted out before the divine tribunal. But their ability to have the full force of law in a civil court arises from civil sovereignty, whose task it is to define what crimes are to find their punishment in a civil court, and what are to be left to the vengeance of God, as well as what natural obligation gives rise to an action in a civil court, and what obligation does not do so, but depends solely upon the honour and probity of men. Therefore, no man is called to account, or assessed a penalty, in the proper sense of the word, in states, for the violation of natural laws, which are not accorded the authority of civil laws. For such sins are usually attended by those evils which are commonly called natural penalties. Although in all states the force of civil law is accorded those precepts of nature, the observance of which is absolutely necessary for the continuance of internal peace. But to some that force is attributed neither expressly nor in the practice of a court, both because there 773 would be too much uncertainty in deciding what should be said to be in violation of them, and in order to prevent the machinery of justice from creaking beneath an enormous number of disputes, and, finally, to leave to worthy men unimpaired the means to merit high praise, which comes from having lived a life of rectitude out of mere reverence for God, not from fear of human punishment. And this merit and praise completely vanish when it cannot be told whether a man has acted through dread of punishment or love of virtue. Here belong the words of Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxvii: 'What a stinted innocence it is, merely to be innocent by the letter of the law. How much further do the rules of duty extend than those of the law! how many things which are not to be found in the statute book are demanded by filial feeling, kindness, generosity, equity, and honour!' (S.)

A law is civil with respect to its origin, which arises purely in the will of the supreme civil power, and is concerned with such matters as are left indifferent¹ by the law of nature and of God, and yet work to some special advantage to the state. Yet these laws no less than other laws must be observed by citizens, since it is obviously more conducive to social life that the decision of sovereigns prevail in matters indifferent, and the decision of their sovereign be held for the best by his subjects, than that there remain between them on that point endless disputes, from which the undoubted evils of wars and bloodshed are only to be expected. Cicero, On Invention, Bk. I [xxxviii]:

It is desirable [. . .] to refer all laws to the advantage of the republic, and to interpret them with reference to the general advantage, and not after the strict wording according to which they are drawn up. [. . .] For no one wishes to preserve the laws for the sake of the laws, but for the sake of the republic. (Y.*)

Thus Philo Judaeus, On Joseph [vi], calls the 'constitutions of different states' on matters which appear to make for the common benefit of individual states, the 'appendages of natural law'.

Now although the sum total of these laws commonly passes under the name of civil law, it should be observed that not all the contents of the bodies or codes of civil law are laws in the proper sense of the term, but that besides the commands which the supreme sovereignty enjoins upon citizens for the special good of the state, much else is found inserted which concerns the discipline of natural law. The larger part, however, belongs to the discipline of civil law, and can be reduced to two main heads. For either certain formulae or certain methods are prescribed, which should be observed in matters whereby a right is conferred upon another or an obligation arises for a person, so that they may obtain validity in a civil court, or the method is detailed in accordance with which a man should go about to secure his right in a court. And so if you would reclaim for natural law all that the interpreters of civil law have so far included in a general way, the civil law would be condensed into a fairly small compass. Not to mention the fact that, in the absence of civil law, recourse should always be had to natural reason, and so in all states what is wanting in civil laws is supplied by the law of nature. In which respect Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiv, § 14, calls natural law 'unwritten civil law'. So also the orators speak of there being an action 'of unwritten crime', on which Quintilian, *Declamations*¹, cclii, has this to say:

* [For indifferentia read indifferencia.—Tr.]

Our ancestors, as it would appear, were most particular about this law; because they knew that no one could exercise such prudence nor such unshakably certain foresight, that precautions should cover every device which the ingenuity of wicked men might ever contrive. Therefore, they enclosed every form of malice within this law, as by a line of circumvallation, so that anything which had eluded the defence afforded by other laws, might still be walled about.

2. Yet Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiv, § 10, denies in a most paradoxical fashion that it is possible for any civil law whatsoever, which tends not to a reproach of the Deity [...] to be against the law of nature. (And this in the main by the following argument, that) They who are going to form a state obligate themselves by a pact to obey the commands of him who holds the supreme sovereignty, that is, the civil laws; and the law of nature commands the observance of that agreement.² Seeing therefore our obligation to observe those laws is more ancient than the promulgation of the laws themselves [...] by the virtue of the natural law which forbids breach of covenant, the law of nature commands us to keep all the civil law. For where we are tied to obedience before we know what will be commanded us, there we are universally tied to obey in all things.

But it should be presupposed in this matter that men, when preparing to come together into a state, already at that time had a knowledge of natural law; that one of the chief objects which they had in view in the establishment of states was the ability to secure the safe exercise of natural laws, whereby the peace of mankind is sustained; and that, finally, there is nothing in natural laws which is repugnant to the nature and end of states, but that, on the contrary, they are in friendly agreement with their design. Therefore, those who in uniting to form a state bound themselves by a pact to obey the civil laws, must certainly be understood to have presupposed that they would establish nothing by civil laws which was contrary to natural law, and that the particular advantage of states, which is the source and cause of civil laws, would not be repugnant to their common end. Therefore, a civil law could, of course, be passed which is opposed to natural law; yet none but an insane man, and one who had in mind the destruction of the state, would wish to pass legislation of that kind. And so on this principle it was proper to hold Stratocles insane, when, according to Plutarch Demetrius [xxiv], he proposed a law in Athens that 'Whatsoever King Demetrius should ordain in future, this should be held righteous towards the gods and just towards men'. (P.) And Parysatis was guilty of base flattery in persuading Artaxerxes that he might scorn the laws of the Greeks and marry his daughter, adding: 'He was divinely appointed as a law to the Persians, and the supreme arbiter of good and evil.' (P.) Plutarch, Artaxerxes [xxiii. 3].

¹ [For declamat read declamat.—Tr.]

² [This sentence is not in Hobbes at that point.—Tr.]

3. The same author [Hobbes] in his De Cive, chap. vi, § 16 and chap. xiv, §§ 9-10, undertakes further to defend his own position, as follows:

Theft, murder, adultery, and all injuries, are forbid by the law of nature; but what is to be called theft, (what murder), what adultery, what injury in a citizen, that is not to be determined by the natural, but by the civil law? For not every taking away of the thing which another possesseth, but only another man's goods, is theft; but what is ours, and what another's, is a question belonging to the civil law. In like manner, not every killing of a man is murder, but only that which the civil law forbids; neither is all encounter with women adultery, but only that which the civil law prohibits. Lastly, all breach of promise is an injury, where the promise itself is lawful; but where there is no right to make any compact, there can be no conveyance of it, and therefore there can no injury follow. Now what we may contract for, and what not, depends wholly upon the civil laws.¹

To this we can reply, that we who venerate Sacred Scripture can know about many crimes, from the laws which God gave the Jews, and from other revelations, how God, the author of natural law, would have them defined, so that even though a state may actually clear some acts from the designation of crime, they are none the less opposed to divine law. Especially since no sufficient reason can be pointed out why God should in His law give for those acts such definitions as would not hold good among other nations as well. Thus the Spartans used to allow an impotent old man the right to call upon some vigorous young man, so as to secure offspring by his wife, with the result that at Sparta such a husband was not branded as a pimp, nor were the wife and youth guilty of the crime of adultery, because the civil laws of that city had not included under adultery such relations with the wife of another at the husband's authorization. And yet, since it appears from the divine laws that by the law on adultery any intercourse is forbidden with a woman who is already actually married to another, it must be acknowledged that the exercise of such vicarious services was also contrary to the law of nature.

And if a man would contend that the definitions of certain acts as 775 set forth in Sacred Scripture apply only to the Jewish commonwealth, and so belong to positive law, he would still be forced to concede that the definitions of acts forbidden by the law of nature should be so drawn up by civil laws, that the purpose and end of natural law would not be defeated, such being the preservation of an honourable and peaceful human society. If, then, any definition of civil law is opposed to this end, he must necessarily grant that it is also opposed to natural law. Thus, if a man would, for example, define adultery as lying with another's wife 'against her will', or robbery as taking a thing 'by night', or homicide as killing a man 'by open violence', there is no doubt that such a procedure undermines the peace of the state. Nor can we believe that peace would be sufficiently insured by the universal terms in which such definitions are cast, so that even though they may at times work a hardship on a man, they can at other times be to his advantage; and that the equality of right which such laws set up between citizens will remove the cause for complaints. For even though we should desire that some things be allowed us alone, yet should they be allowed others as well against us, we would not ask them even for ourselves alone. If such practices were established by civil laws, peace and comely order, the preservation of which nature desires, could not help but be thrown into confusion. Why, if this equality which they speak of were sufficient of itself for the establishment of any right, all laws could on that score be done away with, since that would mean the introduction of absolute equality. Yet that is a thing which no man in his senses would ever think of doing. Thus Sigismund, Baron of Herberstein, De Rebus Muscoviticis, says of the Tartars:

¹ [All this is confined to De Cive, vi. 16.—Tr.]

Justice is not to be found among them. For whenever a man stands in need of anything he can take it from another without fear of punishment. If a man complains before a judge of violence and injury done him, the accused person does not deny it, but only says that he could not do without¹ the article. Then the judge renders this decision: 'If you in your turn² come to need something, take it from others.'

Although Haythonus, De Tartaris, chap. xlviij, gives a little more favourable description of this custom: 'The Tartars', he says, 'gladly share their food with strangers, but wish to be treated in the same manner by them, and if they are not,³ they take things by force.' So by their definition it will be theft, when he who takes a thing against the will of its owner, did not need it. That such a definition almost entirely subverts the law of nature on robbery is obvious enough; and such a law could be the desire of none but desperate ne'er-do-wells, since in the case of industrious men often enough⁴ something could be taken from them, the like of which they could not find in another's possession, or which they would be prevented from carrying off because of the watchfulness⁵ of its owner.

Furthermore, the presupposition of Hobbes is false, that the question as to what is another's and what is mine, is entirely within the province of civil law, in its proper⁶ meaning, and that outside of states there is no property in things. For although those who live in states enjoy a more certain and firm propriety of their possessions than those who live outside their bounds, since the former have for their defence the united strength of many men and the aid of the judge, while the latter must depend only upon their own strength, still one may not

¹ [For secarere read se carere.—Tr.]

³ [For alio quin read alioquin.—Tr.]

⁵ [For cunstdiam read custodiam.—Tr.]

² [For twicissim read tu vicissim.—Tr.]

⁴ [For saedissime read saepissime.—Tr.]

⁶ [For praeesse read presse.—Tr.]

thereupon deny that there was any dominion over things before states were established. So also would any man dare claim, that, because to-day sovereigns and states live in relation to one another in a state of nature, and their property is based not on any common law or judge but only on pacts and the method of acquisition possible in a state of nature, one king can seize by stealth or open force the property of another, with whom he has no pact, without being guilty of theft or robbery? And again, although we grant that a man cannot make a valid pact on 776¹ a matter forbidden by civil laws, yet who will deny that those who live in a state of mutual liberty cannot conclude a pact, the violation of which constitutes an injury? Therefore, it is also false that civil laws are the sole source of our knowing what constitutes an injury. Who will go further and deny that a man who kills another without a state of war, or in self-defence, is guilty of murder, if he is only under the rule of natural law? That adultery is a violation of conjugal fidelity can be known by mere natural law, even without the aid of civil laws. And yet it is patent that civil laws can add certain requirements to the marriage contract, which without them may, within a state, be held invalid and null, or else lacking in certain effects.

Finally, a clear distinction should be drawn between what civil laws command, and what they only permit, that is, what is not forbidden under penalty of punishment to be inflicted in a civil court. For a prohibition of natural law, and a permission of civil laws, are not opposed to one another. The permission of civil law does not prevent an act from being opposed to the law of nature, or allow a man to do it without being guilty of a sin against God, but it only declares that he who would perform it is not forbidden by the civil power to do it, and is not punished on that score, and that in a human court such acts are granted the same effects as otherwise attend those that are lawful in the eyes of natural law. And so the laws of the Tartars do not make it mandatory to rob others of their possessions, nor, I fancy, do they forbid owners to defend their property against thieves, but whoever has stolen is not punished, and need make no restoration, and therefore in a Tartar court such purloining is regarded as a legitimate method of acquisition. The same conclusion should be reached about the theft practised by the Spartan youth. For the Greek of Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms [p. 234 A]: 'It was a legal institution (νενομιστο) for the boys to steal,' need not mean 'the laws commanded' but 'the laws allowed the youths to practise stealing'. For Xenophon², Anabasis, Bk. IV [vi. 14], says in the passage where he was poking fun at Cheirisophus the Spartan, that for the Spartan youths 'it is not disgraceful, but necessary to steal'. Nor was this custom so disgraceful as some would believe, or as it is described in the criticisms of it by Isocrates, Panathenaicus [ccxi f.], since the youths could indulge in it only among the gardens and kitchens, and when discovered were punished with blows and hunger. See Plutarch, Lycurgus; Xenophon, Constitution of the Lacedaemonians [ii. 7 ff.]. Far more disgraceful was the freedom allowed theft by the Colchians, as described by Busbecq, Letters, iii, p. 155. Here belongs also the account of Plutarch, *Apophthegms*¹ [p. 175 f.], about Dionysius: 'Although he punished other malefactors severely, he favoured such as stole clothes, that the Syracusans might forbear feasting and drunken clubs.' (G.) Add Digest, XI. v. 1. So also at Sparta no law bothered the worn-out husband and the youth, and if they reached an agreement the laws did not interfere, while the children born of such cohabitation were treated as legitimate and received their share in the estate. In the same way where the anger of individuals is allowed to vent itself in duels, the death that may ensue is not punished as homicide in a civil court, although the divine tribunal does not treat it so lightly.

¹ [For '766' read '776'.—Tr.]

² [For Xenophn read Xenophon.—Tr.]

But that the civil power may rightfully permit such things, and that not by mere connivance but by express reference in the civil laws, I should not dare assert, since by this course it practically invites citizens to do what is repugnant to natural law. Yet it is excusable to overlook such offences, if the times and the genius of a people do not permit the application of direct remedies of such practices, just as the custom of the Roman law in calling a trial for actual theft an 'action for removed goods', was not lacking in good reason.

777

4. The same writer in his De Givē, chap. xiv, § 9, states that the precepts of the Decalogue are 'civil' and not 'natural' precepts, and to be explained in this wise:

'Thou shalt not refuse to give the honour defined by the laws, unto thy parents: Thou shalt not kill the man, whom the laws forbid thee to kill: 'Thou shalt avoid all copulation forbidden by the laws: 'Thou shalt not take away another's goods, against the owner's will: 'Thou shalt not frustrate the laws and judgements by false testimony.

Here we should note the utter falsity of his hypothesis, that, before the founding of states, nothing belonged to one man or another, there was no such a thing as marriage, and men were free to do anything whatsoever to one another. Surely it is patent that the commands on these matters obligate those who live, not under a common government, but in a state of nature, and observe mere natural law in their relations to one another, for such men were able to, and actually did, by a pact divide things among one another. Therefore, such men sin no less against the seventh² commandment in laying hands upon or stealing by stealth or by force the property of another, than does a citizen in dealing that way with his fellow citizen. Thus who would dare deny that a man who, living in natural liberty, violates another's bed, commits adultery? See Genesis, xx. 3; xxvi. 10. Finally, since in a natural state there may be place for arbitrators to decide questions of fact on the testimony of witnesses (Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 23), use will also be found for the eighth¹ commandment.

¹ [For apophthegm read apophthegm.—Tr.]

² [Commonly numbered now the eighth.—Tr.]

In general most of the precepts of the Decalogue may in their subject matter be referred to natural law. But when they are considered as inscribed upon two tables and proclaimed by Moses to the people of Israel, they are properly to be called civil laws, or rather the chief heads of the civil law of that people, which were thereafter elaborated into special precepts by the addition of penal sanctions. Add Philo Judaeus, On the Ten Commandments. Here belongs the remark of Grotius, on Matthew, v. 27, to the effect that not all crimes, not even such as are punished by civil law, are comprehended (in express terms) in the Decalogue, but only such as are in each class the most heinous. For there is no mention of wounding, but only of murder, none of any kind of gain to another's loss, but only of theft, none of the many kinds of deception, but only of false witness.

5. We should at this point also set forth that Hobbes, loc. cit., chap. xii, § 1, among his seditious opinions, and such as by their very nature lead states to ruin, advances in the first place the following:

That the knowledge of good and evil belongs to each single man. [...] For the rules of good and evil, just and unjust are civil laws; and therefore what the legislator commands, must be held good, and what he forbids evil. [...] Therefore wicked is that saying that kings must not be obeyed unless they command us just things. Before there was any government, just and unjust had no being, their nature being only relative to some command: and every action in its own nature is indifferent; that it becomes just or unjust, proceeds from the right of the magistrate. Legitimate kings therefore make the things they command just, by commanding them, and those which they forbid, unjust, by forbidding them. But private men, while they assume to themselves the knowledge of good and evil, desire to be even as kings; which cannot be with the safety of the commonwealth.

On this matter we should note that it belongs to the power accorded kings to add to or to withdraw from natural laws the force of the civil, before human tribunals, by adding or denying penal sanction, and to make many things, which lie outside natural laws, just, by commanding them, or unjust, by forbidding them. But to say that before there were civil sovereignties, justice or injustice, defined by natural law and binding upon the consciences of men, did not exist, is as false as if I should assert that truth and rectitude depend upon the desire of men and not on the nature of things, or that the nature of things can be fashioned by supreme sovereigns at their pleasure, or that the truth about the same thing can be different from itself.

And, in fact, the very thing itself sufficiently disproves the position of Hobbes. He would have it that while those fathers of a family, by 778 whose coming together states first arose, lived still separated, they acted like brute animals, observed none of the pacts, entered into with others, and robbed others of their own right of life and property whenever they so pleased, while whatever they did was held indifferent. And that even to-day, when absolute kings, who live with relation to one another in a state of nature, do not observe pacts and undertake to rob others of their possessions, they are regarded as having violated no justice, and yet they are certainly not subject to civil laws. Nay, but on the contrary, we would reply, states could never have been formed, and when once formed could not have been preserved, had not some idea of justice or injustice existed before that time. For it is certain that pacts intervened in the establishment of states. Yet how could men have been able to persuade themselves that pacts were of any use at that time, had they not known beforehand that it was just to observe pacts and unjust to break them? And if it is not just to observe pacts before civil laws are defined, what is there to prevent subjects from throwing off obedience and destroying a state at their pleasure, and by that act doing away with the distinction between justice and injustice? For it would be idle for one to hope¹ that so great a multitude of men could hold together forever by the force of mere violence and fear. Therefore, there is surely no king so senseless as to enjoin something which is forbidden by the general laws of nature, or to forbid what they command: To rule, for instance, that it is unlawful to keep one's word, that one need not give a man his due, or live an honest life, that every person may injure another as much as he can, &c. Yet why might not such laws be made, if there is no justice or injustice before civil laws are defined? But it is no more possible for civil sovereignty to create goodness and justice by precept, than it is for it to command that poison lose its power to waste the human body. And from this it is easy to gather how far Polybius, in his sixth book, wanders from the truth in appearing to seek in states the origin of justice and injustice, who is quoted without judgement by Machiavelli, Discorsi sopra la Primadeca di Tito Livio, Bk. I, chap. ii. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v, § 5.

¹ [Commonly numbered now the ninth.—Tr.]

Yet in another sense the thesis of Hobbes can be allowed, if, that is, good and evil be taken as that which does or does not work to the advantage of the commonwealth. For then that is surely a seditious opinion, that 'the knowledge of good and evil', that is, of that which is good or evil, advantageous or disadvantageous to the state, 'belongs to individuals'. That is, that each individual is empowered to pass judgement as to the aptitude of the means which a prince orders to be undertaken so as to secure the public good, with the effect that the obligation of each person to obedience depends upon that judgement. For one may apply here the words of Tacitus, Histories, Bk. I, chap. lxxxiii:

It is as fitting that the soldier (and other subjects no less) should be ignorant of some things as that he should know others. [. . .] If every subaltern may discuss the reasons of his orders, discipline is at an end, and the authority of the commander falls to the ground. (O.) (Nor are those words of praise, when the soldiery are described as) 'more disposed to scan than to execute their general's orders'. (O.) (Ibid., Bk. II, chap. xxxix.)

¹ [For superaverit read speraverit.—Tr.]

Cato, On Farming, chap. v: 'Let not the steward think that he knows more than the owner.' And to this extent the words of M. Terentius, as given by Tacitus, Annals, Bk. VI [viii], would be right: 'It is not for us to appraise those whom you exalt above all others, or to ask why you have exalted them. To you the gods have given the supreme direction of affairs; to us has been left the glory of obedience.' (R.) It is the opinion of Plato, Politicus [p. 299 c]: 'For no one should presume to be wiser than the laws.' (J.) And with this Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. I, chap. xv [12], agrees: 'Trying to be cleverer than the laws is just what is forbidden by those codes of laws that are accounted best.' (R.)

6. We must also in this connexion examine the rather difficult question as to whether a subject can ever sin in carrying out the com- 779 mands of his prince, provided he shows forth by his conduct that he is merely engaged in their execution, while all knowledge of the case and necessity of accountability fall upon him who gives the orders. For laws differ from commands in this respect, that the former are general commands lying upon all subjects; while the latter are laid upon certain subjects for a particular matter, although they have an effect similar to that of laws in obligating the one on whom they are laid. Therefore, the idea is commonly held¹ that a man may sometimes be sinning when he obeys the commands of a civil sovereignty, and so a citizen can and should keep his own conscience well informed and carry out such commands in accordance with it. So Antigone says in the tragedy of that name by Sophocles [lines 453 ff.]:

Nor did I deem that thou, a mortal man,
Could'st by a breath annul and override
The immutable unwritten laws of Heaven. (S.)

Nay, it is understood that good men are conscious that they must give an account of their actions before the divine tribunal, and that every kingdom is subject to a still greater kingdom, and should promise obedience only on the condition that they are willing to obey the commands of sovereigns, provided these are not manifestly opposed to the law of nature and of God. For there is no doubt but when a king commands the performance of something that is contrary to civil law, he can be obeyed without sin.

On the other hand Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xii, § 2, holds it a seditious opinion 'that subjects sin when they obey their prince's commands which to them seem unjust'. And it is in fact a doctrine dangerous both to states and to the conscience of individuals, to hold that if merely a scruple or question arise on the equity of commands, it may be right to refuse obedience. Furthermore, on this score citizens must only too often necessarily fall into sin¹, for they will be acting against their conscience if they obey, and against their plighted faith to their superiors if they do not. For all would agree that when the conscience hesitates between two considerations, it is safest in choosing that side from which there is less danger of sin. Now there is a far more present danger of sin in neglecting in any matter of doubt one's plighted faith, since the commands of superiors are always attended by a presumption of justice, and always follow upon some reason which private citizens are not allowed to pass judgement upon. And so what the same author adds a little further on, deserves careful consideration:

¹ [For per vulgata read pervulgata.—Tr.]

That is my sin, indeed, which committing I do believe to be my sin; but what I believe to be another man's sin, I may sometimes do that without any sin of mine. For if he commanded to do that which is a sin in him who commands me, if I do it, and he that commands me by right lord over me, I sin not.

Procopius, Gothic History, Bk. I [vii. 19]:

As for the proposals which an ambassador has received from the lips of him who has sent him [. . .] he himself cannot reasonably incur the blame which arises from them, in case they be not good, but he who has given the command would justly bear this charge, while the sole responsibility of the ambassador is to have discharged his mission. (D.)

Seneca, Trojan Women [870-1]:

If aught of sin there be
'Tis his who doth command thee to the deed. (M.)

Add Digest, III. ii. 1, words non iussu eius. M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. IV, cont. xxvii [IX. iv. 10]:

She is not unchaste who was summoned by the tyrant; he is not called sacrilegious who with his own hands carried to the tyrant the gifts that belonged to the immortal gods, or who consecrated among the images of the immortal gods the accursed portraits of the tyrant².

A man may undertake the mere execution of an act enjoined upon him by a sovereign, which is imputed for sin upon him who commands it, not upon him who carries it out. Yet for this to obtain, we hold it necessary, first, that the mere execution alone be commanded him, that is, that he lend only his body and its strength to the act, and in general 780 that he give no occasion or pretext, or furnish the least excuse for it, but only carry it out as though it were another's act and not his own. And second, that so far as he can, he avoid and beg to be excused from such a task. An excellent example of this is in Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. V, chap. xxxii. And lastly, that because of his reluctance a threat of death or some other serious evil, which neither justice nor love requires him to undergo for the sake of another, be laid upon him by the sovereign, who is strong enough to carry it out, especially when he will inflict that evil upon another even without our aid. Indeed, it is manifest that no commands repugnant to divine right can contain a force to obligate, that is, to lay upon the consciences of any men an intrinsic necessity, and that whoever refuses to obey such commands is free from all crimes.

¹[For precandi read peccandi.—Tr.]

²[For tyranni read tyranni.—Tr.]

Yet there is every difference between being obligated by conscience to do something, and being able to do something, without being guilty of sin, in order to avoid a most grave evil. For there are many things that we are in no wise intrinsically obligated to do, which we can, however, undertake quite rightfully upon the urge of necessity. And the question before us is not whether we are bound to perform such and such a thing, but whether we can do it without our own sin, so as not to throw away our life. Nor are we hit by that statement of Pliny, Letters, Bk. III, ep. ix, that he had proved to the senate that it was a 'crime even to have ministered in any wise to one', for the defendants in that case, whom he was prosecuting, had not been the mere executioners of another's crime, but had falsely accused innocent persons, so that a governor might have the opportunity to confiscate their property, and as informers they were not acting for others but for themselves, while they were prosecuting such men in their own name¹, not in that of the consul, or as if they were acting under his orders. No more were they led to make such false charges by fear of death. They said, of course, that they were 'citizens of the province and compelled by fear to fulfil every command² of the governors', but it was far more likely that their deeds were inspired by greed for gain, and although the governor may have threatened them with death in case they refused to work his will, it is scarcely believable that he had threatened them with an immediate death which they could in no way have avoided. A case in point is in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIII [xliii]:

The defence of Sullius was that none of these things were of his own doing: he had but obeyed the orders of the Emperor. [...] He then alleged orders from Messalina; but this defence broke down also:—'How was it', his accusers asked, 'that no other voice than his had been selected to serve the rancours of that abandoned woman? No mercy should be shown to the instrument of cruelties, who, after reaping the reward of his crimes, threw the guilt of them upon others.' (R.)

And so the same author in his Agricola [iv] justly praises Julius Graecinus: 'He received orders to accuse Marcus Silanus, and, refusing, was put to death' (H.); and Julius is accorded a great encomium by Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. II, chap. xxi.

But we do not feel that in the case given by Pliny the requests of superiors are equivalent to necessity and sovereign injunction, although in general the statement of Plato, Letters, vii [p. 329 D], is true enough:

¹ [For nommine read nomine.—Tr.]

² [For imperim read imperium.—Tr.]

'We know¹ full well that the requests of tyrants are partly composed of compulsions.' Nor is the case of Doeg, in 1 Samuel, xxii, opposed to our position. For we made this express exception, that a man may refuse such a task so far as he is able, and this the other servants of Saul did, and deserve praise for that reason. (Just as the midwives of Egypt deserved praise for evading by lies the ruthless command of Pharaoh, in Exodus, i.) But Doeg leaped up with all eagerness to carry out the command of the king, although there is no mention of any threat being connected with it, since he had already accused innocent men of a false crime, hinting that they had connived with David in secret plots against the king. For that he had made false accusations is clear enough from Psalms, lii.

Yet it must be confessed that merely to execute some acts seems to 781 many a harsher fate than death itself: if, for instance, a tyrant should command a man to slay his parents or sons, or to lie with his mother, daughter, or a beast. A brave man would choose death to the performance of such a deed. So also no one could easily criticize the steadfastness of those Romans who, when Hannibal ranged them against each other and commanded brothers to fight with brothers, fathers with children, kinsmen with kinsmen, preferred death by torture to staining their hands with the blood of those who were so near to them. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XXV in Excerpta Peiresciana [XXVI. xiv. 2]. We are informed by Laonicus Chalcocondylas, Bk. I, that Amurath 'commanded the parents of those who had joined in the rebellion of Sauzes to slay their sons with their own hands, and two fathers, who refused to carry out such a cruel command were themselves executed at the same time as their sons. For he used to say that the sons would never have gone over to Sauzes had not their parents advised them to, and that they were playing with both sides while the outcome seemed uncertain.' Yet we do not hold it lawful to be willing to assist in the death of an innocent person in order to save my life, for that would be to make another's life the price of my own, while there are many things which we cannot do for a price, but can under another consideration. Abraham Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pt. I, chap. xix, writes that it is held by that people that a wife can do without sin whatever her husband commands her, since an evil done under that condition is to be imputed not to her but to her husband, whom she is obligated to obey.

7. But that a man cannot undertake as his own, at the command of a superior, an action which opposes the dictate of right conscience, no one with any sense of piety will deny. And so those judges in Josephus, Jewish War, Bk. IV, chap. xix, were right in refusing to condemn the innocent Zacharias, despite the fact that they knew that they were in immediate peril from the fury of the Zealots. On the other hand those described in 1 Kings, xxi, involved themselves in the most serious crime, for they pronounced a judgement not as dictated by a king through his sovereign power, but as though meted out by justice herself, when the crime was patent. And their villainy was equalled by that of the witnesses. The same judgement must be passed upon informers who weigh down powerful or wealthy men with calumnies, in order that evil princes may thereby find the occasion to destroy them. Amid whom there was one of some renown named Marcellus Eprius, a well-known informer upon Thrasea, who, as we are informed by Tacitus, Histories, Bk. IV, chap. viii, gave as his excuse that 'the overthrow of Thraseas could not be imputed to his speech more than to the decision of the senate'¹. This was merely to share the crime with others, not to clear himself of it. 'The cruelty of Nero accomplished its purpose by means of such mockeries as these.' (O.) But still it was avarice and a lust to advance to high office by disreputable means which led you to encourage that low actor. Others who engaged in the same practices offered as an excuse that by service of this sort they 'redeemed their dignity or their life'. 'Their pleas,' to the effect that 'they preferred to accomplish the ruin of others' rather than to run a risk themselves, 'may be admitted', thinks Curtius Montanus (loc. cit., Bk. IV, chap. xlii), not because he believes that they are entirely innocent; but by a rhetorical device he gives the appearance of conceding some points, in order to insist the more urgently upon others. And very properly 'the senate, after Nero was put to death, demanded that the informers and the ministers of his iniquity should be punished in the established way . . . a description of men called into existence to prey upon the vitals of society'. Ibid., chap. xxx.² (O.) According to Suetonius, Titus, chap. viii, such men were treated in this way: 'After they had been soundly beaten in the Forum with scourges and cudgels, and finally led in procession across the arena of the amphitheatre, (the emperor Titus) had some of them put up and sold, and others deported to the wildest of the islands.' (R.) We are informed by Pliny, Panegyric, chaps. xxxiv-xxxv, that Trajan had them loaded on unseaworthy vessels, to be drowned in the waves, or cast upon desert islands. Thus the 'private commands of Tiberius' did not clear Cn. Piso of criminal responsibility 782 for the death of Germanicus, if, indeed, he was actually the cause of that prince's death. And although he might have confessed the complicity of Tiberius before the senate, it would only have caused some embarrassment to the emperor, who would have been deprived of any way to excuse himself of a crime which he had ordered; while the senate would still have had the power to condemn him, because he had not declared that he had a command of the emperor for that deed, but had himself eagerly undertaken what could not be ordered with decency, in order that he might by the crime put Tiberius under his obligation. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III, chap. xvi. Nor do we feel that Joab was entirely free from guilt in the death of Uriah, in 2 Samuel, xi. 14-16, although, in xii. 9, only David is mentioned as the principal cause. Papinian was also correct in refusing to defend the murder of Geta, adding the famous remark: 'It is not so easy to excuse a murder as it is to commit it.' Others have recorded that he refused to deliver an oration in which he would have inveighed against the brother of the emperor, giving as his reason, 'To accuse an innocent man when he is dead is to murder him a second time.' But Spartianus, Caracalla, chap. viii, rejects this account, giving as his reason that 'the prefect of the guard may not compose speeches' (although there seems to be no reason why he could not have received an extraordinary command to do so), and adds that 'it is established that Papinian was killed for being one of Geta's supporters'. (M.)

¹ [For ἔσμεν read ἵσμεν.—Tr.]

¹ [For senasus read senatus.—Tr.]² [This last clause comes from the Annals, IV. xxx.—Tr.]

However this may be, a man is right in refusing to lend his ability to the defence of villainies, even though the defence is to be published under another's name. For a subtle arraying of specious arguments, tricked out with artifices and captivating persuasion, can never be regarded as a full excuse for another's act. But our conclusion would have had to be different if Caracalla had commanded some one to deliver in the senate such an oration, composed either by himself or some one else, upon pain of death in case he refused. This point also¹ can be illustrated by a number of passages in Plato, Apology of Socrates. Here also belongs what is told of Sallust by Dio Cassius, Bk. XLIII [ix], whom

Caesar put over the Numidians nominally to rule, but really to harry and plunder their country. At all events this officer took many bribes, and confiscated much property, so that he was not only accused but incurred the deepest disgrace, inasmuch as after writing such treatises as he had, and making many bitter remarks about those who fleeced others, he did not practise what he preached. Therefore, even if he was completely exonerated by Caesar, yet in his history, as upon a tablet, the man himself has chiselled his own condemnation as well. (C.)

Although when a prince's deed has not yet been clearly convicted of injustice, a citizen, and especially a public minister, will be careful not to be over-hasty in condemning it, since it is their duty always to presume the justice of their master. See the political solecism² of Aligrius, Chancellor of France, in Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. XVI.

8. By the same principle we must decide the question as to whether a citizen may rightfully take up arms in an unjust war at the command of his prince. The opinion of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxvi, § 4, is that when it is manifest that a prince is taking up unjust arms against another, it is not right for a citizen to be an accomplice in his crimes; but that in case of doubt he should take the safer course, which is to keep out of the war. But it is our feeling that such matters should be considered with due caution, lest¹ the force of civil sovereignty be destroyed by them, and in a matter of such importance the obedience of citizens should depend upon the judgement of individuals; especially since in such questions it is easy for timidity and laziness to furnish a scruple of conscience. Yet if, when a man is admitted to deliberations and has the right to vote, he is not obligated by the decision of the rest without his own consent, he cannot rightfully undertake what he has questions about, and certainly nothing of the injustice of which he is fully convinced. And this will hold good if he is allowed his choice either to go to war or to remain at home. But what if he is commanded simply to obey? In that case we feel that among all nations who pay any heed to honourable conduct it is always presupposed, in their 783 deliberations, that they had just cause to undertake the war, while there is no use speaking of conscience among such as neglect to do this.

¹ [For quo read quoque.—Tr.]

² [For solaecismus read soloeismus.—Tr.]

But the chief question in this connexion is, whether, at a special time, assuming that the cause is just, it is to the advantage of the state to declare war upon another. In such cases it is presumed that he whose peculiar task it is to care for the state, and who is most thoroughly conversant with the resources of the commonwealth, surely sees more clearly than a private citizen what is for its benefit. But if some man, convinced of the justice of the war, still questions whether it would not be better to overlook or forgive the affront offered the state, rather than avenge it in war, let him know that on no account does this seem to be sufficient reason to allow a citizen to refuse obedience to civil sovereignty and to provoke its discipline against him, because he feels that his state is not observing toward another a virtue which contains only the force of an imperfect obligation. And so the safest course would be for a citizen merely to obey in a case like this, and to leave the supreme sovereign accountable to God for the justice of his war. Rightly does Hector say in Homer, Iliad, Bk. XII [243]: 'One omen is best, to fight for our country.' (L.L. & M.) In Tacitus, Histories, Bk. II [xxv], it is called a 'crime of the state' for a son to have slain his father² in battle. Add Digest, IX. iv. 2, § 1; IX. ii. 37. Yet it should be observed that these points concern only citizens who take up arms at the command of the supreme sovereign, for whoever voluntarily enters the service of a foreign prince, should by all means³ be certain of the justice of his cause. Therefore, it is not without justice that those who sell their services without considering the cause, are in bad repute with men of judgement. Gunther, Ligurinus, Bk. VII, thus describes them: 'A troop hired for pay, a soldiery intent upon gifts of war, accustomed to change its favour for a price, to accept battle at once upon its payment, and to treat any one as an enemy that their contractor names.' Nor are such men given any undue praise by Thomas More in his Utopia, Bk. II.

¹ [For neexinde read ne exinde.—Tr.]

² [For omnio read omnino.—Tr.]

² [For partem read patrem.—Tr.]

CHAPTER II

ON THE POWER OF SUPREME SOVEREIGNTY OVER THE LIVES OF CITIZENS IN THE DEFENCE OF THE STATE

- | | |
|---|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The supreme sovereign can in time of war expose citizens to peril of their lives.2. Whether a citizen may refuse military service because of a pact¹ with the enemy.3. No man should render himself useless for military service. | <ol style="list-style-type: none">4. How far the obligation of soldiers extends.5. Whether a state can surrender an innocent citizen.6. One state can surrender to another a citizen as a hostage. |
|---|--|

ALTHOUGH men gathered into states to the end that they might find security for their property, and especially for their lives, it was still found necessary for the preservation of states that the supreme sovereignty should exercise some power over the lives of citizens, and this for two purposes, both to avert any evil from the state, and to suppress misdeeds. On the former score the power belongs to the supreme sovereign to expose the lives of citizens to peril, in order to defend the state and to maintain its rights, since those who resort to arms are always bent upon taking each other's lives. In fact, since the proper use of arms requires training, Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII [p. 831 A] (although 784 we disagree with him), even held that the lives of citizens could be exposed to danger in this training, and would have such arms used in their military exercises as are exactly like those employed in war, as dangerous, and as suited to strike terror, adding the following law:

If any one dies in these mimic contests, the homicide is involuntary, and we will make the slayer, when he has been purified according to law, to be pure of blood, considering that if a few men should die, others as good as they will be born; but that if fear is dead, then that the citizens will never find a test of superior and inferior in desert, which is a far greater evil to the state than the other. (J.)

Such military exercises are still in use in Japan. See Bern. Varenius, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xix. There is preserved in Demosthenes, Against Aristocrates [54-5], an Attic law:

If one man shall slay another unintentionally in a prize-fight [...] he shall not go into exile² [...] (the reason added being): He, the author of the law, looked not at the event, but at the intention of the party. To vanquish without taking life, not to kill. If the adversary was too weak to endure the struggle for victory, he considered that he was the cause of his own misfortune, and therefore allowed him no redress. (K.)

Furthermore, the requirements of military service quite properly demand a very rigid discipline, since in warfare the slightest negligence often imperils the life of the state. Therefore, although a judge upon the bench commonly makes some allowance for affections which deeply stir the heart of a man, that may not be done in military courts, for in them a man is often condemned to death for deserting his post in order to escape imminent death. Livy, Bk. V, chap. vi: 'Death by cudgelling is the wage of him who forsakes the standards or quits his post.' (F.) Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xv. And yet some have felt that cowardice in soldiers is more effectively checked by ignominious punishments. See Justin, Bk. XXXII, chap. iii; Ferdinand Pinto, chap. x. So also among some nations the avoidance of military duty has received the most severe punishment. See Digest, XLIX. xvi. 4, § 10. Thus Lycurgus, Oration against Leocrates [129f.], tells of a law in Sparta that any one who refused to face peril for his country should die. In this way they turned the very thing they feared into a penalty. [...] For when a man was faced by two perils of death, he would far rather choose the one at the hands of enemies than the one at the hands of the laws and of his fellow citizens.

¹ [For popter pactum read propter pactum.—Tr.]

² [For exulatio read exulato.—Tr.]

Add Law of the Lombards, Bk. III, tit. xiii, § 1. And although certain citizens are to be found in most states, who, although otherwise fitted by age and physique to bear arms, enjoy exemption from military service either because of their occupation or of some special indulgence of the state, that privilege is only in force so long as the rest of the citizens, or allies, or mercenaries are at hand in sufficient numbers to defend the state. Otherwise, at the call of supreme necessity, these exempted persons also shall take up arms for their altars and hearths. Surely it is better for the privileges of such men to lie dormant for a while, than for the state to perish because their religious scruples lack timeliness. 'The summons of extreme perils recognizes no distinctions.' At Rome in her early history the exemption from war enjoyed by old men and priests ceased at an invasion of the Gauls. Appian, Civil War, Bk. II [cl]. Add Code, X. xlix. 3; see also Andreas Maurocenus¹, Historia Veneta, Bk. IV, p. 147. Although there was good reason for Plutarch, Solon [xxx], to commend the law either of Solon or Pisi-stratus: '[...] Those who are maimed in war shall be maintained at the public charge.' (P.) Nay, when the resources of the state will bear it, some pay or reward is certainly² owed those who are in the service while the rest remain at home, since not only are the former forced to neglect their own affairs, but they also deserve some compensation, in so far as 785 they give more service in proportion to the state than other citizens. Add also what is recorded by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxiii, on the rules of the Egyptians regarding military service.

2. In this connexion the question may be raised, as to whether, if a prisoner held by the enemy has promised, in order to secure his release, that he will not take up arms against them, he can thereafter rightly be obligated by the state to break his promise, and to serve against that enemy. Some have pronounced such a pact void in itself, because it is opposed to the duty which a citizen owes his state. Our opinion is, that we should not so much reply to this, that not all things which are opposed to one's duty are therefore at once null and void, as deny that it is opposed to the duty which is owed a state to secure one's liberty by promising what is already in the hands of the enemy. For unless the enemy gave him his freedom, the prisoner could never bear arms against them. Therefore, such a pact makes a state none the worse off, for unless the prisoner regains his liberty he must be regarded as dead to his country. And therefore, when a state has received back a former prisoner, it is held to have done so on this condition: That it leave him able to keep his promise to the enemy, especially when he may have recovered his liberty unaided by the state. But may not that eminent force of supreme sovereignty put forth its power over such an obligation of a citizen, if the safety of the state demands it? If, for instance, a state is in immediate danger, unless he also come to its defence? On this we hold, that, since it is absurd for me to be a citizen and yet be under an obligation which also renders me of no service to the state in its extreme necessity, no less absurd is it for me to be able to be obligated by a simple pact so that I may not resist the unjust force of one who is intent upon the destruction of me and mine; and that for this reason such a pact of a prisoner is to be understood as only for an offensive, not a defensive war, especially if my safety will also be imperilled together with that of the state. For why did the enemy grant me my liberty, if he purposed so to bind me that I could not for the future ward off his violence from my life and fortunes? Therefore, such a pact will by no means stand in the way of my taking up arms in defence of the state at the call of my supreme sovereign.

¹ [For Morocenus read Maurocenus.—Tr.]

² [For omnia read omnino.—Tr.]

It is a question much like the foregoing, as to whether, when set free by the enemy upon a condition, a man is required to return into captivity when the condition is not fulfilled. This is answered in the affirmative in the case of private citizens, but Bussièrès, Historia Francica, Bk. XVI, in the case of King Francis, would raise some doubt about its applying to kings. This matter I leave for others to settle, although my advice would be that he who holds a king captive should be careful not to let him go before the conditions were actually fulfilled.

3. It follows from all this, that, although no present necessity of state should require the military services of its citizens, those who render themselves or others unfit to perform them, deserve severe punishment. M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. I, cont. vii [1]: 'My other limbs are my own; my hands belong to the state.' We read of great numbers of examples of such cowardice in that martial people, the Roman Quirites. Suetonius, Tiberius, chap. viii, says, 'Tiberius¹

¹ [For Tiberio read A Tiberio.—Tr.]

undertook the investigation of the slave-prisons, the owners of which had gained a bad reputation; for they were charged with holding in durance not only travellers, but also those whom dread of military service had driven to such places of concealment.' (R.) This is perhaps the reason why Hadrian is said to have done away with them entirely. See Spartianus, Hadrianus, chap. xviii, and the comments by Salmasius. In Valerius Maximus, Bk. VI, chap. iii, it is recorded that C. Vettienus cut off the fingers of his left hand to avoid serving in the Social War, for 786 which act the senate confiscated his property and imprisoned him for life. Suetonius, Augustus, chap. xxiv, says that the emperor 'sold a Roman knight and his property at public auction, because he had cut off the thumbs of two young sons, to make them unfit for military service'. (R.) Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XV [xii], in describing the customs of the Gauls, reports: 'Nor has any one of this nation ever mutilated his thumb from fear of the toils of war, as men have done in Italy, who in their district are called Murci.' (Y.)

Many laws were passed against this outrageous practice. Digest, XLIX. xvi. 5, § 12 [XLIX. xvi. 4, § 12]: 'The man who, upon the announcement of a levy for war, disabled his son so as to be unfit for military service, was to be exiled according to an order of Trajan.' There is a law of Constantine I in the *Theodosian Code*¹ [VII. xxii. 1]:

Those sons of veterans who are fit for military service, some of whom as slackers refuse to perform military duties, and others are so contemptible as to try to avoid the necessity of service by maiming their bodies, we order, in case they be judged unfit for warfare because their fingers have been cut off, to be brought together for labour and menial employment about the court.

Much the same appears in the Theodosian Code, VII. xiii. 4 and 10².

He who avoids the use of arms by foully cutting off his fingers shall not escape that which he shuns, but shall be marked with infamy, and shall be forced to bear the drudgery of military service, since he refused the honour of it. Moreover, those provincial subjects who because of such wanton deeds are frequently short in their levies, shall be given the choice of furnishing two mutilated young men for one sound one, at the time of holding the draft.

But by far the most severe is in Ibid., VII. xiii. 5³:

If any one be found to have done physical injury to himself by cutting off his fingers in order to escape taking the oath of military service, let him be burned to death by the avenging flames, and let his master, who does not prevent it, be severely punished.

Yet it seems likely that the last penalty applied only to slaves, although those previously cited held good for free citizens. For in the early days of their state, as is well known, the Romans forbade military service to their slaves, except when the state was in dire straits. That this was no longer observed in later years is proved by the Theodosian Code, VII. xiii. 16¹, where the emperors Arcadius and Honorius issue this law:

¹ [For libro primo Cod. Theodosius read I. Cod. Theodosii.—Tr.]

² [For libro quarto & decimo C. Theodosius read lege quarta et decima C. Theodosii.—Tr.]

³ [For libro quinto read lex quinta.—Tr.]

Against the attacks of the enemy we command that not only persons but capacities be taken into account, and although we believe that free men are inspired by love of country, yet by the authority of this decree we exhort slaves to offer themselves with all speed to the toils of war, for they will receive freedom as their reward if they take up arms and are found suitable for service, as well as two solidi for drink-money.

For a law in the Theodosian Code, VII. xiii. 11², which is also to be found in the Justinian Code, XII. xliii. 2³, speaks 'of a slave belonging to another man, and that he who brought him in and offered him for military service, was compelled to pay into the imperial treasury a libra of gold'.⁴ And a law under the same title, the Theodosian Code, VII. xiii. 8, does not forbid the levying of slaves for military service, but only decrees: 'In the finest companies of picked troops no slave is to be enrolled.' Vegetius, De Re Militari, Bk. I, chap. vii, complains that 'either by favour or connivance the new levies laid upon the owners are approved, and such men are enrolled in the armies as their owners do not care to keep'. Many scholars have held that the Italians and French derived their word 'poltrones' from the cutting-off of the thumbs (pollices), but in my opinion Aegidius Menagius, Origines Linguae Francicae, is more correct in deriving it from the Italian 'poltro', that is, one who always lies at home upon his couch (pulvinar).

4. Whoever, therefore, is obligated to undergo military service, must at the command of the general guard a post, even though he see that it will probably cost him his life. And although otherwise the burdens which all citizens are able to share in should be laid upon them proportionally, or, when this is impossible or unnecessary, should be borne in turn, or balanced off by an equivalent, or even assigned by lot, the nature of war does not permit such dangerous posts always to be distributed by lot. And so a general will have the power to choose for them the most fit, or, if there be many such, those whom it seems best; unless it happen that there be some under him who voluntarily demand for themselves such perils, as did Calpurnius Flamma (Florus, Bk. II, chap. ii), and before him P. Decius Mus (Livy, Bk. VII, chap. xxxiv). Nor will any brave man complain if such posts are assigned him by the authority of the general. Seneca, On Providence, chap. iv:

Why in the army are the most hazardous services assigned to the bravest soldiers? A general sends his choicest troops to attack the enemy in a midnight ambushade, to reconnoitre his line of march, or to drive the hostile garrisons from their strong places.

¹ [For amplus . . . libro decimo sexto read amplius . . . lege decima sexta.—Tr.]

² [For libro undecimo read lex undecima.—Tr.]

³ [For libro secundo detiron read lege secunda de tiron. A number of errors in citation and in syntax, on this page, are clearly due to an effort on the part of the printer to occupy additional space by expanding imperfectly understood abbreviations.—Tr.]

⁴ [The original form of this rescript is much changed in the quotation.—Tr.]

No one of these men says as he begins his march, 'The general has dealt hardly with me', but, 'He has judged well of me'. (S.)

Moreover, since our life, which would long since have been lost had we been exposed to a state of nature, is preserved for a long period by the aid of the state, it should surely not be held a heavy hardship to lay it down for the state, especially since we are indebted to it for many other benefits as well. And so it is not an injustice, if, at an extraordinary command of the state, and only under the stress of great necessity, we expose to peril that life which the state gives us, as it were, from day¹ to day and through all our existence; and especially in view of the fact that in a state of nature every man is forced to defend himself by his single strength, if he would not perish or be reduced to slavery. But as the case now stands, it is far better to be endangered with a company, not only because the hope of victory is made more certain, but also because, even though a man die in battle, his property and dependants will be kept safe by the resources of the state, for which solace there was no hope in a state of nature.

Yet it should be observed that it is not, or at least should not be, the intention of these commands directly to cause the loss of the life of a soldier. I say, 'should not be', for that sometimes generals may sin in this is proved by the case of king David in 2 Samuel, xi. 15, who for that very reason is called a murderer in xii. 9. Nor is it an unusual device to throw hated troops upon the enemy to be destroyed. See Curtius, Bk. VII, chap. ii; Polybius, Bk. I, chap. ix; Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIV, chap. lxxiii; XIX. xlviii; Justin, Bk. XII, chap. v, n. 8; Zonaras, Bk. II, about Maurice. In Sallust, Jugurtha [vii. 2], it is said that Jugurtha was sent by Micipsa to Numantia in order that he might fall by his own valour or by the onslaught of the enemy. But the purpose of the rigid commands of generals when soldiers are to battle without quarter, as it were, should be to ward off a great evil from the state, or to win for it some signal advantage, even though it may happen that they must die in securing these ends. The law of such decisive conflict is that we either destroy the enemy or die with him, for the latter is better than for us to fall alone. Therefore, it does not appear absurd for many to clear of the charge of αὐτοχειρία [suicide] those naval officers who, at the express order of their superiors, or from a correct understanding of the art of war, blow up their vessel rather than fall with it into the hands of the enemy, and 'Not to throw away their death was their greatest care'. (R.) Lucan, Bk. III [706-7]. For let us suppose an equal number of vessels on both sides. When one of ours is captured, the enemy will be two stronger than we, if ours perish alone, only one stronger, while if both sink together the strength remains equal. And it will scarcely ever fail, that if one of ours is blown up, it carries down with it one or more of the enemy. For the greatest danger of being captured is when ship lies alongside ship. And usually more damage is inflicted by such a course upon the enemy than upon ourselves, for they must be the stronger in order to force us to such extremities. But I do not feel that sinking should be avoided by blowing up a ship, for in that case there can still be some hope of getting away by swimming. Among the Chinese a law of long standing requires a general who fights unsuccessfully, even through no fault of his, to be put to death, on the ground, probably, that when he goes into battle he should think of no other outcome than victory or death, [which, of course, is manifestly unjust. And yet whoever has joined the colours will never desert his post from fear, but will fight to the very last breath; unless he knows that his commander wishes him to save his life rather than hold the position, or unless the position be not worth so much to the state as the lives of those citizens who are defending it].¹

¹ [For indies read in dies.—Tr.]

5. But what if the life of a citizen is demanded without a battle, perhaps to placate the wrath of a powerful prince, and in this way some evil or even destruction is averted from the state? On this point we must inquire after the reasons which moved the other to demand that a citizen of ours be turned over to him. For if it be for some misdeed of his, he should yet take particular care, even though he might himself be able by every means to avoid hurt, lest he involve the state in misfortune on his account. And so, although we should suppose that such a man is not bound voluntarily to deliver himself into the power of the enemy, he will still be obligated² to betake himself to some other place, where he may cause no trouble for those who harbour him. Nor do I question the power of a state to banish him against his will, unless it should feel it to be a kinder course to hand him over to the one who demands him. It is said that such a calamity befell Athens because of the murder of Androgeus, for whose death Minos took revenge, and after subduing Athens in war demanded of it as tribute seven youths and as many maidens to feed to the Minotaur. See Maro [Vergil], Aeneid, Bk. VI [20]; Hyginus, Fables, xli; Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. VIII, line 170; Plutarch, Theseus [xv]. In such a case I do not see on what plea a citizen can refuse the chance of the lot (which is the fairest way to decide between equals), unless there be found another Theseus who will volunteer to slay the Minotaur.

But what must we say if death or some evil akin to it be demanded of an innocent person, not because of any public or private crime? A case of this kind is found in Libanius, Declamations, Bk. I, decl. xxvii [42, introd.]:

¹ [Added by Barbeyrac, the first few words being his own, the remainder derived from De Officio Hominis et Civis, II. xiii. 2. The supplement was made in order to complete the expression of a thought which Pufendorf himself, in his later work, clearly felt to have been inadequately set forth.—Tr.]

² [For tenebitur read tenebitur.—Tr.]

A tyrant demanded of a neighbouring city a handsome youth, threatening it with war unless he was turned over. The state preferred to face war rather than hand over the youth. When the tyrant closely besieged the city, the youth's father slew his son and cast his body down from the walls. After the siege was raised he is accused of murder.

See Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 6, p. 95. In this case I do not pause either to accuse or to defend the father, who apparently can deliver a more plausible plea than the famous Verginius, in Livy, Bk. III, chap. 1. Yet we hold it to be beyond any question that a state is not obligated to defend such a man to its own destruction, for in that case both it will perish and the innocent person will have been protected in vain. Nor can he demand that the entire state perish on his account and together with him. And so the only recourse for the miserable fellow is to shift for himself, either by flight or some hazardous feat of daring. And when every attempt fails, let him bear his fate, in which he can still preserve his soul unspotted (see Digest, III. i. 1, § 6), since, indeed, it is unlawful to avoid such disgraceful treatment by suicide. As for the state, after it has defended the man with all its strength, and moved every stone to make it possible for him to escape by flight or by some other device, yet when all such attempts are in vain, and certain destruction can be avoided by no other course, it can then leave him to his fate, that is, not prevent the tyrant neighbour from seizing him. Quintilian, Declamations, ccliii: 'I should regard peace as cheap at the 789: price of the life of one citizen.' But that it should itself deliver him into the hand of the tyrant², or compel him to surrender himself, is, we feel, neither lawful nor necessary. See the illustration of Megacles of Messana in Marselaer, Legatus, Bk. I, chap. xxxiii. Worthy of note is also the case of Sperthias and Bulis³ who voluntarily surrendered themselves to Xerxes, in atonement for the foul deed of the Lacedaemonians in killing the Persian ambassadors. Herodotus, Bk. VII [cxxxiv]. Grotius, On the Law of War and Peace, Bk. II, chap. xxv, § 3. Yet in general the lives of its citizens should be of too great value to a state for it to be willing to give them up so as to avoid some uncertain danger, or to secure some little needed advantage, nor is a citizen required to offer up his life for such ends. Therefore, the two brothers, the Philaeni, whose story is told in Sallust, Jugurtha, and Pomponius Mela, Bk. I, chap. vii, did for their country more than could have been demanded of them. And Caiaphas, in John, xi. 50, was giving the worst possible application to an otherwise good rule, namely, that it was permissible to slay an innocent man, in order that the Romans might not suspect that the Jews were rising in revolt and therefore have an excuse to make war upon them. And especially is this true, since there are far more lenient measures for dispelling such a suspicion than by the death

¹ [For 78 read 789.—Tr.]

² [For tyranni read tyranni.—Tr.]

³ [For Sperthiis read Sperthiae, and for Bulis read Bulidis.—Tr.]

of an innocent man. Nor do I see how the deed of Darius can be excused, who by agreement offered several thousand troops for Zopyrus to slaughter, in order for him to gain standing among the Babylonians. Herodotus, Bk. III [clvii].

6. It is often necessary also, in order to strengthen state pacts, for hostages to be given out of the number of citizens, and any citizen can be required by the sovereign authority to undertake this burden, if none come forward of their own accord. And when any powerful enemy has demanded certain citizens, these can scarcely find any ground for refusal. But if several be designated, and it makes no difference to the one with whom we make the pact, or to our state, which one of them is the hostage, the safest way to avoid complaints is to have recourse to lot. And yet if the hostages are to be detained for a long period, the fairest thing will be to relieve them now and then by sending new ones in their place, just as a state is obligated to take care that for whatever extraordinary burden hostages undergo for the rest of the citizens, they shall be compensated, so far as possible, in some other way.

It may be asked, in this connexion, whether the lives of hostages are actually pledged, or only their liberty. My feeling is that in the delivery of hostages the actual bargain was this: 'We give these men here, as the most precious single part of our state, into your hands, on the condition that, if we do not observe what ¹ has been agreed upon, we will none of us raise a voice against your doing with them as you please.' According to Cominaeus, Bk. II, the citizens of Liège gave hostages to Charles of Burgundy, 'on the condition that if they violated their agreement in any way he was at liberty to inflict punishment on those who were in his hands'; yet Charles a little later sent them back unharmed. Therefore, since a breach of such pacts constitutes a cause of war against the guilty party, it is patent that after such a breach, and a declaration of war, hostages automatically pass into the status of enemies, in the very same manner as the other citizens of that state, even those who had in no way contributed to the cause of the war. And there is evidence enough that many have accorded hostages the same treatment as is shown any other enemies, although many others have held it inhuman for a person to alleviate the pain that comes to him from another's act of injury by visiting such miserable and innocent men with suffering. It is surely incorrect to say that hostages are given over with the intention that they shall be objects of punishment for a state's violation of a pact. For it does not appear on what basis the end which men should hold before them in inflicting ² punishments, can be attained by punishing an innocent hostage, who did not himself consent to the violation of the 790 pacts, but only did not refuse to offer himself to be punished for another's evil deed, in which act, considered in itself, there is no wrong. Enough guarantee is to be found in the hostages themselves, even though a penalty, in the proper sense of the term, cannot be exacted from them for another's wrong. For it is enough that they are in such a position that they can at once feel the licence of war, and so their safety depends upon the pleasure of an injured and incensed foe.

¹ [For que read quae.—Tr.]

² [For summendis read sumendis.—Tr.]

However all this may be, the actual truth is that a state pledges only the corporal liberty and not the life of a hostage, since it has or should have the fixed intention to keep faith, and so it regards the case by which another could have the licence to proceed against the life of a hostage, as morally non-existent. Nor is there any doubt that a state does an injury to a hostage if it unjustly violates pacts¹, and subjects that miserable person to another's anger, or if it delivers him over with the purpose that it may be able to cause another, thereby lulled into security, all the greater hurt.

But what are we to say, if he who has taken hostages should abuse his right over them by playing us false and doing us grave injuries, while all the time he threatens us with the execution of our hostages if we resist him? Under such circumstances it seems likely that, if those injuries are so great that it is better for those innocent hostages to be endangered than for the state to endure such wrongs, their peril can be neglected, and resistance offered to the violence of the faithless enemy. Nor is it any more an injury for a state to treat its hostages in this way, than it is for it to assign any of its citizens in war a post, in the defence of which they must either perish or be captured. And they will bear this calamity as a turn of fortune, without a trace of anger at their fatherland, which could not foresee such an outcome. See Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXVIII, chap. vi. Just as such an event will not lessen the value of the civil status, since such cases can happen only at rare intervals, while misfortunes of a similar character cannot help but break in very frequently upon a state of nature. The same conclusion must be reached in the famous case that befell the people of Utica, some of whose citizens were captured by Agathocles and fastened in front of an engine of war, so that their fellow citizens had to kill them first of all if they would beat back the enemy. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XX, chap. lv. On this point may in a way be applied what is found in Gunther, Ligurinus, Bk. X, on the hostages of Cremona whom Frederick fastened to engines of war. Compare Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xi, § 18; chap. xx, §§ 52 ff.; Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, p. 102.

¹ [For pacto read pacta.—Tr.]

CHAPTER III

ON THE POWER OF SUPREME SOVEREIGNTY OVER THE LIVES AND FORTUNES OF CITIZENS, WHICH ARISES BY REASON OF THEIR CRIMES

1. Whether the right of life and death can be conferred upon a state by individuals.
2. In natural liberty no place is afforded for human punishment.
3. This is possible only in states.
4. The definition of punishment.
5. The species of justice to which is to be referred the exaction of punishments.
6. It is not unjust for one man to punish another.
7. To whom the power to exact punishment belongs.
8. Human punishment should serve some end.
- 11¹ 9. The first end of punishment is to reform the guilty person.
10. Whether simply any man whatsoever can correct another.
11. The second end of punishment is to give protection to the injured party.
12. The third end is the security of all others.
13. How far private individuals can inflict punishments.
14. What offences it is idle to punish in a civil court.
15. Whether pardon is lawful at any time.
16. How far it is lawful prior to a penal law;
17. And subsequent to it.
18. The seriousness of an offence is measured first by the object;
19. Then by the passion with which a man was moved;
20. Then by the scope of the purpose which he had in mind;
21. Then by the firmness of his purpose;
22. And finally by his habit or record.
23. What is regarded in determining the amount of punishment.
24. What may be the measure of punishments.
25. Respect is had in punishments also to the person of him who is to suffer.
26. Whether the Hebrew law is in every case an adequate measure of punishments².
27. On retaliation.
28. How a body may be punished.
29. The crimes of a body are finally extinguished with the passage of time.
30. Not every misfortune is human punishment.
31. A loss directly inflicted is one thing, and that which comes by consequence is another.
32. The occasion of an evil is one thing, its cause another.
33. No one should be punished for another's misdeed.

THERE belongs also to the supreme civil power a right over the body and life as well as over the property of citizens, and this by reason of their crimes, which is usually called more accurately the right of life and death; although we may add that this is very different from the right of God over His creatures (Psalms, xc. 4), and of men over animals. On this power the first question that arises is: In what way can such a power be conferred upon a state by individuals through the medium of pacts? For since a punishment is something inflicted upon a man against his will, and yet what any man does to himself cannot happen against his will, it cannot avoid being a matter of some difficulty to explain how any man may have the power to punish himself, and how he can transfer that to another. For the afflictions to which ascetics or others subject their own bodies in lacerating their flesh, or in observing the rigorous discipline of certain religious bodies, are either no punishments at all, properly speaking, but only some kind of medicine, sedatives to restrain the bursting forth of vices, or else they are not undergone voluntarily, but only at the command of priests, who base their authority upon their divine office. In their case there is no alteration in the nature of punishment, because, for example, it is inflicted by their own hands, since they are moved by the consideration of a greater evil which would have awaited them had they refused to obey, just as we see criminals walking to the place of execution, who would be dragged, did they not follow of their own accord. In fact¹ among some peoples criminals at the command of a judge take their lives with their own hands. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. III, chap. v, tells of the Ethiopians: 'One of the lictors is sent to the criminal, bearing before him the badge or sign of death; upon sight of which the party goes home and kills himself.' (B.*)

¹ [In the running folio for Caput I. read Caput III.—Tr.]

² [For poeanrum read poenarum.—Tr.]

Therefore, we must recognize, on this point, that, just as in the case of natural substances there may result, from the mixing and balancing off of several simple substances, a compound, in which are to be found qualities not observable in any of the ingredients of the mixture, so moral bodies as well, composed of several men, can possess some right, consequent upon their union, which was not formally inherent in any of the individual members, which right, also, arising from such a banding together, is exercised by the governors of those bodies. See Digest, XLI. i. 46. Thus no one would say that individual 792 men have the faculty of passing laws for themselves, and yet when all subject their will to the will of one, there arises the power to prescribe laws for all. In the same manner there can exist in the head of a moral body the faculty of restraining each member by punishments, which faculty, however, was not before that time in the individuals. And it is very easy for this to arise, since they individually obligate themselves not only not to undertake to defend, but, if need be, to be willing to lend their aid against him whom the governor of the state is going to punish. From this fact also appears the reason why it does not follow, as some would have it, that what a superior takes from subjects by way of penalty, is taken away with their consent, for the reason that they had formerly agreed to confirm beforehand all acts of their superior. For since that case in which the power of a superior² will exerts itself over the life of a subject, is in the control of the subject himself, and he may, if he please, prevent it forever, that case is considered by individuals as one which will never arise. Compare Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 18.

¹ [For Quinimo read Quin imo.—Tr.]

² [For superioris read superioris.—Tr.]

Although the same writer, in his *Leviathan*¹, chap. xxviii, lays down that the right held by a state to punish does not arise from the concession of citizens, but that the foundation of this right is based upon that other, which, before the establishment of a state, belonged to every man, namely, to do whatever seemed to him necessary for self-preservation. And that therefore this right was not given but left to the state, which, however, it may use at its own pleasure, supposing it has the strength, in order to preserve all its citizens. To this the reply can be made that the right to exact punishment differs from that of self-preservation, and that since the former is exercised over subjects, it is impossible to conceive how it already existed in a state of nature, where no one man is subject to another.

We should also mention the fact that we are treating at this point only of those punishments which are ordained at the arbitrary, as it were, disposal of human legislators for crimes, and are distinguished from such evils as are by natural consequence attendant upon sins.

2. Now in developing the point of this right of requiring punishment of subjects, we would make it clear, first of all, that we are discussing only that right which man exercises over man, and wish our conclusions in no way extended to the process and methods of the divine tribunal, which in many parts of its jurisdiction is by nature different from those of men. And this seems to have been partly recognized by Plutarch, De Sera Numinis Vindicta [iv, p. 549 F], when he says:

It cannot be said that it is safe or easy for a mortal to speak otherwise of the Supreme Deity than only this, that He alone it is who knows the most convenient time to apply most proper correctives for the cure of sin and impiety, and to administer punishments as medicaments to every transgressor, yet being not confined to an equal quality and measure common to all distempers, nor to one and the same time. (G.)

To begin at the very first, we must recognize that there are to be found in most sins, especially in such as terminate in another, two features or factors: The defect itself, or the amount of the deviation of the sins from the law; and the loss which they directly or indirectly bring upon another. Now it is certain that I am obligated by the law of nature to indemnify another for damage done him in any way through my fault, and in case that has proceeded from ill-will, to give him a guarantee that it will not happen in the future. But in requiring² this guarantee there is a difference between the cases of such as live in natural liberty, and such as are subject to states. Apparently the law of nature does not obligate the former, after a man has been affected with repentance and moved of his own accord and not by force to offer to make good a damage, to give one another any guarantee other than their word by simple declaration, or upon oath, to refrain from such offences for the future. And this because a voluntary repentance serves as sufficient evidence of a change of heart and a firm resolve to refrain henceforth from injuries. And so if he who has been injured refuses to be satisfied with such an adjustment, and because of unfounded mistrust or hardness of heart wants to extort by force a larger guarantee, he will be guilty of violating the peace, and the other will be able rightly to resist him, since by the law of nature he is not obligated to furnish such a larger guarantee. In such a case the strife that follows will be a just one for him who did the injury, and unjust for him who received it. But when a man has to be forced to render satisfaction, a fact¹ which shows his utter and perverse obstinacy, and the injured party can obtain no satisfaction unless he overpower the one who wronged him, it will be allowable for the victor in the struggle to secure whatever guarantee for his security he may think most fair. And in such cases we cannot only proceed to seize the other's arms, raze or occupy his fortified places, keep him in perpetual bonds, and the like, but even put him to death, if we are satisfied that his freedom will only mean another threat against our existence, and that we can find no better way to avoid him. Yet as the exaction of a guarantee of this sort is secured by means of war, and not by means of punishment, as it is properly understood (for some apply the term punishment in a looser sense to all evils which attend sins in natural consequence, and so also to such as are inflicted in a state of natural liberty in return for undeserved injuries), so one cannot rightly be said to be obligated to furnish² such a guarantee. Because it supposes and connotes, in him from whom it is wrung, some fault of mind and sin against the law of nature, inasmuch as it is the denial of voluntary satisfaction and a defence by force³ of one's sin. Moreover, since evils which are inflicted by means of war are not, as will be clear from what follows, punishments in the proper sense of the term, it is also obvious that human punishment, in the proper sense of the word, and as it follows upon human sovereignty, cannot fall upon those who live in natural liberty. Equally clear is it, however, that such are liable to those evils which follow by natural sequence upon sins.

¹ [For Levith: read Leviath.—Tr.]

² [For exhigendam read exigendam.—Tr.]

3. But if a man receive any loss within the bounds of states, it is not only recovered more easily than is possible in natural liberty through a war carried on by his own strength, but citizens are also guarded in advance against suffering injuries and damages, so far as the condition of human affairs allows, since there awaits violators of the laws a punishment which is to be exacted in the courts of the state. For the human will, ever naturally capable of being turned to good or evil, can be directed and controlled in no way more easily than by the threat of a present evil.

¹ [For idipsum read id ipsum.—Tr.]

² [For violentiam read per violentiam.—Tr.]

³ [For teneri read teneri.—Tr.]

4. A punishment can in general be defined as an evil of suffering that is inflicted in proportion to an evil of action, or as some troublesome evil which is imposed upon a man by way of coercion, and by the authority of the state, in view of some antecedent crime. We say 'an evil of suffering', for although forms of labour are often required in lieu of punishment, such as condemning a man to the mines, the galleys, the workhouse, to labour on a fortification or on a road, &c., yet such employments are considered only in so far as they are laborious or troublesome to the one so employed, and are therefore to be referred to sufferings. It follows, moreover, that because we said a punishment was inflicted 'in view of some antecedent crime', that those inconveniences which a man suffers by reason of some contagious disease or a deformity, or some other impurity, such as we find frequently mentioned in the Hebrew law, where lepers are shut off from contact with the rest of the people, or men with deformities¹ are excluded from the priesthood, &c., are not punishments in the proper sense of the word. These are no more punishments than for a foreigner or a man of low birth to be deprived of serving in a certain capacity in a state, or for a person to suffer pain while a broken bone is being set. Although such things are sometimes ἀκρίτως [improperly] called punishments, because of their similarity to them, just as it is commonly said of permanent invalids or misshapen persons that their very existence is a punishment to them. It also follows from this, that imprisonment, the purpose of which is to prevent a guilty person from making his escape, is not properly punishment, since no one is justly punished before he is condemned. Therefore, it is contrary to natural law for a condemned person, before he is heard and condemned, to suffer more ill from his custody than it requires, and so anything of that nature must either be made up to him, or else subtracted from the subsequent punishment. See Digest, XLVIII. xix,² §§ 8, 9; Code, IX. xlvii. 25³. Furthermore, by having said that a punishment is imposed 'by the authority of a state', we separate it from those evils to which men are exposed involuntarily in war, or a fight, and from the stubbornness or open injury of another. Therefore, for example, a man is not disgraced by the cutting off of his ear or a blow of a club, but only by the cause for such treatment. Now Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. IV, chap. xi, holds that 'slaughter in war can be included under the head of punishment'. But that is not to be admitted, save in the sense that war justly waged upon a person because of some antecedent injury, and the evils therefrom which befall the author of the injury, may be looked upon as a natural punishment, and that the evils of war should, so far as possible, be tempered by a pious warrior to the process which is usually observed

794

¹ [For multi read nutilati.—Tr.]

² [For libr. Paragraph. octav. non read lex octav. paragraph. non.—Tr.]

³ [For libro vigesimo quinto read lege vigesima quinta.—Tr.]

by the punishment of a human court. Although Tacitus, Annals, Bk. I [xlvi], would suggest also another distinction between punishments and the evils of war: 'In time of peace cases are judged upon their merits; when it comes to fighting, innocent and guilty fall alike.' (R.)

So also evils which follow upon a sin by natural consequence are not held by a human court to savour of punishment; as when a man loses his health by some illegal act, or attacks another and is repelled with blows. For these evils are not inflicted by a civil sovereign by virtue of his authority. Therefore, if a man has by his sins seriously impaired his health or fortunes, or made himself hated of other men from whom he might otherwise have expected considerable wealth, he is none the less liable for punishment.

And we add, in conclusion, that punishment is inflicted by way of coercion, or, in other words, on the unwilling, for if this is not true, punishment will never attain its end for men, which is to deter them by its harshness from sins. Quintilian, Declamations, xi [8]:

Let not any malefactor choose his own punishment. My lords, you will open a door to a boundless presumption in wicked men, if a condemned person may pick and choose what punishment he pleases himself. [. . .] It eases all pain and torment whatever, when the mind is prepared beforehand for its suffering. He is mistaken that thinks human tortures are measured only by the cruel appellation they go by. No, there can be no such thing as punishment, but to him that is loath to come to it. No man is pained but when he is made to abide that which he can't abide; for 'tis terror that makes anything cruel and piteous. Does any man call that a punishment which he leaps freely at? which he earnestly desires? No, I beseech you, drag your condemned persons thither, where they are loath to follow you. (W.*)

- 795 Although the choice of a punishment does not always make it appear voluntary, since it only avoids or mitigates a certain degree or manner of punishment, while the punishment itself which is chosen comes to the recipient against his will. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. IV, cont. xxiv [IX. i. 10]: 'It was no punishment for me to be in prison; I went there of my own accord.' Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xii [23]: 'A man's prison is the place that he is in against his will.' (M.) Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxix, n. 9. And so we must conclude, as well, that it is not proper to say that any man is obligated to bear punishment, or that it is owed by a man, because punishment signifies something which should be imposed on a person against his will, and involves an aversion of his will to it, while the things to which we are properly held are understood to be such as we should be moved to perform of our own accord and at our good pleasure. This makes clear the reason, why, for instance, when a peasant is working at the construction of a fortification without pay, at the command of his master, and a criminal is engaged in the same task because he has been condemned to it, the work is for the latter a punishment, but not for the former, since the task is understood to lie upon the former because of his obligation, and so is done by him willingly, while it is imposed on the other as something abhorrent to his will. Add Digest, III. ii. 22. And so, for example, when criminals in Japan, who have been condemned to death, disembowelled themselves with their own hands, that is no more to be considered a voluntary action than it is such when with us the condemned walk to the place of execution, or when, as we are told, in Spain the officer does not even bind a prisoner, but only says, 'Follow me'. Just as they say that it used to be the custom in Lithuania for criminals to erect their cross and to hang themselves with their own hands. For all these cannot be regarded as the acts of the criminals themselves, since they are actually the means of avoiding greater troubles which would befall them if they refused to do so for no purpose. It is an unusual thing, recounted in Livy, Bk. XXIV, chap. xvi, that Gracchus forced some cowardly soldiers to take this oath: 'None of them [. . .] will, so long as they serve, take either meat or drink in any other posture than standing' (S.); for it was still against their will that they took the oath, in order that they should hold it better to suffer disgrace of their own accord than to convict themselves of perjury. So also a man does not suffer punishment in the proper sense of the term when he goes surety for a person of his own accord, and later is forced to pay it; for the other's sin is only the occasion for his experiencing a loss, while the immediate cause is his obligation which he undertook of his own accord.

It follows, further, from what has been said that just as when a man has already made good the damage which he has inflicted, he is by no means required to accuse himself, so as to have passed upon him the punishment set by the laws; hence he can, for the same reason, by denial, hiding, or flight avoid it without violating any obligation. Quintilian, Declamations, cccxiii: 'The nature of all confession is such that it makes it possible to regard any man who confesses as out of his head.' Idem, Declamations, cccxxviii: 'And there is no man so low down, so useless even to himself, that he does not commit his crimes with the view of denying them.' For the following statement of Boecler in his preface to Grotius, p. 9, is rather involved: 'The merit of human punishments belongs to natural law, both as it is law and as it is natural. If it is a law it produces an obligation, and there would be no obligation, or none could be conceived, without conceiving likewise of some penalty as being imminent upon a violation of the law.' It is, of course, certain that a punishment awaits the violators of natural law, because it is the companion of every law, and it is in no way opposed to nature that he who did an evil should suffer one. But it would surely be an unskilful piece of reasoning to say that a law produces an obligation, and that therefore whoever violates a law is obligated voluntarily to deliver himself up for punishment in a court of men. Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiv, § 7, well says: 'The second part of law, which is called penal, is mandatory and addresses itself only to public ministers.' No such command as this is to be found in the law: 'Do thou, a thief, because of thy theft voluntarily proceed to the place of punishment'; but only this: 'Do thou, a magistrate, see to it that the thief be convicted and hung¹.' Therefore, it is no sin in the thief, if he be not hung, but the magistrate was lax in the performance of what was to the advantage of the state. The arguments of Socrates in Plato, Crito [p. 50 f.], when Crito was urging him to escape from prison: 'This course would break the laws of his state, which every upright citizen is obligated to observe. He must abide by the decisions handed down by the state, must not return upon his country injury for injury, nor endeavour to point out that it is acting unjustly, &c.'² are noble words, such as some great and innocent soul should perhaps follow under certain circumstances, but they in no wise affect our assertion. From this the further conclusion may be drawn, that just as no one is obligated to accuse himself before a human tribunal, or voluntarily to confess his crime, so it is unjust in criminal cases to require an oath of innocence of the defendant. Although we are informed by Demosthenes, Against Aristocrates [68], that this was customarily required before the court of the Areopagus, and surely it was an awesome thing for a man to stand before the sacrifice of a boar, a ram, and a bull, and to call down destruction upon himself, his clan, and family. And so Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 19, concludes that: 'Answers (forced by torture) are no testimony of the fact, but helps for the searching out of truth; so that whether the party tortured answers truly or falsely, or whether he answer not at all, whatsoever he doth, he doth it by right.' Compare Digest, XLVIII. xviii. 1, § 23; XLVIII. xviii. 18, § 2; Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxvii, n. 8; Montaigne, Essais, Bk. II, chap. v. In this connexion we should note what is recorded by Ctesias, Indica [Photius, Bibliotheca, p. 47a Bekker], that among the Hindus there is a fountain the water of which thickens into the consistency of cheese so soon as it is drunk, and that if any man drinks a half a drachm³ of this with other water he at once tells whatever he has done, for on that day he loses his mind. And the king uses this method upon men when he would know for certain whether they are implicated in some crimes, for if a man confesses that of which he is accused, he is forced to be his own executioner, while he is let go if his own testimony does not convict him of crime.

But it should be carefully observed that in most laws the part which contains the body of the law and that which contains the threat of punishment are expressed by two separate declarations, as in this way: 'Thou shalt not do so and so,' and 'Whoever does so shall be punished'; where the second element is a kind of condition of the preceding interdiction, as though it ran: 'Thou shalt not do so and so, unless thou art ready to pay for it by a fine.' And in this type of law what can be regarded as a penal sanction is in fact but a kind of tax, inasmuch as it is left to the will of subjects, whether they are ready to pay the sum of money fixed in the law, or to refrain from an act. And this is especially the case in sumptuary laws, the end of which is often a choice between leading the citizens to a life of frugality and replenishing the treasury; for as to the law of nature it would be unlawful to sell for money the right to violate its precepts. But all other laws regularly have the sole purpose of employing punishment to frighten citizens out of committing crimes¹. Therefore, that hasty youth had no idea of the nature of punishment, who, upon learning from the judge what was the fine for a slap in the face, paid down the sum and then gave the judge himself one. For the laws about injuries are not passed with the object that, for a sum of money, an indulgence may be purchased to injure another. From this it also appears that it is only in those laws where the prohibition is alternative or conditional, that a man is free from guilt who has paid or is ready to pay the fine which he is obligated to pay, 797 and not in others which contain an absolute prohibition. And we would add our opinion that there should be no purely penal laws, such, that is, as have no other end than to make profit from a fine. Although there are some who call any law purely penal, which only affixes a punishment to a simple command and does not expressly command or forbid anything. As an example of this they offer the following: 'Any citizen who refuses the mayoralty when elected, shall pay one hundred gold pieces into the public treasury.' But it is our opinion that this and similar precepts imply the following kind of command: 'Let no one when legally elected refuse the state his services'; and so the first form of statement stands as the added penal clause to the one which I understand. Compare Robert Sanderson, On the Obligation of Conscience, Prelection² VII, §§ 13 ff.

¹ [For suspenbi read suspendi.—Tr.]

³ [For obulos read obolos.—Tr.]

² [A mere summary of the passage.—Tr.]

5. Furthermore, since a judge who inflicts a penalty in proportion to the offence of the culprit, is supposed to be just, and since it is said that justice is administered whenever penalties are rightly meted out, philosophers have therefore discussed to what species of justice the imposition of penalties belonged, whether to commutative or distributive, or if you prefer the terms adopted by Grotius, whether to expletive or attributive. Those who have referred the exaction of penalties to distributive justice, use the argument that the same principle applies in the assignment of penalties as in that of goods, namely, more to him who deserves more and less to him who deserves less. And since in their opinion distributive justice is concerned with those things which are given to the parts by the whole, that is to the individual citizens by the state, penalties fall to individuals from the state. The reply to this is that what they suppose is false. Distributive justice takes place whenever an equality is established between more than two terms, that is, so often as something must be divided proportionally between more than one. For in the contract of a partnership the dividends are divided pro rata when there is more than one stockholder, and yet in this contract the dividends are owed in a very different way from that in which rewards or penalties are owed. For it is surely obvious that penalties are not owed because of a pact, nor does any man in subjecting himself to a state agree that punishment shall be laid upon him for his crimes. And so the imposition of penalties in no way squares with distributive justice as we described it above. In the next place, the fact that the more guilty are punished more severely, and the less guilty less severely, comes about only by consequence and by accident, not because that was intended primarily and for its own sake. For in imposing a penalty for a crime, that crime need not necessarily be compared with¹ another, nor the punishments meted out in both cases be proportioned in accordance with the respective gravity of the offences, but to each crime, separately, as it were, from all others, there is accorded a punishment, more or less severe, as it appears more to the advantage of the state, although it usually happens that the punishment in question is proportioned to the seriousness of the crime.

¹ [For dē peccatis read à peccatis.—Tr.]

² [For paerlect. read praelect.—Tr.]

Some of those who refer penalties to commutative justice, take the view of the matter that a penalty is meted out to a criminal in the manner usual in contracts. They have been led to this error through the habit which we have of saying that a 'punishment is owed him who offends', which, however, is an ἀκυρος [improper] way of speaking. For he to whom something is owed in the strict sense has a right over the debtor whereby he can require of the other his due. But who would say that a criminal has the right to demand that the magistrate inflict a punishment upon him? Therefore, the real meaning of the expression² is that the magistrate can properly require of a guilty person the penalty defined in the laws. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 2, writes that expletive justice, primarily and for its own sake, is observed in the infliction of punishments, and this for the reason, that, 'in order for him who punishes to punish lawfully, he should have a right to punish, which 798 right arises from another's crime.' Yet here the ambiguity of the term 'right' has led him astray, for to have a right to do something, and to have a right to receive something from another, are two very different things. The former means that the power belongs to me to perform some act, in the exercise of which no one should hinder me; the latter means that I have such a right to have something from another that he is also under an obligation to give it to me. And yet when we speak of expletive justice, the word right is taken not in the former but in the latter sense, and this right lies in him who receives a thing, not in him who gives it. For instance, when I pay a workman his wage I am said to be fulfilling expletive justice, not, however, because I possess the faculty to give him something, but because he has the right to demand of me his wages. Thus I may properly say that I have the right to command my servant to pull off my shoes, but who would conclude from such a command that when I order a servant to do that for me, I am exercising justice? Another conclusion, on a par with this, is, that since a penalty can be inflicted properly only by him who has the right to inflict it, expletive justice is therefore exercised by means of a penalty.

¹ [For eum read cum.—Tr.]

² [For istius locutionis read istius locutionis.—Tr.]

A second argument of Grotius [II. xx, § 2, n. 3] is <because in crimes and punishments> there is something that approaches the nature of contracts. For just as he who sells, even if he says nothing specifically, is considered to have obligated himself to all¹ the things which are naturally involved in a sale, so he who does wrong seems by his own will to have obligated himself to a penalty, because <as reason would suggest to any one>² a serious crime cannot be unpunishable; hence, whoever directly <and of deliberate purpose>² wills to sin, by consequence has willed also to deserve a penalty. (K.)

Therefore, in Sacred Scripture as well it is a common thing to call sin by the name of a debt, which we are as much obligated to atone for as any man is obligated to pay his creditor a loan. Add Digest, XLIX. xiv. 34; Code, IX. viii. 6. In Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XII [liii], a woman who has married another man's slave without the knowledge of his master, 'is said to have consented to her slavery'.

To this we answer as follows: It is manifest that, if a man knows a penalty to have been fixed for a crime, and yet proceeds of his own accord to commit it, he cannot complain that an injury is done him or that he is being treated inhumanely, when he is brought to punishment, which sense is set forth in a figurative way by most of the passages which Grotius cites. Yet it is not proper to say on this account that any man has directly and immediately given his consent to his own punishment, or, better, has by his own agreement obligated himself to undergo that punishment. For no man ever commits a crime without having the hope that by concealment or in some other way he will avoid the penalty. Thucydides, Bk. III [xlv]:

Now the death-penalty has been prescribed in various states for many offences [. . .] but nevertheless men are so inspired by hope as to take the risk; indeed, no one ever yet has entered upon a perilous enterprise with the conviction that his plot was condemned to failure. What state ever meditated revolt in the belief that the resources [. . .] at hand were inadequate for success? (S.)

Vasquez, Illustrium Controversiarum, Bk. I, chap. xxviii, n. 12, 13, contends to no purpose that criminals are obligated to suffer punishment by their own consent, for the reason that penal laws also are included in the agreement of citizens, or at least because the legislative power arises from such an agreement. For we have shown in another place that laws are not pacts or agreements, nor is it absurd for some power to be constituted by my consent which can afterward exercise certain acts over me against my will. Although the fact that I have myself agreed to that power would make it impossible for me to complain, if it afterwards exerts its power over me. But a sin is compared to a debt, not because a man is obligated to bear a penalty by his own consent, but because a legislator has secured no less power to exact a penalty from a criminal, than a creditor can exact the money once lent 799 from a debtor, and because the body and property of a sinner is no less in the power of a magistrate for crimes than is the property of a debtor in that of a creditor for his debts.

¹ [For adeo read ad ea.—Tr.]

² [Added by Pufendorf.—Tr.]

On the division of obligations, laid down in the elements of the Roman law, into those which arise from consent, and those that arise from crime, it should be observed that there arises from a crime an obligation, in the proper sense of the term, only to repair the damage, not to bear a penalty. And this obligation is properly¹ based not on the fact that a man has agreed to a penalty, but because natural law, after the introduction of dominion in things, produced the necessity of making that restitution. Thus when Aristotle makes some 'contracts voluntary' and others 'involuntary', his words are to be explained in this way: That just as in onerous contracts² equal must be recompensed by equal, so also in the case of a crime a damage must be paid for by its equivalent. But the reason why the obligation to repair a damage is classed by him under an involuntary contract, is because, for example, in the case of a loan it rests with the will of the creditor as to whether the debtor shall receive the money, while, for example, the fact that a thief is obligated to restore to me either the article which he took from me or its value, is due to the deed having been done without my consent, and his having laid upon himself that obligation without my consent. For I would surely have preferred that he leave me my property intact than involve me in the task of threatening him with an action for theft, especially when the most I will gain is merely the principal without any interest. A further point which has bearing in this connexion, is to keep in mind that every right has a corresponding obligation in another. Therefore, upon the commission of a crime there lies in the injured person a right to demand reparation for the loss, and upon the injurer an obligation to repair it, and this is the concern of expletive justice. But in so far as a crime is a deviation from the law, there resides in the governors of states a power to require a fitting penalty, but no obligation in the offender to pay the penalty of his own accord; and on this score the exaction of penalties does not agree with expiative justice.

¹ [For propri read proprie.—Tr.]

² [For nontractibus read contractibus.—Tr.]

In view of what has been said, nothing remains for us but to conclude that punishments belong to neither species of justice, but fall under a branch of justice peculiar to itself. Although one might prefer to say that the imposition of penalties as well as the distribution of rewards, on which there has been no agreement in advance by a special pact, are parts of the prudence which is connected with the duty of ruling others, and so is to be referred to universal justice.

6. It is, therefore, admitted by all sane persons, that, although all men are equal by nature, and there is something harsh and hard in a penalty itself, while men voluntarily undertake to afflict or destroy their fellows, and that although the most wise Creator also has so disposed the nature of things and men, that evils necessarily accompany their doing and wreak their revenge, as it were, upon their author, positive punishment, however, at the hands of men has nothing in it repugnant to natural equity, nay, more, is of the highest necessity to mankind's safety and prosperity. For as the safety of mankind required that, by the establishment of sovereignty, the equality of men be done away with, so the force of sovereignty would perish in a mass of men's criminal tendencies and aversion to rectitude, could not wicked human beings be restored to reason and order by being brought face to face with some evil. Since, then, public notice is given beforehand of what should be done and avoided, as well as of the penalty which awaits those who do otherwise, whoever brings down the harshness of penalties upon himself by voluntarily sinning against the laws, has no one to blame but himself.

7. Now on the question, to whom belongs the power to inflict penalties, and from whom they are to be exacted, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 3, has this to say:

But the subject of the right (to inflict punishments) [...] has not been definitely fixed by nature itself. [...] Excepting so far as this, that nature makes it clear enough that it is most suitable that punishment be inflicted by one who is superior; yet not to the degree that this is shown to be altogether necessary, unless the word superior is understood to imply that he who has done wrong by that very act may be considered to have made himself inferior to some one else. [...] Wherefore it follows that in any case a guilty person ought not to be punished by one equally guilty. (K.)

See John, viii. 7; Romans, ii. 22. But we are entirely convinced that the power to exact penalties is a part of sovereignty, and so no one can impose upon another a penalty, properly speaking, unless he have sovereignty over him. For although when we posit the evil tendency of men and their proneness to injure others, the exercise of penalties is seen to be necessary in order to preserve a social life between men, and although every person should suit his acts to that social life, as the good of all mankind, it still does not follow that individuals should make all their acts accord with this social life, since they cannot be performed to advantage save upon the fulfilment of certain requisites. Thus men have need of sovereignty, but not merely anybody can and should exercise it over any and every one else.

In the next place, not every evil, inflicted because of an antecedent sin, is a punishment, but such as has been announced in advance, and was imposed after cognizance was taken of the crime. And so evils consequent upon war are excluded from the class of punishments, even though they do furnish some guarantee against suffering them in the future. For in war his guarantee or protection is secured by every man by his own strength and at his own judgement, while by punishments it is secured for the injured parties by the strength and at the judgement of their superior. That a person should be overcome and coerced in war is the interest only of him who was injured, but that a man should receive civil punishment is not the interest of such a person only but of the entire state. So also the question whether an injured person wishes to revenge his injuries by war, is left entirely to his own discretion, but whether a civil penalty is to be required, lies in the power of a superior, who can require it even over the head of the injured party.

Finally, the quantity of punishment is regularly fixed before the crime, while a guarantee in war is set according to our own status and that of the enemy. Furthermore, although nature no more determines whether Gaius or Sejus should be the ones to exact punishment, than it has designed them to be kings, yet reason herself points out clearly enough that punishment, as it is the execution of a judicial sentence, should come from a superior, that is, one who holds sovereignty over the guilty person. Nor is there any need for too nice a definition of the word 'superior'. For the statement is false, that every sin so lowers the dignity of a man, that he must immediately upon its performance be classed among the beasts. Nor is it a logical deduction that, because this man has committed a crime, I therefore have the power to require a penalty of him. For if a crime has been committed against me in a state of natural liberty, I can require reparation for the loss and guarantee for the future by recourse to war. But if the sin was against another, whose defence has not been laid upon me as a special charge, I can no more take upon myself to avenge him, unless bound to him by a treaty, than to pronounce laws to such as are not subject to me. See Exodus, ii. 14. The saying of Democritus, 'It is in accord with nature that the superior should bear rule', should be explained in the sense that, if sovereignty is to be conferred upon some one by the consent of a body, the most convenient and reasonable thing, when no one man enjoys a special right to hold it, is for it to be conferred upon the most excellent, and upon him who is gifted above the rest in the arts required for good government. But such a man will never claim sovereignty over others, unless they have voluntarily subjected themselves to him. The saying of Grotius that 'a criminal should not be punished by one who is equally guilty' properly concerns not those who possess the public authority to require penalties, but such as rush forth on their private authority to censure or denounce vices, when not their necessary duty and only to show their aversion to all unrighteousness. Although it is surely unbecoming, and most effective in diminishing the respect for magistrates, if he who administers justice is found to be guilty of the same vices as he would punish in others, for he who 801 punishes in others the sin which he himself commits, seems not so much to be angered at vices as to envy others their delights. See Pliny, Letters, Bk. VIII, ep. xxii. Plato, Minos [p. 320 B]: 'He is an evil man, who has laid down laws to a certain effect, and then habitually acted contrary to his own laws.' Add Gratian, Decretum, II. iii. 7. 3, 4. Yet it would not have been unlawful for Nero, after murdering his mother, to have put to death such as were guilty of the same crime; 'although Domitian could not have convicted of adultery the women whom he himself had debauched'. Zonaras, Bk. II. Here belongs the statement of Medea in the play of Seneca [500 ff.]:

He who by sin advantage gains,
Commits the sin [. . .].
Let her be guiltless in thine eyes who for thy gain Hath sinned. (M.)

Much more should voluntary informers and censors see to it that the following strictures of Juvenal, Satires, II [22 ff.], do not fall on their heads:

Let the straight-legged man laugh at the club-footed, the white man at the black-moor: but who could endure the Gracchi railing at sedition? Who will not confound heaven with earth, and sea with sky, if Verres denounces thieves, or Milo cut-throats? If Clodius condemns adulterers, or Catiline upbraids Cethegus; or if Sulla's three disciples inveigh against proscriptions? (R.); (or the following of the same author, Satires, III [II. 38-40]): O happy times to have you for a censor of our morals! Once more may Rome regain her modesty; a third Cato has come down to us from the skies. (R.)

Seneca, Controversies, Bk. II, cont. xiv [VI. v]: 'It is disgraceful to punish vices in such a way as to be imitating them yourself.' Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. III [xxx]: 'It is the peculiar characteristic of folly to perceive the vices of others, but to forget its own.' (Y.) Plautus, Truculentus [160 f.]: 'He who accuses another of dishonesty, him it behooves to look unto himself.' (R.) For as Ovid, Fasti, Bk. VI [647-8], observes: 'Thus is his Censorship discharged, and thus is an example given, when the assertor of morality himself practises that which he enjoins on others.' (R.)

Yet in general Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxviii, agrees with us, that a penalty should come from a superior by virtue of his position, although otherwise his definition of punishment is too narrow, both because he included only those inflicted by civil sovereignty, and because he mentions but one end. 'Punishment', he says, 'is an evil inflicted by public authority (on a transgressor of the law) [. . .] to the end that the will of men may thereby the better¹ be disposed to obedience.' Yet he rightly infers from his definition, that the injuries or acts of revenge of private individuals, evils inflicted by public authority but without any antecedent formal condemnation, evils inflicted by a usurper of the sovereignty, and those inflicted without intent to reform citizens, are not punishments properly understood, but are all only acts of hostility. In which connexion, however, we should observe that a state of hostility does not follow at once upon a spurious punishment of this kind, nor does it furnish the right to exercise the licence of a public enemy; in other words, he who is the victim of such an evil does not at once receive licence to take steps of open war against the one who does him the evil.

The same writer also excludes from the category of punishments evils which follow in natural sequence upon evil actions; for instance, when a man is killed or wounded while assaulting another, or when he falls sick because of that unlawful action; although such consequences may appear to be a punishment from God. Again, if the evil inflicted is less than the benefit which naturally follows upon the commission of the crime, it is rather the price or redemption of a crime than a punishment.

Under acts of hostility he lists cases in which a greater punishment is inflicted than is set by the law, if a punishment is required for a deed not forbidden by any law, if a king is attacked, if an evil is inflicted upon an open enemy. But the statement he adds, namely, that, if a former citizen has declared himself an enemy, he shall suffer as an enemy and not as a citizen, and that therefore such as are guilty of treason can be punished, like enemies, with an arbitrary punishment, can in my opinion not be accepted, by reason of the fact that the punishment meted out to a rebel proceeds from the force of sovereignty and as from a superior, although such a rebel may have adopted a hostile attitude towards the sovereign and may sometimes have to be overcome in battle, before he can be treated as a criminal. In the same way he who pursues a runaway slave, does it by his right of dominion and not that of war. A further consideration is that the evils inflicted upon an enemy carry with them no infamy, while that is one of the chief attendants upon punishments meted out to rebels.

802 8. We must now consider the end of punishments, which men should hold before their eyes, in requiring them after the loss has been repaired, or by its nature cannot be. Here we assert, first of all, that of course it does not appear unjust that he who inflicts evil should also suffer evil. Pindar, Nemean Odes, iv [52]: 'Tis fitting that whoso doeth aught should suffer also.' (S.) Euripides, Hecuba [1250-1]:

¹ [Pufendorf changes this to 'by fear of it'.—Tr.]

Forasmuch as thou hast dared
To do foul deeds, even drain thy bitter cup. (W.)

And yet we should presume that a man may not rightly inflict punishments unless they will bring some advantage. And therefore, Hobbes, De Givē, chap. iii, § 11, has claimed that the following also is one of nature's laws:

In revenge and punishments we must have our eye not at the evil past, but the future good: that is, it is not lawful to inflict punishment for any other end, but that the offender may be corrected, or that others warned by his punishment may become better.

Plato, Protagoras [p. 324 B]:

He who desires to inflict rational punishment does not retaliate for a past wrong, for that which is done cannot be undone, but he has regard to the future, and is desirous that the man who is punished, and he who sees him punished, may be deterred from doing wrong again. (J.)

The same sentiments are repeated by Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. xvi. Add Grotius on Leviticus, xix. 18.

We should, of course, in every case look back to the evil done, that is, the antecedent crime, since it is obviously this which makes it a punishment, but we should also look forward to the end of punishment, in order that a man, who, although guilty, is still of our frame, may not suffer to no purpose for a deed which can no longer be made good.

This law of his, Hobbes proves by two reasons: First, because every man is required by natural law to pardon another, provided he is furnished with a guarantee for the future; and second, because revenge, in so far as it considers only the past, is nothing other than a triumph and glory of the mind, which is directed to no end, and so is vain and senseless¹. The following statement, given by Jornandes, History of the Goths, chap. xxix, is worthy of an Attila: 'What is sweeter to a brave man than to take vengeance with his own hand? It is a great boon of nature to glut one's heart with revenge.' Add Bacon, Essays, chap. iv. But a judge, on the contrary, should never derive any pleasure from the punishment of the guilty, when necessity requires that he pronounce judgement on them. Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. ix, § 3. Claudian, *On the Consulship of Manlius*² [224 ff.]:

He is a savage who delights in punishment and seems to make the vengeance of the laws his own. [. . .] But he whom reason, not anger, animates is a peer of the gods, he who, weighing the guilt, can with deliberation balance the punishment. (P.)

Vulcatius Gallicanus [xii] says about Avidius Cassius: 'It never looks well in a prince to inflict punishment for a personal affront.'

¹ [For plaster read praeter.—Tr.]

² [For Mallii read Manlii.—Tr.]

Augustus did right, when, as we are informed in Suetonius, chap. xxxii: 'He struck off the lists the names of those who had long been under accusation, from whose humiliation nothing was to be gained except the gratification of their enemies. [. . .]' (R.) Seneca, On Anger, Bk. [I, chap.] vi:

The ruler of a state [. . .] drives the condemned out of life with ignominy and disgrace, not because he takes pleasure in any man's being punished [. . .] but that they may be a warning to all men, and that, since they would not be useful when alive, the state may at any rate profit by their death. (S.*)

Yet we will not join with Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxviii, in calling it a hostile act, when the sovereign power does not hold before its eyes the genuine end of punishments, provided that the punishment otherwise be inflicted in accordance with the laws of the state. Add Digest, XVIII. vii. 7, at end; Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 5.

9. Now the genuine end of punishments is precaution against injuries, which is secured either if he who has sinned is led to mend his ways, or others are by his example deterred from sinning, or if he who has sinned is so restrained that he is no longer able to repeat his crimes. This principal Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 6, expresses in the following way: 'In the case of punishment we must consider the advantage either of the person who does wrong, or of the person against whose interest the wrong was committed, or of other persons in general.' (K.)

803 Compare Seneca, On Clemency, Bk. I, chap. xxii. The first kind of punishment looks to the end that the sinner's mind be cured and be freed of the desire to sin, by a method of cure which works through contraries. For since every action, especially such as is premeditated and repeated, gives rise to a certain proclivity, which when developed is called a habit, vices should as soon as possible be stripped of their enticements. Here applies the statement of Socrates in Plato, Gorgias [p. 525 f.]: 'A man is made unjust and worse if he never pays the penalty for his crimes, but less so if he does suffer and receives a punishment that is just in the sight of gods and men.' For 'he who pays for his crimes, is purified in mind.'¹ Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. v:

Sincere and discreet correction is sometimes necessary.² For it does not injure, but heals under the guise of injury. We char crooked spear shafts to straighten them, and force them by driving in wedges, not in order to break them, but to take the bends out of them; and, in like manner, by applying pain to the body or mind we correct them. (S.*)

That, however, is not necessary which follows a few lines further on: 'Whether we have done the deed ourselves, or the injury has been inflicted by some one who is dear to us, we ought of our own accord to present ourselves to the judge, to be punished, just as we would to a physician; and this to prevent the moral disease of doing injury to others from becoming so deepseated in the soul as to render it incurable.'

¹ [This is only a paraphrase of Plato.—Tr.]

² [Slightly changed from the original form.—Tr.]

(S.) For he who has a mind so disposed that it voluntarily wishes to seek punishment in order to correct a vice, needs no judge to act as his physician, but is himself sufficient for his own cure. Apuleius, *De Dogmate Platonis*¹ [II. xvii]: 'There is more disquiet and bitterness if a criminal be granted² impunity, and be not promptly visited with the castigation of men, than in any kind of punishment.' Plato, Laws, Bk. IX [p. 854 D]: 'No penalty which is inflicted according to law is designed for evil, but always makes him who suffers either better or not so bad.' (J.) Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. II, chap. ii: 'Punishments are in a sense remedial measures, and the means employed as remedies are naturally the opposites of the diseases to which they are applied.' (W.) Alcinous, De Doctrina Platonis, chap. 32: 'It is as proper for a wicked person to receive punishment as to turn over the sick body to a physician for treatment. Because every correction is a kind of medicine for a diseased soul.' Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [liv]: 'When the mind has become corrupt and the breeder of corruption, its distempered and fevered condition can only be assuaged by remedies as potent as the passions which have inflamed it.' (R.) Plato, Critias [p. 106 B]: 'And the proper retribution of him who errs is to set him in the right way.' (J.)

10. On the person who shall exact this kind of correction, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 7, holds: 'The punishment which serves (the good of the wrong-doer) is by nature permitted to any one of sound judgement who is not subject to vices of the same kind or of equal violence.' (K.) (Isocrates, De Permutatione [14]: 'Those I regard as most wicked and worthy of extreme punishment, who, when they are themselves guilty of some misdeed, have the effrontery to charge others with the same.' Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. IV, chap. xxiii: 'Before you correct the character of others, correct your own.' (C.) When in Tacitus, Histories, Bk. II [x], Crispus, who had himself brought forward and had been rewarded for the same kind of accusations, condemned Faustus, it is added: 'It was not the punishment of the crime that aroused disgust, but the person of the avenger.' (O.) Arnobius, Against the Heathen, Bk. I [xxxvii]: 'You act with great injustice, in regarding that as worthy of condemnation in us which you yourselves habitually do; what you allow to be lawful for you, you are unwilling to be in like manner lawful for others.' (B. & C.)) [Grotius continues]:

However, in the case of corporal chastisements and other punishments that contain an element of compulsion, the distinction between those who may or may not apply them is not made by nature (for this could not be the case, except in so far as reason entrusts to parents in a special sense the exercise of this right over their children on account of the tie of relationship), but by the laws which have limited that common connexion of the human race to the nearest relationships for the sake of obviating quarrels. (K.)

¹ [The correct title is De Platone et eius Dogmate.—Tr.]

² [For differatur read deferatur.—Tr.]

But these remarks do not satisfy us, for we have already observed that no punishment, properly speaking, whatever its end be, can be inflicted save by a sovereign. And therefore, such reproof as is delivered 804 by words, appears to be more like counsel and admonition than punishment, and even when it is enforced by more violent language, it is not sanctioned so much by any common right, as by the special law of friendship. A proof of this is, that, whenever any one starts to criticize a stranger, he is at once attacked in the words of Terence, Self-Tormentor, Act I, sc. i [75 f.]: 'Have you so much time to spare from your own affairs that you can attend to another man's with which you have no concern?' (S.) Therefore, when Chremes in the same passage undertakes to reprove the other he calls upon the right of a neighbour, which he himself holds [57] 'the half-way house to friendship'. (S.) Curtius, Bk. III [xii. 16], says in speaking of Hephæstion: 'He alone was allowed by Alexander to address him in the free and candid language of a monitor; a liberty which he so exercised, that it seemed rather to be conferred by Alexander than assumed by himself.' (A.) Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xvii]: 'Counsels, discourses, exhortations, encouragements, and even sometimes reproofs, flourish best in friendships.' (E.) Homer, Iliad, Bk. XI [793]: 'And good is the persuasion of a friend.' (L.L. & M.)

A further consideration is, that prudence should by all means be used in such matters, in order that a cure too hastily attempted may not turn troubles upon our own heads, and aggravate the disease in the other. Here belongs the advice of Musonius Rufus in Tacitus, Histories, Bk. III [lxxx].

Now parents have a twofold right to correct their children; both because they are unable properly to give them the rearing enjoined by nature unless they are allowed to use some fairly severe discipline as occasion demands, and because such parents as dwell outside of a state enjoy a sovereignty over their children, which, although straitened to a great extent in many states, has yet retained nearly everywhere some of its former power, so that they can in their own judgement reprove them for such sins as are committed more in youthful imprudence¹ than from mature evil design, and affect more the domestic than the public peace. Add Digest, XLVII. x. 7, § 3; Libanius, Declamations, xx. Much the same power is held by those who must govern the youth in their parents' stead, such as guardians, teachers, and masters, who can scarcely meet their duty without some degree of restraint. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxvii: 'Correction on the part of parents² and teachers ought to be submitted to by us in the same spirit in which we undergo the surgeon's knife, abstinence from food, and such-like things which hurt us for our benefit.' (S. *) What power over others belongs to the rest of one's kinsmen in such matters, may be seen in Code, IX. xv. 1. Plato, Laws, Bk. VII [p. 808 D], decrees in his state that since a boy is of all animals the most unmanageable, [. . .] being a freeman, he must have teachers and be educated by them in anything which they teach; but he is also a slave, and in that regard any freeman who comes in his way may punish him and his tutor and his instructor, if any of them does anything wrong. (J.)

¹ [For prudencia read imprudencia.—Tr.]

² [For pare num read parentum.—Tr.]

Xenophon, The State of the Lacedaemonians [vi. 1 f.], says: 'Lycurgus gave any father authority over other men's children as well as over his own. [. . .] If a boy tells his own father that he has been whipped by another father, it is a disgrace if the parent does not give his son another whipping.' (M.*) Yet what the same Xenophon, Anabasis, V [viii. 18], says: 'If I chastised any one for his own good, I claim to suffer the same penalties as parents pay their children, or masters their boys. The surgeons also cauterize and cut us for our good' (D.*)—is intended merely to excuse the accusation of lawlessness brought against him. But what is lawful for a general is not without further ado lawful for every one else.

But Grotius denies that this form of punishment can proceed even to death, since it is absurd, in order to effect a reform, to throw a man into a state where no kind of reform is possible, although some hold that it is better for one who labours under an incurable depravity to be no more, especially in view of the fact that such a person must always be a source of very great trouble to others. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. xvi:

You [. . .] have an incurably vicious mind, and add crime to crime. You have come to such a pass, that you are not influenced by the arguments which are never wanting to recommend evil, but sin itself is to you a sufficient reason for sinning. You have so steeped your whole heart in wickedness, that wickedness cannot be taken from you without bringing your heart with it. Wretched man! you have long sought to die; we will do you good service; we will take away that madness from which you suffer, and to you who have so long lived in misery to yourself and to others, we will give the only good thing which remains, that is, death. (S.)

Idem, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. x: 'The cure for men of that stamp lies in the end of their life, and the best fate for him who will never come to his senses is death.' Plato, Gorgias [p. 512 B]: 'The bad man had better not live, for he cannot live well.' (J.) Thus in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XV [lxviii. 1], Sulpicius Asper gave as the reason for his forming the conspiracy against Nero: 'There was no other mode of curing his iniquities'; (R.) or as it is put by Suetonius, Nero, chap. xxxvi: 'Some even made a favour (of their guilt), saying there was no way except by death that they could help a man disgraced by every kind of wickedness.' (R.) Iamblichus, Protrepticon, chap. ii [p. 4 A]: 'Just as it is better for an abscess to be cauterized, so it is better for a wicked man to die.' [Sadi] A Persian Rose Garden, chap. i: 'Whoever is better asleep than awake¹, had better die than live a bad life.' Yet charity urges that a man should not lightly be held a hopeless case. And this form of punishment often is for the benefit of others as well. For when a man's mind is reformed by the severity of the punishment, others are safe enough henceforth from him, and when an incorrigible criminal is taken from the world, no further trouble need be expected from him. The rule that only incorrigible criminals should suffer death, a thing desired by Plato, Laws, Bk. IX, may perhaps be well enough for moderate misdeeds, such as have nothing atrocious about them. But it surely does not apply to atrocious crimes. For since a man is finally held incorrigible only when he has been apprehended time and again in the same crime, surely it will be of little advantage to a state to wait until a person has repeatedly committed the worst excesses.

11. The second end of punishment is the benefit of him to whose interest it was that the sin be not committed, of the one, that is, who suffered by the other's sin, so that he may not suffer in that way again either at the hands of the same person or at the hands of others. This benefit can be secured in three ways: If the guilty² party is executed; if his ability to work harm is taken away even though his life be spared, for instance, by keeping him in prison, by taking from him his weapons, by removing him to a distance; or, finally, if he is taught by his punishment to sin no more, which is connected with the reform we were just discussing. Now a person who has once been the victim of violence can be secured from that of others, not by merely any form of punishment, but by one that is open and public, and serves as example and warning. This is the reason why executions are usually held not in secluded corners of prisons but in the most frequented places, and with terrifying features which may be able to strike fear into the hearts of the common sort. And this end is so appropriate to punishments, that even when, in the heat of our anger and the sudden desire for revenge, we have given our assailant a thorough beating, we usually send him away with the warning, 'Go now³ and see if you want to try it again'. But the right to exact such a punishment belongs to supreme sovereignty, although in some states, because of the ferocity and stubbornness of the people, legislators have given some indulgence to that base passion which makes us yearn, when injured, to satisfy our wrath by taking the punishment into our own hands. An instance of this is found even in the law of God in the person of the avenger of blood (Numbers, xxxv; Deuteronomy, xix; Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. IV, chap. ii; Grotius on Exodus, xxi. 12), unless we should prefer to explain that custom as one of the survivals of a state of nature. Add also Rochefort,

¹ [For vigilius read vigiliis.—Tr.]

³ [For nunc read i nunc.—Tr.]

² [For quid aliquis read qui deliquit.—Tr.]

Descriptio Antillarum, Pt. II, chap. xix. Some would find the remains of a similar custom in the case of Theoclymenus in Homer, Odyssey, Bk. XXIV [xv. 272 ff.¹]. Certainly scarcely any other explanation can be found for the law of Euripides, Orestes, line 515: 'By exile justify, not blood for blood' (W.); which must mean that the old custom of private revenge had been abrogated, lest it never stop, a reason not applicable to a punishment exacted by a magistrate. Although it appears from Homer, Iliad, Bk. IX, lines 702 ff., that it was also customary to buy off exile by paying the nearest relative of the slain man a fine in money. See also Apollonius Rhodius, Argonautic Expedition, Bk. I, line 90. So also in our own day the relatives of a slain man in Morocco cannot only arrange terms of settlement with the murderer, but can also slay him without any legal process, provided he has not yet been apprehended by a magistrate, it being held a rule among them that revenge is not a sin. A passage in Tacitus, Germany [xxi], can also after a manner be brought under this head: 'It is incumbent to take up a father's feud or a kinsman's not less than his friendships; but such feuds do not continue unappeasable: even homicide is atoned for by a fixed number of cattle and sheep, and the whole family thereby receives satisfaction.' (H.) And one in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I [lxxxix]: 'But he left his punishment to Numitor, saying, that he who had done the injury, could be punished by none so justly, as by him, who had received it.' (S.) Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 8.

12. The third end of punishment is the benefit of any and every man, in that severity of the punishment contributes to the security of all. Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [p. 934 A]: 'The malignant are punished, not because they did wrong, for that which is done can never be undone, but in order that in future times, they, and those who see them corrected, may utterly hate iniquity.' (J.*) Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. vi:

The ruler of a state [. . .] drives the condemned out of life with ignominy and disgrace, not because he takes pleasure in any man's being punished [. . .] but that they may be a warning to all men, and that, since they would not be useful when alive, the state may at any rate profit by their death. (S.*)

Tullus says in Livy, Bk. I, chap. xxviii: 'Let another dare such a deed thereafter if I do not speedily visit such a punishment on him as shall be a conspicuous warning to all mankind. [. . .] You shall yet by your punishment teach the human race to hold sacred the obligations you have violated.' (F.) And again (Idem, Bk. I, chap. xxxiii), king Ancus 'to overawe men's growing lawlessness, built a prison in the midst of the city, above the Forum.' (F.) Add Agathias, Bk. IV, at the beginning [i]. Lucian, Phalaris, No. I [viii]: 'No other measures are of any use if unattended by fear and the expectation of punishment.' (H.)

¹ [For ω read ο.—Tr.]

This type of punishment is employed, first of all, in order that the one who has injured another may not later injure others as well, which end is secured if the guilty person is either executed, or disabled, or confined in such a way that he can do no further injury. Gunther, Ligurinus, Bk. I [527 ff.]: 'No better punishment could have been devised for the fury and pride of a foolish people than to take from them their wealth, the cause of such conceit. Thus poverty could bring to their senses those whom undue wealth had puffed up.' Here the poet is speaking of the inhabitants of Utrecht of whom Frederick exacted a large sum of money because of their revolt. Or the offender may be led by the extreme severity of the punishment to put off his lust of sinning; or, finally, the punishment is sought in order that no other men may be induced, by impunity allowed crimes, to make themselves troublesome to yet other men. This last end is secured by public executions, commonly called by the Greeks παράδειγματα, or examples, the sight of which make all other citizens show due respect for law. See Code, IX. xxvii. 1; IX. xx. 7. Quintilian, Declamations, cclxxiv: 'When we crucify malefactors we select the most frequented thoroughfare, so that the largest possible number may see the sight and be warned by the terror of it.' Seneca, On Anger, Bk. III, chap. xix: 'The more public an execution is, the more power it has as an example and lesson.' (S.) Although the exact opposite was the custom among the Lacedaemonians, where criminals were dispatched not during the day but the night (Herodotus, Bk. IV [cxlvi]), unless they may have believed that the very darkness would add to the terror. Compare Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. ix, § 3.

Under this end of penalties can also be included that advantage whereby they support the structure of government, or strengthen its authority, which is at times not a little weakened, and especially¹ by 807 malign and outrageous transgressions of laws. For it is to the interest of the entire state that its authority remain unimpaired, and, when this is the case, the evil inclinations of men are vigorously curbed. It does not appear necessary, that, with Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. I, chap. iv, in addition to these ends we should set another called the end of satisfaction, or purgation, or expiation, as though a deviation from law were made up, as it were, and the consequent inequality of action corrected. For although² he draws his arguments from Sacred Scripture, they concern either the tribunal of God, or the special religious vows of the Hebrews.

13. Regarding the exceptions added by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 9, to the general rule, that the execution of exemplary punishments lies within the power of the governors of states, it should be observed, that, whatever punishment is inflicted in such places and upon such persons as are not under the jurisdiction of certain courts of justice, such as pirates, belongs to the right of war, which is something different from the power to exact penalties. For against pirates and freebooters, inasmuch as they are enemies of all mankind, every man is a soldier in defence of his country. Although we should not fail to note what he says further on (§ 14), that it would be a wiser step were all seafarers supplied with instructions from the state authority to proceed against pirates, wherever they may come upon them on the seas, so that when the occasion arose they could treat them, not as though on their own initiative, but as if under orders from the state. And although the law of Deuteronomy, xiii. 9, does not appear to grant every private citizen the right to slay one who would lead him into idolatry, but only to bring him to justice, and have him stoned to death by the people upon the showing of cause, yet should we admit that every private citizen was given the power to kill the one who was guilty of that crime, surely the fact of the previous existence of such a law would make what is here undertaken by a private citizen to be understood as done by an agent of the supreme sovereignty, and so on the authority of the state. Add the remarks of Grotius on that passage. And it should be borne in mind, that the deed of Phineas was based upon the special approval of God, for were such zeal otherwise allowed every one, it would seriously disturb the civil order and give a pretext to all unrestrained passions. On a judgement of zeal add Selden, Bk. IV, chap. iv. The right of life and death, which fathers of families hold in some states over children and slaves, although not tracing its origin to states, yet, when found in them, can appear to be a certain portion of the state sovereignty, the exercise of which by fathers of families over their household is conceded them by the state authority. Nor is there anything repugnant in there being a magistrate in a state who can in certain cases mete out extraordinary punishment upon criminals without a judicial hearing, provided he does not abuse that right. Thus when a certain reward is set upon the heads of proscribed persons in case any one kills them, it is held that such an act is done by the authority of the state. For although such a declaration does not always have the force of a command, yet when some one is killed by reason of it, the act is defended as though authorized by the state. Add Code, III. xxvii. 1. Grotius observes on Esther, ix. 10, that it used to be held by the Hebrews: 'If any one has undertaken to betray an Israelite or his property to the Gentiles, or if any one has signally affronted the whole body of Jews, an Israelite will not be doing wrong if he procure his destruction, his property, however, being left to his heir.' And yet the licence and execution of revenge which the Jews enjoyed at that time seems not a little abhorrent to the nature of civil life. The following law is found in Andocides, Orations, i [96]: 'If any one overthrows the democracy of Athens, or, upon the dissolution of the sovereignty of the people, holds any magistracy, he shall be an enemy of the Athenians and may be slain with impunity.' There then follows an oath which the Athenian people took by tribes, to the effect that they would kill whoever was guilty of such things. In Livy, Bk. III, chap. lv, Valerius sanctioned this law: 'No one should appoint any magistrate without a right of appeal; if any person should so elect, it would be lawful and right that he be put to death; and that such killing should not be deemed a capital offence.' (S.) Among the Panchaei, according to Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xlv [V. xlv]: 'It was not lawful for any of the priests to go out of the verge of the consecrated ground; and if they do, it is lawful for any man that finds them to kill them.' (B.)

¹ [For cum primis read cumprimis.—Tr.]

² For Et si read Etsi.—Tr.]

We should observe, in this connexion, that in these and similar laws a general edict, with the added evidence of fact, and such as admits of no doubt of interpretation, has the force of a formal judgement, so that the execution, which follows, appears to have been done upon the decree of a magistrate. And if a private citizen, incited by such a law, when it rests upon just reasons, has slain some person, not only will he go free in a court of law, but he will also rest with easy conscience, provided he was not influenced by a private grudge, but believed that his action was for the good of the state; and especially is this true, if the law allowed or enjoined upon every man the execution of the penalty, for the reason that such attempts threaten the state with immediate disaster. It is different with those executions in which the law makes an allowance for just grief and violent indignation, and blots out the human punishment but not the guilt of the act. Of this kind is the law allowing a husband to kill his adulterous wife and her lover when they are caught in the act. For the law, as dispensed in a civil process, pardons a grief that was conceived only because of so outrageous an injury, although it would, on the whole, have been more fitting for the injury to be punished by a magistrate, provided the state would not have been imperilled through postponing the revenge. See Gratian, Decretum, II. xxiii. 8. 33; Seneca, Controversies, Bk. I, cont. iv; Bk. IV, cont. xxiv; Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. III; Valerius Maximus, Bk. VI, chap. i, § 13; Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 14; Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, V. ii, on Digest, XLVIII; Grotius, Florum Sparsio, on Digest, XLVIII. v. 22, § 4.

14. But it is obvious, from the end of punishment, as well as the condition of human nature, that there can be some injuries which are evil enough in themselves, and yet for them to meet with punishment in a human court would be both superfluous and useless. To their number are commonly referred, first of all, purely internal acts, such as thoughts, yearnings, and desires concerned with some sin, although they may afterwards in some manner, perhaps by subsequent confession, come to the attention of others¹. Add Grotius, De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, chap. iii, n. 1. For since no man receives any hurt from an internal urge of this kind, no man also is interested in seeing any one punished on that account. See Digest, XLVIII. xix. 18. For the statement of Philo Judaeus, in the work entitled That the Worse is Wont to Attack the Better [xxvi. 97]: 'For as long as we only conceive wicked things in the bad imagination of our minds, still, during that time we are guilty of thoughts' (Y.), belongs to the divine tribunal, although Grotius on Matthew, v. 28, shows from the abundant testimony of pagan writers, that such thoughts should, on the basis of mere reason, be regarded as actual sins. Add Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. IV, chap. vii, p. 734. An instance of abominable calumny is told by Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XV, chap. ii [XV. iii. 5-6], about a certain Mercurius:

If any one in his sleep (when nature roams about with an extraordinary degree of freedom) communicated to a friend that he had seen anything <Mercurius> exaggerated it, colouring it for the most part with envenomed arts, and bore it to the open ears of the emperor. And for such speeches men were attacked with formidable accusations, as if they had committed inexpiable² crimes. The news of these events having got abroad, men were so cautious of even relating nocturnal dreams, that, in the presence of a stranger, they would scarcely confess they had slept at all. And some accomplished men lamented that they had not been born in the country of Mt. Atlas, where it is said that dreams never occur. (Y.)

But it is another matter when internal acts are measured as they are joined with external, for they are of the greatest influence on the quality as well as the quantity of actions. And so crimes are punished which have been attempted, even if they have not attained their ultimate end. See Grotius, in Florum Sparsio, on Digest, XLVIII. viii. 14.

In the next place, it would be too great a hardship to undertake to subject to punishment at the hands of men also, those extremely slight mis-steps, which in the very condition of human nature it is not possible to avoid, however much attention a man proposes to give them. For Themistius, Orations, x [ix, p. 123 D], was right in saying that 809 there were three classes of human mis-steps: 'A misfortune, an error of judgement, and a criminal act'; then he adds: 'A ruler should pity the first, correct the second, and punish only the third.' Compare Robert Sanderson, On the Obligation of Oaths, Prelection III, § 18. Here belongs what is related by Jerónimo Osorio, Bk. X. 384, of Alphonso, King of the Congo.³

After having read⁴ five volumes of the laws of Portugal he praised the wisdom of the laws and the order and discipline of the state, but found it difficult to approve the drawing up of laws on such trifling matters. And so, poking fun at the meticulous care of their laws,

¹ [For filiurum read aliorum.—Tr.]

² [For inexplicabili read inexpiable.—Tr.]

³ [Not 'Arrogon', as Kennet translates the passage.—Tr.]

⁴ [For evoluerit read evolveret.—Tr.]

he asked the Portuguese, what punishment had been fixed¹ for those who set² foot on the ground.³

Julian, The Caesars [p. 314 c], in his account of the emperor Probus says:

It is impossible to govern either horses, or oxen, or mules, and least of all, men, unless you yield to them in some of their special delights, just as physicians indulge their patients in trifles so as to get them to follow directions in greater matters.

Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxx, § 19 [II. xx. 19], although the following statement seems not entirely exact: 'Indeed, one may doubt whether such (lapses) are rightly and properly called sins, since they lack, when considered in general, the freedom of action which they seem to have in particular instances.' (K.) For there is a flaw in the following argument: 'It is morally impossible for a man not to fall into some sins; therefore the sins of daily occurrence, as they call them, have not the nature of sins.' The same writer adds in the following section (20), that sins should not be punished which⁴ concern neither directly nor indirectly human society or another man. For, as he says, there is no reason why such sins should not be left to God for punishment, since He is all wise to find them out, all just to weigh them, and all powerful to punish them, and therefore, for men to undertake to punish them would be clearly to no advantage and would lead to injustice. And yet one may well question, whether, if you except thoughts that do not emerge into acts, there really are any such sins.

Furthermore, civil laws deny many acts the power to give rise to an action, or exempt them from human punishment for the sake of the peace of the state, or for other reasons; for instance, if an action may be more splendid, when it does not appear to have been undertaken with an eye to human punishment, or if it does not appear important enough for judges to be bothered on account of it, or if the matter requires the most minute investigation, or if an evil of long standing⁵ cannot be destroyed without overturning the state (an instance of which is to be found in the letter of Tiberius on luxury, in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [liii]), or if a countless multitude of disputes may in that way be avoided. Add Seneca, On Clemency, Bk. I, chap. xxii. And finally, all such faults of the mind must be exempted from human punishment, as result from the general corruption of men, and are found in such numbers that to punish them with human penalties must certainly lead to the overthrow of states. So long as such have not broken out into outrageous acts, they should be let alone. Some of these are avarice, ambition,

¹ [For esse read esset.—Tr.]

² [For poneret read ponerent.—Tr.]

³ [So also Kennet, Barbeyrac omitting the translation of the passage. James Gibbs, however, in his translation of Osorio (The History of the Portuguese, &c., London, 1752), translates the phrase, 'in terra pedem ponerent', as 'throw a louse on the ground', which although perhaps historically correct is certainly not the natural meaning of the words as here recorded.—Tr.]

⁴ [For que read quae.—Tr.]

⁵ [For innolitum read inolitum.—Tr.]

inhumanity, ingratitude, hypocrisy, envy, the desire to belittle others, pride, anger, discord, and the like. These our Saviour endeavoured to do away with, primarily by the holiness of His precepts. And so far as they are concerned, the statement of Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxi: 'For if every one who has a crooked and vicious disposition were to be punished, no one could escape punishment' (S.), is true enough.

15. Nor is it true that, if any crimes are fit for punishment in a human court¹, they are under so great a necessity of receiving it, that there can never be any place for pardon. The Stoics used to take the opposite position and their view is thus set forth in Stobaeus, Sermones, XLIV [Anthology, II. vii. 11 d]: 'They say that the wise man does not forgive.' And the reason is, that 'the person who forgives must also think 810 that the sinner did not sin voluntarily, although every man sins because of his own vicious desire. Therefore, it is rightly said that sinners ought not to be forgiven.' Their argument appears to run as follows: A man sins either of his own fault or not of his own fault. If not of his own fault, it is not a sin, since every sin is committed παρὰ τὴν ἰδίαν κακίαν, 'out of one's own viciousness', and so in that case there is no need for pardon. But if he sins of his own fault, pardon cannot possibly be shown, because it is allowable only for misdeeds that do not arise in the person himself. This argument obviously begs the very point at issue.² They added: 'The good man is not merciful. Because a merciful man pleads for one who deserves punishment. And yet every one should without exception suffer what he deserves.' But what his ἀξία is, desert or merit, differs as concerns good or evil. A good owed a man cannot rightly be withheld from him, but such is the nature of an evil (such, that is, as does not tend to the advantage of the recipient) that it can be denied without injury. Finally, they say: 'When a man is merciful it means that he either holds that the penalties set upon delinquents are too harsh, or else he feels that the lawgiver has imposed undeserved punishments.' But such reasoning comes to nothing. For there is no contradiction between the statements that punishments prescribed in a law are just, and that they can rightfully at times be remitted. For laws only define in general what punishments are due each crime, without considering the peculiar circumstances which sometimes arise in connexion with a certain person, or a certain condition of the commonwealth; while pardon is granted individuals for certain reasons which are not observable at all times or in all transgressors. See also Cicero, For Murena [xxix], and Seneca, On Clemency [II. vii], where he says: 'Pardon is the remitting of a deserved punishment. [. . .] Now the wise man does what he ought to do.'³ (S.*) But there lurks a mistake in the word 'deserved'. For if you understand that punishment is 'deserved' by him who has sinned, that is, that he can be punished without injury, or without just cause for complaints, it will not follow that, if a man does not inflict punishment, he does what he should not do. For I can do many things rightly and lawfully, which are still not necessary for me to do. Furthermore, as it is not correct to say that a transgressor is owed (deberi) punishment, as though there was within him some right which must be satisfied by punishment (for no man ever complains that his punishment was remitted, unless possibly it be of the omission of corrections which looked only to his reform, when in later years childish faults, concealed at first, often develop into open crimes of manhood), so it is also improper to say that a transgressor should (debere) suffer punishment, that is, that he is under some obligation to meet with punishment, the reason for which is shown before. But if we take the word 'deserved' in the sense that a wise man is under some obligation to require punishment, we must say, first, that no man is under an obligation in the matter before us, unless the guardianship of the laws has been publicly or privately entrusted to his keeping. And, secondly, that the obligation lying upon sovereigns concerns not transgressors but the whole state or social group whose safety they should provide for also by this method of coercing wicked men by means of punishments. When the governors of states neglect to do this, they do¹ no injury to malefactors, but they do violate that obligation which they owe the state. And yet it is manifest that by the granting of pardon in the proper place and time, the safety of a state is not undermined but is in fact sometimes strengthened.

¹ [For foreo read foro.—Tr.]

² [For principio read principio.—Tr.]

³ [In the original this sentence is cast in the double negative, but to the same effect.—Tr.]

16. The statement of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 22, to the effect that there is place for pardon even 'antecedent to a penal law', requires a sagacious interpretation, for otherwise it becomes a mere commonplace to say that, when there is as yet no law, there can also be no punishment, or crime, or pardon for crime. Moreover, a law is penal 811 not only when a certain kind of punishment is expressly defined, but also when it is left to the decision of the judge to define the quality and quantity of a punishment. Therefore, it must be recognized in the case before us, that in any state which does not use written law, the place of civil laws is taken by natural laws, and justice is administered in accordance with them, while whoever transgresses them is visited by the judge with an arbitrary punishment. But even where the civil laws are written, inasmuch as not every way in which human evil may display itself can be expressly set forth, it is everywhere understood that natural law and reason supplies the defect of civil laws, and in cases where an express sanction is wanting, it lies at the discretion of the judge to define the punishments. Lycurgus, Against Leocrates [9]: 'The punishment for such crimes was omitted, not by the negligence of those who made the laws at that time, but because such things did not happen in those days.' It is in this way that we are to understand how there is place for punishment 'antecedent to a penal law', and on the same grounds is to be explained the statement of Cicero, Against Verres, Bk. I [II. xlii]: 'Nor in any law is time past ever implicated in blame, except in cases which are of their own nature wicked and nefarious, so that, even if there were no law, they would be strenuously avoided.' (Y.)

¹ [For inserunt read inferunt.—Tr.]

But although in such states the governors have power to inflict punishment upon malefactors, not each and every transgressor should be punished on that score, for the course to be taken will depend upon the connexion between the ends for which punishment is established, and punishment itself. Therefore, if in a certain case those ends are in moral estimation not necessary, as in case it does not appear wise to publish a certain crime, or if opposing ends come¹ into consideration, which are no less useful and necessary, as in case the same or a greater advantage can be gained by waiving the punishment, or, finally, if the ends proposed for penalties can be reached more conveniently by another course, it is obvious enough that there is nothing which precisely obligates their imposition in a human court. See Decretum, II. xxiii. 3. 18, 24 [II. xxiii. 4. 18 and 24].

An example of the first case is a sin which is known only to a very few, and public notice of which is therefore not necessary or even harmful. For many persons refrain from a sin more out of ignorance of vices than love of virtue, and by the punishment of such a crime, which was before entirely unknown to them, they are not so much deterred from it, as led by idle curiosity to commit it themselves, and to incline to what is forbidden. Here belongs the reason advanced by Solon for not drawing up a law on parricide, namely, lest he should appear not so much to be forbidding it as to be keeping it before the mind. Apuleius, Metamorphoses, Bk. X [iii]: 'What nobody knows, almost² doesn't happen.' Add Seneca, On Clemency, Bk. I, chap. xxiii. Busbecq, Letters, iii, writes: 'The Turks do not delve into secret misdemeanours, lest they open the way to calumny, but punish severely open and discovered crimes.' This is not very different from the advice given Augustus by Maecenas on the exaction of punishments. Dio Cassius, Bk. LII.

An example of the second case can be found in him who advances as an adequate offset to his present guilt, his own merits or those of his parents or ancestors. For sometimes it may be of as much or more advantage to a commonwealth to reward a certain kind of noble deed, than to punish a bad one, and not only is an injury wiped out by a supervening benefit, but also by one that has preceded it. Procopius, War of the Vandals, Bk. II [xvi. 19]: 'While a wrong which has once been committed can never be undone in all time, still, when it has been corrected by better deeds on the part of those who committed it, it receives the fitting reward of silence and generally comes to be forgotten.' (D.)

¹ [For occurrant read occurrent.—Tr.]

² [For pene read paene.—Tr.]

An example of the third case is to be seen in him who is led by good advice to reform, or satisfies the injured party by an apology and a promise to refrain from such things in the future, so that a punishment is no longer required for these ends and the wrong will not do harm as an example. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. xvi [I. xix]:

812 The wise man often lets a man go after detecting his crime, if his penitence for what he has done gives good hope for the future, if he perceives that the man's wickedness is not deeply rooted in his mind, but is only, as the saying is, skin deep. He will grant impunity in cases where it will hurt neither the receiver nor the giver. (S.)

From all this, as we may note in passing, it appears how far a crime may be atoned for by settlement with the accuser or the injured party, for they can regularly remit what is to their private interest, but their action may not prejudice the interests of the commonwealth. And so the agreements of individuals can remove the second end of punishments, but not the third. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [lxx]: 'Forbearing as the Emperor might be in regard to his own private wrongs, he should not be indulgent to an offence committed against the State.' (R.) To this case also you may refer the so-called follies of youth, which just men readily pardon when the heat of that age is past and there is a return to virtue. Juvenal, Satires, viii [166]: 'Let some of your misdoings be cut off with your first beard.' (R.) Add Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. II, chap. iii, at the beginning. Here also belongs the remark of Arrian, Anabasis of Alexander, Bk. VII [xxix]:

When a man has been done an injury, he does not take it so hard if his injurer acknowledges that he was in the wrong; and a man has good reason to hope that he will not be injured any further, if the one who wronged him plainly shows that he regrets his deed.

And in such cases it is considered an act of clemency to incline to pardon rather than to punishment. For since every punishment, and especially one of considerable severity, has something in it, which, considered in itself, does not appear repugnant to justice, and yet opposes the charity which results from the common kinship of all men, therefore reason readily suffers a penalty to be superseded. Plutarch, Roman Questions, lxxxii:

Why are the rods of the magistrates carried tied in bundles with the axes fastened to them? Does this hint that the wrath of the magistrate ought not to be ready and unbound? Or is it because the hindrance and delay caused in the course of his anger by the leisurely unfastening of the rods often causes him to change his mind about the punishment? (Juvenal, Satires, vi. [220]: No delay can be too long when a man's life is at stake. (R.)) As some badness is curable, some incurable, the rods correct that which is capable of amendment, while the axes cut off the incorrigible. (R.)

For sometimes a higher and juster charity demands punishment without gainsaying, as it were, in order that the pardoning of one may not cast the burden of other evils upon many. Julian, Misopogon [p. 371 B]: 'Clemency towards rascals and thieves increases and fosters wickedness among mankind.' (W.*) Appian of Alexandria, Mithridatic War, xvi. 112]: 'Baseness, if shown mercy, is ever ungrateful.' And for that reason pardon should not be granted, save to such as repent of their wrong-doing. Gunther, Ligurinus, Bk. I [478 ff.]: 'Long-sufferance in a king is often more harmful than severity: The former injures but a few, the latter incites all, in that they hope their crimes will go unpunished.' Sadi, A Persian Rose Garden, chap. viii: 'To forgive is praiseworthy and virtuous, but it is folly to bind up the wound of him who is an enemy to mankind. Does not he know who takes pity upon a serpent that he does an injury to all mankind?' King James, in his Donum regium, Bk. II, considers the following to be crimes which should on no account be pardoned: 'Sorcery, robbery, incest, sodomy, poisoning, counterfeiting, oppression or public violence.' Here belongs the statement of Lepidus, in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [1], who felt that some leniency should be shown the foolish poet because 'his life will be no danger to the State; his death will teach no lesson'. (R.) In cases of this kind the Stoics used to say that a wise man 'spares' but does not 'forgive'. As though we cannot join with mankind in calling that 'forgiving' which they call 'sparing', or as if it were not unworthy of a wise man to quibble over terms when the fact is agreed upon!

17. But after a penal law has been passed it seems a matter of greater difficulty to have a criminal freed from punishment; in other words, it is easier to find place for pardon when punishment is arbitrary, than when it is expressly defined by laws. And this not so much because a legislator is expected to act in conformity with his own laws, as 813 because the authority of laws is cheapened unless the execution of them is neglected only for the most urgent reasons, and because a magistrate seems of his own accord to invite others to sin, when he offers as great or greater hope of pardon than fear of punishment. Arnobius, Bk. VII [viii], remarks: 'The number of sinners increases, when there is some chance to redeem one's sin; and people run readily into wrong-doing when the favours of those who stand ready to pardon are for sale.' Therefore, although the force of all human laws depends upon the will of men, not only for its origin but also for its duration, they should, nevertheless, not be annulled or changed save for very urgent cause, for this involves a serious restriction upon the rules of government. Nay, not to prosecute without good cause a law still in force, in the case of certain persons, appears a more serious thing than completely to abrogate it, since the former course gives rise to the sharpest complaints that those who deserved equal treatment are not accorded it. Nevertheless, as a supreme sovereign is able to abrogate a complete positive law under just cause, so he can remove its effect in a certain person or case, although it remain in force in every other respect. I say this can be done by the 'supreme sovereign', for petty judges may well be kept in mind of the statement of Lysias, Orations, ii, Against Alcibiades [9]: 'If any one of you hold the punishment to be heavy or the law too severe, let him bear in mind that you have come here not to frame a law, but to pass judgement in accordance with laws already enacted.' Themistius, Orations, v: 'One kind of praise and virtue belongs to a king, another to a judge: the latter must observe the laws, the former must sometimes even correct them and point out their severity and harshness, since he is the living and breathing law.' Digest, XL. ix. 12, § 1; XLIX. viii. 1, § 2.

Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 24, divides the grounds for freeing a man from punishment consequent to the enactment of a penal law, into intrinsic and extrinsic. It is for him an intrinsic case when the punishment would not, indeed, be unjust, since it has been formally enacted and announced, and yet it is harsh when applied to a particular case. Although, to my way of thinking, if the punishment set by the laws be in general too harsh, it would be better to correct the entire law than to pardon one or only a few, and leave the rest liable to an unjust punishment. Yet even if special circumstances arise, in the case of this or that man, which mitigate its atrocity as the law conceives it, judges are obligated by equity itself not to abrogate the law in its entirety but only to mitigate its severity. In this case there resides intrinsically, as it were, in the fact itself a cause not for pardon but for tempering the punishment. Therefore, it is more proper, in my opinion, to speak only of there being extrinsic causes for making a punishment less severe, for instance, when some former merit of the transgressor himself (see Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XV, chap. xi) or of his ancestors or kinsmen, or some other fact commends it, or, finally, when there is great hope that the sin itself will be atoned for by worthy deeds. Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xxxv]:

It will be desirable, therefore, for the man who entreats to be pardoned for what he admits that he has done, to enumerate whatever services of his he is able to perform, and, if possible, to show that they are greater than those offences which he has committed, so that it may appear that more good than evil has proceeded from him; and then to put forward also the services done by his ancestors, if there are any such; and also to show that he did what he did, not out of hatred, or out of cruelty, but either through folly, or owing to the instigation of some one, or for some other honourable or probable cause; and after that to promise and undertake that he has been taught by this error of his, and confirmed in his resolution also by the kindness of those who pardon him, to avoid all such conduct in the future. (Y.)

Thus many men have been pardoned for the fame and merits of their ancestors, or at the intercession of influential personages. It is recorded in Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio's History, that Hadrian mitigated the punishment of transgressors in proportion to the number of their children. See Livy, Bk. VIII, chap. xxxv. So some have been freed because they were the last of an illustrious family. When Phryne the courtesan was pleading for her life in Athens the orator Lysias¹ procured her acquittal by the stratagem of pulling off her upper garment, so that the judges could see her nude bosom. M. Antonius freed 814 M. Aquilius from the charges of bribery, of which he was plainly guilty, by making him stand at the conclusion of his plea in sight of all and tearing the tunic from his breast, so that the Roman people and judges might see the scars which he had received with his face to the enemy. Cicero, Against Verres, Bk. V [i]. Polydorus Virgilius, Historia Anglica, Bk. XXVI, writes that in early England no prisoners, 'who could read', were ever condemned to death for anything save treason, but were only condemned to life imprisonment.

Considerations like this will suffice all the more if the reason for the law ceases, at least in a particular sense, in the fact which is being scrutinized. The general reason why a law should be observed is the authority and will of the legislator as endowed with supreme sovereignty, which should be sufficient when no other reason appears; but the particular reason is some outstanding advantage accruing to the commonwealth, or the damage which the observance of the law avoids, an example of which is to be seen if we imagine in some countries the existence of sumptuary laws. In the case of these the general reason is the will of the legislator, while the particular is that citizens may not waste their patrimonies in useless and immoderate expenditures. Now although the universal reason of law is sufficient to uphold the authority of such, yet when the particular reason ceases, the result will be that the punishment can be remitted more easily and with less affront to the authority of the laws, if, for instance, the transgressor be so wealthy that he cannot be impoverished by such prodigality. Yet it is not safe under strict rulers to neglect a law or mandate merely because its particular reason ceases. Thus we find in Herodotus, Bk. III [xxxvi], that Cambyes was glad because the life of Croesus had been saved, but those who had failed to execute him at the command of the king were put to death. One is also greatly inclined to pardon, if a crime is committed through ignorance, although not such as is entirely blameless, but due to inattention, or if it be due to some mental weakness which can be overcome only with effort. To the former class can be referred the instance of Charondas, who through inadvertence came into the assembly carrying a sword, which was contrary to one of his own laws; although surely that was no reason for his falling upon it. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. xix.

¹ [But it was Hypereides.—Tr.]

A similar account is given by the same author (Bk. XIII, chap. xxxiii) of Diocles of Syracuse, one of whose laws was: 'That, if any man came armed into the market, he should be put to death, without any exception of ignorance, or of any other circumstance of the fact whatsoever.' (B.*) Yet on the report of a raid by the enemy he set out for the forum¹ armed with his sword, and when he heard that the forum was in a tumult he hurried thither still carrying his sword. But upon being advised by a friend of what he was doing he slew himself. And yet he had himself eliminated the consideration of pity, because in his law he had made no exception for inadvertence or similar circumstances. Nor is what has been said overturned by the tedious arguments set forth by Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus, XIX. v, on Digest XLVIII.

In conclusion we should add that, as otherwise in a human court the advantage of the state sets the measure of punishment, so it also often enjoins the indulgence of pardon to delinquents because of their great number. For although usually it is no excuse for a crime to claim that others are guilty of the same (see Isocrates, Busiris, [45], towards the end), it is still the part of prudent governors to see to it that the justice whose end is the preservation of human society, should not² be the cause of the overthrow of a state. Lucan, Bk. II [141 ff., 198 ff.]:

And while he amputated the limbs now too corrupt, the healing art exceeded its limits, and the hand followed too far where the malady led it. The guilty perished; but when now the guilty alone could possibly be surviving. (Ibid.): So many youths at the same instant to fall by a hostile death, full oft has famine, the rage too of the ocean, and sudden earthquake caused, or pestilence of climate and locality, or slaughter in warfare, vengeance it never was that did so. (R.)

Claudian, The Gothic War [120 ff.]:

The Physician's skill deals more carefully with grave diseases and ulcers that are near the heart; here he is more sparing of the knife for fear lest the blade, driven too deep, 815 should slip and sever beyond healing some vital organ. (Y.)

Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. x: 'Where a whole army deserts, it must needs be pardoned.' (S.)

Therefore, that prince deserves our praise who, as described by Ovid, From the Pontus, Bk. I, el. ii [125], 'controls many things by the fear of punishment, few by punishment itself.' (W.) So also necessity often leads us either to modify the excessive rigour of some laws, or to allow them to lapse. In Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [xxv, xxviii], mention is made of the relaxation of the Papia-Poppaeian Law; (and for the following reason): The multitude of persons exposed to prosecution was continually increasing, not a house but was at the mercy of the interpretations of informers. (And the added reason): The inquisitors did not stop there; the capital, Italy, and Roman citizens all over the world, fell into their clutches; ruin was brought into many households, and terror hung over every head. (R.*)

¹ [So the text, obviously in error. The original has at this point 'ἐπὶ τῆς χώρας, for the country'. No doubt Pufendorf wrote, or intended to write, foras, 'out of the city'.—Tr.]

² [For ne-quae read ne quae.—Tr.]

In the same author, Annals, Bk. IV [III. liii and liv], the letter of Tiberius is worthy of notice, where he holds it wiser 'to overlook ailments of long standing, come to a head through time, than, in the attempt to correct them, to disclose only such crimes as they were not strong enough to correct'. Since it is better for them 'to seek a remedy within themselves', and to wait until 'we senators may be turned to better things by shame, the poor by necessity, the wealthy by satiety'. (R.*) All of which means that man was not made for punishment, but punishment for man. Therefore, if an act of punishment by those in whom the right lies to require it, would be followed by their ruin, they are under no more obligation to inflict it than they are to take their own lives. If a pilot had committed a crime on board ship, and there were no one else to run it, the man who would require that he be punished would imperil all the passengers. A magistrate must pass over many misdeeds, the punishment of which would lead to the ruin of the commonwealth, and when the men guilty of them are necessary to the preservation of our state, although a magistrate may never make any direct agreement about the permission of sins, or turn such to the public gain. See 2 Peter, ii. 15. Under this head may fall the case, that, in Italy bandits are sometimes promised immunity if they bring in the head of another bandit, although that custom is censured by Henri Estienne, Apology for Herodotus, chap. xviii, who says that such a principle could better meet the approval of a Plato or an Aristotle than of a Christian. The reason for this was that such villains might become suspicious of one another, and so no longer be able to form into bands which cause serious troubles to the commonwealth. The contrary opinion is expressed by Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. II.

18. Our next task is to discuss the rating of punishments, that is, how great punishments may properly be fixed for each crime. On this question we should observe, in addition to what we have already said in Bk. I, chap. vii, 'On the Quantity of Actions', that in a human court crimes should be weighed primarily by their object, by the amount of damage which they cause to the commonwealth, and by the purpose and evil intent of the transgressor, which last are inferred by means of various conjectures.

Now the more noble and valuable the object of the action which has been violated, the more grave and serious is held to be the action. As among such objects the most Good and Great God takes far the first place in nobility, so an action which tends directly to irreverence toward Him is properly deserving of censure before all others; and as His worship, which consists chiefly of an attitude of heart, should govern every act of our lives, so, in accordance with His own expressed will, actions which are concerned with the external observance of His worship yield to such as render some outstanding advantage to men or avert serious damage, when delay in performing them is fraught with peril. See Luke, xiv. 5.

The next degree from these actions is held by such as concern the entire society of men, followed by such as disturb the public order of a state. After them come crimes which concern individual men, among which in a civil court first place is accorded to life, which is the foundation of all temporal possessions, then the non-vital members without the use of which life itself is but a sorry thing at best, and which are valued in accordance with the nobility of their service. Add Isocrates, Against Lochites. Then follow those crimes which disturb or disgrace the families of citizens, the foundation of whose honour is marriage, 816 although Philo Judaeus, in two of his works, On the Ten Commandments and On Special Laws, places the commandment about adultery before that about murder. Next place is given to such as destroy or deny other desirable things which serve the necessities or conveniences of life, and this either directly or indirectly, by causing the damage in deliberate malice. Last of all come such as destroy civil fame or reputation.

Regarding these crimes considered separately, first place is held by completed crimes and last by such as have advanced to certain acts but not to their consummation, where the degree of their heinousness is measured by the length to which they have gone. In this connexion we should observe that the proposal and desire to perpetrate some villainy naturally cannot in any way be regarded as being so serious as the completed act, since evil takes on a far more horrid aspect to the mind when the step is taken to its actual performance, and since it requires a more hardened heart to face the consummation of an evil deed than to propose and consider it at a distance. Therefore, when it is sometimes said that the will is as good as the deed, the statement is to be taken of that will which is joined with the final act of an undertaking, so that there takes place between such a resolution and the consummation of the villainy no new operation of the will, even though the end in view may not be attained, as, for instance, when a man for all his aiming has missed his victim. Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. II [chapter 'On their Marriages']:

He that tempts a married woman to adultery is no less severely punished than he who commits it; for they believe that a deliberate design to commit a crime is equal to the fact itself; since its not taking effect does not make the person that miscarried in his attempt at all the less guilty.

But most evils are rated higher or lower in accordance with the disparity of the subjects against which they are directed, as to their status, degree of fortune, age, time, or necessities, or any special affection whereby they incline to some peculiar good, or are averse to a certain form of evil. Nor is consideration given only to such evils as follow directly and immediately upon an action, but also to such as in all probability would follow upon it, as in the burning of a building or the breaking of a levee the misery and death of many people are also to be considered. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 30. And so the Chinese make it a capital offence for one to have started a fire even by accident.

19. In judging of the resoluteness or weakness of the προαίρεσις [moral purpose or will] consideration is regularly given first of all to the causes which have led men to sin. Scarcely any man is evil for nothing; and if not, when he finds pleasure in vice for its own sake, or even sins from mere perverseness, or because, to use the words of Calpurnius Flaccus, Declamations, ii, 'The reason for his sin is to commit an incredible sin', he reaches the lowest level of human depravity. Hence it is, as Cicero, On Laws, Bk. I [xiv], says, that 'no villain was ever so audaciously impudent, but what he either denied that the action in question had been committed by him, or pretended some cause or other for his just¹ indignation, or sought a defence of his deed in some right of nature'. (Y.) Most mortals are led to sin by their passions, of which some violently impel the mind to avoid a present or a threatening evil, and these are most effective in excusing or extenuating a sin. Therefore, whatever deeds are undertaken by reason of death, imprisonment, excessive grief, or extreme want, usually appear to offer every ground for excuse. Thus a wise Hebrew concludes that a thief who is driven to the deed by want is less base than an adulterer. So also a robbery to satisfy hunger will be accounted less heinous than one to satisfy excessive avarice, just as it is a lesser evil to commit perjury out of fear of death, than to deny a sum of money left with you so as to claim it for your own. The writer of the treatise Ad Herennium, Bk. II [xix], says: 'It is a greater crime to debauch a free-born woman than it is to commit sacrilege; for the one act is committed at the instigation 817 of actual need, the other in ungovernable insolence.' Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VIII, chap. i, towards the end. A pimp, who for a base livelihood supplies the objects for the lusts of others, merits a severer punishment than he whose own lust goads him on to gratify his passions. Thus the judgement of Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. II, § 10, is justified:

[. . .] The offences which are due to lust are more heinous than those which are due to anger. For the man who is moved with anger seems to turn his back upon reason with some pain, and unconscious compunction; but he that does wrong from lust, being mastered by pleasure, seems in some sort to be more incontinent and more unmanly in his wrongdoing. (H.)

Libanius, Declamations, xxiii [viii. 22]: 'Anger incites and constrains more violently than love. For the latter allows time for consideration and reflection, but anger creates turmoil in the heart, well nigh drives one to insanity, and rages until it has satisfied itself.'

¹ [For justs read justi.—Tr.]

The other passions draw one toward some real or imaginary good. Of the things which are really good it is opposed to the very nature of some to lead to sin, as is the case with the virtues and actions that proceed from them. Some are good in themselves, and yet furnish the occasion for sins, according to the heart of him who is their subject, while of these some give delight or pleasure, and others, again, are the cause of securing delights and are also called useful. Whatever transgression is traceable to these passions, all else being equal, is considered less heinous, the more the good sought is agreeable to nature, or the greater the difficulty for her to go without it. But that is an imaginary good the price of which is set by nothing but the folly and vanity of men, and their vices. Under this category fall vainglory, or a craving merely to excel all others, in so far as it is not¹ based upon virtue, and has no relation to anything of substantial value, as well as revenge, when it has no other purpose than to make the offending party suffer. The farther such an imaginary good departs from nature, and the more easily it can be forsworn, the baser are judged to be the crimes committed because of it. But it is also certain that all crimes which are committed out of error are far more heinous² than those committed out of clear knowledge, and among errors that into which a man is led from a stubborn purpose to gratify his own principle and ideas, is more heinous than what he has imbibed³ from public teachers. Compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 29. It has also been well observed by Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxvii, that if a transgression of the laws arose because a man trusted to his strength, or friends, or wealth, which a malefactor relies upon in resisting public officials, it is a greater crime than if it had arisen in the hope of escaping detection, or seeking refuge in flight; and if, as Juvenal, Satires, vi [97], says, such guilty men 'if they be doing a bold, bad thing, fail not in their courage'. (R.) For the former implies a contempt for the laws, while the latter does not. Add Aristotle, *Rhetoric*⁴, Bk. I, chaps. xii and xiv. Idem, Rhetoric, Bk. II, chap. iii:

Those who contradict us and deny their offence we punish all the more, but we cease to be incensed against those who agree that they deserved their punishment. The reason is that it is shameless to deny what is obvious, and those who are shameless toward us slight us and show contempt for us. (R.)

Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. xvi [I. xix]:

In some cases the wise man will punish great crimes more leniently than lesser ones, if the former were the result of momentary impulse, not of cruelty, while the latter were

¹ [Supplying the negative, necessary for the sense, which was erroneously omitted.—Tr.]

² [So also the 1759 edition of Barbeyrac's translation, although an early hand, in the copy of the University of Illinois, has changed 'plus' to 'moins' (and yet such a change is not recorded in the errata), while Kennet (1710 edition) exactly reverses the statement.—Tr.]

³ [For houstus read haustus.—Tr.]

⁴ [For Rbetoricor. read Rhetoricor.—Tr.]

instinct with secret, underhand, long-practised craft. The same fault, committed by two different men, will not be visited by him with the same penalty, if the one was guilty of it through carelessness, the other with a premeditated intention of doing mischief. (S.)

20. But it also tends to show the great force of moral purposes or intentions, if to the common cause which should restrain all men from sin, there is added a special one founded in the person of the criminal, or of the victim, or upon some other circumstance. And so Juvenal, Satires, viii [140-1]: 'The greater the sinner's name, the more signal the guiltiness of the sin.' (R.) Dio Chrysostom, Orations, i [43]: 'The transgression of a ruler is greater and more conspicuous.' (M.) The words of Pliny, Natural History, Bk. V, chap. i, can also be applied here: 'Never is implicit credence more readily given, than when a falsehood is supported by the authority of some personage of high consideration.' (B. & R.) Thus the sin of a priest, when known to the world, is regarded as more heinous than the same sin in another, since the former should furnish others an example of a pious life. Libanius, Declamations, xxix [1, III]: 'If a man scrupulously avoids himself what he sees fit to lead others to do, he refutes the counsel of his words by that of his deeds, exhorting by the weaker argument and dissuading by the stronger.' Cicero, On Laws, Bk. III [xiv]:

For it is not so great an evil that the chiefs of the city should do wrong, though that must be allowed to be very considerable of itself, as the fact that there are a great many imitators of those chiefs. [. . .] On which account, great men of a vicious life are doubly pernicious to the state, as being not only guilty of immoral practices themselves, but likewise of spreading them far and wide among their fellow citizens. Nor are they mischievous to it inasmuch as they cherish vices themselves, but also because they corrupt others; and they do more harm by their example than by the crimes which they commit. (Y.)

Seneca, Hercules Raging [745-6]: 'The sins of you who rule with heavier judgement shall be judged.' (M.*) Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [lxx]: 'The infamy of Capito was all the more notable, that being himself a jurist, skilled in all law human and divine, he had brought disgrace upon his own personal accomplishments as well as on his high position in the State.' (R.) Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. II [iv]:

For just as if one who professed to teach grammar, should speak with impropriety, or a master of music sing out of tune, such conduct has the worse appearance in these men, because they blunder in the very particular with which they profess that they are well acquainted: so a philosopher, who errs in the conduct of his life, is the more infamous, because he is erring in the very thing which he pretends to teach, and whilst he lays down rules to regulate life by, is irregular in his own life. (Y.)

Quintilian, Declamations, iii [15]: 'For this is the case of superiors, what they do seems a command, and the greater the author in a bad matter, the more pernicious his example.' (W.) In Peru, under the rule of the Incas, a magistrate who committed a crime was punished more severely than a private citizen, on the basis that he is especially appointed to render justice to others, and that he was given the office because he was supposed to excel others in probity. Garcilaso¹ de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. II, chap. xiv. So also we are more hurt by the injury of a friend than by that of an enemy. Petronius [107]: 'A person who injures a stranger is called a robber, but a man who hurts his friends is practically a parricide.' (H.) Although among the Celts a man who killed a stranger was punished more severely than he who slew a fellow citizen, for the former was put to death, while the latter was only exiled (Nicolaus of Damascus, De Moribus Gentium [fr. 103 e Jakoby]). On the other hand a kindness at the hands of an enemy is considered something greater than one which comes from a friend, although it is the opinion of Terence, Brothers, Act II, sc. iii [254 f.]: 'To get a good thing from any one, when you want it, may give you joy, but the only real delight is when your benefactor is the right man.' (S.) In the same way it is more humiliating to be the butt of a common man's jest than of one's equal or superior (see Digest, XLVII. x. 17, § 3), of one's own children and servants than of another's. See 2 Samuel, xvi. 11.

There are also sins which fall under special censure, and are regarded as peculiarly base, because they run counter to a special duty which was owed some particular person. Such are a lack of respect for parents and of kindness to kinsmen, and ingratitude to benefactors, all of which acts are far more heinous under such circumstances than if they had been directed towards other persons. A passage of Lysias, Orations, IV[vi. 17], applies on this point: 'You should, O Athenians, be more severe upon citizens when they are guilty of sacrilege, than upon foreigners; for such a sin on the part of the latter has a kind of foreign aspect, while one on the part of the former is native and touches the heart of the state.' Again, the place or time at which a deed has been committed is a matter of no little consequence. Thus the same sin, when committed in a public place and before witnesses, is more heinous than if a person makes an effort to conceal it, both because what is concealed is less 819 harmful, at least by way of example, and because that man is accounted a more hardened criminal who parades his sin and has no respect for the presence and sight of honourable men. Add Aristotle, Problems, Bk. XXIX, chap. xiv. Thus² it is a viler thing to be guilty of misconduct in a temple than in a tavern, and to be beaten at a session of court than in the privacy of one's own house. Again, a man who gets drunk on a week day, other things being equal, has done something less sinful than one who acts intemperately on a day especially dedicated to prayer. See Digest, XLVII. x. 7, § 8; XLVII. x. 9, § 1; XLVII. x. 17, § 3. Thus Cicero, Philippics, II [xxv], very greatly magnifies the drunkenness of Mark Antony, which led him to vomit while seated on the judge's bench. Quintilian, Declamations, cclii:

[Just as a citizen when injured will bring suit—if he be a magistrate, the charge will be

¹ [For Gorçilassus read Garcilassus.—Tr.]

² [For Si read Sic.—Tr.]

lese-majesté, if an ambassador, the injury will be avenged in war: and the same sum of money taken from a private citizen will be theft, but from a shrine or temple, sacrilege; so the ravisher will pay ten thousand sesterces to the injured party¹ on a charge of simple rape, but a person will not be let off so easily if he has committed rape in the public square, if he has raped a virgin who was a candidate for a priesthood, nay, so as not to be ungrateful toward the benefaction of the people, who, as far as they were concerned, had already been elected to that priesthood. (W.)

Idem, Declamations, cclxiv [cclxv]:

Violence anywhere else may deserve only a moderate reproof. But in a temple, where we are chary about even speaking, where we compose our spirits, where we keep even our mind quiet, to attack another person as though one were out in a lonely spot, as though one were in some secret place, this cannot be tolerated.

Add Idem, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VI, chap. i. Demosthenes, Against Meidias [xxi. 74]:

I was insulted by an enemy, sober and in the morning, who did it purposely and not under the excitement of wine, in the presence of many persons both aliens and citizens, and that too in a temple, and where, being choir-master, I was compelled to go. (K.)

Add Digest, XLVIII. xix. 16; XLVIII. xix. 28, § 8.

Finally, the method and instruments used in the performance of a crime seem to aggravate or to mitigate it by reason of the fact that they form the basis for a conclusion about the degree of a man's purpose². Consequently, a robbery is considered to be more heinous when it is accomplished by breaking or cutting through the walls, or when the locks are picked by instruments especially designed for the purpose, than when the thief enters the house through open doors.

21. It is also of no little importance, in the weighing of crimes, to determine how far a person was able to avoid committing some sin. For some are of keener wit than others to grasp the reasons for which they should refrain from transgressions. One man also is swept with greater violence into a certain kind of sin than are others, which is due to his physical constitution or temperament, age, sex, education, and other considerations. See Digest, XLVIII. xiii. 6. For it is easy to observe that children and women and men who are endowed by nature with little wit, or are but poorly educated, show little understanding of the difference between just and unjust, lawful and unlawful, and have slight ability to judge their respective claims. Procopius, War of the Vandals, Bk. II [iv. 30]: 'And for an Erulian not to give himself over to treachery and drunkenness, but to strive after uprightness, is no easy matter and merits abundant praise.'³ (D.) Those whom choler controls are inclined to hasty anger, others whose blood runs hot, to venery; old age turns desires one way, youth another. Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, 13: 'Young persons rarely show any wisdom, since it is their special privilege

¹ [For qui read quae.—Tr.]

³ [Only a paraphrase of the original.—Tr.]

² [For aere read haere.—Tr.]

to be indulged in their sins.' Libanius, Declamations, xxi [x. 16 and 17]: 'The following are the accompaniments of youth: to pass by duties, to be ignorant of something or other that is becoming.' And again: 'Wherever there dwells the race of man, there also their age is offered as an excuse for the young.' So also the nearer the threatening evil seems to be, the more violent the fear which it elicits, and the greater 820 difficulty a man finds in resisting it. A fresh passion stirs the mind more violently than one which has been softened or appeased by the passage of time, and a fresh grief which will scarcely give ear to reason, than such as has run its course and been poured out, and is already broken by a period of relief. And the general judgement is that it is worse for a man to undertake a villainy when his mind is composed, than when it is disturbed by passions. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [viii]: '[. . .] Those things which proceed from a short, sudden fit, are of slighter moment than those which are inflicted by forethought and preparation.' (E.) Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [III. xvii], says: 'That is but half a crime, when the mind was not for some long time before occupied by the pollution.' (Y.*) Plato, Laws, Bk. IX [p. 867 B]: 'We make the penalties heavier for those who commit homicide with angry premeditation, and lighter for those who do not premeditate, but smite upon the instant.' (J.) Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VII, chap. viii:

But everybody will agree that a person is worse, if he does something disgraceful without desire, or without any strong desire, than if he does it at a time when his desire is violent, and worse, if he deals a blow in cold blood than when he is angry; for what, it may be said, would such a person do if he were in a passion? (W.)

Although the law of Pittacus on drunkenness, preserved in Aristotle, Politics, Bk. II, chap. x [II. xii], and also mentioned in Plutarch, The Banquet of the Seven Wise Men [p. 155 F], was just the opposite: 'If a drunken man strike another, he shall be more heavily punished than if he were sober; he looked not to the excuse¹ which might be offered for the drunkard, but only to expediency, for drunken more often than sober people commit acts of violence.' (J.) Of the sins caused by the passions, those which come from passion aroused at the sight of evil are less odious than such as follow upon a craving for pleasure, especially such as is superfluous. For the latter stirs the mind more gently and can be more easily put off, or else satisfied quite harmlessly in another way. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. xii: 'It is more difficult to endure pains than to abstain from pleasures.' (W.) Ibid., chap. xv: 'While pain distracts and destroys the nature of one who suffers it, pleasure has no such effect, but rather leaves the will free. Hence licentiousness deserves more severe reproach. [. . .]' (W.) Idem, Bk. VII, chap. vii: 'The incontinence of angry passion is not so disgraceful as the incontinence of the desires.' (W.) Idem, Magna Moralia, Bk. II, chap. vi [p. 1202 b]:

¹ [For adveniam read ad veniam.—Tr.]

The impulse to anger [. . .] is not greatly to be blamed, but the impulse to pleasure is blameworthy. [. . .] For incontinence due to anger is a pain (for no one feels anger without being pained), but that which is due to appetite is attended with pleasure, for which reason it is more blameworthy. For incontinence due to pleasure seems to involve wantonness. (R.)

A similar passage is in Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. II, § 19. Add Aristotle, Problems, Bk. XXIX, chap. xvi.

Lastly, if a man's relatives have moved him to commit a sin, that fact is of no little influence in mitigating the punishment. See Digest, XLVII. xvi. 2. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 31.

22. Finally, it is customary also to consider whether a man was the first to commit some crime, or was led astray by the example of others; and whether he has done it only once or repeatedly. For when any citizen is the first in a state to commit a crime that may serve as an example, and, as it were, teaches it to others, he is guilty of a greater crime than is one whose natural modesty has been undone by contact with frequent malefactors. Velleius Paterculus, Bk. II, chap. iii: 'For examples do not stop where they begin; but if allowed to spread through a channel ever so narrow, make way for themselves to any extent.' (W.) (Yet compare Gellius, Bk. X, chap. xix; Polybius, Selections on Embassies, XCIII, chap. v [XXXII. v].)

Likewise, a criminal will be held to have committed a greater offence if what he does is consistently punished, than if there are many instances of impunity; because a greater contempt for the sovereign and the laws is visible in the former case than in the latter. But the more or less frequent repetition of the same kind of crime does not make it worse or better in itself, except in so far as it serves to show that it proceeds from an established habit. See Digest, XLVIII. xix. 28, § 3; Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, I. i. 9, on Digest XLVII and XLVIII. iv. 28, on Digest XLVIII. And since the matter of habit is of the greatest 821 consequence in connexion with moral actions (since it is understood that actions which result from it are performed almost with full premeditation, which is the reason why it is commonly said that bad habits are worse than bad acts), it is sufficiently clear why a good act, which a man had performed many times before is commonly considered to be more praiseworthy than one which he performs for the first time, or only at rare intervals; and, on the other hand, why an evil one, repeated with some frequency, is held to be worse than one which is performed by the same man but once or twice. Here you may refer the law of the Emperor Julian on liars, as given by Libanius, Legatio ad Julianum [xv. 54]:

If one of those who attend upon me lies once, I bear with him; if he presumes to do so a second time, I bear it also; even if he be caught in an untruth a third time, he still does not incur my displeasure. But if he would impose upon me a fourth time, he is forbidden my presence.

But the Peruvians under the rule of the Incas made every effort to see that the first crimes were punished, giving as their reason, that, in this way, a man could not sin a second or third time. For, they said, if the weeds are not destroyed at the beginning of spring, it is impossible that they fail to cause a bad¹ harvest, and where punishment is exacted only after repeated misdemeanours, individuals will scarcely be able to restrain themselves from taking vengeance into their own hands, which must necessarily disturb the public peace. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. II, chap. xiv. Nor is it an objection that a good habit helps a good deed, and an evil one, on the other hand, makes it difficult to refrain from an evil one; for the labour involved in forming a good habit is a matter of cost, so that an action may not lightly be rated as of less value, even though its performance be accompanied with some pleasure to a good man. And we hate evil all the more, because so often the result of evil conduct is that a man can scarcely ever act any other way, and because shame is entirely lost by repeated sinning. Every man will now and then fail to recognize what life demands of him, but to err repeatedly in the same matters bespeaks an unbalanced mind. Add Thomas Browne, Religio Medici, Sec. 41 [42], who says very wisely: 'The same vice, committed at sixteen, is not the same, though it agrees in all other circumstances, at forty; [. . .] for, besides the constant and inexcusable habit of transgressing, the maturity of our judgement cuts off pretence unto excuse or pardon.' And all these circumstances are properly observed in imposing punishments. For it is easier to grant pardon, or to allow some leniency to a man who has committed some trifling crime for the first time, than to one who has struck over and over again upon the same rock. Lucian² [lxxxiv], De Saltatione: 'One fit of insanity is enough.' Sometimes also the pardon of former crimes is made to depend upon future reform as a condition, and when that does not appear, the punishment of the former crimes is demanded along with that of the present. See 2 Kings, i. 52; ii. 23. And this shows us in what sense the common saying is true: 'The estimate set on a past crime is never increased by any subsequent one.' [Digest, L. xvii. 138, § 1.]

In this connexion we should consider how far the custom of the Persians, of which Herodotus, Bk. I [xiii], tells, is just in the eyes of nature; namely, that a man's past life should be taken into consideration in judging a crime, and if the former abounded in good services, the latter might go unpunished.

Now that properly had no bearing upon the intrinsic estimate of a crime, nor do we feel that it ever was the custom in the worst offences, and in those where the premeditated evil intent of the malefactor was clearly apparent. The truth is, as Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 30, holds, that this principal was, or should have been, followed¹ in cases where men, otherwise of upright life, were suddenly caught off their guard by some enticement to sin, or where, in case the proof of the crime was not entirely clear, a man's past life gave some hint as to whether he would likely have done such a thing, since a man is not usually said to turn scoundrel over night. Yet there is the case in Herodotus, Bk. VII [xciv], namely, that of Sandoces, whom Darius had ordered to be crucified, because, while acting as one of the royal judges, he had been bribed into rendering unjust decisions; but when the king called to mind that he had to his credit more services rendered the royal house than sins against it, he had him taken down from the cross, and received him back into the circle of his friends. The same thought is found in Cicero, For Sulla [xxv]:

¹ [For pravam read pravam.—Tr.]

² [For Luianus read Lucianus.—Tr.]

822

In every case, O judges, which is of more serious importance than usual, we must judge a great deal as to what every one has wished, or intended, or done, not from the counts of the indictment, but from the habits of the person who is accused. (In other words, because) according to the opinion that is formed of a man's habits, do people conjecture what has or has not been done by him. (Y.)

Idem, For Cluentius [xxv], towards the end. And this was the reason, why, in the trials of the Romans, it was customary for the prosecution to attack the entire life of the accused, while the defence offered excuses for the same, or else defended a man's record by calling in witnesses to praise it. And in view of the well-known fact of the corruption of mankind, it is highly desirable that human judges should not hastily destroy a citizen in whom there may appear to be more good than evil fruit. And yet it should be carefully noted that the character and former life furnish a strong presumption for either side, when the crime is not clear. But when a man has fully cleared himself of a charge, he will do well in guiding himself by the advice of the author of the treatise Ad Herennium, Bk. II [iii]: 'That he is not speaking of his client's morals before the censors, but only of the crimes of his opponents before the judges.' On the other hand, when a man with a good record has changed the entire manner of his life, the laws have good reason to be incensed at him on two scores, both because he has sinned, and because he has changed from a good citizen into an evil one. Polybius, in Excerpta Peiresciana, Bk. VII [xii. 11]: 'For his purposes being now entirely reversed, it inevitably followed that men's opinions of him should be reversed also, as well as the success of his various undertakings.' (S.)

23. For although it is perfectly evident, from what has been said, that one crime is more serious than another, and that in a human court of law the same penalty should never be meted out to all alike, it must still be confessed that both the precise quality and quantity of human punishments depend upon the definition of civil sovereignty, which is governed first of all by the advantage of each individual state. A case in point is the course followed by Anysis, king of Egypt, who in his reign put no one to death, but sentenced each man, in proportion to the magnitude of his offence, to bring a certain amount of earth to the city in which he resided, and in this way the cities were elevated enough to avoid all troubles from the inundation of the Nile. Herodotus, Bk. II [cxxxvii]; add Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxv. And yet we are informed by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lx, that Actisanes, after the founding of Rhinocolura, deemed it best to remove such dregs of states into a place by themselves, where they could not infect others with their evil ways. Nor is it necessary for there always to be the same proportion between punishments as there is between the objects of the crime; rather every crime can have its own separate punishment fixed, as the advantage of the commonwealth demands, without considering whether an equal or even a less punishment is laid upon another crime, which in itself appears less or greater than the one in question. And so Plato, Laws, Bk. XII [p. 941 c D], gives his approval to such a law as this:

¹ [For habere read habere.—Tr.]

If a man steals anything belonging to the public, whether that which he steals be much or little, he shall have the same punishment. For he who steals a little steals with the same wish as he who steals much, but with less power.¹ He who takes up anything more than he has deposited is unjust in the highest degree; and therefore the law is not disposed to inflict a less penalty on the one than on the other, because his theft is less, but on the ground that the thief may possibly be in the one case still curable, and in the other case incurable. (J.)

It would follow from this that judges should so far observe an equality in imposing punishments that those who are guilty of equal offences should suffer equally, and that never without the most urgent cause should a crime in one man be forgiven in another, since such unequal dealing must give rise to the most serious disorders in a commonwealth, and punishment is entirely without effect when it is apparently meted out not for the public good but to please private interests. But such equality as Plato mentions should be understood only of those who have committed the same kind of crime, not different 823 kinds, for time and again men impose a heavier penalty upon a crime that appears not serious in itself, and vice versa, all as the need of the commonwealth and the judgement of the legislator may dictate. Nor can a complaint of the defendant about this injustice amount to anything, since he was aware of it beforehand. Calpurnius Flaccus,

¹ [For minorivi read minori vi.—Tr.]

Declamations, v: 'When the penalty is threatened beforehand the fault is the victim's own.' For instance, although theft in itself is a far less heinous crime than murder, a thief has no cause for complaint if he suffers death along with a murderer, even if he has not committed a crime equal to his. And yet not a few offences, unequal in themselves, are punished alike by death, for the reason that men know no punishment more severe than death (Lycurgus, Oration against Leocrates [§ 8]: 'The greatest and most extreme of all punishments is death.'), although sometimes it is reached by a short and easy road, and again only after long and cruel tortures. Ovid, Heroides, Ep. x [82]: 'Death holds less of dole than the delay of death.' (S.) Still some are to be found who regard a sudden death as milder punishment than a life of misery. See the speech of Caesar in Sallust, Conspiracy of Catiline [li]. In Suetonius, Tiberius, chap. lxi: 'When a man begged for a speedy death, he replied, "I have not yet become your friend".' (R.) Seneca, Hercules Raging [513]:

Forbid the wretch to die, the happy slay. (M.)

Idem, Agamemnon [995-6]:

AEG. An unskilled tyrant he who punishes by death.

EL. Is aught worse than death?

AEG. Yes, life, if thou longest to die. (M.)

Euripides, Hippolytus [1047]: 'For easiest for the wretch is swift death.' (W.) Nay, Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxix, n. 11, classes among the foolish opinions of the common sort that of killing a man by way of revenge, for such an act, he says, only deprives the victim of all power of feeling, and leaves the slayer exposed to every evil, unless our security requires that an enemy of ours be not left alive. In Philostratus, Bk. I [xxxvii], Apollonius punished the eunuch who had lain with the king's concubine by giving him his life.

Yet sometimes the punishment of death is heightened by visiting with ignominy the man's body or memory (Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. IV, chap. vii), which is occasionally inflicted some time after the person has passed from this world, and may again be rescinded. See Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. VII, chap. xlv. At times, also, the will of the legislator may have somewhat to do in determining punishment, not in so absolute a way but that it should always have respect to the need of the state, and yet so much so that the exact form of punishment may in fact depend upon it. Another consideration is that so atrocious is the character of some crimes that even the extreme penalty may be visited upon those who are found to be in any degree implicated in them. Add Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, Prolegomena, i, § 5-6, and V. iii. 10 and XVIII. iv on Digest XLVIII; Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 39; Valerius Maximus, Bk. VI, chap. i, § 8. Digest, XLVII.

xi. i, § 2; XLVIII. viii. 1, § 3; XLVIII. viii. 3, §§ 1, 2, 3; XLVIII. viii. 14. Philo Judaeus, De Confusione Linguarum [xxx]:

And even if any one, rising up as it were from ambush, were to try, but to be unable, to slay a man, still he is none the less liable to the punishment due to homicide, as the law which is enacted about such persons shows. 'For if,' says the law, 'any one attacks his neighbour, wishing to slay him by treachery, and escapes, thou shalt apprehend him, even at the altar, to put him to death.' (Y.)

The same thought appears also in his On Special Laws [xvi and xvii]. Tacitus, Histories, Bk. II [lxxvii]: 'For those who deliberate about revolting have revolted already.' (O.) Here belongs a sentence in Plutarch, Caesar [lxvii]: 'For those who inflict punishment do not exact a penalty for what was done, but for what men wished they had done.'¹ Quintilian, Declamations, ccclxxii: 'The law punishes the mind.' Lysias, Orations against Simon [42]:

We all know that the authors of our laws did not want a man banished for the reason that he may have broken another's head in a quarrel, but if one hurts another while attempting to kill him, for such a one they instituted severe penalties, holding that men should be punished for whatever they attempted with deliberate intention. For although 824 they had not attained their end, they had made every effort to do so.

Add Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. XIV, chap. xxvii. The judges of the Areopagus, however, were too severe, who, according to Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. V, chap. ix [13], 'condemned a boy to death for picking out the eyes of quails [. . .] because such an act was the indication of a cruel disposition, likely to do mischief to many if he should be allowed to reach maturity.' (W.) Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. V, chap. xiv 'He is a brigand even before he has dipped his hands in blood, because he carries² deadly weapons and has intentions of robbing and murdering. His wickedness consists and is shown in action, but does not begin thereby.' (S.*) Velleius Paterculus, Bk. II, chap. viii, observes on those who sentenced C. Cato for a trivial offence: 'They considered the inclination of the man to dishonesty rather than the magnitude of the offence, and estimated deeds, in general, by intention, regarding rather what had been done than to how great an extent.' (W.) Add Code, IX. viii. 4, at beginning, and Grotius in Florum Sparsio on this law.

In the crime of laesa maiestas [injury to the dignity of authority] and treason mere knowledge of the affair without assent, and failure to communicate it, merit punishment. An example of this is found in the case of Thuanus in Benjamin Priolo, History of France, Bk. I, chap. vi, and of David Berchin in Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. VIII; compare Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XI, chap. liv.

Yet so far as possible leniency may regularly be shown even in punishments, and that severity of Draco, which Solon corrected, was surely deserving of censure. See Plutarch, Solon [xvii]. A like severity was shown by the Peruvians, who punished practically every crime with death, not giving heed so much to the crime as to the fact that it violated a command of the Incas, to whom they paid the same reverence as to God. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. II, chaps. xii, xiii. And yet it is lawful to intensify punishments, if that course is urged by a livelier regard for the entire people of a state, whose security is to be guaranteed by the death of criminals. So, for instance, if a great danger threatens from the malefactor, unless he be suppressed at once. Here belongs a story given by Henri Estienne, Apology for Herodotus, chap. xvii, of a certain man in France, who threw the blame upon the king when the latter had denied him his petition for pardon for his seventh murder: He himself, he said, had committed only one murder; the rest should be charged to the king, since he would never have committed the others had not the king pardoned the first.

¹ [Pufendorf generalizes a specific statement.—Tr.]

² [For am armatus read armatus.—Tr.]

Sometimes also an example must be made of one offender so that the rest may be struck with terror¹, especially when the general incitements to sin are present, the chief of which are facility and habit, and can be restrained only by harsh measures. It was because of facility that the Hebrew law laid a heavier punishment on theft from a field than from a house. Compare Exodus, xxii. 1 with 7 and 9; Digest, XLVII. xviii. 2. Justin, Bk. II, chap. ii, says of the Scythians: "They considered no offence more serious than theft. For among a people which had no barns or defence for its flocks and herds, what could be safe, if theft were allowed?" Therefore, in the laws of some nations robbery by a native of the country is considered more heinous than by a foreigner, although the laws of Rome apparently took just the opposite stand. Digest, XLVIII. xix. 11, § 1; XLVII. ii. 17, 36, § 1; XLVII. ii. 52, 89. See Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, I. iii. 2 and 3 on Digest, XLVII. Add Aristotle, Problems, chap. xxix, § 14, where he discusses the question why one who steals from the baths, or the palaestrae, or the market-place, or some similar spot is put to death, while one who steals from a private dwelling gets off by paying back twofold. See Digest, XLVII. xvii. 1, with the remarks on that law in Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, VIII. i and ii on Digest, XLVII. Add also the comments made by Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws, to magnify the crime of sorcery. Here applies what is given by Curtius, Bk. IV, chap. vi [5 f.], on the custom of the Persians:

It is a moral habit of the Persians to keep with illustrious fidelity the secrets of the king; neither fear nor hope can extort a word tending to discovery; for the venerable institutes of that monarchy fortify silence by the penalty of death. The Persians punish intemperance of the tongue more severely than any other delinquency; nor can they esteem a man qualified for great employments who feels any difficulty in conforming to enjoined taciturnity, a duty which nature has rendered easy. (A.)

825

And although an accustomed deed or some vice that has grown, as it were, into the public customs (for I have already spoken of the habit which individual men form by repeatedly sinning) detracts somewhat from guilt, it still demands in part the severity of punishment. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [liv]: 'When the mind has become corrupt and the breeder of corruption, its distempered and fevered condition can only be assuaged by remedies as potent as the passions which have enflamed it.' (R.) Digest, XLVIII. xix. 16, 10. Claudian, Against Eutropius, Bk. I [II. 11 f.]:

¹ [For tertor read terror.—Tr.]

When the body is overwhelmed with long-standing disease 'tis all in vain that thou makest use of healing medicines. When an ulcer has penetrated to the marrow of the bones the touch of a hand is useless, steel and fire must save the place that the wound heal not on the surface, like any moment to re-open. The flame must penetrate to the quick to make a way for the humours to escape; in order that, once the veins are emptied of corrupted blood, the fountain-head of the evil may be dried up. Nay, even limbs are amputated to assure the healthy life of the rest of the body. (P.)

Therefore, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 35, carefully notes that in trials a general habit of sinning has some effect in diminishing the heinousness of an offence, since judges¹ should always take into consideration the amount of guilt in the individual, which is unquestionably less when he has been carried along in the stream of those who commit such deeds. But when laws are to be passed, the result of a deep-rooted custom is that the penalty which aims to abolish it is made all the more severe, because laws look more at the advantage of a punishment as it affects everyone. Nevertheless, when a vice has become so deep-seated that the multitude of the offenders leaves no place to exact punishment, unless one is willing to weaken or overthrow the state by wholesome executions, the necessity of the commonwealth requires that the law suffer rather than the state. See the letter of Tiberius on luxury in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III. That is, as Plutarch, Solon [xxi], says: 'A law must regard the possibilities in the case, if its maker wishes to punish a few to some purpose, and not many to no purpose.' (R.)

Finally, if the necessity of the commonwealth requires it, as at the menace of war, and there be none others able to defend her, who would hesitate to remit the death sentence hanging over the head of an able general, since the commonwealth is unable for the time to do without his services? An illustration is found in the famous saying of Fabricius, when he was casting his vote for Cornelius Rufinus as consul, an able leader but an avaricious man: 'He would rather be robbed than sold.' [Gellius, IV. viii.] After the disaster at Cannae the dictator Junius made the proclamation: '[. . .] Of such persons as had been guilty of capital crimes or were in prison on judgement of debt, those who would serve as soldiers with him, he would order to be released from their liability to punishment and their debts.' (S.) Livy, Bk. XXIX, chap. xiv [XXIII. xiv]. Add Grotius, on 1 Kings, ii. 6.

¹ [For iudiciis read iudicibus.—Tr.]

24. Now it is clear, I should think, from what has been said, that there is no vindicative justice in a civil court which enjoins that a certain measure of punishment in a definite nature be meted out to certain crimes, but that the true measure of punishments is the welfare of the state, and they are to be required with greater or less rigour at the discretion of the supreme sovereignty, as it appears that their ends can be most conveniently attained, all this, however, understanding a great latitude in such discretion. Therefore, a punishment will be greater than justice requires when the ends of punishments could have been secured by some less rigorous course, and milder than such requirement when it is lacking in the severity capable of securing those ends, and so of restraining the evil propensities of citizens, and of procuring the inner security of the state, or is such as is despised by the offenders. See Gellius, Bk. XX, chap. i, on the wilful conduct of L. Veratius. When a legislator has sinned the one way, he cannot escape the charge of cruelty (see Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 11), and when he leans the other way he renders punishments useless, and leaves an open field, as it were, for the vices. For since the threat of punishments should turn a man's will from a love for sin to obedience to the law, and yet, since in their deliberations men regularly weigh as in a balance the advantages and disadvantages which accrue from the same thing, it is readily seen 826 that when the advantages or delights connected with any vice surpass the loss and pain consequent upon punishment, the latter is by no means sufficient to divert a man's mind from vices. Add Hobbes, loc. cit., chap. xiii, § 16, and Leviathan, chap. xxvii; the author of De Principiis Justitiae et Decori [Velthuysen], p. 200; Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v, § 39.

25. It should also be added that, since not all people are affected alike by the same punishment, and consequently not equally deterred from sinning, it is easy to see that in the general application of punishments as well as in their application to individual cases, regard should be had to the person of the sinner and to those qualities which may, on account of age, sex, status, wealth, strength, and the like, increase or decrease the sense of punishment. See Digest, XLVII. ix. 4, § 1; XLVII. ix. 12, § 1; XLVII. x. 45; XLVII. xi. 6; XLVII. xii. 11; XLVII. xiv. 1, § 3; XLVII. xxi. 2; XLVIII. viii. 3, § 5; XLVIII. viii. 16; XLVIII. xix. 1, 10, 16, § 3; XLVIII. xix. 28, § 16; XLVII. xvii. 1; XLVII. xviii. 1, §§ 1, 2; XLVII. xx. 3, § 2; XLVIII. viii. 1, § 5. For the same fine will be a burden to a poor man, but not to a rich, and a punishment with infamy will rest lightly upon a common man, but be a serious humiliation to one of high station. Moreover¹, a man and a person of mature years can bear a punishment more readily than women or children. See Digest, XLVIII. v. 38, § 24; XLVIII. v. 39, § 4; XLVIII. xiii. 6; Code, IX. viii¹, § 3. Digest, IV. iv. 37, § 1; L. xvii. 108. Add also Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. III, chap. vi, on the fine imposed by the Russians for contumely, which they call Biszestia². Yet at the present time the Moroccans punish women for loose conduct more severely than men, since they hold that the former for the most part offer the occasion and the invitation to lust. Still it does not follow from this that a geometric proportion may be followed in imposing punishments, or a harmonic proportion, as Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. VI, the last chapter, proposes. What is necessary is only a simple equation between the crime and the punishment, the discovery of which is not a little aided by the condition of the individual. But if for qualities, which, although equal in merit, have no bearing upon a crime or upon any sense of punishment, unequal punishments are inflicted, that is vicious προσωποληψία [respect of persons] of which Grotius does not always clear the Roman laws. Some find an illustration of that in Digest, XLVIII. viii. 1, § 5, where the husband who has killed his wife, when taken in adultery, is sentenced to perpetual exile if he be of the common sort, but is exiled only for a time if a man of some position. For the disgrace attaching to such a wife can be felt as much by a common man as by one of high position, and the loss of country is as grievous to the former as to the latter. See also Edict of Theodoric, chap. xci; add Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 33.

¹ [For Ex read Et.—Tr.]

We may note, in conclusion, that among certain nations a special ignominy attaches to a certain kind of punishment. Euripides, Helena [299 ff.]:

Unseemly is the noose 'twixt earth and heaven:
Even of thralls 'tis held a death of shame.
Noble the dagger is and honourable. (W.)

Pliny, Natural History, Bk. II, chap. lxiii: 'The uncanny punishment of the halter which stops the breath that is seeking to escape.' Add Digest, XLVIII. xix. 28, § 2. The statement of Dio Chrysostom, Oration to the Alexandrians [xxxii. 49], may be applied here: 'For one³ is the death of a criminal, the other⁴ of a wretched slave.' (M.) In Homer, Odyssey, Bk. XXII [462 ff.]. Telemachus refuses to slay the worthless handmaids 'by a clean death', that is, by the sword, but has them hanged, although on the other hand strangling is the regular method of execution in the Osmanli family, because they hold it wrong to wet the 827 earth with such noble blood. The Hebrews also considered it more disgraceful to be beheaded than to be strangled or stoned to death. Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VII, chap. vi. Thus Philo

¹ [For § read v.—Tr.]

³ [For illa read illa.—Tr.]

² [Properly now bezchestie, 'dishonour'.—Tr.]

⁴ [For hic read haec.—Tr.]

Judaëus, Against Flaccus, expresses his anger because Jewish magistrates and senators of Alexandria¹ were scourged in the same manner as the fellahin of Egypt. Here belongs the statement of Seneca, On the Steadfastness of the Wise Man, chap. iv: 'You will find a slave who prefers to be flogged to being slapped.' (S.*) And I suppose it is a very ignominious punishment which is mentioned in Law of the Burgundians, tit. X, Additamentum, 1. On the other hand a certain degree of honour is held to reside in some punishments. An illustration of this is found in the indignation which stirred the Athenians that Hyperbolus, a man of the very dregs of Athens, should be banished by ostracism. See Plutarch, Alcibiades [xiii], where the following lines are cited from the comic poet Plato:

And yet he suffered worthy fate for men of old;
A fate unworthy though of him and of his brands.
For such as he the ostrakon was ne'er devised. (P.)

And the same writer in his Nicias [xi] speaks of the same occurrence:

They thought that even chastisement had its dignity, or rather, they regarded the ostracism as a chastisement in the cases of Thucydides and Aristides and such men, but in the case of Hyperbolus as an honour, and as good ground for boasting on his part, since for his baseness he had met with the same fate as the best men. (P.)

Thus there is comfort in the thought that 'twas by the hand of great Aeneas that you fell'. (B.) Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. X [830], and the comments of de la Cerda.

26. And we see no reason or necessity for every nation to impose on crimes the same punishment that is found in the Hebrew law, and this because that part of their law is the positive and civil law of the Hebrews, tempered to the genius of that people and commonwealth. And since from this the genius of other peoples, and the nature and order of their states differ in many points, it would be but reasonable for their punishments also to be fixed on another principle. But whether this rule should be applied also to capital punishment may well be questioned, since, as it appears, that punishment was laid down not for the Jewish people alone but for all mankind. And its reason is patent to every one: For when a man is so evil-minded that he shows no scruple at killing men by deliberate purpose, other men will never be safe from him until they have put him out of existence. This sentiment is strengthened by the statement of Antiphon, Orations, xv [v. 11]: 'All courts try murder cases under the open sky, and this for no other reason than partly that the judges may not enter the same room with men of unclean hands, and partly that the prosecutor may not be under the same roof with the murderer.' Add Libanius, Progymnasmata, the standard passage against murder. Nevertheless if a homicide is not given the death sentence because of the condition of the commonwealth, it will not be a direct contravention of the command of Genesis, ix. 6. For since the determination of all punishments belongs to positive law, which may properly be suited to the necessities of the commonwealth, the same exception may justly be understood to lie in that law. Compare Grotius on Matthew, v. 40, and on Genesis, loc. cit. Although some say that this verse contains not so much a divine law as a threat, whereby God announces that He will wreak vengeance upon murderers, either by the hands of men or by other horrible means, if in any way they have escaped the rigour of a human court. See Acts, xxviii. 4. Nor does the explanation offered by Grotius, Bk. I, chap. ii, § 5, reject the exception to be found in the condition of the commonwealth. Add the same author's remarks in Florum Sparsio, on Digest, XLVIII. viii. Selden, Bk. IV, chap. i, expressly states that this verse was not taken by the Hebrew teachers as a formal law whereby death must necessarily be the penalty for every case of murder, but as the express indication of God's hatred of that crime in His designating the most severe punishment for it, which mankind might limit or inflict in accordance with each case, and with the differences in the administration of the state. For this reason the Hebrews did not inflict the death penalty upon any of their faith who had killed a proselyte of the gate, or any other 828 Gentile. Even when a number of Hebrews, or other circumcised persons, had killed one of their nation by blows or kicks, in such a way that no single one had contributed enough to have caused his death, they were all free from any judicial sentence or murder, since no one of them was personally a murderer. See Selden, loc. cit., for further details. And yet I should be unwilling to suggest that this punishment be forborne too freely. Nor would I lightly approve the implication of the clause in a constitution of the kings of Poland on the punishment of murder among the nobility, which runs: 'We, moderating the rigour of divine law.' Add Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws.

¹ [For Alexandriæ read Alexandriæ.—Tr.]

In this connexion we should touch on the question, so painstakingly discussed by many writers, of the death sentence for robbery. On the whole subject see the opinion of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 14. Yet Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VII, chap. vi, says that the Jews punished with death robbers among the so-called Sons of Noah, or Gentiles, but were more lenient to their own race. Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. XVI, chap. i, condemns as too harsh the law of Herod, that thieves who dug through walls and stole by night should be sold out of the kingdom into slavery to foreigners. In Athens it was a law of Solon's that for simple theft the payment should be twofold, if the article was recovered, and tenfold if not recovered, although it was added:

If a man filched a cloak or an oil-cruet or the most trifling article from the Lyceum or the Academy or the Cynosarges¹, or any of the utensils from the gymnasia or the ports,

¹ [For Cynosargae read Cynosarge.—Tr.]

above the value of ten drachmas, he enacted that such a person should be punished with death. (K.) [Demosthenes, Against Timocrates, 114.]

Add Aristotle, Problems, chap. xxix, § 14. What the Roman law held on the subject is known to every one. Nay, Justinian, Novels, cxxxiv, last chapter, even forbade that a common thief be mutilated, although otherwise it would not seem inappropriate for a man to be punished in that part of the body with which he had committed the wrong. Alexander Severus ordered that a secretary who had drawn up a false petition and presented it before the emperor's council, should have the tendons of his fingers severed so that he could never write again. Lampridius, Alexander [xxviii]. Zaleucus¹ [Valerius Maximus, VI. v. ext. 3] made a law that an adulterer should lose his eye, because it is the eyes which first lust after married women, and to have once looked upon them is a great incentive to forbidden pleasure. So also the law of God commands that if a woman in bringing aid to her husband in a quarrel seizes his adversary by the privates her hand shall be cut off. [Deut. xxv. 11 f.] Vulcatius Gallicanus [vi] tells that Avidius Cassius cut the sinews in the upper and lower legs of many deserters. Add Cujas, Observations, Bk. VII, chap. xiii. The real reason for the law of Justinian is well explained by Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, I. ii, on Digest, XLVII: Since most cases of robbery are due to laziness or poverty, he did not want thieves punished by the loss of their hands, so that they would not lose the instruments necessary for the relief of their evil condition, because a more appropriate thing would be to put them to some labour. In Germany Frederick II issued a law that thieves be hanged (L. 2. F. tit. de pace tenenda), and after him Charles V, in his Constitutio Criminalis [Art. 160], although the latter may appear to have been more severe than Frederick because he took no account of the depreciation of the currency. And yet we must confess that some judges are too free in using the noose, and that it is sometimes better for the state to condemn thieves to labour (see Herodotus, Bk. II [cxxxvii], and Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxv, on Sabaco, king of Egypt, who set all who were condemned to capital punishment at work, through whose labour he greatly improved his country; also Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. I), although we are fully persuaded that capital punishment can properly be inflicted upon thieves. From what has so far been presented it is not difficult to devise an answer to the reasons offered in opposition, especially by Ant. Matthaeus, loc. cit.

27. Neither is it necessary, finally, that a man suffer exactly what he has done to another, that is, that crimes be always punished by talion, which was the opinion commonly attributed to the Pythagoreans, who defined punishment by the term ἀντιπεπονθός, that is to say, a 'corresponding hurt'. This end of punishment is confirmed

¹ [For Saleucus read Zaleucus.—Tr.]

829 by the saying attributed to Rhadamanthus: 'If a man should suffer what he has inflicted then would fitting justice be done.' [Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, V. viii.] Ovid, Art of Love, Bk. I [655-6]: 'No law is there more righteous than that the contrivers of death should perish by their own contrivances.' (R.) Quintilian, Declamations, xi [5]: 'Tis the shortest way of doing vindictive justice when the offence and punishment are commensurate. And if you will consider the nature of a compensation, a man is best avenged in the same way and method he was wronged.' (W.) M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. V, Pref. [X. vi]: 'By a very just shift in punishment a man often expiates in his own case the penalty which he had designed for another.' Polybius, Bk. XII, in Excerpta Peiresciana [xi. 4]: 'Himself a most bitter and implacable critic of others, he can but expect to meet with implacable criticism at the hands of others.' (P.) Yet Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. viii, proves the absurdity of the Pythagorean theory of the ἀντιπεπονθός [corresponding hurt], in this fashion: 'If a person who strikes another is a magistrate, he ought not to be struck in turn, and if a person strikes a magistrate, he ought not only to be struck but to be punished.' (W.) Add Idem, Magna Moralia, Bk. II, chap. xxxiv. On the laws of Exodus, xxi. 23; Leviticus, xxiv. 50, the Hebrew doctors unite in saying that no strict retaliation was taught, but that such hurts could even be redeemed by a fine. See Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. VI, last chapter, who denies that there was ever in use such a law, for instance, that whoever broke another's leg should have his own broken. He adds that there should be no idle arguing over the formula, 'An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth', since such a proverbial expression, as it were, only means that punishments should be in proportion to crimes; that we should not scourge one who deserves no more than a whipping, or give no more than a whipping or severe reprimand to one who should feel the axe. He infers this from the fact that the divine law does not punish theft with theft, adultery with adultery, or wound with wound, but theft by a two or fourfold payment, adultery by death, a wound by a fine; and from the further fact that the divine law also had respect to persons, for instance, if a man cursed a private person, no heavy penalty is required of him, but if a man cursed a prince, or a son his father, it was a capital offence. On the other hand Constantine l'Empereur, Baba Kama, chap. viii, § 1, defends the literal interpretation of those words. It is not our task to settle these disputes. But it is at least generally agreed that the judge was empowered under certain circumstances to transmute a corporal punishment of retaliation into a fine, by virtue of the law of Exodus, xxi. 29-30, which allows the alternative of a more weighty punishment. Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. IV, chap. viii [35]:

He that maimeth any one, let him undergo the like himself, and be deprived of the same member of which he hath deprived the other, unless he that is maimed will accept of money instead of it, for the law makes the sufferer the judge of the value of what he has suffered, and permits him to estimate it. (W.)

A defence of the law of retaliation is found by some in Deuteronomy, xix. 19. Compare Code, IX. ii. 17; IX. xlv. 10; IX. xii. 7. Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. IV, chap. viii [34]: 'Let no one of the Israelites keep any poison that may cause death.' (A law of the Egyptians, exactly like this, is given by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvii.) 'But if he be caught with it, let him be put to death, and suffer the very same mischief that he would have brought upon them for whom the poison was prepared.' (W.) But it can be replied that these laws of Deuteronomy cannot properly be brought into the case, since the punishment there set forth for defaming another exceeds the measure of retaliation, by returning a completed act for an attempt; although in general the punishment is not unjust, for as Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. ix [XII. ix. 9], says: 'For an evil speaker differs from an evil doer only in opportunity' (W.); and again, Declamations, cccxxxi: 'It (looks like) a sort of murder to make an attempt upon the life of any man who does not deserve to be killed.' And Pliny, Panegyric [xxxv. 3], is justified in his judgement on calumniators: 'Let them expect punishments as great as their expected reward, that their hopes may be no greater than their fears, and that they may fear as much as they were feared.' Thus the divine law passed the same judgement on him who defamed a virgin and him who used violence. Deuteronomy, xxii. 19, 29. Isocrates, De Permutatione [18]:

What can be more maleficent than calumny? It causes us to think well of liars, to regard the innocent as evildoers, and judges to be false to their oath. In a word, it extinguishes the light of truth, involves all who listen to it in a mist of error, and puts citizens without discrimination unjustly to death. 830

Quintilian, Declamations, xi. 6:

The villainy of false accusers can do no harm but by and through the judges' act. Good night to all human safety, if lies may be so bald with your accusation; nor was there ever any innocent yet so happy as to be able to baffle the diligence of knights o' th' post. (W.)

Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. II, chap. xiv. A law of the Twelve Tables [VIII. ii. Bruns] runs: 'If physical injury be done some part of the body, unless the matter is settled out of court, let the same injury be inflicted on the assailant'; on which one should by all means read the argument of Favorinus and the Jurisconsult Sextus Caecilius, in Gellius, Bk. XX, chap. i. But it is clear from Institutes, IV. iv, § 7, that the law of retaliation had fallen into utter disuse at Rome. Add Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, IV. ii. 2 and 3, on Digest, XLVII. We find in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. xvii, the following law of Charondas as passed by the Thurians¹:

¹ [For Turios read Thurios.—Tr.]

He who struck out the eye of another, should have his own eye plucked out. It happened that one who had only one eye (by the injury of the other) lost that also, so that he was altogether blind. In this case, although the offender was to lose his eye for the injury done to the other, yet the punishment was not thought equivalent to the nature of the offence; for he who made his fellow citizen wholly blind, although (by the loss of) one of his eyes he satisfied the letter of the law, yet the loss and prejudice was not equal; and therefore it was conceived to be most equitable and just, that he who deprived another of his sight wholly, should lose both his eyes, if the punishment were proportional to the offence. The blind man therefore, moved and heated with the pain and indignity of the thing, complained to the people of his sad condition, and made his address to them for the amendment of the law. At length, having the rope about his neck, he prevailed and the law was abolished, and another made more effectual in its place, and so he escaped hanging. (B.*)

The same law is mentioned by Demosthenes, Against Timocrates [139 ff.]. Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. I, chap. vii [41]: 'Blinding a one-eyed man inflicts worse injury than half-blinding a man with two eyes.' (R.) Add Petrus Gregorius Tholosanus, Syntagma, Bk. XXXI, chap. x.¹

However this may be, it is certain that a law of talion so crudely understood as this, is not a just measure of all punishments. Because, in the first place, it is certainly not applicable to most crimes. For how could it be applied to such crimes, for instance, as adultery, rape, copulation with beasts, laesa maiestas, reviling, calumny, sorcery, falsification, imposing of false children, abortion, kidnapping, bribery, incest, sacrilege, the moving of landmarks, violation of tombs, trickery, falsehood, and the like? All of which, by the way, makes it clear that the emperor Theodosius was justified in doing away with the punishment of women taken in adultery, then in use in Rome, whereby they were forced to enter a house of prostitution and to play the whore, while a bell was rung whenever they were suffering that disgrace. For although so great ignominy may serve for the most severe punishment, yet it appeared to increase rather than remove the offence, since such a punishment could not be inflicted without further sin. Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. V, chap. xix. And yet we confess that the actual laws which appear to sanction retaliation apply it only to physical injuries or hurts.

In the second place, even if we imagine a case where the crime that has been committed can serve as a punishment, and where neither the persons, place, time, quality, nor cause increase or aggravate the crime, yet not even under such happy conditions will simple retaliation be of sufficient worth. Suppose one rustic has given another a blow in some private part. If the other must return the blow, how will he be able to keep it within fair bounds? Add Law of the Visigoths, Bk. VI, tit. iv, chap. 3. But if a third party is to give the blow, how will he be able to know how heavy the first was? Furthermore, in the case of drawn between what is done accidentally and what is done maliciously, or if no distinctions of persons were observed. For instance, in case a man intends to give another a cuff and entirely without purpose puts out his eye with the set of a ring on his hand, it would surely go too hard with him if his eye were in turn put out. Again, if a gentleman should strike a porter, it would be too severe a punishment for him to be returned the blow, which is an insult to one of his position, but not to a porter. Finally, retaliation in most offences appears too light a punishment. And this is especially true by reason of a disparity in the persons who wrought or suffered the injury, or in the place, the time, and other circumstances.

831 many crimes retaliation would be too severe, if no distinction were

¹ [For a. read c.—Tr.]

In general that crudely conceived theory of retaliation is overthrown by the arguments of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 32, where he justly denies that a man who injures another deliberately, and without grounds which greatly mitigate his guilt, should get off with just as much injury as he has done and no more. Add Revelation, xvii. 6. For it is repugnant to equity that the injurer suffer no more than the injured, nor is the security of men sufficiently provided for if scoundrels stand under no greater fear of the laws than honest men do of their knavery, since there lies before them the hope of concealment, flight, or escape from the severity of the law, in some manner or other, as a kind of additional expectation of gain. And what shall we say of the fact that sometimes the most holy laws of God ordain the same punishment for attempted as for completed crimes? See Deuteronomy, xix. 19; Exodus, xxii. 9; Edict of Theodoric, chaps. xiii and l. A law of the people of India, found in Strabo, Bk. XV [i. 54], deserves mention: 'Whoever maims any one else, experiences not merely talion himself, but in addition has his hand cut off. But if any one destroys the hand or eye of an artisan, he is punished with death.' By a law of Solon, preserved in Diogenes Laertius, Solon [I. lvii], whoever had put out another's eye should lose both of his. Thus whoever 'went armed with the intention of killing a man' was reached by the law of Digest, XLVIII. viii. 1. And although the consequence of this be that the punishment should be greater to correspond with accomplished crimes, yet since with mankind there is no greater punishment than death, which cannot be repeated, punishment must needs stop with that, although tortures may sometimes be added as the crime demands, or such ignominy as may precede or follow death.

28. We should also add, in this connexion, some remarks upon the punishments which are commonly required by human justice¹ for a crime committed by another. Yet in such cases there is no question but those who actually share in the guilt of the misdemeanour can be punished in proportion to their contribution to any villainy, since they would be paying not for another's crime but for their own. Now what persons can participate in another's crime, and how they may do so, has been shown above [I. v. 14]. Add Jacques Godefroy's discourse on Code, IX. viii. 5, §§ 9, 10. But it should be noted that this distinction is observed between a restitution of damage and a punishment, namely, that it is usually easier for a human court to make one pay for the loss than to bear a punishment along with it, since imprudence or minor guilt can more easily beg off from punishment than from making good the loss. There is a memorable law of Thomas Randolph, Regent¹ of Scotland, in Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. IX:

¹ [For forro read foro.—Tr.]

In order to stop the robberies, still so common because of the war, he passed a law that farmers should leave their agricultural implements in the fields, and should not lock their houses or out-buildings at night. They should require compensation for any loss they might suffer from the justices, who in turn should require it of the king, while he would reimburse himself from the property of the robbers whom he apprehended.

Regarding crimes of corporations it should be observed, that, although decisions to which the majority agrees are regularly held 832 to be those of the whole body, so that even the minority is required to agree to and execute them (see Polybius, Bk. V, chap. xlix; Pliny, Letters, Bk. VI, ep. xiii: 'When a question is under debate², each member is at liberty to have his own opinion; but once settled by the majority, it should be the common concern of each to support it.' (B.*)), still in any case arising out of some guilt attaching to such decisions, only those who gave their consent to the act are to be held liable, while he who both dissented at the outset and consistently maintained his position, will be judged innocent. See Luke, xxiii. 51. Therefore, when Alexander took Thebes and sold all the inhabitants into slavery, he excepted those who had opposed the decision to break away from Macedon. Plutarch, Alexander [xi]. Nay, it is customary to excuse, at least from the full penalty, such as at first dissented, although they afterwards yield to the will of the majority and give their entire support to the prosecution of the offending decision. Thus it is said that the Greeks spared Antenor and Aeneas, who had favoured restoring Helen, although the latter afterwards performed notable deeds of arms for his country.

We should also observe that a corporate body, as such, is punished differently from individuals. The punishment of individuals is sometimes death, which in the case of a corporation is accomplished by dissolving the body. Add Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. I, tit. xlvii. So also, as Modestinus has said in Digest, VII. iv. 21, when a state no longer exists, all the usufructs from it cease. Sometimes individuals suffer slavery as punishment, and the same is the lot of a body when it loses its former position of dependence upon the state alone, and is subjected to some other similarly subordinate body or citizen.

¹ [For protégis read proregis.—Tr.]

² [For integrare read integra re.—Tr.]

Finally, individuals are also punished by the confiscation of their property. So for the crimes of a state that body is also deprived of public holdings such as forts, naval bases, ships of war, arms, treasure, public¹ lands, and privileges. Theodosius punished the public offence of the people of Antioch, who had cast down the statues of the emperor in the forum when new taxes were laid upon them, by forbidding them the use of the theatre, and the baths, and depriving the city of the name it had formerly² borne of 'metropolis'. Libanius, Orations, xiii. The emperor Marcus Aurelius had also taken from the same people the shows and other³ ornaments of their state, but had later returned them. Vulcatius Gallicanus, Life of Avidius Cassius [ix]. Thus Severus almost entirely destroyed Byzantium, taking away the enjoyment of the theatre, the baths, and every dignity and honour, reduced it to the rank of a village, and handed it over to the Perinthians. Herodian, Bk. III, chap. vi. The emperor Constantius, as a punishment to the people of Constantinople for having slain his general Hermogenes, deprived them of their usual dole of grain. Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. II, chap. x. Although it is reasonable in the crimes of a multitude to punish principally its ring-leaders. See Livy, Bk. XXVIII, chap. xxvi, at the beginning. And so the following principles set forth by Quintilian, Declamations, xi [7], are of considerable value in estimating the offences as well as the punishments of corporate bodies:

What the generality of a city does, proceeds from the ascendancy that seducing orators have over them; whatever the commonalty does, they are never angry, but according as they are exasperated. Thus our bodies receive no motion but from our spirit, and our limbs lie quiet till our minds use them. There is nothing more easy than to work the common people to any passion whatsoever. When we meet together in our assemblies, nobody brings his own private thoughts, his private sentiments, private persuasion or reason along with him. Nor has any convention the wisdom or humour of single persons; whether it be that the public interest doth not enter so much into us; or else, because a man is more negligent when he thinks he is not to give a reason alone; and therefore when many are gathered together, we vote things in confidence of the whole. (W.*)

Cicero, For Cluentius [xlvi]: 'Our ancestors established a rule, that, if in military affairs a crime had been committed by a number of soldiers, a few should be punished by lot, that so fear might have its influence on all, while the punishment reached only a few.' (Y.) Tacitus, Annals, Bk. I [xliv], advises in the case of soldiers: 'Punish the guilty, forgive those who had been led astray.' (R.*) Add Polybius, Bk. XI, chap. xxvii, at the end, and in Selections on Embassies, XXVIII, chap. iv; Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. III, chap. vii, p. 527 ff.; Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, XVIII. iv. 30, on Digest, XLVIII; Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. I, last title.

¹ [For publici read publici.—Tr.]

³ [For alia read alia.—Tr.]

² [For antena read antea.—Tr.]

833 29. In this connexion the question arises as to whether a punishment should be required in every instance of evil practice by a corporate body; in case, for instance, the offence was publicly committed two or three generations before that time. Whoever would affirm this might use the argument that, during the life of the body, it remains the same, even though its individual members may change as they succeed one another. The lines of Plutarch, De Sera Numinis Vindicta [xv], bear on this position:

For a city is a kind of entire thing and continued body, a certain sort of creature, never subject to the changes and alterations of age, nor varying through process of time from one to another, but always sympathizing and in unity with itself, and receiving the punishment or reward which makes it a body and binds it together with the mutual bands of human benefit, preserves its unity. [...] <In the same manner does a city still remain the same;>¹ and for that reason we think it but justice, that a city should as well be obnoxious to the blame and reproach of its ancient inhabitants, as participate in the glory of their former puissance and renown. (G.)

But the question is to be answered in the negative, if it is a case of human punishment. For it is not necessary even with individual men to punish old faults so much as those which are recent and still, as it were, offensive. Therefore, there is good reason in what the Roman Law sets forth concerning exceptions of crimes. See Anton. Matthæus, De Criminibus, XVIII. iv. 30, on Digest, XLVIII. Furthermore, it should be carefully observed that certain things primarily and in themselves can be predicated of a corporate body that cannot of its individual members, such as having a treasury, laws, rights, and privileges. And again some things belong to a body only as derived from its individual members: That is, they first of all inhere in the individuals, and afterwards distinguish and describe the body. Thus we speak of an association² as learned, active, restrained, moral, or immoral, &c., the majority of whose members are likewise learned, active, restrained, moral, or immoral, although that does not prevent it from having some members who are ignorant, sluggish, or reckless. It is for this reason, also, that we say that a body merits punishment, for merit belongs to its members as endowed with reason, and as able to act with full knowledge and power. But a body as such and in so far as it is conceived of as something distinct from its members, has no mind or faculty by which it can perform acts primarily and immediately capable of merit, and which are entirely distinct from the acts of individuals. The consequence of this is, that, if those citizens through whose services a state gathered merit are dead, and it has not been continued by any act of their successors, the merit also is dead and with it the ability to receive punishment, which cannot lawfully be inflicted without a corresponding merit. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxi, § 8.

¹ [Not in Pufendorf.—Tr.]

² [For societatem read societatem.—Tr.]

Plutarch, indeed, in the passage just cited, finds an example of the justice of God in the record that the sins of fathers are sometimes¹ visited upon their children. But it is not permissible in every instance to argue about human justice from the process of God's tribunal. In the same way it does not follow, that, if it is just for children to receive rewards and honours for the merits of their father, it is also just for the same to be punished for their sins; because such is the nature of a kindness that it can be conferred upon a man who neither deserves it nor pays for it, while that is not true of a punishment. And Justin, Bk. XXVIII, chap. i, tells how the Romans felt they were justified in calling upon an old obligation, when they gave as their reason for undertaking the defence of the Acarnanians against the Aetolians, that the former were the only ones who in the old days did not send aid to the Greeks against the Trojans, the ancestors of the Romans. The same account is given by Strabo, Bk. X [ii. 25, p. 463]. And yet men of judgement can easily see that this was feigned, so that the Romans could have at least some sort of excuse for mixing in matters which were no concern of theirs. It is a ridiculous sentiment which we find expressed by Mahomet II to Pope Pius II, namely, that he was surprised to see the Italians join a league against him, since he also traced his line back to their common ancestors, the Trojans, and since they were both equally concerned in wreaking vengeance for the death of Hector upon the Greeks, whom the Italians were at that time supporting against him. Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. II, chap. xxxvi. 834

30. But in general it remains fixed, that one may not rightly be punished in a human court for another's crime in which he in no way participated. But since all around us we often see the crimes of some serving as the occasion for others to come to grief, we must observe, in the first place, so that no one may fall into error, that not everything that causes a man trouble or loss can be regarded as a punishment. Whoever has had his property confiscated for a misdeed, and been reduced to want, suffers a punishment, but how many men come into this world with no inheritance beyond that of a physical body! How many lose all their worldly possessions by fire, shipwreck, or the attack of enemies! And yet their poverty is not a human² punishment, but an evil of fate, or, as others would call it, a turn of fortune. Therefore, if, for example, subjects experience evils because of the waywardness of their prince, they should look upon them as upon other inconveniences which attend the life of all men, such as bodily weakness, infirmities of age, inclement weather, sterility, and the like.

31. In the next place we should recognize that a loss directly inflicted is one thing, while one which results as a consequence of something else, is quite another. It is the former when something is taken from a man to which he has a right in the proper sense of the term; it is called the latter when that condition is interfered with, without which he could not enjoy his right. An instance of this last is in Digest, XXXIX. ii. 24, § 12; XXXIX. ii. 26; XXXV. ii. 63. Thus when the goods of their parents are confiscated, of course the children also feel some loss therefrom, but this is not properly a punishment with respect to the children, because that property would not have been theirs had their parents not held it until their death; and so the confiscation only interferes with the condition without which no right, in the proper sense, to the property of their parents would have belonged to the children. See Digest, XLVIII. xxii. 3. Yet the law of Mogald, king of Scotland, 'That the property of criminals should be confiscated and that their children and wives should be admitted to no share in it', is rightly called unjust and inhuman by Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. IV. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxi, § 10.

¹ [For aliquando read aliquando.—Tr.]

² [For humana read humana.—Tr.]

32. Finally, it should also be observed that occasionally some evil is imposed upon one party, or some good taken from him, by the occasion of the crime of a second, or because the latter has not satisfied his obligation, and yet that sin, or failure to meet an obligation, is not the proper and immediate cause for the former suffering an evil, nor does a third party acquire directly a right from that sin whereby he can justly punish the first for that evil. Thus sureties often suffer some loss because the debtor on whose behalf they intervened, breaks his pledge. But the immediate cause of the obligation whereby a surety¹ is obligated to pay² another's debt, is his own promise. For just as he who acts as surety for a buyer is properly not obligated by the thing bought,³ but by his promise, so whoever acts as surety for a malefactor is properly obligated not by the other's offence but by his own act of promising. It follows from this, that, when the surety must suffer some loss or evil, it should be measured not by the crime⁴ of the other, but by the power which he himself had in making the promise. And so when the guilty party has vanished, and the payment of the bail falls upon the surety, no concern should be given to the consideration of how much evil could rightfully have been meted out to the criminal, but how much the surety could obligate himself, by his mere promise, to bear for another. It can also be gathered from this how far bail should be granted in capital offences: Only to the extent that a bondsman may 835 good the damage he has done, or guarantee to produce the defendant, this being done in order that the man, already made prisoner, may be freed from the hardship of a jail, and not be forced to plead his cause in chains, or that sentence be not passed upon him as though he were

¹ [For fidejussor read fidejussor.—Tr.]

³ [For exemptio read ex emptio.—Tr.]

² [For luere read luere.—Tr.]

⁴ [For delicte read delicto.—Tr.]

convicted, while he is absent and undefended. But no bondsman can obligate himself to suffer death for a criminal, since a man has not so much power over his own life nor does the process of human justice allow the requirement of such a penalty. Because punishment is inflicted for a crime with the purpose of restraining the wickedness of men; and yet neither has the surety himself been guilty of wrongdoing, nor did he by going bail draw upon himself the guilt of the crime. For it is no crime in him to wish that the defendant plead his cause in a fairer place, or be more at ease until sentence is passed upon him, or to promise that he will pay the fine laid upon the defendant in whatever manner and to whatever amount the magistrate may determine, in view of the fact that the power to inflict a punishment has been lost by the flight of the defendant. Nor will the end of human punishment be obtained by the punishment of the surety. For he would be punished, not because he had sinned, but because he had exposed himself to so great a peril by trusting in another's good faith. And the result of such a punishment would only be that other men would for the future not be so quick to intervene in behalf of their fellows, not that they would be restrained from the crime which the defendant had committed. Therefore, such a punishment would not be concerned with the sin of the principal offender, but with the rash credulity of the surety. And so a magistrate who punishes a surety like an offender has not properly understood the nature of punishment or his duty in requiring it, unless it appear that the surety had acted with guile, so that in this way he could make a mockery of the force of public discipline. So also since no man has such a right over his members that he can destroy them at his pleasure, it is likewise patent that one cannot obligate himself to bear for another a punishment of mutilation.

But it is another matter if the guards of prisoners who have allowed them to escape through negligence or collusion, are put to death. Because they are punished not for another's offence, but for their own. See 1 Kings, xx. 39 ff.; Acts, xii. 19.

Nay rather, although free fathers of families have the right to make the final decision touching their form of government, yet it does not seem that they can rightfully banish a bondsman, both because banishment can scarcely pass as a punishment, and because it is not to the interest of a state to drive away such a citizen. Under this point comes the account in Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. VI, chap. iii, to the effect that the towns which were near the capital city of Cuzco, in Peru, formerly had to furnish the royal court with servants by way of tribute, and if any of these was recreant in his services, the town for which he served made it up.

There are also other cases in which a man suffers¹ because of another's offence. For instance, if I were living in another's house without rent, and it should be confiscated because of an offence of the owner, I also should suffer some inconvenience, since I would have to move, although he might have allowed me to live in it longer. Yet I am not properly affected by the punishment. For the government, now that it has taken over the ownership of the dwelling, can rightfully put an end to my precarious use of the building at its pleasure. Thus the children of traitors and rebels are often excluded from public office, which properly acts as a punishment for the parents, in that those who are dearest to them must on their account live without glory. And yet this is not really a punishment in the case of the children, since a state always may decide to whom it would offer honours, and so it can by its own right deprive of honours even such as have not offended against it, when such a course is judged to be to the advantage of the state.

¹ [For in commodum read incommodum.—Tr.]

33. It is clear from these distinctions that in a human court no man who is untouched by any charge can rightfully be punished for another's offence, the reason for this being that a man can be subject to punishment only because of desert, the foundation of which is each man's will, which is pre-eminently a man's own possession, and can contract a 836 vice only by its own intrinsic motion. For the example cited by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxi, § 12, who feels that an instance can be found, beyond the person of a guilty man, in the person of one for whom he holds a most singular affection, is false. Nor is the case given by Plutarch, De Sera Numinis Vindicta [xvi], to the point: 'A schoolmaster, by chastising one, admonishes all the rest of his scholars, and a general, condemning only one in ten, reduces all the rest to obedience,' (G.) for both the youth who is whipped and the soldier who is executed were guilty.

It follows from this that innocent children should not be punished for the sins of their parents. See Code, IX. xlviii. 22; Digest, XLVIII. xix. 26; Decretum, II. i. 4. 6, 7, 8. Therefore, some take the passage of Joshua, vii. 24, to mean that the children of Achan were brought out that they might be instructed by Joshua along with all the people, and be warned to refrain from such acts, not to be killed with their father, and that the following words, 'and they stoned them', are therefore to be understood only of Achan and his herds. But if this interpretation is not allowed, recourse must be had to the reply by Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 8, at the end. Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. IV [669-670]: 'There unrighteous Ammon had bidden Andromeda, though innocent, to pay the penalty of her mother's words.' (M.) Statius, Thebaid, Bk. I [688 ff.]:

Cease then to lament and to ascribe to yourself the misfortunes of your forbears. [. . .] Guilt is no obstacle to a man's descendants. Only be yourself different, and with blessed² deeds earn the forgiveness of your ancestors.

² [For secundus read secundis.—Tr.]

Thus the law of the Persians, as given by Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXIII [vi], is called by him an abomination, surpassing all known laws in its ferocity, namely, that when one man has offended against the king all his kinsmen must perish for his sin. See Herodotus, Bk. III [cxviii], on the case of Intaphernes; Justin, Bk. X, chap. ii. On a similar law of the Macedonians see Curtius, Bk. VII, chap. xi; Bk. VIII, chap. vi. It is, of course, perfectly clear that kings undertook to protect their safety by such cruel executions. We are told by Justin, Bk. XXVI, chap. i, that Hellanicus was moved to murder the tyrant Aristotimus, because he himself was advanced in years and childless, and so had no fear because of his age, or for the sake of his family which would be held for his deed. Add Idem, Bk. XXI, chap. iv,¹ n. 8. A. Caesellius speaks to the same purpose in Valerius Maximus, Bk. VI, chap. ii. But he who can thus despise his own life is made more apprehensive, when he realizes that all who are dear to him must perish with him and because of his deed. Furthermore, such kings wished to take the precaution that the sons should not avenge their father's death. Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. II, chap. xxi [II]: 'He is a fool, who would kill a father and spare his sons.' So also it is not easy to believe that a man would attempt such a deed without taking his kinsmen into his confidence. It was for this reason, according to Arrian, Bk. III [xxvi], that Parmenio was put to death by Alexander. There is something in the remark of Cassius in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIV [xliiv]: 'Some inequality there must be in every notable punishment; but what is hard for the few is compensated by the benefit to the whole.' (R.) Compare Digest, XXIX. v. The judgement is given in Code, IX. viii. 4, that the sons of traitors should suffer the same punishment as their fathers, when there was fear that they would repeat the offences of their fathers. See Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, II. v. 10, on Digest, XLVIII. Thus Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXVIII [ii. 11], records that the young children of the Maratocupeni (a name given to robbers in Syria from the village which was their headquarters) were all killed along with their parents, so that they would not grow up to continue the calling of their forbears. Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxviii, advances the following reason. Those who are guilty of treason are confessed enemies of the state, and so can be dealt with by the law of war; and in war neither the sword nor the victor makes any distinction, so far as past time is concerned, between the guilty and innocent, nor is mercy granted any one save in so far as it conduces to the safety of the citizens. Moreover, he adds, sentences for treason have this distinction, that the prince can act as judge in his own case, and the execution may be carried through at once without the delays of legal process (add Grotius on Joshua, i. 18), although a pious prince would do well always to hold before his eyes the speech of Tiberius in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [xii], delivered in the case of Cn. Piso. And yet not even in war is it right to take vengeance with the sword upon the innocence of youth. And since those who are born in a state are by that fact citizens, there appears to be no way in which they can be treated as enemies unless they have become such by an act of their own doing.

¹ [For 'lib.' read 'c'.—Tr.]

Therefore, an innocent son can pay for the rebellion of his father in no other way than by being cut off from those possessions which would otherwise have passed to him from his father. Although it used to be the custom among the Peruvians, under the rule of the Incas, that if a Curaca had been executed for a crime, his son was not for that reason denied the right to succeed to his father's position, but was pointed out the crime and the punishment of his father in a graphic manner, so that he would avoid them for himself. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. II, chap. xiii. It is not, properly speaking, a punishment to be shut out of unowed honours, and yet no other reasons than can be alleged can remove the unfairness of this punishment. For example, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. VIII [lxxx], writes that the Greeks who had either killed the sons of tyrants along with their fathers, or had exiled them, were persuaded, 'As if it was contrary to the course of nature for virtuous sons to be the offspring of wicked fathers, or wicked sons of virtuous fathers.' (S.) Add Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws. The saying of Marcus in Vulcatius Gallicanus, Avidius Cassius [xii], deserves praise: 'Therefore, you will pardon the children of Cassius, his son-in-law, and his wife. Yet why do I say "pardon", when they have committed no crime?' Nor can such deeds plead as an excuse the threats¹ of God, since our discussion concerns only human justice. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxi, § 14. We may rightly approve a law of the Egyptians which forbade the execution of a woman with child until she had brought forth (Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvii), which other nations also have adopted. Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. V, chap. xviii; Digest, XLVIII. xix. 3; I. v. 5, § 2; I. v. 18; Plutarch, De Sera Numinis Vindicta [p. 552 v]. Yet add Quintilian, Declamations, cclxxvii. On the severity of punishments among the Japanese we are informed by Bernhard Varenius, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xviii; Ferdinando Pinto, Itinerarium, chap. lv; Bernhard Varenius, De Religione Japoniae, chap. xi, p. 192.

In this connexion it should be observed that those legislators abuse their power who seize the occasion of one or another man's sin to pass some severe law against a whole class, even though in the course of time such a death may take on some appearance of glory. Such is the case with the law of some sections of India, to the effect that a wife be burned upon the pyre with her deceased husband, the original purpose of which was to prevent wives wanting to poison their husbands when wearied of them, so as to make way for others. See Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. V [xxvii]; Solinus, chap. lxv; Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XVII, chap. xci; Bk. XIX, chap. xxxiii; Strabo, Bk. XV [p. 1041]; Abraham Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pt. I, chaps. xix, xx. It is also clear from what has been said that an heir is not obligated to suffer any punishment that would touch the body or reputation of the delinquent. Digest, XLVIII. xix. 20. But he is responsible for a fine, although if we would respect the principle of equity, it should not exceed the resources of the inheritance. See Digest, XLVII. i. 2.

¹ [For cowminationes read comminationes.—Tr.]

CHAPTER IV

ON THE POWER OF CIVIL SOVEREIGNTY IN DETERMINING THE VALUE OF CITIZENS

- | | |
|---|---|
| 1. The definition and division of esteem. 2. Simple natural esteem, 3. Which is either entire, 4. Or impaired, 5. Or entirely lost¹. 6. Simple civil esteem is wanting either from one's status, 838 7. Or from a former offence. 8. It is not dishonourable to refuse a duel when it is forbidden by the laws. 9. Simple esteem does not depend upon the whim of those who are in power. 10. Nor can it be used up in their interest. 11. Intensive esteem. 12. Its foundation. 13. Whether the foundation of honour is power alone. 14. Such foundations produce only an ability to receive honour. 15. Who may by his own right have precedence over another? 16. The arguments on which a claim is made to precedence. 17. A glance over the custom of antiquity. | 18-19. The quality and titles of power. 20. One king is not obligated to give way to another king. 21. How kings may meet without contention. 22. On rank among allies. 23. It is an attribute of supreme sovereignty to fix the rank of citizens. 24. How citizens of different states are compared. 25. Nobility is not born with one by nature, 26. But it is due to the imposition of states. 27. Yet it usually is and should be based upon merits. 28. The nature of the Roman nobility in the early period. 29. Afterwards it was accorded to honours borne in the state. 30. What is the nature of nobility to-day over most of Europe? 31. In some places little store is set upon nobility of blood. 32. How far do civil honours depend upon the judgement of a state? |
|---|---|

ALTHOUGH there exist outside a state even in natural liberty some bases upon which one man can properly be preferred above another, yet since it depends upon a pact or definition of civil sovereignty whether those bases shall yield any man a right, it appears, accordingly, the most convenient thing, at this point, to set forth all the reasons for distinctions among men according to esteem. Now esteem is the value of persons in common life, in accordance with which they can be equalled or compared with other persons, and ranked either before or after them. Of a truth those two most noble species of moral quantities, esteem and price, have no little relationship to each other, of which the former has regard to persons and the latter to things, because in common life persons are valued by the former and things by the latter. And as prices are set upon things chiefly to the end that in their exchange or transfer from one to another they can be correctly compared with each other, so also esteem serves the end, that, by it, as by value, men can be compared with one another, so that a decorous order can be set up in case they happen to be united, when it was found that a general equality among mankind could not be conveniently preserved. Esteem can be divided into simple and intensive, each of which comes in for consideration both in those who live in natural liberty, and in those who are members of the same state.

¹ [For consumma read consumia.—Tr.]

2. Simple esteem among those who live in natural liberty seems to consist primarily in this: That a man deport himself and be regarded as a person with whom you may treat as with a good man, who is also inclined to accommodate himself to the laws of human society, and therefore ready, to the best of his ability, to observe natural law in his relations with others. That is, as we say that a thing which is of some use in human life is of value, and that which is useless is of no value, 839 so you may say that at least some value attaches to him with whom one can at any rate treat as with a social being. But if a man plainly shows his unfitness for society, as he does when he shamelessly spurns and tramples under foot the law of nature, and the duties owed other men thereby, you may rightly conclude that he is a man of no value.

3. Such esteem can be considered either as entire, or impaired, or entirely lost. It is entire when a man has not yet knowingly and willingly, by a malicious and outrageous villainy of deliberate malice, violated the law of nature toward another. For the sins of human infirmity are forgiven, in view of man's frailty, and they do not at once extinguish the opinion of a good man, provided his mind remain honourable and desirous of doing what is just; and this esteem is presumed to remain with every man so long as his own wickedness does not utterly destroy it. And so it must be said to belong by nature to every man in equal share, and, when no evil deed has preceded, all men must be judged to be equally honourable. Pliny, Letters, Bk. V, ep. iii: 'Goodness knows no distinction of rank or title'. (B.) On this principle is based the old saying: 'Every man is presumed to be good until the contrary is proved.' Nor is this conclusion at all disproved by what Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, sets forth regarding the evil of human nature and its lust to injure others. If this were absolutely true, a man would be presumed evil until the opposite were proved, or rather until his ability to injure has been taken away.¹ But, as has been shown before, the principle which he presupposes, namely, that 'All men are able and willing mutually to injure one another', is not universally true. Yet because men 'are able to will' to injure each other, all men, therefore, will naturally be held to be good, but capable of becoming evil, and to be friends, but such as you may not safely trust too far.

4. Such esteem is impaired by evil deeds and especially by outrageous deeds, committed upon others undeservedly and contrary to the law of nature, which make it unsafe for others to put any trust for the future in such a deceiver, and to associate with him in any business undertaking without some substantial precaution. Now a man's esteem is impaired by evil deeds, but not entirely lost, for although I may suspect with some probability that a man will act toward me as he has toward others, yet it is not always so certain that the contrary will not happen. For there may be some special causes which led him to deceive others that are not found in my case, and a man could have been moved at one time by evil passions, by which he is not affected at another. Yet that blot upon a man's esteem, caused by evil deeds, can be removed when a man voluntarily makes reparation for a damage, or some equivalent, and shows signs of a change of heart. For such actions when spontaneously offered, can furnish sufficient proof of a mind that has seriously reformed.

¹ [For edemta read ei demta.—Tr.]

5. But this esteem is entirely lost by a type and pattern of life which has the direct purpose of promiscuously harming others and profiting from their manifest injuries. Indeed, there are callings even in states which openly admit the exercise of some certain vice, such as those of harlots, panders, sturdy and vagabond beggars, whom Plato, Laws, Bk.¹ XI, orders thrown out of his state, and by whom Isocrates, Areopagiticus, declares the state to be κατασχύνεσθαι [disgraced]. Atticus, Bishop of Constantinople, in Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. VII, chap. xxv, advises: 'You should choose to bestow your alms, not on those who make an occupation of begging for their bellies' sake, and devote 840 their whole life to it, but on such as are ashamed to ask for aid.' Thus not only were beggars not tolerated in Peru under the rule of the Incas (see Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. V, chap. ix), but whoever was prevented by some physical deformity from maintaining himself, was supported by the state. Ibid., Bk.¹ V, chap. xi. Likewise, there were in Egypt professional thieves, of whom Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxx, writes as follows:

Those who enter into the list of thieves are to give in their names to one who is their chief and head, and whatever they steal, they engage to bring to him. They that have lost anything are to set down in writing every particular, and bring it to him, and set forth the day, hour, and place, when and where they lost their goods. Everything being thus readily found out, after the things stolen are valued, the true owner is to pay a fourth of the value, and to receive his goods again. For since it was not possible to restrain all from thieving, the law-maker found out a way that all might be restored, except a small proportion for redemption. (B.*)

Yet it would be my feeling that such a class of men could be gotten rid of at less expense to the citizens by an energetic use of workhouses, stripes, and gallows.

¹ [For I. read I.—Tr.]

How little esteem should belong to such men is a matter for the decision of the state which tolerates them, although he who is allowed the open exercise of a vice should at least enjoy the common right of men. This is illustrated by the expostulation of the pander in Terence, Brothers, Act II, sc. i [188 f.]: 'Slave-dealer I am, the common bane, I own it, of youth, liar, and nuisance; still I didn't start outraging you.' (S.) See Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. I, tit. xx. All would agree that natural esteem is seriously prejudiced by a type of life which confesses any kind of vice, and yet unless that vice is connected with an injury to others, it does not appear that such persons can be treated as the common enemies of all. But those whose calling in life has as its end the injury of others, and such as promiscuously use the same licence against all men, or at least against those who are outside their circle, as they do against beasts, and thus carry on war not against their special enemies but against their fellow men—such men entirely lose that esteem by which we rank and grade all other men. To their number belong pirates, freebooters, highway robbers, assassins, cut-throats, and the like. Nor are they removed from that class if they do not regularly wreak the worst villainy they can upon all persons promiscuously, if, for instance, they rest content with robbery, and do not commit murder, or go away after relieving one of his purse and cloak. For there is no justice and praise in not committing every excess known to injustice. And, in fact, under this head should undoubtedly be classed whole bands of pirates and highwaymen, so long as they have not renounced that kind of life, however¹ much they may seem to observe the forms of justice within their own number. Thus mention is made in Heliodorus, Ethiopica, Bk. V [31], of a 'law among the pirates, that he who was the first to board an enemy's vessel and exposed himself to the greatest danger in behalf of all, was to have his choice of the booty'. Also in the same chapter [V. 20]: 'Even pirates retain some conscience and affection towards those whom they know.' Indeed, I should not exclude entire states, should there be any such, which men have formed so as to enjoy the benefits of law among their own number, but in which they otherwise act like enemies of all other men, and pay no regard to pacts and their pledged word. And if there are states which observe the pacts which they actually make with others, but either against all other men, or at least against certain other peoples, have acquired the practice of conducting themselves, without just cause, in opposition to the law of nature, it will scarcely be permissible for them to lose all esteem, although it cannot but be very considerably lessened.

Now the effects, as seen in others, which attend such men who have lost all esteem, are in general these: That unless they go about to

¹ [For ut ut read utut.—Tr.]

841 renounce that fierce and bloody manner of life, others must show no more mercy on them than on wolves and other savage animals. And when they have been apprehended they are usually treated more cruelly than other enemies, even though the latter also threatened us with utter destruction. They are also held unworthy to receive any office even of simple humanity, since they are bent upon the injury of others. Nay, just as no trust can be placed in their word, should they wish to give it, since any value it may have had with others is destroyed by the ferocious character of their lives, so it can apparently be said with reason that they are unable to receive the pledge of others so long as they openly continue in their villainous occupation, which is presupposed in our discussion. For I agree with a man either voluntarily, or because I am compelled by his unjust use of force. I do not see how I could do the first without catching the disease of his villainies, since I would be treating with one as a friend, who acts like the common enemy of all men except his own accomplices. In fact, to keep faith with a thief is frequently connected with the injury of others, for example, in the case of some booty which he has stored with me. See Digest, XVI, iii. 31, § 1.¹ But if a robber has done me some good turn, such as I could accept from such a person without disgrace, it is only just for me to pay him the price agreed upon. Although in that case he will no longer be a robber, as we suppose him to be in our discussion, the common enemy of all save his associates. As regards the second case we have already shown that pacts extorted by force are invalid². But, after all, such men can recover their lost esteem³ if they leave off their evil way of living, and take up another which is honourable; and this is possible not alone to individuals, but also to whole bands of robbers and highwaymen. And from the moment that change is effected they will have to be treated like honourable men, provided, of course, they have made reparation or secured forgiveness for the injuries which they had formerly done.

6. Simple esteem among those who live within states consists in a man being held to be, at the least, a common but a full and entire member of a state, or, in other words, in his not having been declared by the laws and customs of the state to be a vicious member of the same, but in his being held to be one of its number and a unit in its composition. Furthermore, this esteem in a state is wanting by reason either of a man's mere status or of a crime. The first comes about in two ways: That status may in itself have by nature nothing base about it, or it may be connected with some actual vice, or something that is regarded as such. Their mere status, although by nature it contains nothing vicious, in some states takes away simple esteem from slaves, who are not considered civil persons, being understood, in other words, to be such as have no civil standing (caput) and are not numbered in the state. How low was their condition among the Romans is well known, an instance of which is to be seen in Digest, XLVIII. v. 6; Code, IX. ix. 23, 29. Nor were the Gentile slaves among the Hebrews esteemed any more highly. Josephus, Antiquities, IV. viii [15]: 'Let no servants be admitted to give testimony, on account of the ignobility of their soul; since it is probable that they may not speak truth, either out of hope or gain, or fear of punishment.' (W.) Add Selden, Bk. IV, chap. iii; Law of the Visigoths, Bk. II, tit. iv, chap. 9. In some states, also, practically no esteem is enjoyed by bastards, despite the fact that the manner of their birth is not a matter of their own guilt but of that of their parents. See Code, VI. lvii; Stobaeus, Anthology, lxxv. Unless it be that there is something to be said for the remark of Procopius, Secret History [II]: 'The crimes of women are carried over not only upon their husbands, but touch even more heavily their children, whose fate it is to bear the stigma of their continued disgrace, as though they bear by nature the blemish of their mother.' Among the Hindus a certain race of men, called the Peneaës, is considered infamous, on whom see Abraham Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pt. I, chap. ii.

¹ [For de positi read depositi.—Tr.]

³ [For estimatio read existimatio.—Tr.]

² [For in válido read invalida.—Tr.]

Status destroys or diminishes civil esteem, in the second manner 842 outlined above, when those who are in it are engaged in such occupations as cannot be carried on without vices, or such as, because of their base nature, are confined to men of the vilest and lowest type. What position men engaged in the affairs first named are accorded, will be clear enough from the laws and customs of every state. Here belongs what is told by Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. vii, of Q. Metellus the praetor urbanus, 'who did not grant the pimp Vecilius possession of Juventius' property, although his will so stipulated, because he refused to approve the latter's act in throwing away his wealth into such a slough of lewdness, or to allow Vecilius the right of a full citizen, since he had divorced himself from every honest pursuit in life.' And again, when a certain Genucius, an emasculated priest of the Great Mother, had received of Gnaeus Orestes the right to have restored to him the property of Naevianus, the consul Aemilius Lepidus overruled the praetor's decision, 'in order that the tribunals of the magistrates might not be polluted, under the pretence of his suing for his right, by the vile presence and contaminated voice of Genucius.' Another case is found in Digest, XI. v. 1, where the judge refuses to allow an action 'if anyone beats a man in whose house it appears that a game with dice has been carried on, or damages his property, or, on a similar occasion, something has been taken out of his house¹ by anyone.' (M.)

To the second class belong in many states executioners, bailiffs,

¹ [For tempore dolo read tempore e domo.—Tr.]

vault-renters, and men of such stamp, who are debarred from association with more honourable citizens. And this is expressly stipulated in the laws of some states. Thus Cicero, For C. Rabirius [v], says that formerly at Rome 'The laws of the censors considered an executioner ought not only to be ejected out of the forum, but even to be deprived of the sight of the sky, of the breath of the atmosphere, and of a home in the city, (as if the public assemblies would be defiled by contact with such a person).' (Y.)¹ In other places only custom and public opinion attach shame to any association with such people, and this both because their manners usually correspond to the vileness of their services, and because only vulgar minds volunteer for such tasks. Although among the Romans the soldiers were often called upon to perform public executions, not only in the field, but in the city as well, without their esteem suffering any infamy or loss (see Peter Faber, Semestria, Bk. II, chap. vi), because it is one thing to act as executioner at the special command of a superior, and another to make that one's calling. So also among the Jews criminals were stoned by the entire people. Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. III, chap. i, writes that De Witold, Duke of Lithuania, introduced the custom of condemned men serving as their own executioners, because it was improper to use an innocent man in such a task, and stain his hands with homicide. And yet this reason is silly, since an executioner certainly does not commit murder by inflicting a punishment. Some advance the reason that, in the performance of this task, they are presumed to witness only the suffering of him who is punished, which is a sight repugnant to the compassion of man's nature.

The Roman laws branded with infamy those who appeared upon the stage for pay (see Digest, III. ii. 1), or who hired themselves out to fight with beasts (Digest, III. i. 1, § 6). Here the basis for this judgment lay not so much in any wickedness in the act, since such acts could be performed without guilt, but in the fact that the peculiar dignity of the Romans held it disgraceful to do such things for money. For often the mere fact that a thing is paid for makes a task ignoble. By the same laws, if a man allowed a widowed daughter to marry another within the period allotted for mourning, or himself married such a person, or allowed one who was under his authority to marry or be married under such circumstances, he was suspected of being light-minded and branded as a man of inconstant faith and love. We are told by Aloysius Cadamus, Navigatio, chap. viii, that among the ancient inhabitants of the Canary Islands it was held highly disgraceful and unbecoming for a man to follow the trade of a butcher, and Th. More, Utopia, II, makes his Utopians feel the same way. Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. IV, chap. v, writes that the Hebrews refused to allow the members of four professions to give testimony and participate in judicial matters, 843 to wit, gamblers, usurers, those who made a profit from the fruits of the seventh year, or year of remission, and those who taught pigeons to fly, giving as their reason that no one of such men was engaged in undertakings which in any way concern the stability of the generation, that is, the public good, or enhance the well being of men.

¹ [This last clause is not in Cicero at this point.—Tr.]

7. Simple esteem is entirely wanting by reason of a former offence, when a man is branded by the laws with infamy because of a certain kind of offence, for not all offences destroy civil esteem. See Code, I. liv. 1. The result of this is that a man loses his natural life at the same time as his memory is execrated, or he is banished in disgrace, or is left in the state, yet not as a healthy member but as a plague upon it, so that although he has his residence in the state and enjoys the common protection of its laws, he is shut out of a public career and from the honourable associations of men, and is unfit to exercise lawful acts which presuppose unimpaired esteem, as well as unable to make a will or serve as a witness. What the crimes are which bring¹ such infamy upon a man, must be learned from the laws of each particular state. See Digest, L. xiii. 5, § 1, 2, 3. On this law we should observe, that, in some of the instances which it cites, a careful enough distinction is not drawn between simple and intensive esteem. We should notice in this connexion a law of the Egyptians given by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxviii:

Soldiers who ran away from their colours, or mutinied,² though they should not die, yet should be otherwise punished with the utmost disgrace imaginable; but if they afterwards wipe out their disgrace by their valour, they are restored to their former post and trust. By thus inflicting a punishment more grievous than death, the lawgiver designed that all should look upon disgrace and infamy as the greatest of evils. Besides it was judged that those who were put to death could never be further serviceable to the commonwealth, but such as were degraded only, through a desire to repair their reputation, might be very useful, and do much service in time to come. (B.*)

We should observe, furthermore, that according to the Roman Jurisconsults evil deeds which give rise to infamy are so branded either directly by the law itself, or at the cognizance and sentence of a judge, or, finally, by a kind of censure³ on the part of honourable men, which last they call in general infamy of the deed. See Code, II. xi. 13; add Digest, XXXVII. xv. 2; III. ii. 20; Code, IX. ix. 25. You may also refer to this head the account of the Apalchitae in Rochefort, *Descriptio*⁴ Antillarum, Pt. II, chap. viii, to the effect that thieves suffer no other punishment among them than to be censured in all meetings, but that most of them take this so hard that they flee into the wilds. Yet it would be my opinion upon this 'infamy of the deed', that it is not so much the

¹ [For concilinantia read conciliantia.—Tr.]

² [For imperatorum . . . ex sequentibus read imperatorum . . . exsequentibus.—Tr.]

³ [For sensura read censura.—Tr.]

⁴ [For de scripti. read descripti.—Tr.]

immediate result of the opinion of judicious men, as a punishment of the law as well, because of the fact that such deeds are always condemned and held disgraceful in the opinion of judicious men. For although it is a disgrace for a thing not to receive the approbation¹ of men of good repute, yet unless this be seconded by a further pronouncement of the law, no man experiences such a loss of esteem at the mere judgement of private citizens, that he is excluded from those benefits and rights which accompany unimpaired esteem by virtue of the civil laws. Therefore, it is obvious that a man does not at once suffer in reputation when he has only been accused of or charged with a crime which carries infamy with it. For when the orator Delphidius cried out: 'But will anyone ever be found guilty if it be enough to deny the charge?' it was with justice that Julian replied: 'Can anyone be judged innocent if it be enough to make a charge?' (Y.) [Ammianus Marcellinus, XVIII. i]. Here can be applied the saying in Plautus, Trinummus [81 f.]: 'I am the keeper of my own heart, so as not to admit guilt there; suspicion is centered in the heart of another.' (R.) But a crime carries infamy with it only when a man has been condemned for it, or has acknowledged it, which latter thing a man is understood to 844 do when he agrees with the prosecutor to drop the case, since a man who makes such an agreement is understood to confess the crime. Digest, III. ii. 5. Unless it can, perhaps, be shown that it was not so much a consciousness of his guilt as other likely causes, such as the nuisance of a trial, or the severity or hostility of the judge, that induced a man to settle with the prosecutor out of court. In the oration of Isocrates, Against Callimachus [xviii. 10], certain men advised the defendant to settle the case out of court with the plaintiff:

For in trials many things turn out in an unexpected way, and when the ballots are cast chance rules more than equity. Therefore, it is more advantageous and more easy to avoid important suits at a small expense, than to pay out nothing and yet run so great a risk.

And although a man is regarded as retaining his esteem unimpaired if the judge has declared him innocent of the charge, yet in order that his innocence may be given greater publicity, and that calumny be punished, it is customary in many states to require the plaintiff to recant, and force him to confess and repent of his falsehood, do honour to the defendant, and the like. It appears from Josephus, Jewish War, Bk. IV, chap. xxxix, that the disgrace which attaches to chains was removed if they were not unloosed but cut in two, and he adds that the Romans followed the same practice with such as had been wrongfully bound.

8. Another conclusion from what has been said is, that no true infamy can attach to a man from the fact that he has not wished to avenge injuries done him by word or deed with his own sword, as has come to be the custom in some places, especially among nobles and men of military training, but to leave that to a judge, or to bear them in silence; provided that restraint does not imply confession to a base villainy. Of course it implies a high degree of slothfulness and cowardice for a man to swallow every kind of disgraceful injury and insult and not gird himself to a strenuous defence of his liberty or right. And most men would make the statement of Neoptolemus in Quintus Calaber [Smyrnaeus], Bk. IX [283]: 'Ere I be called war-blencher, let me die!' (W.) And yet if a man chooses with judgement rather to scorn revenge for certain injuries than to turn from them in fear, he shows proof of a lofty mind, nor is there anything in such an act that would destroy natural or civil esteem. Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxvii:

¹ [For propari read probari.—Tr.]

A man receives words of disgrace [...] for which they that made the laws had assigned no punishment [...] and is afraid, unless he revenge it, he shall fall into contempt; and breaks the law and kills him. This is a crime, and such a fear will not excuse him. Why is this so? Because the commonwealth would have the words of the state, that is, the laws rate higher with citizens than the words of an individual for whose words it refused to set any penalty, for the reason that the state holds men who cannot abide only words the most mild of all its citizens.¹

See, however, the Salic Law, tit. xxxii. Much less is it infamy in those states where private revenge of injuries is expressly forbidden by the laws, for a man to obey the laws rather than to desire under cover of his honour to expose himself to the peril of an uncertain struggle, as well as to the severity of the laws. 'A stubborn sword metes out unjust justice.' Ovid, Tristia, Bk. V, el. vii [V. x. 43]. Nor is it always a proof of cowardice for a man to refuse to descend to combat with another for every quarrel, and to engage rashly in a struggle that involves his life and fortune, since there can be other occasions for him to show his bravery in a manner far more safe and entirely blameless. There is an illustration of this in the case of the centurions Pulsio and Varenus in Caesar, Gallic War, Bk. V [xliv]; see also Busbecq, Letters, iii, on the case of Velibegus. In Plutarch, Pyrrhus [xxx], that general called Antigonus a scoundrel and challenged him to come down into the plain and fight it out with him for the kingdom, to whom Antigonus replied: 'In conducting a campaign he relied more upon opportunities than upon arms, and that many roads to death lay open to Pyrrhus if he was tired of life.' (P.) In the same author's Life of Antony [lxxv], Augustus, when challenged by him to a duel, sent back the same answer: 'Antony had many ways of dying.' (P.) Alexander of Rhodes, Divers Voyages, Bk. II, chap. vi, writes of the soldiers in the kingdom of Tonquin, that they show all bravery with no concern at all for their lives when opposing an enemy, but among themselves they love each other like brothers and never draw their swords upon their fellows; and that when they once saw a Frenchman and a Portuguese fighting a duel, they were astonished, and said that they had never witnessed such barbarity. Nor should a wise man under such conditions pay any heed to the remarks of the common sort, since every citizen's esteem stands and falls by the judgement of his supreme sovereign and the laws, and virtue lies in being willing and obedient to the laws, without regard for the empty opinion of idle and mischievous men.

¹ [Much of this is not in Hobbes at this point.—Tr.]

It appears from this what reply should be made to Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. x, who thinks it scarcely possible for it not to be glorious and honourable to join at once in a duel, since that is a proof of power. For why may it not be a proof of excellence for one to know how to temper with reason the urge of his mind and his strength, and to give them rein only in accordance with the laws? Although we should not hold irrelevant what he suggests¹ in the same work (chap. xxx), that the further law should be added to those upon duelling, namely, that those who are noble and desirous of being accounted such should bind themselves with an oath never to challenge a fellow citizen to a duel, or take up the sword when thus challenged, for in this way those who declined a duel would have an excellent excuse for their action.² The Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. III, tit. xxxiii, § 4, endeavour to meet this evil by imposing the severest penalties on such as offer another an affront.

We may mention, in passing, that information upon the antiquity of duelling and the customs from which it arose, is given by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. V, chap. xxviii, on the Gauls: 'In the very midst of feasting, upon any small occasion, it is ordinary for them in a heat to rise, and without any regard of their lives, to fall to it with their swords.' (B.) The reason advanced for this is their belief that their souls took up their dwellings in other bodies. 'Thence have the people spirits ever ready to rush to arms, and souls that welcome death; and they deem it cowardice to be sparing of a life destined to return.' (R.) Lucan, Bk. I [460 ff.]. The same reason is assigned for the bravery of the Germans in Appian, The Gallic History [IV. iii].

9. Furthermore, it is also obvious that a man's simple natural esteem cannot be taken from him at the mere pleasure of his sovereign, save for some previous sin on his part, which, because of its own depravity, or the express sanction of the laws, is accompanied with infamy. For since such a power can in no wise make for the preservation or betterment of the state, that power is never understood to have been conferred upon sovereigns. Yet just as a sovereign can injure a citizen by banishing him from the state, so he can do the same by depriving him of civil esteem, in so far, at least, as to deprive him of those advantages which in a state attend unimpaired esteem. But his own natural esteem can no more be taken from a man than his honourable character. Moreover, it is a contradiction, out of mere desire to declare a man infamous, that is, to accuse a man of being privy to base crimes, not because he actually committed them, but because it pleases a sovereign to treat a man in this manner, as though he were guilty. And it appears certain that no citizen is obligated to sacrifice his own simple esteem to the state, or to undergo actual infamy for its advantage. For the evil deeds from which actual infamy arises, can neither be commanded by a state nor should they be performed by a citizen.

¹ [For suadeat i read suadeat.—Tr.]

² [For pugnant read pugnandi.—Tr.]

10. It is not so clear whether it can be demanded of an honest citizen that he take upon himself the infamy of his prince or state, or give himself up as if guilty of their crimes. Now although it may seem in such a case that a man practically commits a crime in feigning guilt, yet it would be my feeling that a distinction should be drawn between 846 the domestic or private crimes of a prince, and his public crimes, or such as concern the entire state. Regarding the former, neither can a prince honourably demand that a citizen take up himself the sins of his prince, nor can the citizen in the case honourably do so, to the end that he may either supply some plausible excuse for the prince's villainy, or take upon himself the guilt which would have impaired the natural esteem of his sovereign. For no one may deprive a prince of his civil esteem, since he is placed above civil judgements. Nor do I believe that any wise man will approve the deed of Anicetus, who claimed that he had been guilty of adultery with Octavia, in order that Nero might have an excuse to divorce her. See Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIV, chap. lxii. Euripides, Helena [1000-1]:

I will not [. . .] show my brother grace
Wherefrom shall open infamy be mine. (W.)

Add the story of Antonius Perezius in De Thou, Bk. CIV. But it happens fairly often that when a minister is treating with other nations on orders from his prince, or is opposing them in matters the public discussions of which would be prejudicial to the state, this prejudice may be avoided by laying the blame for it upon the minister, as though he had undertaken it on his own responsibility. In such a case I do not feel that a good citizen will refuse to ward off a great evil from his state by pretending that he acted without a mandate of the state; provided he may suffer no more than the punishment of a feigned disgrace (add Marselaer, Legatus, Bk. I, chap. xxxiii, p. 200); for surely it would be too severe for him to suffer death, or be turned over to the enemy on that score. And whatever be the nature of the pretended punishment, it can be easily removed or offset in another way, since it is obvious that he who has the power to inflict civil infamy, can also remove it. See Cornelius Nepos, Alcibiades, chap. vi; Justin, Orat., VII [Histories, V. iv]. [Libanius, Orations, VII. xiv. 21]: 'To dissolve and undo things which have already been done is one of those things that is impossible. But entirely to remove the mark of disgrace from such as have received it is always possible—and there is no other physician to remedy this defect than you alone' (he is addressing the emperor Julian). Yet it should be remembered that when any punishment has been inflicted for serious offences, the restoration of a man's reputation only produces the external civil effects in the entire esteem, and does in no way remove the stain upon natural esteem.

II. Intensive esteem is that in accordance with which persons, who are otherwise equal in respect to simple esteem, are preferred one to another, according as there reside in one more than in another those things towards which other men usually show honour and respect. Now the honour which corresponds to various degrees of esteem is an expression of our judgement of another man's excellence; and so honour does not actually reside in him who receives it, but in him who pays it. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. I, chap. iii: 'Honour seems to depend more upon the people who pay it than upon the person to whom it is paid.' (W.) For although every man put any value upon himself that he chooses, just as a merchant can rate his wares as highly as he pleases,¹ yet as the price of wares is set by the ultimate purchaser, so the worth which a man bears in the eyes of others is for them to determine. See John, viii. 54. 'However highly a man values himself, he is actually only as valuable as others think him.' Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. x. Yet every man is affected by the honour which is offered him at the hands of others, in the measure with which it corresponds to the value which he has set upon himself. And yet, by the figure of speech of metonymy, esteem itself, that is, that which is the object of and deserves honour, is distinguished by that word, just as certain positions which are attended with honour are commonly given the special designation of 'honours'. And it is rightly observed by Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, § 2, that since glory and honour consist of comparison and pre-eminence, if the cause for these resides in all men it is present in no one man among them; and that no society or state can be formed by many men or endure for long, when entered into for the sake of glory, that is, in order that the members may give mutual aid to one another in attaining glory and honour, since the worth of every man is judged by his fellow men in accordance with what he can do apart from the aid of other men. See Seneca, Letters, xxvii, on Calvisius Sabinus. On the other hand, the more people touched by ignominy, the more lightly it is borne.

Now this intensive esteem can be considered as it resides either in those who live in natural liberty, or in those who reside in the same state. We shall next have to consider the foundations of that intensity, and these as they produce either only an aptitude to expect honour from others, or else a right, properly so called, by which it can be demanded of others as a thing which they owe.

¹ [For quantivult read quanti vult.—Tr.]

12. The foundations of intensive esteem in general are held to be all those things which possess a remarkable excellence or perfection (Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Bk. I [xvii]: 'Whatever excels has a right to veneration' (Y.)), or are judged to imply the same; and such an excellence as that its effect agrees with the end of natural law, or that of states. For you may sometimes see much ado made by the common sort over men who show unusual ability only in the practice of some vice, such as men who can toss off a gallon or two at a single drink, and earn¹ the praise of Juvenal, Satires, Bk. IV [139]: 'No one in my time had more skill in the eating art than he.' (R.) Aristophanes, Acharnians, Act I, sc. ii [77-8]:

For only those are there accounted MEN
Who drink the hardest, and who eat the most. (R.)

Others are bold warriors in love, ῥυποκίνδυνοι [reckless], clever thieves, and all such as tower above their comrades in vice. Yet the more highly they shine in their calling the more worthless they are in the sight of upright men. Philo Judaeus, De Migratione Abrahami [xxix]: 'To be pre-eminent² in what is not honourable is the most conspicuous disgrace, just as it is a lighter evil³ to come off second best in such a contest.' (Y.) Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. xiv: 'If you say to me, "I am great in kicking", I shall answer, "That is the boast of an ass".' (M.) And even though such powers prove a strength of body or an active spirit, yet the more vehemently he who has turned to base things revels in his vices, the greater vigour they develop. It is easy to gather from all this that praise and glory are measured by the men who accord them, and so the only praise of value is that given by men who themselves deserve it, while on the contrary a wise man 'takes no account of praise from such men, who in fact cannot even win their own approval'. (H.) Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. III, § 4.

Now among these foundations in particular are keenness of intelligence and the capacity to improve the mind by wide observation, especially when a man has actually measured up to such capacity; a judgement fitted to control affairs and to detect inconsistencies (see Ecclesiasticus, ix. 15; 1 Kings, iii. 28); a firm mind, undisturbed by outside influences and above enticements and threats; the ability to make one's meaning clear in choice and fluent speech; and finally strength, dignity, and outstanding physical dexterity in so far as such are held to be conspicuous indications or instruments of the mind. See Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. V, line 344; Isocrates, Praise of Helen, although here he savours too much of the orator; Bacon, Essays, chaps. xli-xlii. However, the common sort feel that physical height betokens something godlike and magnificent, and so it was customary in the theatres for gods and heroes to be made taller by the use of buskins, while there are many who would have something added to their stature and none would have it decreased. Yet even worse than simple is the account of Themistius, Orations, xiv [p. 36 B], drawn from Herodotus, Bk. III: 'The Ethiopians elect their king on his breadth and stature, measuring by such means his virtue.' This agrees with the opinion expressed by an American Indian from New France, who was in France during the reign of Charles IX, and said that of the many strange things there, he marvelled that the French chose that slight lad as their king, and not one of his tall and strong and bearded attendants, referring to the Swiss body-guards. Michel Montaigne, Essays, Bk. I, chap. xxx; add 348 1 Samuel, x. 23-4. This view may be strengthened by the remark of Oppian, The Chase, Bk. III, line 68, applicable on this point: 'It is larger for the smaller ones, and smaller for the larger ones.'¹ And often 'small was his stature but great his soul'. Claudian, Gothic War [584]. Quintus Calaber [Smyrnaeus], Bk. V [263 ff.]:

¹ [For gous read quos.—Tr.]

² [For miseriae read miseria.—Tr.]

² [For excellere read excellere.—Tr.]

Valour is a deedless thing;
And bulk and big assemblage of a man
Cometh to naught, by wisdom unattended. (W.)

Furthermore, what are called the 'goods of fortune' imply either unusual skill in their acquisition, or the faculty or means to accomplish worthy things. But esteem is enhanced most of all by worthy accomplishments, because these both presuppose some intrinsic merit and show that it was directed to legitimate use and ends. Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. I, chap. v [9]: 'Honour [...] is chiefly and most properly paid to those who have already done good; but also to the man who can do good in future.' (B.) Pindar, Olympian Odes, vi [123-4]: 'This is proved by all their acts.' (S.) And as one's excellence or accomplishments come to the notice of many people, they are given the special designation of 'renown'. When in the eyes of others a man is attended with a special reputation for prudence and wisdom in wisely deciding perplexing questions of daily life or theoretical truths, it is given the name of 'authority', which some define more generally as a 'reputation for higher learning, linked with probity'. Nor are advanced years judged to raise esteem, for any other reason than because they are held to have begotten wisdom by an extended contact with affairs and a daily contemplation of the business of life. See Digest, L. vi. 5. Quintus Calaber [Smyrnaeus], Bk. V [155 f.]:

¹ [Speaking of the tails of two varieties of panthers.—Tr.]

[. . .] in counsel ever the old man

Who knoweth much, excelleth younger men. (W.)

Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIX, chap. xxxiv: 'For in all other cases the constant rule is to yield more honour and respect to the elder than to the younger.' (B.*) Oppian, *On Fishing*¹, Bk. I [683]: 'Old age renders a man venerable.' Although there are not wanting such as are hoary in years but not in wisdom, to whom may be applied the words of Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. IX, fab. xi [437-8]: '[. . .] Who, because of the galling weight of age, is now despised and no longer reigns in his former state' (M.); and 'the shadow of a glorious name'. (R.) Lucan, Bk. I [135]. For this reason the advice of Horace, Satires, Bk. II, sat. viii [Epistles, I. i. 8-9], is timely: 'Be wise in time and turn your horse out to grass when he shows signs of age, lest he end in a ludicrous breakdown with straining flanks.' (W.) Antiphanes [III, p. 116, no. 240 A, Kock]: 'Very much like wine is our life: when only a little is left, it turns to vinegar.' Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxv, n. 5. Strabo, Bk. XV [i. 54]: 'The Indians give no special privilege to age, except it be wiser.' Philo Judaeus, On Abraham [xlvi]:

For he who is really an elder is looked upon as such, not with reference to his length of time, but to the praiseworthiness of his life. Those men, therefore, who have spent a long life in that existence which is in accordance with the body, apart from all virtue, we must call only long-lived children. (Y.)

There are times when the saying of Varro, On Farming, Bk. II, chap. ii, is applicable: 'That is a better age which is attended by hope than that which is attended by death.' Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. II, chap. i. [7]: 'It is not to be considered of what age a boy is, but what progress he has already made in his studies.' (W.) Isocrates, Archidamus [4]: '[. . .] It is not by length of years that we are distinguished from one another in regard to soundness of judgement, but by our natural gifts and the attention bestowed upon their cultivation.' (F.) Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. VI [xvi]: 'You must not reject the claim that youth makes, that in some way it assimilates an idea more easily than old age.' (C.) But in general women would rather be commended for the bloom of their youth than for old age. And so when Lais was advanced in years she dedicated her mirror to Venus, her reason being, as it runs in the epigram of Plato in [Greek Anthology, Bk. VI [1]: 'Since I do not want to see how I now look; and to show me as I was the glass is unable.' Quintilian, Declamations, cccvi: 'And no old woman is loved except in memory.' Add Bacon, Essays, 84¹ chap. xl. But Digest, I. ix. 1, apparently accords greater dignity to men than to women. Yet add Jacques Godefroy, De Praecedentia, Pt. I, chap. v, § 35. And still, in general¹ women have some foundations of esteem in common with men; some that are their own, such as pre-eminence in virtues and functions which are judged to fall in a special sense to their sex; and some that are only borrowed, as when they are said to shine from the rays of their husband (see Digest, I. ix. 8), or, when they boast loudly of the number and excellence of their offspring. See Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. VI, fab. iv, lines 127 ff.; Valerius Maximus, Bk. IV, chap. iv, § 1; Plutarch, C. Gracchus [iv], on Cornelia; add also the speech of Kennedy in Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. XII, towards the beginning.

¹ [For halicut. read halieut.—Tr.]

13. It is patent from what has been said, what conclusion is to be reached regarding the views of Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. x, whose position is like this: He reduces all the foundations of honour or intensive esteem² to power, which is defined as the possession of present means to obtain in all likelihood³ some good. This power he makes either 'natural' or 'instrumental'. The former consists of excellence of the faculties of the body or mind, such as remarkable strength, marvellous beauty, prudence, eloquence, liberality, nobility, and the like. The latter is such as either by the use of these faculties, or of things secured through fortune, serves as the means of acquiring more, such as riches, honours, friends, good fortune, and in general any quality which begets the love or fear of many men, or the reputation for such a quality. In the next place dignity is defined as the value or price of a man, that is, as much as a person would be willing to give for the use of his power. To declare that value, or to make known how much we value him at, is what is meant by 'honouring' and 'dishonouring' a man, since to value a man high is to honour him, and low is to dishonour him. He then enumerates the natural signs of honour, such as to ask aid, to obey, to give one large and valuable gifts (for this reason, although with questionable taste, the prince of Zanaga in Africa, according to Leo Africanus, Bk. I, killed a great number of camels and ostriches for his guests, and when they begged him not to, replied, 'I would not be acting civilly if I only set common animals before guests who are so noble and come for the first time to my kingdom'), to be quick to advance another's good, to yield in any matter that he desires, to give proofs of love or fear, to praise, to magnify, to call blessed, to speak considerately⁴, to approach decorously and humbly, to believe, to trust, to give counsel or discourse on any subject, to agree with another's opinions, to imitate, to honour whom he honours, to make use of a person's aid in taking counsel, or in difficult matters. Furthermore, civil dignity to him is that value which a state sets on a man in conferring upon him by way of honour, sovereignty, or office, or the handling of

¹ [For universum read universum.—Tr.]

² [For propabiliter read probabiliter.—Tr.]

³ [For estimaoionis read estimationis.—Tr.]

⁴ [For considerare read considerate.—Tr.]

any public undertaking, or even a name or title. And he correctly observes, in this connexion, that a state can establish anything as a sign of honour, even though it otherwise appears by its own nature indifferent. So, for instance, it was a sign of honour among the Persians, according to Esther, vi. 8, to be led through the streets seated upon the king's horse, as it is also to wear certain badges and decorations. Thus the Chinese salute with their head and hands, the Japanese by taking off their shoes; the Chinese rise before such as they wish to honour, while the Japanese sit upon the ground, holding it unbecoming for a man to stand upright in the performance of this duty. Bernhard Varenius, Descriptio Japoniae, p. 21. Add also, Neuhof, Generalis Descriptio Sinae, chap. iv. Also in Rochefort, Descriptio Antillarum, Pt. II, chap. xix, are to be found some rather unusual signs of honour.

Yet although what has so far been said is true enough, still his 850 following statement cannot be dismissed without censure, where he maintains that 'honour consisteth only in the opinion of power', and infers therefrom: 'Nor does it alter the case of honour, whether an action, so it be great and difficult, and consequently a sign of much power, be just or unjust. [...] Therefore, the ancient heathen did not think they dishonoured, but greatly honoured the gods, when they introduced them in their poems, committing rapes, thefts, and other great but unjust, or unclean acts.' For although we might concede that the foundations of honour may justly be reduced to power, in so far as they naturally produce some effect in human life, since whatever among men lies like a dead thing, with no effect either of good or evil, can apparently be valued neither one way nor another, yet that power alone, without any union with goodness, is a true foundation of actual honour, is opposed both to Hobbes himself and to sane reason. For the same writer in his De Cive, chap. xv, § 9, defines honour as nothing else but an opinion of another's power joined with goodness, and therefore 'three passions do necessarily follow honour: love, which refers to goodness; hope and fear, which regard power.' In other words, that is true honour which is attended by those three joint emotions. Fear alone, as aroused by a power determined upon evil, can in no way be held a proof of honour, since it always carries hatred with it, and whoever fears another would encompass his ruin. Silius Italicus, Bk. I [149]: 'He madly thought it an honour to be feared.' Thus we Christians are convinced of the great power of the devil, yet that is such a power as is wanting in goodness, and is bent only upon evil, while no man in his senses would consider that personage worthy of honour on this score. When he asked our Saviour to worship him, he showed Him not his claws but gifts (Matthew, iv. 8-9), and no one of us approves the custom of certain barbarous nations who excuse the reverence they show the devil on the ground that they would avoid his wrath.

And so we are also unable to agree with Hobbes, loc. cit., when he includes in the signs of honour 'flattery of another'; for all flattery presupposes a fault either in him who bestows or in him who accepts it, is a form of derision, and absolutely lacking in sincerity. And so Lucan, Bk. V [385-6], calls it 'the expressions by means of which now for long we have lied to our rulers'. (R.) See Plutarch, How to Tell a Flatterer from a Friend. Wisely did Pescennius Niger, in Spartianus [xi], reply to a man who wished to recite a panegyric upon the occasion of his being made emperor: 'Write praises of Marius or Hannibal, or of any pre-eminent general now dead, and tell what he did, that we¹ may imitate him. For the praise of the living is mere mockery, and most of all the praise of emperors, in whose power it lies to kindle hope or fear, to give advancement in public life, to condemn to death, and to declare a man an outlaw.' (M.) As to the fables of the poets, there are some, of course, who feel that they would merely suggest that the gods are above the laws, although the philosopher Sallust, De Diis et Mundo, chap. iii, offers another reason:

But why do such stories include adulteries, thieving, the enchaining of parents, and other such wicked deeds? Surely even this is not unworthy of wonder: that by means of an obvious absurdity the mind is quick to recognize the tales as chaff, and realize that the truth in such things should be buried in silence.

However this may be, it is my opinion that we can no more yield honour to Jupiter for his adulteries and violations of maidens, than we can to Messalina because she left the stews 'wearied of men, but not yet satisfied'. [Juvenal, VI. 130.] It is a worthy saying of Pindar, Olympian Odes, i [55 f.]: 'In truth it is seemly for man to say of the gods nothing ignoble.' (S.) And Isocrates, Busiris [228], calls those tales blasphemies (in which) men have told such lies about the very gods as they would never dare spread against their enemies. For they have not only accused² them of thievery, adulteries, and periods of slavery with mortals, but have invented tales about their devouring their children, emasculating their fathers, lying with their mothers, and many other 851 frightful deeds. The authors of such stories were never worthily punished, and yet they did not escape entirely some retribution. For some of them became vagabonds and beggars, others were stricken blind; yet others were banished and waged perpetual warfare against their families. Orpheus, the chief inventor of such tales, was torn to pieces.

Seneca, On the Shortness of Life, chap. xvi: 'Is it not adding fuel to our vices to name the gods as their authors, and to offer our distempers free scope by giving them deity for an example?' (S.) Fulgentius, Mythology, Bk. I [55-7]: 'If gods presided over thievery, crimes would have no need of a judge, since misdemeanours would have divine authority.'

14. Furthermore, all these foundations of intensive esteem in themselves produce nothing more than an imperfect right to receive honour and respect from others, and so if a man has denied them to others, even when they have well deserved them, he cannot be said to have done these men an injury, but only to have laid himself open to the censure of inhumanity or, if we may so speak, of incivility. For it does not appear how, among those who live in a state of natural liberty and so are naturally equal to each other, one man can by any right of his own demand honour of another, since by reason of the natural love which every man entertains for himself and his own, he is perfectly free to feel that his own endowments are in every respect as good as those upon which another preens himself, or even superior. For instance, one man calls attention to his grey hairs. but another holds that his youthful vigour more than counteracts them. Pindar, Olympian Odes, IV [26 f.]: 'Even young men full often find their hair growing grey, even before the fitting time of life.' (S.) One person is as proud of his hopes as another of his accomplishments. Ajax is emboldened by his physical strength, but Ulysses holds that he himself is far to be preferred by reason of his prudence and persuasiveness, for, as he says in Sophocles, Ajax [1251 f.]:

¹ [For non read nos.—Tr.]

² [For exdobarunt read exprobrarunt.—Tr.]

'Tis not the brawny, big,
Broad-shouldered men who prove the best at need;
The wise and prudent everywhere prevail. (S.)

One man boasts of his wealth, while another holds his mental endowment worth as much as the treasures of kings. This man glories in his learning, another replies in the words of Plato, Epistles, x [p. 358 c]: 'Steadfastness and loyalty and sincerity, that, say I, is the genuine philosophy.' (P.) This man boasts of the honours which he has won, another rejoins with the remark of Cicero, Letters to Friends, Bk. III, ep. xiii: 'The outward rewards of virtue many have attained without possessing virtue.' (S.) Still another chants the saying of Euripides, Phoenician Maidens [442]:

For the high-born in poverty is naught, (W.)

and laughs at those whose endowment the same writer, in his Electra [37-8], describes as

Noble in line, but poor in this world's goods. (W.*)

Nay, finally, wise men think it just as foolish to rate men by their wealth, dignities, honours, and everything that lies outside the man himself, as to value a horse by his saddle and bridle.¹

Furthermore, since a man accords honour by reason of the fact that he recognizes some outstanding excellence in another, and voluntarily submits to him for that reason, and since he cannot be made by force to do so, that method being more inclined to confirm him in his resistance, it is obvious that it is inappropriate to accord to such foundations in themselves the force of a perfect right, which can be asserted even by violence and the sword. For the respect which is forced from a man by the power of sovereignty, is a sign not of any real honour for him, but of a fear of death. Again, the mere external signs of honour, unless they arise from submission of the mind, are empty things, which savour more of mockery than of honour, and it would be folly to rush to arms merely because of their refusal; especially if the other claims that his failure to show respect is not due to contempt, but to his desire to enjoy his liberty, which allows him not to be forced to such things as should depend upon his own discretion and humanity. And so the Scythians once said to Alexander: 'Living in vast¹ forests, may we not remain ignorant who you are, and whence you come?' [Curtius, VII. viii. 16.] And in Caesar, Gallic War, Bk. I [xxxiv. 2], Ariovistus replied to Caesar: 'If he had need of aught from Caesar, he would have come to him, and if Caesar desired aught of him, he ought to come to him.' (E.) In much the same manner Vologeses, king of the Parthians, when summoned into the presence of Nero, replied to him: 'It is far easier for you than for me to traverse so great a body of water. Therefore, if you will come to Asia, we can then arrange when to meet each other.' (F.*) Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio [LXIII. vii].

¹ [Derived probably from Epictetus, Discourses, III. xiv. 12 (cf. fr. 18), in the Loeb Classical Library edition.—Tr.]

From all this it seems patent, that, even if it be agreeable to natural reason for honour to be accorded to outstanding individuals (nay, if any one so desires, we would list the according of honour to the more worthy as one of the precepts of natural law), that duty should, none the less, be included among those which a man cannot require by his own right, but any praise which he gains from their being performed in his behalf must be left to the goodwill of the other party. But if a man is to be able in his own right to demand of another honour, or some sign of respect, he must either hold sovereignty over him, or have secured such a right by pact or law which has been issued or approved by their common lord. This is illustrated by the account found in Mandelslo, Itinerarium, Pt. II, that when the Portuguese and the king of Cochin were arranging terms of peace after a long war, the parleys were delayed for a long time, because the Indian nobles, called Nairi, demanded that the Portuguese make way before them as their common folk in India are forced to do. When the Portuguese held that to be unworthy of them, the issue was finally left to a single combat. This was won by the Portuguese warrior, and as a result the Nairi were obliged to make way before the Portuguese and to stand until they had passed by.

15. Yet the most worthy contest between private citizens over honours and eminence, would be for them to contend as to which would be the more quick to pay honour, and which the more modest in declining it. And fun is very properly made of those who strive about such honour with great heat, especially when it is an empty distinction and connected with no substantial return. He is a foolish person who 'struggles for the distinction of walking foremost through the midst of the mud'. (A.) Martial, Bk. X, ep. x [8]. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. III, chap. xxxvii:

¹ [For vaestis read vastis.—Tr.]

When you are not given a sufficiently distinguished place at table you have begun to be angry with your fellow guests, with your host, and with him who is preferred above you. Idiot! What difference can it make what part of the couch you rest upon? Can a cushion give you honour or take it away? (S.)

Worthy of commendation is the remark of that prince to two of his meanest slaves who were contending for the first seat in a temple, that the one who surpasses the other in folly should have it. Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xvi. For when Quintilian, Declamations, cclii, calls honour 'the most precious possession of the poor', that is to be understood only of simple esteem, since we are well aware that no better excuse has been found in any generation for struggles between princes and entire nations, than that about the degree of dignity, and its natural consequence, precedence. So that to practically every man is applicable the saying of Ovid, Fasti, Bk. V [298]: 'We that inhabit the heavens are an ambitious set.' (R.)

The arguments which are usually advanced in such quarrels deserve a little closer consideration. This much is beyond question, that, if one prince is dependent upon another as his superior, the latter is the more noble, and deserves by perfect right precedence over the other, even though they both may enjoy an equal title. Thus there are instances of greater kings who have under them others entitled kings, although they are really no more than magistrates and governors of provinces. Some acknowledge their kingdoms to be under the feudal overlordship of others, while some hold them under one title, some under another. Thus in Tacitus, Agricola [xiv], it is called an 'old and long received principle of Roman policy, which employs kings among the instruments of servitude'. (H.) Adherbal says in Sallust, Jugurtha [xiv]: 'My sire Micipsa admonished me on his death-bed to consider that I was only a steward of the kingdom of Numidia, but that the right and authority were in your (the Fathers of the Senate) hands.' (R.) And whoever is leagued with another by an unequal treaty, acknowledges through that act that the dignity of the other is superior, 853 because he pledges that he will give due respect to the other's majesty. And it is, furthermore, unquestioned, that, when a prince in his own person, or as the head of his state, has secured over another a right of greater dignity and precedence, whether by a pact, or when the other has allowed it for some time, and has submitted to it (for which right no more likely reason can be advanced than that the inferior recognizes the other as more worthy), the former can maintain it so long as he lives, since he embodies the dignity under which that right was acquired. See Jacques Godefroy, De Praecedentia, Pt. I, chap. i. Add also the arguments presented by the French and Spanish speakers in Andr. Maurocenus, Historia Veneta, Bk. VIII, pp. 301 ff., and the anonymous¹ work entitled Mémoires touchant les Ambassadeurs, p. 328, where the writer correctly observes that a third party should not take to himself to settle controversies which are concerned among other things with matters of precedence.

16. But when a man has not as yet secured such a right as we have just described, various arguments can be urged for a greater dignity. Among these first place is usually accorded the great age of the kingdom and its ruling house, the extent and wealth of its possessions and their power, the quality of the power whereby the prince holds sovereignty in his kingdom, and the splendour of his title. Age is commonly held to add a certain veneration to state and ruling lines, and those who rest upon such claims boast that they already enjoyed their dignity when other kingdoms constituted but an humble portion of the subject population of a foreign empire, or when that family which now glories in its newly acquired crown, lay lost in the obscurity of the common sort; that it is forbidden to contend with the dignity of a prince whose ancestors could have used those of rival princes as their servants; that it is a kind of natural and common law for things of later origin to be subject to those of earlier. From such claims they pass to a magnificent recital of the mighty deeds wrought by that kingdom or ruling house in war and peace, of the like of which those upstarts can show little or nothing. Might also adds terror to veneration, and it seems not only imprudent but even rash to undertake to challenge the dignity of one who holds in his hands the power to aid us as well as to do us harm; and it is regarded as a most effective way to secure honours for one to be able to point to his sword and say, 'If you will not grant them, this will' [Suetonius, Augustus, xxvi. 1, inexactly].

Moreover, it is considered a greater honour for one to enjoy full liberty, and be subject to none but God, than to live under the control of the laws and pacts of men. And, finally, since a thing itself is usually expressed by a title, the splendour and greatness of such a title is held to establish a dignity that is its equal. See also Andr. Maurocenus, Historia Veneta, Bk. XII, p. 484, where he describes the rivalry of the princes of Italy upon the occasion when Pope Pius V granted Cosimo the title of Grand Duke, and Petrus Suavis, History of the Council of Trent, Bk. V, p. 402.

¹ [By Abraham de M. Wicquefort. See § 24 below.—Tr.]

17. Now although these and similar arguments can be advanced with great plausibility, it must be confessed that they all of themselves produce but an imperfect right, unless they are supported by some express or tacit pact, which is understood to reside in an established custom. Nor are there wanting considerations which can lessen the force of arguments like those which we have just set forth. It may be urged that mere age of itself has no dignity, since it means nothing but a passage of time, which can be as true of a trifling matter as of a nobler one. That all kingdoms enjoy the character of being free and independent of one another, and that how long they have been that way is of little importance. That it is true, that, for a kingdom to have flourished over a long period of time, is proof that its structure was well knit together, and that it has enjoyed an efficient administration, and that due to the kindness of fortune or the bravery of its citizens, external foes have either not arisen, or else have been repelled successfully and bravely. But that states of recent origin can be ordered and administered as successfully as old ones; nay, perhaps, even more successfully, because the good institutions of the latter have often arisen at the cost of perilous experiments, while the former can take over for their own uses the best of what has been discovered by others. That no man can secure to himself the continued kindliness of fortune, although a state may do so much as to see that evil institutions do not pave the way to its downfall. In brief, that every man should be judged by the present. The past concerns us no longer, the future not yet. That states never form into a system or council where the most recent arrival must take the lowest place, but that each of them enjoys its own liberty. That for one house to hold the sovereignty in a state over a long period, is often only a proof that the new rulers have emulated the virtue of their ancestors, and that in general its resources have made it so powerful that another has not dared to hurl it from the throne. That sometimes a family is indebted for its long possession of power to the genius of the people, which avoids revolutions and a change in the established order. Now and then the credit must go to heaven alone that 'the Metelli are consuls at Rome'. [Naevius, frag. 63 Baehrens.] Such men as have recently attained that eminence can return the old answer: 'For as to race and ancestry and the deeds that other than ourselves have done, I call these in no true sense our own.' (M.) [Ovid, Metamorphoses, [XIII. 140-1.] Likewise 'Fortune furnished the family.' Statius, Silvae, Bk. III [iii. 45]. That nothing is easier than to enter into a rich inheritance won by one's ancestors, while to win a patrimony for one's self is a task for the strong. That the first speakers owe the grandeur which they have received to the accident of birth, while they themselves owe it to their own superiority; the first speakers harp upon the past glories of others, while they themselves win renown by such as are of their own making and belong to the present. Finally, that to be king is regarded as the highest degree of nobility, and this claim can be advanced as well by a recent king as by an ancient family. It is the conclusion of Ovid [Fasti, Bk. V. 26], upon majesty: 'Of full growth was she on the very day on which she was produced.' (R.)

To all this can be applied the words of Arnobius, Bk. II [71]: 'Is it a new thing that we are doing? Well, the day will come when it will be old. Is it an old thing that you are engaged in? Yes, but when it started, it was fresh and novel.'

18. Of course power can call forth certain signs of veneration from the weaker, because it is folly in them not to yield to such as can do them harm. Thus in Spartianus, Hadrian [xv], Favorinus very wittily replied, when his friends reproached him for having done wrong in yielding to Hadrian in the matter of a word used by reputable authors: 'You are urging a wrong cause, my friends, when you do not suffer me to regard as the most learned of men the one who has thirty legions.' (M.) For as Juvenal, Satires, v [130-1], says: 'There's many a thing which a man whose coat has holes in it cannot say.' (R.) Yet if any king has sufficient strength to be able to defend his kingdom without trouble, he has no cause to yield to another, however superior the latter may be in resources, since he need neither fear the latter's hosts nor solicit aid for his own preservation. Liberty is something that all men have equally who have it at all, and it is not divided into degrees which are distinguished by extent and resources. Therefore, although one sovereign's kingdom may stretch out six hundred miles and another's but a hundred, yet the latter holds the same sovereignty in his little realm as the other does in his larger, nor does the latter attain the end of established states any less than the former. Nor need I mention the fact that mere power, as it signifies the power to injure others, does not of itself denote any such excellence as deserves to attract true veneration. For the latter carries with it a certain affection, while power to inflict injury begets hatred. Add Jacques Godefroy, De Praecedentia, Pt. I, chap. iii.

19. Furthermore, although the possession of a power that is absolute and unlimited by laws may arouse among subjects a greater respect mingled with terror, such is not the case with other princes, 855: who measure another's absolute power in relation to themselves by mere natural liberty, which of itself confers no pre-eminence upon him who has not sovereignty over another. And since a prince is to be measured not by his own rights alone, but by the condition of the state over which he rules, a prince², although limited, can enjoy such rights from the latter source as to be far more powerful than another who is absolute. Finally, titles and all kinds of words acquire their value, like money, from use, and since nothing can be found¹ in a king more excellent than supreme sovereignty, it is enough if they express that sovereignty in its native sense or common usage. The pomp or the modesty of words neither adds nor takes away anything from a fact. (Yet add George Bate, Elenchus Motuum Nuperorum in Anglia, Pt. II, pp. 246 ff., and the anonymous work, Cardinalismus, Pt. I, bk. iii, pp. 375 ff.) Thus the mere fact that the Turkish monarch is commonly called 'emperor', and the Persian 'king' in no wise² makes the former superior to the latter. To append a boastful³ string of high-sounding titles to a proper designation, although it smack of barbarity, may still, perhaps, lead more simple subjects to respect, but not others. And what did it matter, for instance, to a Roman emperor, whether Sapor, the Persian king, chose to designate himself as 'brother of the sun and moon', or of Saturn and Venus? See Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XVII, chap. v; compare Bk. XXIII, chap. vi. Add Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 10.

¹ [For '825' read '855'.—Tr.]

² [For principes read princeps.—Tr.]

20. From all this we can assert, apparently with all confidence, that no perfect obligation, which presupposes a right, properly speaking, in another, obligates a lawful and true king⁴ to yield place to another king as more honourable, even though the latter excel in the conditions just stated, or one free state to another free state, even though the latter be older and more powerful. Nay, a state governed by the people does not in itself appear inferior in dignity to a monarchy, although no one man may be found in a democracy to be compared with a king. As also the ambassador of a free state is not necessarily required to yield place to the ambassador of a king. But since there cannot be so much splendour in a vicarious and delegated dignity as in an original, nor as much dignity in a minister as in a prince, and since free states cannot meet in the same place with kings, save through ambassadors or representatives, it is evident, surely, that in every case the ambassador of a free state should yield to any king or prince who holds supreme sovereignty.

21. Yet this equality among those who are invested with supreme sovereignty does not prevent them from being able to meet, when necessary, in person or else through their representatives, or even to organize into an established council. For if one of the kings⁵ comes into the territory of another, at least the law of civility requires the latter to yield the first place to the guest in his house, unless the former happen to come as a temporary subject. For although every prince is supreme in his own territory, yet kings themselves, like ambassadors, by a kind of fiction seem to have their existence outside the territory of the king to whom and with whose consent⁶ they come, and do not

¹ [For in veniri read inveniri.—Tr.]

² [For ambitio sam read ambitosam.—Tr.]

³ [For regumad read regum ad.—Tr.]

⁴ [For inse read in se.—Tr.]

⁵ [For reverera read re vera.—Tr.]

⁶ [For concensu read consensu.—Tr.]

put off the splendour of their fortune. For I should not advise any prince to go into another's territory incognito, and without first securing permission. To be sure, Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. III, says with all confidence: 'It is no sin against public law to seize a disguised prince,' and yet I fail entirely to comprehend his reason, unless it be that such a visit may seem to indicate a suspicion of and contempt for the lord of that land.¹

When two or more princes meet in a third place, care may easily be taken that one does not appear to be preferred before another. For the rooms may be so arranged that no one can conclude what place in them is first or more honourable. With this end in view it is common 856 to use circular tables at such meetings. Ausonius, Ludus Septem Sapientum [78-80]: 'Justly did the Delphian god once mock at a silly man who asked who was the first of wise men: "Write all their names in a ring that no one shall be first or last"².' The princes may also declare at the outset that they will gather without respect to precedence, and will seat themselves promiscuously as their pleasure or chance may dictate. Thus Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. III [xxvii], recounts of the Brahmins, wise men of the Hindus: 'The sages [. . .] paid no special honour to the king, although great importance would be attached to him among Greeks and Romans, but each took the first place that he chanced to reach.' (C.) Lucian, Epistolae Saturnales [xxxii]: 'For mirth and good-fellowship it is essential that all the company be on the same footing.' (F.) Add Athenaeus, Banquet³ of the Learned, Bk. I, chap. iv. The easiest course of all is for the princes to lay aside their dignity and meet without their accustomed pomp, for in this way they show that they will neither care nor contend about their dignity. If they do not agree to this, the matter can be left to lot, on the understanding either that a member will keep the seat which he has received, or that the order thus secured shall pass around. This course is the easier if only ambassadors meet, especially since in their case there is yet another way of avoiding rivalry, if they have not all received the same but unequal ranks or powers from their princes. For when those degrees arise from mere imposition they allow most easily the greatest variations in dignity. See the anonymous work, Mémoires touchant les Ambassadeurs,⁴ p. 428. Worthy of mention is the shrewd device of Abbas, king of the Persians, who at a banquet put his Persian guests on his right and his Turkish on his left, because with the Persians the right hand is more honourable and with the Turks the left. Petrus de Valle, Itinerarium, Pt. II, ep. v. Add Jacques Godefroy, De Praecedentia, Pt. III, and the account of Petrus Suavis, Historia Concilii Tridentini, Bk. VIII, of the rivalry over precedence between the French and

¹ [For territorii read territorii.—Tr.]

³ [For Dipnosoph. read Deipnosoph.—Tr.]

² [For velimus read vel imus.—Tr.]

⁴ [M. Wicquefort. Compare § 24 below.—Tr.]

Spanish representatives at Rome and at Trent. But it should be noted in this connexion that the value of such ranks should be defined by the common consent of the princes. For if one prince would wish to invent a new rank on his own initiative, and to confer it on his representative, who would thereby undertake to claim a specific honour among other people, all the rest of the representatives will be justified in claiming that they are not bound by his pleasure. See the anonymous work just cited, pp. 534 ff. Although we must confess that a certain nonchalance in such matters is often a worthy thing: such as Agesilaus showed when he took an obscure seat in a gathering: "It is all right," he says, "I'll show that it is not the places that grace men, but men the places." (G.*) Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms [p. 208 D]; or Damonidas, who said in a similar situation: 'Well done, you have found a way to make this place also honourable.' Idem, Apophthegms [p. 191 F]. Add the remarks of the same author in his Symposiacs, Bk. I, chaps. ii, iii, and his Banquet of the Seven Wise Men.

We may add, in passing, a device of Alphonso XI, who, in order to settle an old quarrel between the states of Burgos and Toledo over precedence, said before any mention had been made of the dispute, and while he was in the act of canvassing the wishes in the council: 'I know that the people of Toledo will gladly do whatever is decided upon, and so let the people of Burgos speak.' Both sides were pleased with this speech of the king, since each felt that it was preferred above the other: the people of Toledo because the king mentioned them by name before all the rest, those of Burgos because they were the first of all to state their case. The account is in Jerónimo Osorio, De Rebus Gestis Emanuelis, Bk. I. Add also Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. III, at the beginning.

22. But if any society composed of equals is destined to stand for any time, and the individual members wish to retain their equality, while there is no desire to settle the matter of position by lot or by sequence in places, one more plan is left which is something like that of lot, and cannot work to the injury of any man's dignity, namely, let every member sit in the company in the order in which he entered 857 it. This method takes place especially in the case of such as enter an organization some time after its founding, for those who are the first to form a company have their places fixed by lot or agreement. And since so many gatherings and colleges have adopted the rule that every member take his place in the order of his reception, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 21, lays it down as a universal rule, that "The natural order followed with associates is that in which each member enters the association." Add Boecler on the passage; Digest, L. iii. 1; Code, XII. iii. 1; XII. xliii. 3; XII. v. 1; XII. iv. 2; X. liii. 10; Jacques Godefroy, De Praecedentia, Pt. II, chap. iii, §§ 17-18. In this connexion we should bear in mind that in such societies a higher or lower position in no way denotes a higher or lower dignity, but forms a mere order of precedence among such as are equal in dignity, to whom can be applied¹ the old verse: 'First and last are equal in honour.'² For the observation of Ausonius, Panegyricus ad Gratianum [xxiv]: 'There is no disgrace in being the second of two, but great glory in being the first,' applies only when the preferment is given because of greater excellence in the one preferred. But Grotius has remarked, in the passage just cited, that the same custom prevailed in early time in the assemblies of Christian rulers and peoples, as was observed in shaping the body of the entire church, namely, that those who were the first to profess Christianity took precedence over all the rest in the ecumenical councils. Some have seen fit to make this their first claim to a pre-eminence above all others, even in certain other councils and assemblies, as though it were rightfully due them.

Now although there may have been some reason for the order just mentioned in those religious gatherings, yet it does not seem necessary that the same rule be observed in all other assemblies, or that an early profession of Christianity may allow a man a dignity above others. For besides the fact that one of the precepts of the Christian faith is 'in honour to prefer one another' (Romans, xii. 10; compare Philippians, ii. 3), even in many church councils the priests have played the first role, while secular representatives have usually taken an accessory place and been bidden to observe the decrees of the others. But however this may be, the fact that in a certain assembly one man yields to another, because of a certain respect or situation which does in no wise affect his dignity in general, does not mean that he is obligated to yield to him everywhere, and in cases where that respect or situation is no longer considered. In the same way we observe that in states men belong to several organizations, and in one of them one man yields to another, while outside it or in another organization he keeps his previous position above the other.

23. Now it is perfectly obvious that sovereignty is endued with the power to assign by way of a perfect right a preferment which will prevail against him over whom it is exercised. For just as to command is a nobler thing than to obey, so it betokens a greater dignity to have another's will at the service of your will, than to adapt your way of living to another's, while I must of necessity show respect for him to whom I am indebted for my protection, and who can compel me by fear of punishment to obey his orders. And so sovereignty of itself introduces inequality among men. However, the respect due to such a rank and office may be increased by a special regard that arises from some outstanding excellence in the sovereign. Thus Nestor says in

¹ [For tinere read tenere.—Tr.]

² [Modified from Aeschylus, Agamemnon, 314.—Tr.]

Homer, Iliad, Bk. I [277 ff.]: 'Nor do thou, son of Peleus, think to strive with a king, might against might; seeing that no common honour pertaineth to a sceptred king to whom Zeus apportioneth honour' (L.L. & M.), although Achilles recognized more the leadership of Agamemnon than any sovereignty in the proper sense of the term.

But it is also obvious that the more ample and effective sovereignty 858 is, the greater the dignity with which it envelops the sovereign in the eyes of his subjects. Nay, the very duration and age of sovereignty, although of itself adding nothing to its force, increases to no little extent the dignity of a sovereign, even though that does not make it impossible for a subject to excel his lord in those¹ foundations of honour which² produce but an imperfect right. And so it was arrogance on the part of the emperor Hadrian to claim that he was the peer of all who had gained distinction in any art, or for Alexander to exclaim, upon reading in Homer that the Greeks prayed for the lot to leap forth of Ajax or Diomedes or Agamemnon: 'I would have killed the man who named me third!' [Ausonius, Panegyricus ad Gratianum, xxv.] For it is no reflection upon the glory of a general to have in his command more robust warriors than himself. And yet the reflection of Domitian in Tacitus, Agricola [xxxix], was not for nothing, namely, that 'The qualities of a good general were Imperial qualities'. (H.) But it lies within the power of the one who holds the supreme sovereignty in the state to establish a certain measure, as it were, of intensive esteem among those who dwell in his state, and to grant one person a perfect right to take precedence over another; and just as a citizen can rightfully guard that position, which has been accorded him in this way, against his fellows, so he is obligated to acquiesce in it in every respect. See Digest, I. xiv. 3. Every right attaches to the statement of the veteran centurion in Livy, Bk. XLII, chap. xxxiv: 'You ought to think every post honourable in which you act for the defence of the commonwealth.' (M.) And although one man or another may appear to have been unworthily raised above his betters, yet the man who undertakes to request another station for such, or to be restive in his own, can be punished as no better than a rebel to the supreme power of the land. See Code, XII. viii. 1. It was for this reason that, according to Diogenes Laertius, Solon likened courtiers to 'pawns'. We can well bring under this point the remark of M. Terentius in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. VI [viii]: 'It is not for us to appraise those whom you exalt above all others, or to ask why you have exalted them. To you the gods have given the supreme direction of affairs; to us has been left the glory of obedience' (R.); and that of Lucian, Judicium Vocalium [iv]:

Surely it is best for each of us to stay in the place which belongs to him: to go where no one has a right is the act of a law-breaker. The man who first framed these laws for us [. . .] decided the order in which our places are now fixed, and also the qualities and powers that each of us has. (H.)*¹

¹ [For hicee read hicee.—Tr.]

² [For quae quae read quae.—Tr.]

Pliny, Letters, Bk. IX, ep. v: '⟨There are proper⟩ distinctions of rank and dignity, and if these are once confounded and all thrown upon a level, nothing can be more unequal than that kind of equality.' (B.)*

Yet a prince may well play his part in removing the complaints of ambitious men, by not dismissing offhand, in his assignment of a more honoured position, the foundations of dignity already enumerated, and especially particular merits toward the commonwealth, which wiser princes know how to honour with a more eminent degree of esteem than money or similar rewards. See Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VIII [iv. 2], where he describes the order which Cyrus assigned to his companions. And they will be the more careful in this matter by reason of the fact that, unless the dignity and prerogative of eminent citizens are measured by the benefits and aid which they do or can render the more needy, they are to be regarded as silly and idle. But since if princes were always to assign every citizen a place in keeping with his intrinsic dignity, it would be a nuisance to them to go so often over the lists of their citizens and give them a new order, in which undertaking the larger part of them could not help being offended, since most men as a rule only take into account their superiors, and pay no heed to those who are beneath them, the most convenient course seems to be that of according distinction, at least to the outstanding citizens, by the offices which they perform in connexion with the commonwealth. Add Bacon, Essays, chap. liii. In such case no room will be left for complaints, if such offices are bestowed upon the worthy and fit (for if that is not done, the saying of Claudian, Against Eutropius, Bk. II [321-2], will be in place: 'Under such a consul what honour would not 859 be a disgrace?' (P.)), and if the order of such offices is carefully arranged. And the order of the offices in a commonwealth seems in general most proper when greater distinction is attached to a man, according as he undertakes tasks that are more serious and important, which contribute directly to the real act of governing, and that call into play the most noble arts of the mind. Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. XIII [366-7]: '[. . .] He who directs a ship surpasses him who only rows it.' (M.) In Homer, Iliad, Bk. I [280-1], distinction of office is preferred to lineage and bravery, for Nestor addresses Achilles: 'Though thou be strong, and a goddess mother bare thee, yet his is the greater place, for he is king over more.' (L. L. & M.)

But it is sometimes the case that the greater honour attaches to some offices in a state, the less sovereignty and power are accorded it, and vice versa, lest wealth added to dignity may arm magistrates to the destruction of the commonwealth. See Bodin, On the

¹ [Scarcely more than a paraphrase of Lucian.—Tr.]

Republic, Bk. III, chap. vi, p. 501. Yet in individual undertakings the nobler the task which a man performs the more worthy he is esteemed. Yet it may very often be the case, that, although one office be by nature more noble than another, not each and every man who is concerned with its functioning is preferred before each and every man in the other; for instance, he who is the chief in the second office may give way before him who is head in the first, and yet be preferred before all the latter's subordinates. It is the more rare occurrence for an office to gain dignity from an incumbent, as was the case in Thebes with the position of Telearch after Epaminondas had served in that capacity. See Plutarch, Praecepta Gerendae Reipublicae [p. 211 B]. And yet on the intrinsic esteem of the trappings and dignities of honour, the statement of Sallust, Jugurtha [iv], holds true: 'Just as if a praetorship, a consulship, or anything else of the kind were distinguished and illustrious in and of itself, and were not valued according to the merit of those who live up to it.' (R.) Nor was point lacking to the story of Antisthenes, as given by Diogenes Laertius, Bk. VI [viii], who once urged the Athenians to pass a law decreeing all asses to be horses, and when they said such a proposition was silly, replied: 'And yet you make men generals who have never learned anything, and are such only by virtue of your action.'

But if the citizens themselves come to an agreement on a position, or if a certain class is introduced in a state by custom, both of these cases will have the force of law, provided they have not been contravened by the supreme sovereign. See Code, XII. viii. 2. A passage in Suetonius, Vespasian, chap. ix, deserves our notice:

To let it be known that the two orders differed from each other not so much in their privileges as in their rank, in the case of an altercation between a senator and a Roman knight, he rendered this decision: 'Unseemly language should not be used toward senators, but to return their insults in kind is proper and lawful.' (R.)

And this is in keeping with the lines of Sophocles, Ajax [1322-3]:

For my part I can pardon one Who when reviled retorts in angry words. (S.)

24. But if a comparison must be made between eminent men of different states, it is clear that in their case the foundation of intensive esteem can be caused by nothing other than their worthiness to be accorded respect by those who fall below them in the possession of such foundations. And this remains true, whether the nobler one come as a foreigner into the other's state, or they meet on neutral ground, unless in the former case the sovereign has commanded his subject to yield to the alien, or the ruler of the neutral soil where they meet has defined the order of preferment, or it has been fixed by agreement or custom. And so the eminence of an office which a citizen holds in his own state, does not of itself give him the right to rate himself above citizens of another commonwealth who enjoy the same position as he, because he had precedence in his own state, for a right which prevails against fellow citizens does not for that reason prevail against 860 others, just as the laws of other states do not bind us. Add Wicquefort, Mémoires touchant les Ambassadeurs, pp. 519 ff.

Nor is it any obstacle that this foreigner's title in his own state is superior to that of the one with whom he is contending, for it remains at the pleasure of every state to determine what value it will set within its own borders on titles and other emblems of honours which are conferred by it on others. Nay, offices by the importance of which dignities are usually measured, may have one value assigned them in one state, and another in another. Also certain sound arts are esteemed more highly in one place and less so in another. Thus everyone knows that in one country the arts of peace are rated high, in another those of war. Especially should it be observed with regard to certain words which express degrees of honour, that not only do they denote different dignities in different states, but that they rate sometimes higher and sometimes lower in the same state, just as conditions commonly raise or lower the prices of other things as well. In other words, the external signs of esteem have their value determined by the imposition of individual states, even though the foundations of intensive esteem, in themselves and as they are measured by wise men, have everywhere their own value. And so there is no place in which virtue and outstanding arts or functions have not their meed of honour. And yet no one can claim of his own right, by virtue of them alone, specific insignia of honour among foreign peoples, unless he has acquired that right by the methods described above. Yet since it is presumed that insignia of honour are everywhere accorded men by reason of their reputation for outstanding virtue, all of the most cultured nations usually accord practically the same respect to the honours of foreigners as do their native states, but they would have it appear that they do so because of civility and humanity, and not by reason of any perfect obligation. And yet there are peoples who set practically no store upon honours conferred by other nations. For Cicero [Against Verres, III. xxiii] does not directly call some foreigners, sprung of worthy families, nobles, but always designates them as such 'at home', or 'among the nobility of their land', because foreign nobility were not rated so highly at Rome as in their own state. The same orator's language is highly insolent when in his oration, For M. Fonteius [viii, at end], he says: 'If it is proper to have a regard to the men themselves, [...] is anyone, the most honourable man in all Gaul, to be compared¹ [...] even with the meanest of Roman citizens?' (Y.) Thus what man does not know how highly the ancient Greeks honoured the victors in the Olympic Games? And yet Cicero, For L. Flaccus [xiii], uses this very custom in order to criticize their frivolity¹. But the Greeks would have deserved to be laughed at if they had required that such athletes be accorded the same honour among peoples who did not rate physical strength or skill so high.

¹ [For comparandus read comparandus.—Tr.]

25. Finally, since most nations hold that some dignity attaches to birth, it would not be beyond the scope of our task to inquire with a little more care, in this connexion, as to what basis there is for nobility of blood, and what value should be put upon it, considered by itself. I suppose that nowhere is it rated higher than among the inhabitants of India, who are described by Jerónimo Osorio, De Rebus Gestis Emanuelis, Bk. II:

They believe that if a common man touches noblemen, their nobility is defiled and their caste polluted, and they avenge so slight an injury by putting to death the miserable men who have brushed against them. For this reason those who are not of the nobles are required to cry out whenever they pass down the street, while the nobles, on perceiving their approach by their cries, command them to turn off from the street, so that in this way the base-born avoid the danger of death and the nobles that of lasting pollution. Nor is it ever possible among that people for one to becloud his nobility by an evil life, or to dignify obscurity of origin by deeds of virtue, but all must of necessity remain in the same class in which their parents were.

The same nobles who are called in the Malabar tongue Nairi, claim the special privilege of lying with the wives of others when and where they please, and if anyone of them is thus engaged he makes it known by hanging a shield on the door, and the husband dare not enter his own house. Phil. Baldaeus, Description of the Island of Ceylon, 861 Malabar, and Coromandel, chap. xxvi, and De Idololatria Indorum, Pt. II, chap. xvi; Mandelslo, Itinerarium, Bk. II, chap. x. Add Abraham Rogerius, De Braminibus, chaps. i, ii; Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxiv.

Now it is perfectly clear that noble birth of itself does not impart a more excellent bodily frame (although often enough good nourishment may have some effect), or a more outstanding mind and remarkable force of character, but that all these qualities can come just as well from common birth. Nor does nature vary her process in the creation of nobles and commons, but the marriages of commons can, or should be, attended with the same sanctity as those of nobles. Nor can one easily show that the canopied couches of the rich are less defiled by adulteries than the simple beds of the poor. Nay, Euripides, Hippolytus [409-410], says of adulteries:

Ah, 'twas from princely homes
That first this curse on womankind had birth. (W.)

¹ [For leviatem read levitatem.—Tr.]

And so, even if the virtue of parents were always passed on to their offspring, many would still have the greatest difficulty in proving that their blood had been passed down to them from the founder of their family uncontaminated and without mixture with that of others. See Dio Chrysostom, Orations, XV [lxv], near the beginning [4]; Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 8. Nor is the common saying: 'The brave are begotten of the brave and good,' so inviolable a rule that the opposite saying may not hold as good, namely, that 'The children of great men are their undoing'. It is a saying of Marius in Sallust, Jugurtha [lxxv. 38]:

Their ancestors have left them all they could—riches, portrait busts, their own illustrious memory; virtue they have not left them, nor could they have done so; that alone is neither bestowed nor received as a gift. (R.)

Furthermore, commoners are not always less educated than nobles; nay, often the more advantages the latter have been granted by fortune for the superior cultivation of the mind, the worse they abuse them in luxury, idleness, and the service of other vices. With justice does Plato, Alcibiades, I [p. 120 E], say: 'Those who are well-born and well-bred are most likely to be perfect in nature' (J.), and experience records that many degenerate nobles have sullied the glory of their ancestors. Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. II, chap. xv [3]: 'Being well-born, which means coming of a fine stock, must be distinguished from nobility, which means being true to the family nature—a quality not usually found in the well-born, most of whom are poor creatures.' (R.) Add Stobaeus, Anthology, lxxxiv–lxxxv. It is well known that many men of obscure birth have by their virtue attained the highest pinnacle of success: The son of Tydeus was not the only one to be 'greater than his father'. Although Isocrates, Praise of Helen, commends nobility for the reason that it does not, like other¹ blessings of fortune, either quickly pass or else pass on to others, but always remains in the same hands, and for that reason is the fairest heritage one may leave his sons; still we may add that unless a man builds his nobility upon his own virtue, or by reason of it enjoys special rights in a state, it must justly be counted an empty thing. Therefore, there appears no necessity in nature itself why a son should succeed to the offices of his father, or enjoy his degree of esteem because of birth alone, especially since in the last analysis we all trace our family to the same stem. Marius says in Sallust, Jugurtha [lxxxv. 15]: 'For my part, I believe that all men have one and the same nature, but that the bravest is the best born.' (R.) And a man will be rated not by the excellence of his ancestors so much as by his own, if he follows the advice of Tibullus [Elegies], Bk. IV [i. 25 ff.]:

For though thou hast distinctions abundant in thy ancient family, thy thirst for fame is not to be sated with the renown of ancestors, nor dost thou ask what saith the scroll

¹ [For uticas read ut i cetera.—Tr.]

beneath each mask; but thou strivest to surpass the olden honours of thy line, thyself a greater lustre to posterity than ancestry to thee. (P.)

26. Nevertheless, many states have seen fit to allow citizens of outstanding merit to pass down to their descendants by birth, or some manner of inheritance, that status in which the commonwealth has placed them, along with its special privileges and degree of esteem. Lesbonax, Oratio Hortatoria [II. 12, 13]: 'The children of men who show their mettle in the face of adversities are called well-born.' For it is certain that noble birth has by nature no excellence above common, but its prerogative springs from the imposition and endowment of a state, to which are attached certain rights, and a certain degree of esteem, when once conferred upon a man, can be handed down to his posterity by birth alone, without any renewal of the grant. And when this imposition is done away with, even the most splendid birth will in no wise differ from that of a commoner. Add Huarteres¹, Scrutinium Ingeniorum, chap. xvi, p. 488 ff. Therefore, when a prince transfers a commoner to the nobility, he works no change in the man's nature and origin, nor does he endow his mind with any new vigour, but he merely commands that the man be put in a class distinct from the commons, which together with its rights he can in the future hand down to his posterity. This may be well illustrated by a device of Amasis, king² of Egypt, who, in order to prove that the obscurity of his birth was no reason why he should not be accorded honour, now that he was king, had a gold basin made into an image of a god and set up for worship. Herodotus, Bk. II [clxxi]. On the other hand, if a noble is deposed from his rank by reason of his crimes, or because he had not conformed to the laws ordained for nobles in his state, it is equally certain that neither his nature nor his mind are changed, nor the blood which he received from his ancestors, and that his noble parentage is not done away with, but he loses only his status and the right accorded to nobility in that commonwealth. When this is done, he becomes at once a commoner. In the same way neither legitimation nor restitution of birth works any change in a man's nature, but only gives rise to moral effects. This is the sense in which the lines of Euripides, Phoenician Maidens [814 ff.], are to be understood:

Nay, not the unblest spousal's fruit
Are sons true-born, but with stain they pollute
Their begetter, the stock that sprang from the self-same root. (W.)

See Code, VI. viii. A case in point is given by Niccolò Machiavelli, Storie Fiorentine, Bk. III: After the Duke of Athens had been overcome, and the government of Florence had been taken over again by the commons, and the nobles had been forbidden by law to hold any office, a certain Benchi of the family of the Boundelmonti, of knightly rank, was granted the special favour, because of his excellent services performed in the war with Pisa, of being enrolled among the people, that is, of being regarded as a commoner. There is an account, in Book V, of the same privilege being accorded to other nobles, and among the Romans P. Clodius passed by adoption from the patricians to the plebeians, so that he could become¹ tribune of the plebs.

¹ [For Huarterus read Huarteres.—Tr.]

² [For regiae read regis.—Tr.]

27. But it must be confessed that, in conferring nobility, most nations have had regard to certain outstanding arts and unusual merits. And just as he who had distinguished himself in them justly surpassed all others in dignity, so it was held that his virtue was accorded greater distinction when its rewards were also passed on to those whom every man holds most dear, especially since it was hoped that such a course would arouse the virtue of citizens, by inciting them to a more eager pursuit of such rewards. At the same time it was believed that their children would be quickened by the examples within their family to rival the virtue of their parents, and to guard that splendour by the same achievements with which it was won. No less did they feel that parents would concern themselves, so far as in them lay, to return to the state children which would not disgrace them. The result of all this was, that after it became customary for nobility to be acquired by mere fortune of birth, nobles became exacting in the choice of their wives, in order that they might not prejudice those rights of their offspring by uniting with persons of inferior rank, and this either in order that the daughters of equals rather than of inferiors should be called to share in that dignity, or that those of poverty-stricken nobles should not 863 be passed over for the heiresses of wealthy merchants. Moreover, there was reason to keep an accurate record of a long series of ancestors, lest questions some day might be raised about the birth of their descendants, while, on the contrary, it would be idle for the commons to keep a careful register of their ancestors, since no privilege attaches to their birth, and every man is thrown upon his own virtue and industry.

28. To illustrate these points it may not be amiss to inquire with some care into the Roman institutions on nobility. When Romulus undertook to reduce that well-known medley of men of his into the form of a real people, he chose out of the entire body one hundred men to serve as his immediate council, whom he saw fit to denominate Patres [fathers], in order to signify either their position or age, while all the others remained the plebs. The descendants of the former were called patricians, a very simple designation, signifying the offspring of the 'patres', or, as others hold, because they alone were able to point out their fathers, while the rest was a band of renegades who could not show that their fathers were free born—in a word, they were children of the soil. See Plutarch, Romulus [xiii]; Roman Questions [p. 278 c d]. They offer as proof of this that whenever the patricians were summoned by the kings, criers called each of them by his own and his father's name, while certain officers called the plebeians to assembly as a body by blowing of trumpets made of ox-horns. Yet Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in his usual fashion, Roman Antiquities, Bk. II [viii], gives a kinder turn to this institution, by saying that the patricians were summoned by criers, as a point of honour, and the plebs by a horn to save time. But the statement of Decius in Livy, Bk. X, chap. viii, seems to outweigh that of Dionysius:¹

¹ [For fiere read fieri.—Tr.]

Have ye never heard it said, that the first created patricians were not men sent down from heaven, but such as could cite their fathers, that is, nothing more than free born? I can now cite my father, a consul; and my son will be able to cite a grandfather. (S.)

Juvenal, Satires, viii [272 ff.]:

Yet, after all, however far you may trace back your name, however long the roll, you derive your race from an ill-famed asylum: the first of your ancestors, whoever he was, was either a shepherd or something that I would rather not name. (R.)

And so it appears that what was sufficient to obtain primitive nobility in the city of Rome, was that a person be born of lawful wedlock and of free parents, for, as Livy, Bk. I, chap. xxxiv, says: '[. . .] Amongst a new people, all rank is of sudden growth and founded on worth.' (F.) And that was the reason why the patricians claimed that they alone had any family (gens), and were related by family (gentiles) to one another. For the term gentiles is thus defined by Cicero, Topics [vi]:

Those are gentiles who are of the same name as one another [. . .] and who are born of noble blood [. . .] who have never had any ancestor in the condition of a slave [. . .] who have never parted with their franchise. (Y.)

And Boethius, On Cicero's Topics, says as much:

The gentiles are such as bear the same name, such as the Brutuses and Scipios; but if they are slaves they cannot be gentiles. Yet the descendants of freedmen are not gentiles, even though they all go by the same name, since gentilitas is derived from a long line of free-born² citizens.

Gaius the Jurisconsult says in the Institutes: 'There is no gentilitas among freedmen or slaves.' Although it is well known that in later times the plebeians also laid claim to gentes or families. Add François Connan, Commentaria Juris Civilis, Bk. II, chap. xi. And so to this day, in the languages which have come down from the Latin, nobles are commonly called gentlemen (gentiles homines). But when the plebeians later began to contract lawful marriages with the nobility, and in the course of time that blemish, if there ever was such, of low origin began to disappear, the patricians undertook to distinguish themselves from the plebeians in another way, and to surround the sacred institutions of their families with a peculiar sanctity. On this score they claimed that they alone could hold the magistracies, because they alone could hold the auspices. See Livy, Bk. IV, chap. ii; VI. xlii; X. vii. But this pretence the plebs later justly exploded, although certain plebeians as well, in order to set at naught that prerogative of the patricians, established their own religious institutions. But since these involved some burden, as they passed down in the family, they were done away with by the process of mock sales, which is explained by Cicero, For Murena [ii]. Add Godefroy on Cicero, Letters to Friends, Bk. VII, ep. xxix.

¹ [For Dioneysium read Dionysium.—Tr.]

² [For ingeniorum read ingenuorum.—Tr.]

29. But afterwards, when the senatorial dignity and the magis-
 864 tracies, both of which had up to that time been held only by patricians, were thrown open to plebeians, it came about that the Romans began to measure nobility not so much by the age of the family and its patrician origin, as by the number of images of illustrious members of the house, and from that time on noble families began to be distinguished as patricians and plebeian. Livy, Bk. X, chap. vii: '[. . .] There might be numbered triumphs of the plebeians; the commons had now no reason to be dissatisfied with their own nobility.' (S.) Idem, Bk. VI, chap. xxxvii: 'From that day everything in which the patricians surpassed them, would flow in on the commons, power and honour, military glory, birth, nobility.' (S.) Now the knights were not, properly speaking, nobles by the institutions of the Roman commonwealth, for the statement of Tacitus, Agricola, that both of Agricola's grandfathers had been procurators of Caesar, 'which is the nobility of the knights', means only, that, as the nobility of those who belong to the families of senators is judged by occupation of the curule magistracies, so to have been a procurator of Caesar constituted a claim to nobility among the knights, since after the prefecture of the pretorian guard no more splendid office fell to that order as such. And so in later times the nobles at Rome did not form a special order, distinguished from the others by distinct rights, but if a man had lined the atrium of his home with 'grimy Dictators and Masters of the Horse', (R.) [Juvenal, Satires, viii. 8], or had raised himself to honours by his own virtue, he was held noble by the merits of his ancestors, or his own, respectively. On this point bear the lines of Claudian, Panegyricus de Probinus et Olybrii Consulatu [13 ff.]: 'Select what man thou wilt from their family, 'tis certain he is a consul's son. Their ancestors are counted by the fasces¹, the same recurring honours crown them.' (P.*)

Now although many magistracies at Rome were no less important in war than in peace, such as that of the dictator, master of the horse, consul, and praetor, yet because peace is, as it were, the ordinary state of a commonwealth, and war the extraordinary, and so those magistracies both in their name and nature seemed to breathe a spirit of peace rather than war, it appears that the Roman nobility owed its origin to peace more than to war. Nor, indeed, would it have been appropriate for a virtue that was concerned only with war and not connected with the position and skill of the commander, to give rise to a nobility which would have established a peculiar order, and one distinguished by many rights, in a state where practically the common profession of all the citizens was military. And so we may conclude that among the Romans nobility did not establish a peculiar order in the state, and conferred practically no other privilege than that the images of ancestors rendered the passage to positions of honour more easy.

¹ [For perfasces read per fasces.—Tr.]

30. It is obvious from all this, that the character of the Roman nobility was different from that which now obtains in most of the kingdoms of Europe. For with us the nobles form a special order, distinguished from the rest of the citizens in dignity and peculiar rights. Furthermore, our nobility is not dependent upon public office, but is conferred by him who wields the supreme sovereignty in the commonwealth, not so often with regard to the virtues of peace as those of war, one proof of which, among others, is that noble families usually distinguish themselves from one another, as well as from the commons, by signs borne upon a shield underneath a helmet, which are for that reason called 'arms'. The antiquity of these can be established by a passage in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. V, chap. xxx:

The defensive arms of the Gauls are a shield, proportionable to the height of a man, garnished with their own designs. Some carry the shapes of beasts in bronze, artificially wrought, as well for defence as ornament. Upon their heads they wear helmets of bronze, with large pieces of work raised upon them for ostentation's sake, to be admired by the beholders; for they have either horns of the same metal joined to them, or the shapes of birds and beasts carved upon them. (B.*)

Add Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. x. On the reasons why these nations have laid such emphasis upon martial bravery, while among the Chinese, on the other hand, scholars take precedence over soldiers, our conclusion must be as follows. Certainly the contributions in themselves made by civilians to the state can be as valuable as those made by men in uniform. To formulate beneficial laws, to deliver justice without favour, to increase the resources of a state by the arts and by commerce, to calm by one's eloquence the inflamed minds of a people and turn them into a better course, to study in advance and evade with wise counsel the attempts of other nations upon us, are surely works worthy of distinction and all honour. And yet these accomplishments are not always rated high enough, especially among the uninstructed, both because the arts from which they flow are not so apparent to the eyes, and can scarcely be understood by the common people, and because they seem to unfold themselves with a certain calm and peace, and without violence and peril. It is entirely different with martial virtue. And so, although civil administration cannot be undertaken without strength and firmness of mind, yet peoples of warlike spirit, and such as have chosen to gain what they have by blood rather than sweat, hold it far more glorious to offer an intrepid breast and expose to peril man's most precious possession, life itself, to the terrors of battle, where every moment threatens instant death, so that the rest of mankind may spend their days the more securely. Add Aristotle, Problems, Sec. xxvii, qu. 5. And so in most of the kingdoms of Europe nobles hold their lands by feudal right, and enjoy immunity in their possessions from many burdens which weigh upon the possessions of the commons, so that they may be of military service to the state. A suggestion as to the origin of this custom is to be found in Lampridius, Alexander Severus [lviii]:

The lands taken from the enemy were presented to the leaders and soldiers of the frontier-armies, with the provision that they should continue to be theirs only if their heirs entered military service, and that they should never belong to civilians, for, he said, men serve with greater zeal if they are defending their own land too. (M.)

It is for this reason as well that nobles rarely turn to business occupations; not because such imply in themselves anything dishonourable or base, but that they may avoid being drawn away from their military studies thereby, and thus from possessing their fiefs and privileges gratis. And wherever there are states in which the noble turn to trade without losing any of their dignity, you may safely conclude that such a nobility does not owe its origin to military distinction. Compare Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. III, chap. viii, p. 560, although some find the reason for this in Ecclesiasticus, xxv. 29, and from the fact that, as Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xlii], expresses it: 'They never can succeed unless they lie most abominably.' (E.) It may be observed that, according to Herodotus, Bk. II, among the Egyptians, Scythians, Persians, and Lydians, and in fact among practically all non-Greek peoples, those who have acquired the manual arts, and their children, were considered citizens of a baser breed, while those who refrained from manual labour, and especially such as did so because of duties in war, were accounted more noble. Add Code, XII. i. 6; IV. lxiii. 3; Aristotle, Politics, Bk. III, chap. iii; Ecclesiasticus, xxxviii. 25 ff.; Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xlii]: '[. . .] Ungenteel and mean are the gains of all hired workmen, whose source of profit is not their art but their labour; for their very wages are the consideration of their servitude.' (E.) Nay, Livy, Bk. XXI, chap. lxiii, records that the tribune Q. Claudius passed a law at Rome, that:

No senator, or he who had been father of a senator, should possess a ship fit for sea service, of more than three hundred amphorae burden. This size was considered sufficient for conveying the produce of their lands: all traffic appeared unbecoming a senator. (S.)

Juvenal, Satires, xiv [269], speaks with scorn of the 'contemptible trafficker in stinking wares'. (R.) And, in fact, it is at times regarded as ignominious to undertake to get something from a man by paying him. Yet add Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. III, chap. viii, p. 546 ff.

31. Yet in some states little heed is given to birth, and every man's nobility is derived from his own virtue, and what he has done for the state in private and public capacity. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xcii, in speaking of the funeral orations among the Egyptians, says:

They say nothing of his birth, as is custom among the Greeks, because they account all in Egypt to be equally noble. But they recount how the deceased was educated from a child, his breeding till he came to man's estate, his piety towards the gods, and his justice 866 towards men, his chastity and other virtues, wherein he excelled. (B.*)

Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. III [xi], ascribes these words to Tullus Hostilius: 'For we look upon the nobility of men to consist in nothing but virtue.' (S.) It is the opinion of an ancient poet, that: 'A noble man may not in any wise be base-born.' [Menander, Monostichs, 30, p. 931.] Ogier Busbecq [Letters of the Turkish Embassy], i, says of the customs of the Turks: 'They rate no one of their nation by anything but his own virtues; only their ruling house is excepted, and allowed preferment of birth.' Add what he records there of the Janissaries. Add also Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. III, chap. viii, p. 557. Martinius, Historia Sinica, Pref.: 'This nation accords no nobility to mere family lineage. The poorest man may by learning make his way to the pinnacle of fame.' Even the emperor of the Chinese and his children pay no heed to family in choosing their wives, but look to their beauty alone. Neuhof, Legatio, p. 280.

Now such customs may perhaps be abhorrent to ours, and yet wise men teach that nobles should not depend upon lineage alone, but much more upon virtue. Seneca, Hercules Raging [339-340]:

He who boasts
His noble ancestry exalts a thing
Which is not his to boast. (M.)

Boethius, De Consolatione Philosophiae [III. vi]:

Why brag you of your stock? Since none is counted base,¹
If you consider God the author of your race,
But he that with foul vice doth his own birth deface. (S.)

Horace, Satires, Bk. I, sat. vi, To Maecenas: 'You say that if a man be himself free-born it matters not what his parents were.' (W.) Claudian, De Laudibus [Consolatu] Stilichonis, Bk. VII [II. 122 f.]: 'Thou exaltest men of all countries, asking what are their merits not their place of birth, what their character not whence their origin.' (P.) Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. III, chap. xxviii; Letters, xlv. Canuleius says, in Livy, Bk. IV, chap. iii: 'Whilst no class of persons is disdained, in whom conspicuous merit may be found, the Roman dominion increased.' (S.) Herodian, Bk. V, chap. i:

¹ [For de genere read dégener.—Tr.]

The gifts of fortune adorn even those who are far from worthy of them, but mental and moral virtue wins for any man glory as his own abiding possession. So a distinguished family, wealth, and everything else of that sort, although people are congratulated for them, are not made the subject of praise, because they have been given by another.

It was a harsh answer of Antigonus to the worthless son of a brave captain, when he aspired to honours: 'It is my way to reward my soldiers for their valour not their parentage.' (G.) Plutarch, De Vitioso Pudore [xiv], and Apophthegms [183 D]. Plato, Theaetetus [p. 175 A]: '[. . .] Every man has had thousands and thousands of progenitors, and among them have been rich and poor, kings and slaves, Hellenes and barbarians, many times over.' (J.) A similar thought is found in Dio Chrysostom, Orations, XV [xi]:

It is impossible [. . .] that from the beginning of the world there was ever a race of men in which there was not an infinite number of men born free, and a number no smaller than that who have been slaves; and tyrants, kings, bond, branded, tradesmen, cobblers, and of every other station that there is among men; who have had experience of all the activities and kinds of lives, as well as all the fortunes and misfortunes that there are.

He adds that the reason why the poets trace the lineage of heroes to the gods was because they feared that, if they went back too far, disgraces of this kind would be uncovered. M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. I, cont. vi [I. iv] [4]: 'Look up any¹ famous man you please; you will come upon a humble station.' The point is illustrated by the story of Lycurgus endeavouring to show by the example of two dogs that we are inclined to virtue more by discipline than by nature. Plutarch, Apophthegms [p. 225 F], and De Liberis Educandis [p. 3 A]. So also men who have risen from the ranks can well give the same reply to nobles of ancient but degenerate families, that Iphicrates made to a certain Harmodius, a descendant of the old family of that name, when the latter chided him upon his mean birth: 'My nobility begins in me, but yours ends in you.' (G.) Plutarch, Apophthegms [p. 187 B]. Add Philo Judaeus, On Nobility; Stobaeus, Anthology, lxxxiv-lxxxvii. Thomas Browne, Religio Medici, Pt. II, chap. i:

Neither in the name of multitude do I only include the base and minor sort of people; there is a rabble even amongst the gentry; a sort of plebeian heads, whose fancy moves with the same wheel as those; men in the same level² with mechanics, though their fortunes do somewhat gild their infirmities, and their purses compound for their follies.

- 867 There are also some who argue that it appears unjust, because of birth alone, which can of itself bestow no virtue, and can be won by no man of his own endeavour (Euripides, Electra [551]: 'For many nobly born be knaves in grain' (W.)), to grant a man immunity from certain burdens of the state to the prejudice of the rest of the citizens, or open to them an easier entrance to the rewards of the commonwealth, since the arts necessary to meet such tasks are found as much or more in others than in them; and all the more if he be of the number of those to whom may be applied the lines of Aristophanes, The Frogs, Act III, sc. i, line 2 [739-40]:

¹ [For Quemcumque read Quemcumque.—Tr.]

² [For contribue read contribule.—Tr.]

Of course, a gentleman.

He's all for wine and women, is my master. (R.); and those of Juvenal, Satires, xi [11]: 'Men whose sole reason for living lies in their palate.' (R.) They would say, in fact, that a state suffers from no light disease, if the supreme civil power is so drawn and bound to a certain social class, in assigning its affairs of state, that it cannot avail itself of the service of other citizens in matters for which they are recognized to be particularly suited; especially when that power is not allowed to choose able men for this social class. For if any prince finds himself forced to favour the nobles only in order that by their aid he may be better able to restrain the rest of his subjects, this is evidence that his power¹ is tottering and has almost completely lost control, since he is forced to join a conspiracy, as it were, with a part of his citizens, and depends no longer on open authority but on cunning designs. Add also Bacon, *Essays*², chap. xiv, and The Advancement of Learning, Bk. VIII, chap. iii, n. 3, where he advises 'those kingdoms which aspire to greatness to beware lest the nobles be made too numerous'.

32. We may now inquire, last of all, whether as dignity and badges of honour in a state depend on the supreme civil power for their origin, the same is true of their duration. Here it is our opinion that we must consider whether badges of honour and rights are connected solely with some office in a commonwealth, which the supreme sovereignty may confer as it sees fit, or whether they are conferred upon a citizen as his own personal possession. It is patent, when the first is the case, that the supreme³ sovereignty possesses the same power as in the appointment and removal of magistrates. So⁴ Fabius Cunctator not only showed an example⁵ of his tolerance, but also paid tribute to the power⁶ of the state, when, as Dictator, he suffered the appointment of a Master of Horse with the same power as his own. See Livy, Bk. XXII, chap. xv, xxii. Here applies a saying of Solon, in Diogenes Laertius [I. 59], which is also given by Polybius, Bk. V, chap. xxvi:

Those who had influence with tyrants were like the pebbles which are used in making calculations; for that every one of those pebbles were sometimes worth more, and sometimes less, and so the tyrants sometimes made each of these men of consequence, and sometimes neglected them. (Y.)

¹ [For poestatis read potestatis.—Tr.]

³ [For sommo read summo.—Tr.]

⁵ [For spe specimen read specimen.—Tr.]

² [For sermou read sermones.—Tr.]

⁴ [For Si read Sic.—Tr.]

⁶ [For potestaem read potestatem.—Tr.]

We should add here the act of Amasis, king of Egypt, as recorded in Herodotus, Bk. II [clxxii], when he made a statue of one of their gods out of a basin. And it is on such an understanding that we allow the statement of Cicero, For Plancius [iv]: 'This is the inalienable privilege of a free people, [. . .] to be able by their votes to give or to take away what they please to or from any one.' (Y.) Although the word detrahere appears to signify more the denial of a requested honour than the taking away of an honour already acquired.

But when such distinctions are held by citizens in the second way, they cannot regularly be deprived of them, save by way of punishment. This is illustrated by the saying of Aristotle in Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. XIV, chap. i: 'It is not the same sort of thing never to take on high office, and to be robbed of it, after you have accepted of it. For it is no misfortune not to get it, but when you have once got it, to lose it again, that is a trial.' Here belongs also what is given by Dio Chrysostom, in his Rhodian Oration. But whatever immunities and privileges are connected with honours can be suspended or removed entirely, as the condition of the state requires, provided compensation be made so far as is possible; because all such privileges are understood to be conditioned upon the highest necessity of the commonwealth, and it would be absurd for them to be attributed 868 such sanctity that they should not yield even to the safety of the commonwealth. It may also be gathered, from what has been set forth, as to how far any state can decree that the children of traitors shall be ἀτριοι [deprived of all civic rights], such as was decreed in Athens against Antiphon, as we learn from his biography, while in Rome Sulla forbade the children of the men whom he had proscribed to seek any honours. We must hold that such could be debarred from honours and magistracies, but could not justly be deprived of their simple esteem.

CHAPTER V

ON THE POWER OF SUPREME SOVEREIGNTY OVER THE POSSESSIONS BOTH OF THE STATE AND OF INDIVIDUALS

- | | |
|--|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The power belonging to a king over possessions, if the kingdom is his own patrimony.2. Citizens do not everywhere owe dominion of their possessions to the state.3. The supreme sovereignty can pass laws about the use which citizens should make of their possessions.4. It can likewise exact taxes.5. What should be observed in the imposition of customs, | <ol style="list-style-type: none">6. And of other revenues.7. On eminent domain¹.8. The rights of a king over the possessions of a state.9. On the alienation of a kingdom and of its parts.10. A king cannot enfeoff or mortgage his kingdom without the consent of his people;11. Or alienate the possessions which pass with the crown. |
|--|--|

IN order to understand the power of supreme sovereignty over the property of citizens, we should observe that it flows either from the very nature of supreme sovereignty in itself, or from a special manner of acquiring sovereignty. For it is, without doubt, a matter of no little concern whether he who holds supreme sovereignty in a state has created, as it were, his own citizens and was the first to acquire all manner of dominion over the things embraced within the bounds of his state, or whether he is summoned to sovereignty by the free will of men who already had possession of all their property. It is clear that in the former case the sovereign holds over all property in the state not only such power as flows from sovereignty as such, but such as every father of a family possesses over his own patrimony, unless it be that he has relinquished some portion of his right. Therefore, if such a king has kept his dominion unimpaired, citizens will hold their property by no other right than that by which slaves in ancient Rome held their trifling possessions, and so their possession is merely precarious, revocable at the pleasure of the king whenever he so pleases. Yet so long as citizens are left in possession of such property, they will be justified in gathering from it their sustenance and whatever else is necessary to sustain life, as though in payment for their trouble in looking after and protecting it. And so what Hobbes, De Cive, chap. vi, § 15; chap. xii, § 7, falsely applies to all citizens, is really true only of such subjects as we have described:

Each particular citizen hath a propriety to which none of his fellow citizens hath right [. . .]; but he hath no propriety in which the chief ruler [. . .] hath not a right. (Just as) the sons of a family have a propriety of their good granted them by their father, distinguished indeed from the rest of the sons of the same family, but not from the property of the father himself [xii. 7]. Even as in a family, each son hath such proper goods, and so long lasting, as seems good to the father.

¹ [For domino read dominio.—Tr.]

But if such a king has relinquished part of his right, subjects will then have so much right to their possessions as the concession of the 869 king has allowed them. Thus Pharaoh, as master of the land of Egypt, used to claim for himself a fifth part of the fruits, and leave the rest to the cultivators (Genesis, xlvii. 23, 24, 26), although there was an exception made in the case of the fields of the priests, to whom a third of the land belonged as a gift of Isis. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xxi, lxxii, and Grotius on Genesis, xlvii. 26. About the peasants among the Hindus we are informed by Strabo, Bk. XV [i. 40]: 'Since all the country belongs to the king, the farmers rent it and work for one-fourth of the crops.' Add Diodorus Siculus, Bk. II, chap. xl. And this continues to this day in the realm of the Great Mogul¹, where the king is actually heir of his servants and merchants. Add Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk.² V, chap. v. In the kingdom of the Congo no man has anything which he can call his own and hand down to his heirs, according to Eduardus Lopez, but everything belongs to the king who assigns the oversight and use of the property as he pleases. Therefore, whatever right individuals have over property in these kingdoms, depends originally upon the indulgence of the king who has absolute power to dispose of all property within the limitations of irrevocable pacts or concessions of his own making. Although in this connexion we should not pass over an observation made by Bernier³, De Nuperis Motibus in Imperio Magni Mogolis, to the effect that this absolute dominion of princes in that realm and in other oriental empires is the reason why those lands, otherwise so favoured, are daily sinking lower in ignorance, barbarity, and poverty, or at least do not enjoy the prosperity seen in most of the kingdoms of Europe, where the princes encroach more sparingly upon the dominion of citizens, and where the latter have something which they can call their own even in opposition to the prince. To which we may add, in passing, a custom related by Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. V, chap. ii, that by a law of the Incas subjects had to have cultivated their own fields before they passed to the cultivation of those of the king, since they held that the property of the king could be well looked after only by those whose own affairs were properly cared for; on the other hand, they considered the poor as of no value either in peace or war.

2. Yet there are states where the citizens in no wise look upon their property as originally a gift⁴ of the civil sovereignty, and this appears to take place chiefly in two ways: Either when a people, under the guidance of a king whom they themselves had created, has sought a new

¹ [For Mogoris read Mogolis.—Tr.]

² [For Bernier read Bernier.—Tr.]

³ [For I. read I..—Tr.]

⁴ [For beneficium read beneficium.—Tr.]

home, or when several fathers of families, who were already men of wealth, have voluntarily united into a state or joined themselves of their own accord to one already established, and have taken this way to subject themselves and their possessions to civil sovereignty. The method regularly followed in the first case is for such a people under the direction of their leader to occupy as a whole some region which is set off either by natural boundaries or according to the choice of men, which is then divided into parcels and assigned each person by lot, or at the discretion of the leader, or, more rarely, by their own choice. See Cornelius Nepos, Miltiades, chap. ii. We must recognize in such a case that, although the dominion of the individual settlers seems to begin not so much by their own seizure as by their leader's assignment, yet what they hold is far from being a gift of their leader, since all who joined such an expedition as voluntary partners acquired a perfect right to hold a section of the land so secured. See Genesis, xiv. 14, 21, 23-4; add above, Bk. IV, chap. vi, §§ 3-4.

Much less does the dominion of private individuals depend for its origin upon the desire and indulgence of a king, when, as in the second manner, free fathers of families, already property holders, have voluntarily subjected themselves to his sovereignty. For surely it is as plain as day, despite what is said to the contrary by Hobbes, loc. cit., that those who live outside of states can have something which is their own. Even though we should assume that nature has given every man a right to everything, what is there to prevent every man from being able to have his portion assigned him by the intervention of a pact? And 870 although the pacts of two or a few men, which bear on a thing left open to all, work no prejudice to the rest, but leave them their original right unimpaired, yet if they all should enter a common pact, whether express or tacit, we should not hesitate to say that a true property in things is introduced. And so it is false when Hobbes says: 'The fathers of different families, who are subject neither to a father nor to a common master, have a common right over all things.'¹ See Genesis, iv. 4; xiii. 5 ff. Although it is certain that the dominion of those who live in states is far more firm than that of individuals dwelling in natural liberty, for the latter have only their own strength to depend upon, while the property of the former is protected against foreign foes as well as fellow citizens by the strength of the entire state. See Genesis, xxxiv. 30. Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. II [iii. 2], reports Socrates as saying: 'It is better to belong to a community, secure in the possession of a sufficiency, than to dwell in solitude with a precarious hold on all the property of their fellow citizens.' (M.) And in this sense we can admit the saying of Cicero, *For Caecina*² [xxv]: 'If civil law is taken away, there is no possibility of any one feeling certain what is his own property or what belongs to another.' (Y.) And more clearly in On Duties, Bk. II [xxi]:

¹ [De Cive, vi. 15, note 1.—Tr.]

² [For Caecinna read Caecina.—Tr.]

Commonwealths were established principally for this cause, that men should hold what was their own. For although mankind was congregated together by the guidance of nature, yet it was with the hope of preserving their own property that they sought the protection of cities. (E.)

3. Therefore, in states where the possessions of citizens do not depend for their origin upon their rulers, only so much power over them belongs to the supreme sovereign as flows of itself from the nature of supreme sovereignty, unless the citizens of themselves have voluntarily given over more. A passage in Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. iv, bears on this point:

According to law everything in a state belongs to the king. Yet all that property over which the king has rights of possession is parcelled out among individual owners, and each separate thing belongs to somebody. And so one can give the king a house, a slave, or a sum of money without being said to give him what was his already, for the king has rights over all these things, while each citizen has the ownership of them. We speak of the country of the Athenians, or of the Campanians, though the inhabitants divide them among themselves into separate estates. The whole region belongs to one state or another, but each part of it belongs to its own individual proprietor, so that we are able to give our lands to the state, although they are reckoned as belonging to the state, because we and the state own them in different ways. (S.) The king possesses everything by virtue of sovereignty, individuals by virtue of ownership.¹

And Grotius on 1 Kings, xvi. 24. Therefore, according to Zonaras, Bk. II, when the people demanded that a charioteer, who was a slave, be given his freedom, the emperor Hadrian opposed them with these words: 'It is not fitting either for me to free a slave who belongs to another or for you to force from his owner emancipation.' And the same author tells us that the emperor Claudius issued an edict forbidding anyone to ask the emperor for things that belonged to another, for it was believed at that time that Caesar could make such gifts, and he restored to its owner a farm which he himself had received in that way when a private citizen. And for this reason we cannot give our approval to an act of the emperor Frederick, recorded by Gunther, Ligurius, Bk. III [480 ff.]: 'Whatever the rich stores up, whatever the miser hoards, we allow the people but its use. It is clear that money with the royal stamp belongs to the king; the gleam of Caesar's image betokens Caesar's ownership.'

Furthermore, it appears that that power can most conveniently be divided into three heads: (1) the right of passing laws on tempering the use of property to the welfare of the state; (2) the right of imposing taxes; (3) the exercise of eminent domain. Under the first head are listed sumptuary laws, or such as fix a limit upon unnecessary expenses, whereby first private houses and then the state are exhausted, since money flows out of the country once luxury becomes wild for the delights furnished by foreign lands. Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VI, chap. xxviii:

¹ [This sentence is not in Seneca at this place.—Tr.]

Of all peoples the Arabians are the most wealthy, since practically all the wealth of the Romans and Parthians ends in their possession; for they sell whatever they secure from the sea or forests, and buy nothing in return. (Idem, loc. cit., chap. xxiii): In no year of the existence of our empire does India draw from us less than 50,000,000 sesterces, while she returns to us merchandise which sells for one hundred times its cost.

Compare Idem, Bk. XII, chap. xviii. A further disadvantage is, that, if men have wasted their resources in luxury, they become unable to help meet the expenses of the state. For instance, if he who spends two-fifths of his annual income must give another two-fifths in taxes, he feels no inconvenience and actually increases his capital by one-fifth, while when those who make a practice of spending all their incomes have to give something to the state, they are forced either to draw from their capital or to cut down their scale of living. Of this nature were those laws in the Roman republic which are enumerated by Paulus Manutius, De Legibus Romanis, on the basis of Macrobius, Saturnalia, Bk. III. Plato, in the Laws, Bk. VI [p. 775 A B], would have no more than ten relatives invited to a wedding, nor more than a mina spent upon it even by the most wealthy. Add Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. III, chap. xxxiv; Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk.¹ V, chap. xi. To the same class also belong laws against gambling (see Digest, XI. v, and Code, III. xliii; add Gratian, Decretum, I. lxxxvi. 7-9), and those which everywhere restrain spendthrifts. Here belongs a law of Periander of Corinth which did not allow a man 'to spend more than his income' (Heraclides, De Politicis [Aristotle, Fragments, DCXI. xx]), a rule which should be observed especially in the case of those who have the direction of a commonwealth, as is shown by a remarkable passage from Polybius, Excerpta Peiresciana, Bk. X [xxii. 5]: 'It was impossible for a man to take the lead in public business with honour who neglected his own private affairs; nor again to abstain from embezzling public money if he lived beyond his private income.' (S.) A similar observation is that of Lucian in the Anthology [IX. 367]: 'Whoever has misused his private affairs cannot be trusted with those of others.' Likewise laws on the extent and quality of possessions, as the Lex Licinia in Rome, that no one should have more than five hundred jugera of land², or more than one hundred head of larger cattle or five hundred of smaller. See P. Manutius, loc. cit. Here belongs Numbers, xxxvi. 7, 9. Add Aristotle, Politics, Bk. II, chaps. v, vii; VI. iv (v) [VII. iv], where he gives a law³ in common usage in many democratic states, 'which enjoins the preservation of the original lots'; and a law of Oxyllus: 'There should be a certain portion of every man's property on which he could not borrow money.'

¹ [For I. read l.—Tr.]

² [But this law applied only to land which was held by the state and leased to citizens.—Tr.]

³ [For sex read lex.—Tr.]

(J.) Add Law of the Burgundians, Tit. LXXXIV, § 1. Another instance is a resolution of the senate, given by Pliny, Letters, Bk. VI, ep. xix, that candidates for public offices should invest one-third of their wealth in lands which lay in Italy. Likewise laws on the manner of donations, legacies, and on circumscribing the drawing up of wills, and setting a limit to the consecration of things to pious uses. See Exodus, xxxvi. 6. And such laws as forbid the possession by citizens of a certain class of things, as the one of the Hindus described by Strabo, Bk. XV [i. 41]: 'No private citizen is permitted to keep a horse or an elephant, for both are regarded as the property of the king.' Likewise laws against the idle, such as that one of the Nabateans, whereby 'a man is punished by the state for letting his property grow less' (Strabo, Bk. XVI [iv. 26]), and against those who allow their property to perish through neglect. See Gellius, Bk. IV, chap. xii. Another such was that of king Amasis for the Egyptians, whereby all the inhabitants had to show each year to the governors of the provinces by what means they made their living, upon penalty of death if they refused. Herodotus¹, Bk. II [clxxvii]. You may refer here also laws whereby citizens are forbidden to acquire certain things, or to increase their wealth in a certain manner, as Pliny, Natural History, Bk. III, chap. xx, remarks about Italy: 'In abundance of metals of every kind Italy yields to no land whatever; but all search for them has been prohibited by an ancient decree of the senate, who gave orders thereby that Italy should be exempted from such 872 treatment.' (B. & R.) Another instance is a law of the Venetians, given by Maurocenus, Historia Veneta, Bk. XVII, that no man could bequeath, sell, or alienate in perpetuity any immovable property to churchmen by testament, sale, or in any other way without the consent of the senate. And, finally, such laws as forbid money to be taken out of a state, and require that all commerce with foreigners be restricted to exchange of commodities.

4. But a further right belonging to supreme sovereignty is that whereby it is able to lay hands on a part of the possessions of citizens by way of taxation, since taxes, when levied in just measure and honestly expended, are nothing other than the price paid by individuals to the state in return for the defence of their lives and property, and to meet the expense involved therein. Therefore, when 'Nero debated whether he should not confer a magnificent boon upon the human race² by abolishing custom dues altogether, this impulse was restrained by his senatorial advisers [. . .] who pointed out that a diminution of the revenues by which the state was supported would bring about the dissolution of the empire'. (R.*) Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIII [1]. And the same author, Histories, Bk. IV [lxxiv], quotes Cerialis as saying to the Treveri:

We have imposed upon you by the right of conquest that only which was necessary to preserve peace. For to maintain the tranquillity of nations, arms are necessary; soldiers must be kept in pay; and without tribute supplies cannot be raised. (O.)

¹ [For Herodotus read Herodotus.—Tr.]

² [For genere read generi.—Tr.]

The following words are found in Isaeus, Orations, vi: 'He felt that he should be frugal on himself and reserve what was left for the state, so as to be able to meet its requirements.' Themistius, Orations, xiv: 'A law of Athens forbids any whose names have been given into the treasury to hold any office until they have paid that which they owe.' Whoever has given this proper consideration will agree that the complaints of the common sort, to whom the burden of taxation usually seems the greatest cause of their miseries, are often unjust and impudent, as is the principal point to what is given by Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xii, § 9. Although far more worthy of censure are the complaints of those to whom applies the lines of Plautus, Cistellaria [Epidicus], Act II, sc. ii [226 f.]: 'As if lots of wenches weren't parading the streets with whole estates on their backs. But when the taxes are levied the men say they can't pay; the heavier taxes levied by these wenches—that can be paid all right.' (N.) Here belongs a statement of Archidamus, given by Plutarch, Apophthegms [p. 190 A], who replied to his allies in the Peloponnesian war, when they asked that he stipulate a certain amount for their contribution: 'War has no fixed rations' (P.)¹; and the same author in his Crassus [ii] says: 'The wealth requisite for war cannot be determined.' (P.) Procopius, Persian War, Bk. II, chap. xxvi [22]: 'There is never a war whose outcome may be taken for granted by those who wage it.' (D.) Rarely at best is there truth in the statement of M. Cato, in Livy, Bk. XXXIV, chap. ix, to the effect that 'War maintains itself'. Nay, in general the expenses of a state cannot always be kept within a certain amount, and for various causes, which depend not upon us but upon our neighbours, who make us need money to ward them off. To every preparation for war can be applied what is recorded by Nicetas Choniates, Bk. I, on the Byzantine fleet. It seems that under the emperor Manuel Comnenus, on the advice of his secretary of the treasury, Joannes Puzenus, the levy for the navy, which had of old been spent upon the fleet, was put into the treasury, 'Because', the latter said, 'battleships were not of service to the state at all times, while their upkeep ran throughout the year and amounted to an enormous sum. Therefore, that money should be put in the treasury, and when necessity demands it, the necessary outlay can be met by the Exchequer. When he had said this, he was regarded as a remarkable man and one of consummate skill in the handling of affairs, although as a matter of fact his advice would have done credit to the most savage pirate. For he deceived the emperor on the amount of the cost, and buoyed him up by a false estimate of the expenses. The result of this counsel, whether due to rashness or parsimony, was that the provinces bordering on the sea were harassed by pirates.' And the historian adds that the blame for the losses which followed could have been as justly laid upon him, as when 'The harvest, when we have received it, we carry to him who sowed the crop¹, and he is accused who did not cut it; and a fire is charged not merely against the man who lighted it, but also against him who was unwilling to put it out when he could have done so.' The same account is found in Nicephoras Gregoras, Bk. VI, who adds that much the same thing happened under Andronicus Palaeologus.

¹ [This famous saying was attributed to many ancients. The translation is that of Perrin in Plutarch, Crassus, ii. 8.—Tr.]

5. Yet a prudent governor of a state will see to it that he so adapt himself to the querulous character of the common sort, as to have the taxes raised with the least possible friction and commotion. Indeed, the mass of mankind feel it to be a far greater hardship to part with something which they once numbered among their possessions, than not to have received something at all. See Livy, Bk. V, chap. xxiii, and Plutarch, Camillus [p. 132-3], when the plebs accounted it a most severe hardship that they were forced to turn over a tenth² of the booty that they had already divided. Homer, Iliad, Bk. I [125-6]: 'What spoil soe'er we took from captured cities hath been apportioned, and it beseemeth not to beg all this back from the folk.' (L.L. & M.) Claudian, De Consulatu Mallii [De Consulato Stilichonis, I. 379-380]: 'Even so to lose a possession stirs a heavier pain than never to have had it.' (P.) Add Digest, XXIV. i. 5, § 13. It is a saying of Hannibal in Livy, Bk. XXX, chap. xlv: 'So far, forsooth, we are affected with the public calamities³ as they reach our private affairs; nor is there any circumstance attending them which is felt more acutely than the loss of money.' (S.) Therefore, many men have thought it the most convenient thing to get rid of that burden once and for all, and to set aside a part of their property for the permanent use of the state. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxii, and Paul Warnefrid, History of the Lombards, Bk. III, chap. xvi. Some hold that the public is less affected by moderate customs or excises than by direct taxes and levies. Although a point to bear in mind in connexion with customs on imports, is whether such imports constitute necessities of life, or merely serve the requirements of luxury, for in the latter case they may properly be increased to restrain luxurious living, and because they are customarily used by men of wealth, or such as are otherwise the recipients of many privileges, and so contribute little to the commonwealth. See Digest, XXXIX. iv. 16, § 7. Another point is, whether the same commodities may not be raised or made at home, if native workers turn their attention to them. For this reason it is proper to lay heavy customs on foreign goods, especially such as only serve luxury, and, as Dio Chrysostom, Orations, lxxix [5], says: 'They take tribute of you, through no fault of our country, or of our herds, but because of our own folly.'

¹ [For suevit read sevit.—Tr.]

² [For quantum read quantum.—Tr.]

³ [For pattem read partem.—Tr.]

With regard to exports we must see whether the commonwealth will prosper by forbidding them, or whether they must needs be sent out of the country, since that is the only means for citizens to make a living. In the first case the export dues can be increased, in the second they should be taken off. Another necessary consideration is whether foreign nations stand in great need of such commodities, or can secure them as well in other markets. For who is not acquainted with the shrewd ways of merchants? how 'You are indefatigable in sailing as a trader to the utmost Indies, for from poverty you would fly through sea, through rocks, through fire.' (W.) [Horace, Epistles, I. i. 45.] For it is their common practice, if they are overburdened in one place, to start on a hunt for other trading places, or to give the answer attributed to Gallienus, in his life by Trebellius Pollio [vi]: 'Can we not live without linen from Egypt? Is not our country safe without such robes of state?' And so I should judge that one of the best rules for customs is that given by Hesiod [Works and Days, 40]: 'A half is more than the whole' (E.-W.), for that harbour is unproductive which never sees a merchant. And in this connexion we should call attention to the rule laid down by Nero in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIII [li]: 'Merchant vessels were exempted from assessment and the payment of property tax.' (R.) It is also a duty of the supreme sovereignty to put a stop to the exactions of tax-collectors, which they make for their own profit, as well as to the ways in which they harass and vex subjects—a burden more intolerable than the very taxes. We are informed by Dio Cassius, Bk. XLII, that Caesar freed the province of Asia from the tax-collectors, who had been harassing it most grievously¹, 'and made their exactions take on once more the form of taxes'. Add Digest, XXXIX. iv. 12 at the beginning. So also Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIII [li], praises an edict of Nero's: 'That the regulations for each tax, hitherto kept secret, 874 should be publicly posted up; that arrears should not be recoverable after one year; that suits against publicans should be heard out of the ordinary course.' (R.) No more should too great favour be shown the king's private treasury 'whose case is never a losing one save under a good emperor', which never lacks such as 'stand ready stubbornly to support its claims, and that with dignified² looks and a solemn air of moral elevation'. Pliny, Panegyric [xxxvi. 4 and xli. 3].

6. But in levying taxes and laying other burdens special care should be taken that subjects be given no just cause for complaints, which result, in the first place, if the burdens of the state should be laid upon citizens unequally. For, as Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiii, § 10, well observes, any burden which lies lightly upon all, will be irksome to the rest if many evade it, and, indeed, intolerable. For as a rule, out of grief at the injury, or from envy of others, men complain not so much of the burden itself, as of the inequality; and since whatever citizens contribute to the state is nothing other than a payment for the peace thus purchased, it is reasonable that those who share equally in the peace should pay equally for it by contributing to the commonwealth money or services, and the immunities and privileges which are enjoyed in many states by certain men or orders, can have no equity save as they are balanced by the quality of the services which their recipients furnish the commonwealth. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. IV, chap. lxxiii, on Machaon and Podalirius, and Isocrates, Busiris [21 f.], on the privileges of the priests of Egypt.

¹ [For earnacerbissime read eam acerbissime.—Tr.]

² [For ravi read gravi.—Tr.]

But in order to discover properly this equality, it should be accurately observed that the equality which we are seeking here is not so much of money as of burden, that is, the equality does in no wise mean that all individuals should pay in equal amounts of money, but that the portion assigned each man should not lie more heavily on one than on another, which is the case if an equal ratio is maintained between the burdens and benefits of peace. For although all enjoy the peace equally, yet not all share equally in its benefits, since some have more property, others less, and again some have greater wants, others less. Therefore, Hobbes raises the question as to whether citizens should contribute to the state in accordance with their profits¹ or with their expenses, that is, whether persons should be taxed according to what they have coming in or to what they pay out. On this point we must say, first of all, that, inasmuch as every man's wealth receives its defence from the state, burdens can be laid upon him in proportion to his income. This is illustrated by the statement of Servius Tullius recorded in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. IV [ix], in defence of the institution of the census: 'And I look upon it in itself to be both just and advantageous to the public, that those who have great possessions should pay great taxes; and those who have small possessions, small ones.' (S.) So also extraordinary demands made by a commonwealth in times of stress should be based upon capital. In the second place, since it is by the resources of the state that every man's life is defended, and life is as dear to the poor as to the rich, it follows that military service can be required of the former as well as the latter, and also, on the same grounds, a small equal tax, such as the poll-tax, where a rich man pays no more than a poor.

But since it is also due to the benefit of the state that citizens have the opportunity of being able to increase their wealth by their industry, the chief difficulty that arises in this connexion is how that fact should affect the adjustment of burdens. Here the most convenient course seems to be for a man to be taxed according to his consumption and not by his profits, especially since most men usually proportion their expenses to their income. For should taxes be levied according to a man's income and should it happen that those who have equal incomes have not equal capital—which is often enough the case, since one man keeps what he has by careful spending and another wastes it in luxury—the result would be that those who share equally in the benefits of peace do not bear equally the burdens of the state. For instance, of two men with an annual income of one hundred units of value, one spends forty 875 of it and the other eighty. Now since they both share equally in the peace, it would seem but fair for them both to pay the same. And yet that would involve two inconveniences: First, it would be most difficult for the state to find out each year the amount of every citizen's income, nor could a general property census be taken so often. In the second place, if the tax should be set at the end of the year when every man would submit an account of his total receipts and expenses, and levied upon the surplus from the preceding year, one would pay twice as much as the other, notwithstanding the fact that they share equally in the benefits of the peace. And another result would be that the one would suffer for his frugality and the other profit by his luxury. Therefore, the best course is to tax what is to be consumed, so that in consuming his own property he is, without feeling it, paying his dues to the state in proportion not to what he now has, but to what he formerly possessed by reason of the protection¹ of the state, and what is paid the state is regarded as a part of the price of the thing consumed.

¹ [For que lu crantur read quae lucrantur.—Tr.]

And the observations which we have just made on customs should also be followed in taxes and other burdens of the state. Here belongs the statement of Tacitus, Agricola [xix]:

Demands for grain and tribute he made less burdensome by equalizing his imposts: he cut off every charge invented only as a means of plunder, and therefore more grievous to be borne than the tribute itself. As a matter of fact, the natives used to be compelled to go through the farce of dancing attendance at locked granaries, buying grain to be returned, and so redeeming² their obligations at a price; places off the road or distant districts were named in the governor's proclamations, so that the tribes with winter quarters close at hand delivered at a distance and across country, and ultimately a task easy for every one became a means of profit to a few³. (H.)

Add Cicero, Against Verres [II], iii.⁴ But we feel that the reply of Pescennius Niger, in his Life by Spartianus [vii], was too severe, when he said to the Jews of Palestine, who had asked him to lighten their tribute: 'So you wish me to lighten the tax on your lands; verily,

¹ [For beneficio read beneficio.—Tr.]

² [For vendere read, with the best text, luere.—Tr.]

³ [For pacis read paucis.—Tr.]

⁴ [For actione 3 read actionis 2. libro 3. The whole of this oration, De Frumentis, deals with the Sicilian grain trade.—Tr.]

if I had my way, I would tax your air.' (M.) But Aristotle, Economics, Bk. II, chap. i, gives a full discussion of the general ways in which necessity may impel a state to raise money. We may mention, in passing, an unusual instance of taxation, whereby the Incas of Peru ordered the very poor to render each year to their governors a certain amount of the horns of vermin, in order that no one could claim that he was free from taxes, and that they might rid the country of those pests. In Garcilaso de la Vega, Bk. V, chap. vi; Bk. VIII, chaps. v, vi.

7. The right of eminent domain is condemned by some authors, not so much in theory as for the name under which it goes. Their position is that the very force of sovereignty, instituted¹, as it is, for the safety of the state, gives sufficient title to a prince to make use of the property of his subjects under strict necessity, and that for this reason he is understood to have a free hand in everything necessary for the common good, but that the term is too broad, and could be abused by evil princes to exhaust the resources and rights of their subjects. But as it is idle to quarrel over terms, so it appears reasonable enough to designate by a special name one of the lesser functions of supreme sovereignty, which is concerned with a special thing in a special manner. The force of such dominion will be clear enough from the following remarks.

Natural equity is observed, if, when some contribution must be made to preserve a common thing by such as participate in its benefits, each of them contributes only his own share, and no one bears a greater burden than another. And the same is true in states. But since there are times in the life of every state when a great necessity does not allow the collection of strict quotas from every one, or when something belonging to one or a few citizens is required for the necessary uses of the commonwealth, the supreme sovereignty will be able to seize that thing for the necessities of the state, on condition, however, that whatever exceeds the just share of its owners must be refunded them by the 876 other citizens. One or two examples may be cited: When a town must be fortified the gardens, fields, and even residences of individuals must be cleared to make way for trenches and works; in sieges the dwellings and trees of private citizens are cleared away, that they may not work to the benefit of the besiegers and the injury of the besieged. So also materials that private citizens have laid aside for their own use may be worked into the fortifications of the city. In time of famine the stores of individuals are thrown open. When necessity requires it the money which they have deposited with the state or in their private chests may be seized, in case the more civil course cannot be followed of accepting as loans the money which citizens may donate of their own accord. According to Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VIII [ii. 9 ff.],

¹ [For istituti read instituti.—Tr.]

Cyrus did this, although it is questionable whether even a dubious justice can be allowed the act of Caesar, even though you assume that he was the lawful master of the state; for, according to Dio, Bk. XLII [li]:

(When Caesar returned to Rome after his victory over Pompey) he applied the term 'borrowing' to those levies of money for which there was no other reasonable excuse; for he exacted these sums also in a high-handed way and no less by force than he collected money actually due to him, and it was his intention never to repay them. (C.)

So if the enemy can be repelled in no other way, our own country is laid waste, and everything usable that cannot be carried off is destroyed. See Curtius, Bk. III, chap. iv. When war with the Romans was imminent Critolaus discussed with the officers of the Achaean League whether 'not to exact money from debtors, nor to receive prisoners arrested for debt, and to cause loans on pledge to be held over until the war was decided'. (S.) Polybius, Selections on Embassies, CXLIV. iii [XXXVIII. ix. 10]. Add Digest, XVIII. iii. 8. Here also belongs the ruling made by Julius Caesar on loans, as given in Suetonius [Julius], chap. xlii.

It appears from what has been said, that there is no place for eminent domain unless the necessity of the state require it, on which, however, Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 6, observes that the necessity here meant has its own degrees, and that when the term is used it is not always to be understood in its last sense. Yet, on the other hand, care should be taken that this right be not extended too far and that it be, so far as possible, kept within the limits of equity. An excellent example of this is to be found in Livy, Bk. XXXI, chap. xiii.

Another conclusion of all this is, that a prince cannot release a citizen from the force lying in eminent domain, since every privilege is understood to admit as an exception the necessity of the commonwealth, and it would appear to be a contradiction for a man to want to pose as a citizen and yet to claim a right, the observance of which involves the destruction of the state. Yet the claim that those who have in this manner paid out or lost their fortune for the public weal, should, so far as possible, have it restored them, or be properly recompensed by the entire state, rests on the most manifest equity. Some men offer an exception to this, namely, if the damage involved was inevitable and could be seen to be so, as when dwellings outside the walls of a city are torn down in war. For no compensation can be asked for such, since their owners were aware that a condition of this kind was annexed to such places, and in building there notwithstanding, they tacitly confirmed it beforehand. Much the less can compensation be sought if the same necessity lies upon all or involves an equal damage. For it is all that can be expected if the state allows no one to become worse off by its own fault, while it has never obligated itself to bear the losses of its subjects. Johann Christoph Becmannus, Meditationes Politicae, XXI, § 8.

8. Regarding property which belongs to the state as such, it should be observed that in some kingdoms a distinction is drawn between that which is¹ reserved for the support of the king, and that which has been set aside to meet the expenses concerned with the preservation of the kingdom. Thus Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. III [i], distinguished between 'public property' and 'permanent royal patrimony'.

877 According to Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. IV, chap. xxiv, the Chinese allot one-ninth of all the land to the king. Our meaning is that in some states certain state property is made over to the king, with the income from which he is to meet the expenses of his court. Of all of this the king enjoys the full usufruct, so that he can dispose of its income as he pleases, and if he has any surplus therefrom it goes into his own personal estate, unless the laws of the commonwealth may have ruled otherwise. The statement of Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. vi, bears on this point: 'Everything belongs to Caesar, yet he has no private property beyond his own privy purse; as Emperor all things are his, but nothing is his own except what he inherits.' (S.) In Herodian, Bk. II, chap. iv, Pertinax forbade his name to be inscribed on the royal possessions: 'Maintaining that such possessions did not belong to sovereigns but were common and public possessions of the Romans.' Thus in Peru under the rule of the Incas the land was divided into three parts, of which one was assigned to the king, one to the sun, their god, and the third to the state, as a result of which the citizens paid no taxes on their portion. Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. V, chap. iv. But of those possessions by the income from which the expenses in connexion with the preservation of the state are to be met, the king has no more than the mere administration, which should have for its end the safety of the state, and be carried on with no less scrupulousness than a guardian observes in the affairs of his ward. Paul Warnefrid, History of the Lombards, Tit. III, chap. xvi:

In the days of Authar those who were dukes then, in order to restore the kingdom, gave a half of their substance to the services of the royal house, so that there could be something for the king himself, as well as his immediate followers, and those who attended upon him in different ways, by which to maintain themselves.

It is easy to infer from what has been said, to whom belong the possessions laid up by a king during his reign, that is, whether they belong to the king or to the state. For if they are laid up out of the possessions assigned to the state, or by taxes and the blood of the citizens as well as by such service as they owe the state by virtue of their common obligation, it is clear that they belong to the kingdom, and not to the private fortune of the king. Although it may happen that a king will meet all the cost of a war without entailing any burden or peril upon the state, not out of the treasury but his own patrimony, or the income from that which belongs to the throne. Whatever a king has secured in such a war he can rightfully claim as his own and not the state's. For the income from any thing the usufruct of which I enjoy, is mine by full right, and can be disposed of at my pleasure. Add Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 12.

¹ [For sit read sint.—Tr.]

9. Our next task is to inquire as to how much right belongs to a king to alienate his kingdom or parts of it, and such a kingdom as does not belong to a king's patrimony but was given him by the free consent of a people. This point is discussed by Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 10, Bk. II, chap. vi, §§ 3 ff., where the comments of Boecler should be read, and Bk. III, chap. xx, §§ 5 ff. The matter may be stated in brief thus: A king has no right to undertake to transfer his kingdom to another on his own authority; and the subjects are not bound by such an act of a king, but the consent of the people is quite as much required as that of the king. For just as a kingdom cannot justly be taken from a king without his consent, so another king cannot be placed over a people unless it also agrees to it. But in the alienation of a part of a kingdom there is required, in addition to the consent of the king, not only that of the subjects remaining to him, but also, and in all circumstances, that of the inhabitants of the section which he has alienated. The reason for this is that those who first united to form a state, or later joined one of their own volition, bound themselves by a mutual pact that they would agree to be ruled by one and the same sovereignty, so long as they saw fit to dwell within the borders of the same state. And so just as each of them secured by that pact a right whereby they cannot be ejected from that state against their will, or handed over to the sovereignty of another, save by way of punishment, so the whole body of citizens acquired by the same pact a similar right over the individual citizens, whereby no one of them may subject himself to another's sovereignty, or renounce the sovereignty of that state, so long as he chooses to live within its borders. And so since states, like moral bodies, were formed with the consent of their parts, we must measure what power in the matter before us belongs to the whole state over its parts by virtue of the original will of those who formed it. Now this will cannot be presumed to have been such as to give a right to the body to cut off parts from itself and to hand them over to the jurisdiction of another at its mere pleasure. Thus it is reported in Frossardus, Bk. IV, and Polydorus Virgilius, Historia Anglica, Bk. XX, that the inhabitants of Aquitaine were unwilling to be treated like a present by Richard II, and separated from England. 878

But the statement that a part may not withdraw from the body while it remains within the same borders, admits of this one exception: Provided it is not forced to do so by extreme necessity, and cannot protect its life save by acceding to another's jurisdiction. For in all agreements of this nature an exception appears to be made in the case of extreme necessity, which allows one to provide for his safety in every way at his disposal. Therefore, no one may justly blame cities which, after resisting a foe with all their might, have finally chosen surrender to destruction. In other words, those who were originally united to form a state already possessed by nature the right to defend their safety by every means possible, and entered into states only in order that they might the better attain that end. And when the state can no longer secure for them that end, it is held that they are freed from the obligation by which they were bound to the state, and have recovered their right to consult their interests as best they can. All would agree that as for the state, it has no other right over its members than what is granted it by those who formed it in the first place. And just as it promises defence to its individual subjects with the exception or condition, 'except it be hindered by a compelling necessity', so when this does press upon a state, it is no longer understood to forbid them to look to their safety as best they can. For¹ it is just, of course, that a member of a physical body be allowed to perish in order that the whole body may be saved, because the member has no life save by the life of the body, but the members of moral bodies can exist and live to themselves, and so a body will not have such power over moral as over physical members. But if a king is forced by necessity to make peace with a stronger foe on the condition of granting him a certain region, which, however, is opposed to that cession, it is our opinion that he should withdraw his garrisons from the region, and in no way oppose the victor in taking possession of it, but that he will not be able to compel it to submit itself unreservedly to the other's jurisdiction. Nor does any obligation appear to prevent that territory from resisting him who would seize it, if it sets any store in its own strength, or from setting itself up as a separate commonwealth. Thus when the emperor Jovianus ceded Nisibis to the Persians, the citizens prayed for permission to defend the city of their birth with their own strength. In Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXV, chap. xii; Zosimus, Bk. III. By such a pact, therefore, the king and people lose their right over that territory, while the victor, by its consent and pledge of faith, acquires legitimate sovereignty over it.

For the rest, the statement which some advance either about all kingdoms, or one only, namely, that property once ceded to, or, as they say, incorporated in the crown, can in no way be alienated, and that not even the longest period of time or the peaceful possession of it by another can prevent the possibility of its being reclaimed, is plainly untrue. And much more foolish is their attempt to assert for some particular kingdom this privilege: That it can seize the possessions of others and yet what it has once seized can never in any way be taken back from it.

¹ [For Nam read Nam.—Tr.]

10. All this makes clear, that it is not lawful for a king, without the consent of the people, to acknowledge his kingdom to be the fief of another's, with the added condition, that, if he fails in his feudal obligations, or has no heirs, it shall belong to his lord. For when a kingdom is enfeoffed on such a condition, it is the same as a conditional alienation. 879 So also if a king has remitted to a vassal, without the consent¹ of his people, his service of homage, the people can for their part render such an act null and void. But it also follows that a king cannot mortgage a part of his kingdom to another, with the result that its administration and natural possession lie for a time at least in the hands of the creditor, without the consent of his people and of the part mortgaged, and much less if there be some clause of forfeiture (lex commissoria) attached. The reason for this is not merely that alienation only too frequently accompanies the giving of a mortgage, but the further one, that a people, in setting up a king of their own accord, wished to be under his rule and not another's, while it is presumed that those who united to form one people had no desire to be broken up into several.

11. Furthermore, it is clear that a king cannot without the consent of his people alienate possessions which have been assigned him in order that the income from them might meet the burdens of the state or royal dignity, for there belongs to the king from such possessions only the usufruct, which in no wise includes the right of alienation. Even though a king may feel that he has provided well enough for his own lifetime, yet the people must need have another king after him, who will also have to be maintained as his dignity requires. Yet we must carefully distinguish on this point between the possessions themselves, that is, the patrimony of the people, and the income from them, for a king is forbidden to alienate the former, but he has full power to dispose of the latter. Thus when the right to alluvial lands belongs in the patrimony of the people, the king may not make that right over to another, but there is nothing to prevent a king from disposing of articles brought down by floods, since they are like the fruits of the same. Thus the right of confiscation lies in the patrimony, the articles confiscated belong to the fruits, and so the former belongs to the state, the latter to the king. Nevertheless, a king who is empowered for cause to levy new taxes at his own judgement, can mortgage portions of the state's patrimony when necessity requires it. For just as a people is obligated to pay the taxes levied by such a king for cause, so it must redeem the article thus mortgaged for cause, since it amounts to the same thing whether the citizens make up the money to prevent the necessity of such a thing being mortgaged, or redeem it with money that is contributed later. Although it is obvious in such a case that individual citizens are not debtors for that money, even though every one must contribute his quota for its payment. See Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VI, chap. xx. So also when a king has drawn upon his personal fortune for some need of the commonwealth, it will be right for the property of the state to be mortgaged to him for that sum, until the nation has paid it. Yet all these principles hold good only if no basic law or ruling has made a contrary disposition, and enlarged or restricted the right of the king or the people. Add Grotius, loc. cit.

¹ [For consensu read consensu.—Tr.]

CHAPTER VI

ON THE LAW OF WAR

- | | |
|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The subdivision of the chapter. 2. Peace is the ordinary status of man; war is an extraordinary indulgence of nature. 3. War is either defensive or offensive. 4. The cause of war ought to be clear. 5. A list of unjust causes for wars. 6. Craft may be used against an enemy. 7. What further is lawful against an enemy. 8. Within states individuals are deprived of the right of war. 9. War is either formal or less so. 880 10. A magistrate as such has no right to make war. 11. Whether he can make war on the presumed will of the supreme sovereign. 12. How far an injury done by a citizen furnishes a cause for war against¹ a state. 13. On the equity of reprisals. 14. On whose behalf a war may be justly waged. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 15. On the declaration of war. 16. Nations usually allow themselves great licence in war. 17. On licence over the person of an enemy. 18. Whether it is lawful to kill an enemy by hired assassins. 19. Sacred objects are not exempted from the licence of war. 20. How property may be acquired by war. 21. To whom the spoils of war belong. 22. How far incorporeal objects may be acquired by war. 23. Whether a loan may be acquired by war. 24. The ways by which sovereignty may be acquired over the conquered². 25. How the booty of war may be recovered. 26. How whole peoples may be taken back from an enemy. |
|--|---|

SINCE individuals who live in natural liberty have no less power accorded them than states to defend themselves against an unjust threat of violence, and to have recourse to force in maintaining their rights, when they have been infringed upon or denied by others, I feel that it would be fitting to examine first, what the wars of individuals and states have in common, and secondly, what belongs in a special way to the latter by their nature, or by the customs of nations.

2. Now it is one of the first principles of natural law that no one unjustly do another hurt or damage, as well as that men should perform for each other the duties of humanity, and show especial zeal to fulfil the matters upon which they have entered into particular agreements. When men observe these duties in their relations one with another, it is called peace, which is a state most highly agreeable to human nature and fitted to preserve it, the creation and preservation of which constitutes one of the chief reasons for the law of nature being placed in the hearts of men. Add Polybius, Bk. XII, chap. xiv. Nay, peace is a state especially reserved to human nature as such, since it springs from a principle which belongs to man, as distinct from animals, while war arises from a principle common to them both. Of course, even animals depend upon a natural instinct to defend and preserve themselves by force, but man alone understands the genius of peace. For it is characteristic of him voluntarily to do something for another, and to refrain from injury, by reason of a certain obligation residing in one, and of a certain right residing in another person, all of which is unintelligible without the use of reason. Of course domestic animals perform services for their masters, but that is due to a fear of blows, or an expectation of food, and not to any obligation, which, indeed, is beyond their powers to comprehend. Animals also refrain from doing harm to men and to other animals, but that is due to weakness, or to the fact that they find in them nothing to whet their appetite. Finally, there are some that show affection for one another or render mutual assistance, but that does not mean that they understand that they are obligated to act in that way. This is illustrated by a passage in Quintilian, Declamations, ix [13]:

¹ [For contr a read contra.—Tr.]

² [For invictos read in victos.—Tr.]

Nature first put a certain sociableness into our minds beyond other creatures, whereby we are taught to rejoice in one another's company, to gather a people, to build cities, and though she hath furnished our minds with several inclinations, yet she hath given us no affection better than kindness one to another. For what would be more happy than we men, if all of us were friends? For then wars, seditions, robberies, and other mischiefs that arise from ourselves, would not also come upon us on the score of fortune. But because God thinks it not fit to bestow so great a blessing on us, yet certainly at all times and amongst all nations, 'twas ever held one of the greatest and as it were most sacred offices, for men to agree together in honest principles, to observe truth and faithfulness, and return love for love. (W.*)

- 881 Despite all this war is lawful and sometimes even necessary for man, when another with evil intent threatens me with injury, or withholds what is my due. For under such circumstances my care for my own safety gives me the power to maintain and defend myself and mine by any means at my disposal, even to the injury of my assailant, or, as Ulysses says in Dictys Cretensis, Bk. II [xxi]: 'To extort by force a right which cannot be secured by friendly means.' Here belongs the statement of Maximus of Tyre, Dissertations, xiv [xxiv. II e]: 'Consequently¹ to the just war appears a necessity, to the unjust a voluntary act.' Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 1. A further consideration lies in the fact that nature has not only instilled in the minds of men a bitter sense of injuries, so that they avoid in every way being harassed by the injuries of others, but has also given his body for its protection such agility and strength of hands that he may not be forced to bear them in patience. And yet nature permits war, on the condition that he who wages it shall have as his end the establishment of peace. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. X, chap. vi [X. vii. 6]:

[. . .] The object of war is the enjoyment of peace. [. . .] Nobody desires war, or pre-

¹ [For Unde read Unde.—Tr.]

pires to go to war, for its own sake. A person would be regarded as absolutely bloodthirsty, if he were to make enemies of his friends for the mere sake of fighting and bloodshed. (W.)

Themistius, Orations, x [p. 131A]: 'The prize of war is peace. Moreover, men fight because they have to, not in order that they may spend their days in fighting, but that they may rest in safety.' Tacitus, Histories, Bk. IV [lxxvi]: 'No man was so addicted to arms as not to prefer the same reward for repose to incurring danger for it.' (O.) Therefore, you would never approve the character of those described in the lines of Silius Italicus, Bk. III [330-1]: 'They cannot endure life without war; because the only purpose for living lay in arms, and a peaceful existence stands condemned in their eyes.' Furthermore, although he who has injured me gives me by that act the fullest power to find recourse against him in war, yet I should consider how much good or evil such a course will probably contain for me, or for others who have not injured me. For I need not fly to arms to avenge such injuries as do not mean my utter ruin, if that will mean greater disadvantages than advantages to me and mine, or if others with whom I am still at peace will by reason of my war suffer great losses, which I should, by the law of humanity, have warded off from them by allowing such an injury as was done me to go unpunished. Therefore, if a man feels that the avenging of an injury done him will mean more evil than good, he acts in a just and praiseworthy manner in refusing to punish it by recourse to war.

3. The causes of just wars may be reduced to the following heads: To preserve and protect ourselves and our possessions against others who attempt to injure us, or take from us or destroy what we have; to assert our claim to whatever others may owe us by a perfect right, when they refuse to perform it for us of their own accord; and, finally, to obtain reparation for losses which we have suffered by injuries, and to extort from him who did the injury guarantees that he will not so offend in the future. As a result of these causes we have the division of just wars into offensive and defensive, of which we consider the latter to be those in which we defend and strive to retain what is ours, the former those by which we extort debts which are denied us, or undertake to recover what has been unjustly taken from us, and to seek guarantees for the future. Although sometimes the credit for defence stands with him who is the first to take up arms against another, if, for instance, a man has been troubled time and again with sudden border raids, the enemy always retiring on his approach, or if by a swift movement he overcomes an enemy who is already bent upon attacking him, but is still engaged in his preparations. See Justin, II. iii. 12.

4. But in general the causes of wars, and of offensive wars in particular, should be clear and leave no chance for doubt. For time and again doubts arise on this point, either from ignorance of fact, when it is not clearly established whether a thing was done or not, or what was the purpose of the doing, or from an obscure comparison of strict right with the law of charity, or from an uncertain balancing of the advantages which are likely to follow upon the declaration or avoidance of war. Therefore, in the matter before us, neither should we rashly advance any vague claim, nor, on the other hand, fly at once to arms; but we should by all means try one of three courses in order to prevent the affair from breaking out into open war, to wit, either a conference between the parties concerned or their representatives; or an appeal to arbitrators; or, finally, the use of the lot. Valerius Flaccus [Argonautica], Bk. V [563 ff.]: 'Should we never have given ear to prayers or sought treaties with the king, but turned our every effort to blind battle? That is the life of Thracians.' See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxiii, §§ 7, 11. [Especially should such amicable settlements be sought by him who is the plaintiff, since there is some reason for the favour which regularly attends possession.]¹ But however clear be the cause of war, every wise man before rushing to arms should carefully weigh the observations of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxiv. No less should he bear in mind that it is great folly both in individuals and states to be unable to reach a settlement while their fortunes are still unscathed. 'But when they have used each other severely², they separate of their own accord without the need of any one's intervention.' (F.) Isocrates, To Philip [38].

5. The unjust causes for wars are reviewed by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxii, of which some have no grounds at all, while some have a slight foundation, though³ weak at the best. To the first belong avarice and the lust for⁴ superfluous possessions, ambition and a craving to lord it over others, and a burning desire to gather fame from the oppression of their fellows. Yet men usually go to much labour to conceal the first of these, because it betokens a sordid mind, although many a man puts forth the last as a proof of greatness, 'calling it praise fit for a king to battle for another's goods'.⁵ Yet all kings should take to themselves the words of Philiscus to Alexander: 'Be mindful of glory; yet be not a pestilence, nor some great disorder, but a bringer of peace and health.' [Aelian, Varia Historia, XIV. xi.] For although God often uses war to drain away, as it were, the dregs of mankind, as we find in Euripides, Helena [39-40], Jupiter saying that he raised up the Greeks and Phrygians against each other:

[. . .] To disburden so

Earth-mother of her straitened throngs of men; (W.)

still it is unlawful for princes to rush into⁶ war for that reason, when no other cause can be found. And yet the Hebrews held that they were

¹ [This sentence is added by Barbeyrac from the De Officio Hominis et Civis, 2, 16, 3, in order to round out the expression of a thought which Pufendorf himself, in his later work, recognized to have been incomplete.—Tr.]

² [For sicet read licet.—Tr.]

³ [Tacitus, Annals, XV. i, slightly modified.—Tr.]

⁴ [For mali read mals.—Tr.]

⁵ [For habenâ read habendâ.—Tr.]

⁶ [For mare read ruere.—Tr.]

permitted, in order to increase the majesty of their nation, to attack other peoples and reduce them and their property to subjection for no other reason than that their Sanhedrin had seen fit to declare a war. Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VI, chaps. iii and xii.

To the second class belongs fear of the strength and power of a neighbour, and 'when men deem that will is equal to power'. Lucan, Bk. III [101]. Yet fear alone does not suffice as a just cause for war, unless it is established with moral and evident certitude that there is an intent to injure us. For an uncertain suspicion of peril can, of course, persuade you to surround yourself in advance with defences, but it cannot give you a right to be the first to force the other by violence to give a real guarantee, as it is called, not to offend. Gellius, Bk. VIII, chap. iii [VI. iii. 31-2]:

For the fortune of gladiators prepared to engage, was of this kind, either to kill if they should conquer, or to die if they should yield. But the life of men is not circumscribed by such unjust or insuperable necessity, that you ought first to commit an injury, lest, by not doing so, you should endure it. (B.)

For so long as a man has not injured me, and is not caught in open preparation to do so (for sometimes an incompleated injury can be 883 avenged by a war no less than a completed one), it should be presumed that he will perform his duty in the future, especially when he confirms it by protestations and his pledged word. But it would be unjust to extort a real guarantee from such a one through force, since by such a procedure his² condition would be worse than ours, in that he is required to abide by our mere given word. But supposing there exists a just cause for war, in that case an unusual increase in a neighbour's power comes in for serious consideration in the debates upon war, since experience well shows that most³ men, as their strength increases, grow more eager to lord it over others. Add Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 15, towards the end; Bacon, Essays, chap. xix. Seneca, Oedipus [542-3]:

There stands a mighty tree
And with its heavy shade it overwhelms
The lesser trees. (M.*)

Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. IV [xx]:

Men naturally are restive when there is any neighbouring power which has attained great size and is prepared to inflict injury. For the extremely powerful are never at a loss for excuses upon which to bring war against their neighbours, no matter how innocent these may be.

Herodes, De Republica [13]:

Neighbouring nations are not displeased when peoples near them are torn with internal

¹ [For quotcunque read quodcunque.—Tr.]

² [For plurisquis read plurisque.—Tr.]

³ [For his read is.—Tr.]

strife. Weaker ones see that thus they will not be subdued; those of equal strength think they will be the stronger; powerful ones hope that they will subdue them the more easily.

Polybius, Bk. I, chap. lxxxiii: 'It is never right [. . .] to help any one to build up so preponderating a power as to make resistance to it impossible, however just the cause.' (S.) Appian of Alexandria, Bellum Lybicum [xi]: 'Although he be a friend, not even he should become so powerful.' Yet it would be impudent to allot utility the same right over the property of others as necessity, as Thucydides, Bk. I [lxxvi], represents the Athenians maintaining: 'No one ever put justice before force and refrained from taking advantage, when opportunity offered, of securing something by main strength' (S.); especially since mankind would surely fare ill for the future, if it was introduced as a right, that I could take by force from another, against his will, whatever I think will be of use to me. For others will surely employ the same licence against me that I use against them.

On the other pretexts adduced by Grotius in the passage cited above, we must reach the same conclusion. Thus we cannot agree with Bacon of Verulam, The Advancement of Learning, p. 348, when he holds that sufficient cause for waging war upon the Americans¹ can be found in the fact that they can be held condemned by the very law of nature, because it is their custom to sacrifice men and eat human flesh. On this matter we should carefully consider whether a Christian prince can attack the Indians, as men condemned by nature, merely because they eat human flesh like any other food, or because they eat the flesh of men of their own religion, or because they eat that of strangers. And in connexion with their treatment of strangers we must again inquire, whether those foreigners come to their shores as enemies and robbers, or come as innocent guests, or driven by storms. For only in the last case does a right of war lie with those whose citizens are treated with such cruelty, not in the others.

6. There is also this one feature common to all wars, that, although their method and genius, as it were, is force and intimidation, one may still use craft or deceit against an enemy, provided that this does not entail perfidy and the violation of pacts and pledged faith. Agesilaus says in Plutarch, Agesilaus [Laconian Apophthegms, p. 209 B]: 'To break one's promise is indeed impious; but to outwit an enemy is not only just and glorious, but profitable and sweet.' (G.) And especially appropriate in this connexion is the saying of Cleandrides in Polyænus, 884 Strategemata, Bk. II, [x. 5]: 'When the lion's skin fails, one must put on also the fox's.' Silius Italicus, Bk. I [219]: 'He had no confidence² in the sword alone without guile.' Add Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. I [vi. 19]; Livy, Bk. XLII, chap. xlvii; Grotius, Bk. III, chap. i, § 9; and above Bk. IV, chap. i, §§ 12 and 19.

¹ [The American Indians.—Tr.]

² [For Et metuens read Nec fidens.—Tr.]

7. But if we are correctly to understand how far we may proceed with violence against an enemy and his possessions, we should observe that the licence to be used against an enemy is one thing, as it arises from a simple state of hostility, and another, as the mercifulness of natural law orders control and temperance in its indulgence. That is, since according to the law of nature there should be a mutual performance of the duties of peace, whoever takes the first step in violating them against me, has, so far as he is able, freed me from my performance of the duties of peace, and therefore, in confessing that he is my enemy, he allows me a licence to use force against him to any degree, or so far as I may think desirable. This is especially true because the end of war, whether offensive or defensive, could not be gained without this licence, if it were necessary to hold the use of force against an enemy within a certain limit, and never to proceed to extremities. For this reason even open wars partake somewhat of the nature of a contract like this: 'Try whatever you can, I will likewise use every means at my disposal.' And this holds good not merely if an enemy has undertaken to use every extremity against me, but also if he simply wishes to injure me within certain limits, for he has no greater right to do me a slight injury than a severe one. Therefore, not only may I use force against an enemy until I have warded off the peril with which he threatened me, or have received or extorted from him what he had unjustly robbed me of, or refused to furnish, but I can also proceed so far as to secure guarantees for the future. And if he allows that to be forced from him, he shows clearly enough that he still intends to injure me again in the future. Nor is it in fact always unjust to return a greater evil for a less, for the objection made by some that retribution should be rendered in proportion to the injury, is true only of civil tribunals, where punishments are meted out by superiors. But the evils inflicted by right of war have properly no relation to punishments, since they neither proceed from a superior as such, nor have as their direct object the reform of the guilty party or others, but the defence and assertion of my safety, my property, and my rights. To secure such ends it is permissible to use whatever means I think will best prevail against such a person, who, by the injury done me, has made it impossible for me to do him an injury, however I may treat him, until we have come to a new agreement to refrain from injuries for the future.

But now the law of humanity would not only have one consider how much an enemy can suffer without injury, but also what should be the deeds of a humane and, above all, a generous victor. Therefore, we should take care that, so far as it is possible, and as our defence and future security allow, we suit the evils inflicted upon an enemy to the process usually observed by a civil court in meting out justice in offences and other quarrels. This proportion and measure is treated in detail by Grotius, Bk. III, chaps. xi-xvi, just as the understanding of the licence of war is greatly aided by the three rules laid down by the same author in Bk. III, chap. i, §§ 2-4. It often happens, as well, that the uncertainty of the outcome of a war leads us to temper its licence, for fear the examples we have set may by the hand of fortune be turned against us. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIV, chap. xlvii. Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. X [533]: 'By the death of Pallas, Turnus had first removed all friendly intercourse of war.' (B.) Here belongs an incident found in Anton. Gratianus, De Bello Cyprio, Bk. V, to the effect that when Colonna gave orders for the Turks captured in the battle of Lepanto to be accorded generous treatment in Rome, he turned to Mohammed and said, 'Learn humanity of us, you who are regularly so harsh and cruel to Christian captives'. To which the infidel replied, 'You should forgive us, for it has never yet been our fortune to be captured and fall 885 into the hands of our enemies; in fact we Turks have only learned how to make captive, not how to be captives ourselves'.

What is permissible against such as only furnish an enemy with supplies, is also to be seen in Grotius, Bk. III, chap. i, § 5, and chap.¹ xvii.

8. Let us now consider the questions which concern in a peculiar way wars waged by states and their heads. Here we must observe, at the outset, that the right of war which accompanies a natural state is taken away from individuals in a commonwealth, and that therefore individuals can no longer revenge injuries done them with the means at their own disposal and at their own discretion, or extort with violence of their own doing anything owed them when it is denied, but on such matters they must have recourse to a magistrate, whose function it is to secure to injured persons reparation for damage and guarantees for the future, as well as to make it possible for every man to enjoy his own right. On this point bear Digest, L. xvii. 176; IV. ii. 11 at end, 12, 13; XLIII. xxiv. 7, § 3; Code, I. ix. 14. And although individuals in a state are sometimes permitted to defend themselves by their own strength, that cannot properly be called a right to make war. For that right is summed up in this: That a man can commence a war at his own judgement, continue it so long as he pleases, and conclude pacts with the enemy. But citizens are allowed to use violence in their own defence only in case of an unavoidable peril, and then not after it has been warded off, just as there is no necessity for individuals drawing up pacts for peace, when that is already secured well enough by the authority of the supreme sovereignty. Nay, even though a quarrel may have been settled between private citizens, that does not prevent a magistrate from having a free hand in settling the injury which gave rise to the altercation between the citizens.

¹ [For &c. read & c.—Tr.]

But it may sometimes happen that individuals receive back such a right of defence as is theirs in natural liberty; if, for instance, a man come to places which belong to no state but still continue in their primitive community. Yet we must observe, in such a case, whether a man is attacked there by a fellow citizen or by another; for if the former be the case, he can use force only in repelling the immediate peril, while he must leave the prosecution of the injury to their common master. Unless it should appear that his assailant is not going to return to his country, and has nothing at home with which he may render satisfaction for the injury. But if the attack be made by a subject of another country, a man is not forbidden, in case he has prevailed, from going to any extreme in his punishment. Yet he may also enter an action against him in his own country, and there demand satisfaction and punishment, also reserving to himself the intervention of his own state, which acquires a right, when justice is denied one of its citizens, of using violence to secure satisfaction for him. Therefore, if a man is attacked upon the open ocean he need not always call upon his own force any further than to repel the peril, since his assailant can be threatened¹ with an action in his own state, when he has returned to his own home. But if such citizens have paid no heed to the authority of the judge, or the latter patently refuses to see that justice is rendered, a man can conduct his defence as he sees fit, especially if he be outside the jurisdiction of a state. And yet if a judge pleads the condition of the commonwealth, and urges me to postpone the prosecution of my injuries, or to pardon the commonwealth for its remissness, it is the duty of a good citizen to acquiesce in his desire.

9. A common distinction is drawn between a war that is formal and one that is less formal. The former requires that it be conducted on each side by the authority of the supreme sovereignty of a state, and that proper notice be given of its opening, while the designation less formal is given to such a war as is not proclaimed, or which is waged against private citizens. Of these last two the former is more like a kind of incursion or freebooting expedition, while the latter accuses one of the parties of the crime of rebellion, or of such a mode of life as makes a man unworthy to be called a regular soldier. Again, under less formal wars may fall civil wars, when a state is so divided that one cannot tell 886 on which side the supreme sovereignty stands. And in this connexion we should observe, in the case of formal wars, that the peoples who wage them along with their commanders are usually called lawful enemies, as opposed to robbers and highwaymen. See Digest, L. xvi. 118; XLIX. xv. 19, § 2; XLIX. xv. 21, § 1; XLIX. xv. 24. Cicero, Philippics, IV [vi. 14]: 'He is an enemy who has also a republic, a senate-house, a treasury, harmonious and united citizens, with whom, if fortune so wills it, there might be peace and treaties on settled principles.' (Y.*)

¹ [For intentarari read intentari.—Tr.]

Although a state should not be considered as no better than a band of robbers, merely because it has officially, in a way, been guilty of unjust practices, nor should a band of robbers receive the dignity of a state, even though they treat their members with some show of justice. Add Grotius, Bk. III, chap. iii, § 2.

10. At this point, by reason of what is said by Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 4, the question is raised, as to whether to a magistrate properly so called, as such, belongs the power to wage war. This must surely be denied. For since war is the most important of those matters whereby an entire state can be put in jeopardy, to give a magistrate as such the power to decide upon war of his own authority, is equivalent to granting him the supreme sovereignty. See Digest, XLVIII. iv. 3. Yet it is patent that when the supreme authority appoints a magistrate to administer certain details of the affairs of state, the power necessary for the fulfilment of that function is understood to be given him. Therefore, it is a principle of Roman law, that a mixed power belongs to every magistrate, as such, who has jurisdiction, and this mixed power is defined as that modestly to force refractory subjects to observe his jurisdiction, and to obey his decisions. But if a magistrate who exercises jurisdiction uses force upon a few recalcitrants, he must not be held to be waging war, since a coercive force over subjects is not a right of war. Furthermore, it appears that war is waged between equals, or those who claim to be such. Yet if the number of refractory persons be very large, or if the whole state be imperilled by their disturbances, and the ordinary officers are not sufficient to control them, a magistrate properly waits for directions from the supreme power, on how to deal with them. Therefore, Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 4, is wrong when he says:

And surely if the matter be viewed without reference to the laws of particular states, it would seem that every public official has the right to wage war for the protection of the people entrusted to his charge, and also in order to maintain his jurisdiction if assailed by force. (K.)

For the protection of the people is the proper province of the supreme sovereignty, while a magistrate whose province is the administration of justice, protects the people only to the extent that he defends the right of the weak against the more powerful, which end can be achieved without the right to wage war. We might mention, in passing, that although the slaughter by Moses of some thousands of men because of the worship of the golden calf, may more properly be called a punishment than a war, yet the slaying of the Benjamites, in Judges [xx], appears to be the latter rather than the former, although the opposite position is taken by Erasmus of Rotterdam, Letters, Bk. VI, ep. xxix.

In this connexion it may not be¹ out of place to make some general remarks on the power of military magistrates or generals, who serve under orders of their superior. Now a general, when sent out with full authority to wage war, can attack the enemy as well as defend himself against him with every means which he thinks will serve such purposes, but just as he cannot commence a new war, so he cannot close the one already begun, except on the authority of his supreme sovereign. But when a general has received restricted instructions on the conduct of the war, they will set forth very clearly how much power is accorded him, although in all cases generals have the power, whether they have received unrestricted or restricted instructions, to defend themselves in any way they see fit from the attack of an enemy, when they can no longer escape it by an honourable withdrawal. Only under such circumstances can we allow what is said by Cicero, Letters [to Friends], Bk. X, 887 ep. xvi: '[. . .] You ought not, in the midst of such sudden and pressing emergencies, think yourself bound to ask advice from the senate. Be your own senate and follow wherever the interest of the public service shall lead you.' (S.)

Now defence consists not alone in repelling or avoiding the attack of an enemy, but in countering it. And so, for example, although an admiral be commanded merely to stand on the defensive, he is not prevented thereby from firing upon the enemy's fleet and trying to destroy it, when he has been attacked, but is only forbidden to take the offensive when the other shows no signs of action. So if the commander of an army has received orders not to attack the enemy, he may still not only repel his attack, when his position is assaulted, but may even leave his trenches in counter attacks, and when he is attacked on the march, and cannot withdraw in safety and with honour, he will be within his rights in fighting a decisive action. Therefore, the governor of a province, or the commander of a city, especially if he have troops under him, can resist the attacks of an enemy without consulting the supreme sovereign, but he may not carry the war into foreign lands, unless that be expressly stated in his instructions. Some inferior commander who receives instructions to hold a city or a fort with his troops, should defend it with every means at his disposal, and until the destruction of his force, which would be of no service to his cause, can no longer be avoided. We can pass judgement from what has been said on the incident of Pinarius in Livy, Bk. XXIV, chap. xxxvii. The defence of the citadel of Enna had been entrusted to him, and its keys were not to be turned over to the citizens upon pain of death. Therefore, when he felt that his troops were threatened with destruction, unless he put down a rebellion arising in the city, he did not exceed the limits of his power in putting to death the guilty parties, save that he appears to have been too cruel after the peril was ended. Nor did Pinarius, as a matter of fact, stir up a new war, since the Roman state was already at war in Sicily with the Carthaginians and their allies, whom the people of Enna were planning to join. But it does not lie within the power of a general to decide whether to commence hostilities against a people which had lent aid to a former foe, especially after the war is over. On the case of Cn. Manlius who commenced hostilities against the Gallo-Graeci, see Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. xlv ff.; Bk. XLI, chap. vii; Florus, Bk. II, chap. xi. If the governor of a province, especially one that is far removed from the capital of the state, has been granted the power of war and peace with his neighbours, whatever wars he undertakes will be considered formal ones, since he who has given a man authority to do something is regarded as the author of what he does. But if a governor has declared war on another without the authority of the supreme sovereign, it shall lie with the latter, whether or not he will approve the act of his subordinate. If he does so, the war will have to be regarded as a formal one, and that ratification throws back, as it were, an authority upon the war and makes the whole state responsible for it. But when the supreme sovereign disowns the deeds of his governor, the undertaking will be looked upon as no better than a freebooting expedition, and the whole state will not be implicated in the war, provided the governor is either surrendered to the injured state for justice, or else punished at home, and the damage done is, so far as possible, repaired. An illustration of this was the question put by the Roman mission, in Livy, Bk. XXI, chap. xviii, as to whether Hannibal was attacking Saguntum on his own authority or on that of the state; whereupon the Carthaginians quite properly replied that the first question to be decided was, whether the city of Saguntum could be attacked without contravening any treaty between themselves and the Romans, and that until this was decided there was no point in the Romans asking whether a citizen of their country had acted upon his own authority or that of the state. Add the arguments pro and contra over the seizure of the Cadmea by Phoebeidas, in Xenophon, Greek History, Bk. V.

¹ [For fureit read fuertit.—Tr.]

11. A further question is, whether a governor who lacks a general or special authority, can rightfully commence a war against a foreigner, 888 on the presumed will of his supreme sovereign, or because he believes that his act is approved by him. This must be answered in the negative. Because it is not enough for him to consider what would be the decision of his sovereign, if consulted in this particular case, but he should consider rather what the same would want done without being consulted, when there was no hurry, or the matter is doubtful, if a law had to be passed, or a general ruling made on all such cases. If that were so, the decision would certainly be that a minister should not undertake anything, without consulting his sovereign, which concerns the supreme power in the state, such as war, and especially an offensive one, which is the subject of our present inquiry, and regularly admits of delay. And so even should it turn out that a supreme sovereign agrees in feeling that a war may now be begun against a certain enemy, it cannot but displease him for a minister to exceed the limits of his position.

This is illustrated by the action of Cambyses¹ in putting to death his servants for sparing the life of Croesus, although he was glad enough that he had been spared. Herodotus, Bk. III [xxxvi]. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. III, chap. xvi, gives us another illustration in the case of C. Piso, propraetor of Sicily. Yet add Livy, Bk. XLIV, chap. x.

12. But just as those who live as individuals in natural liberty cannot be punished by war, except for injuries which they themselves have committed, so it is a point for further inquiry, as to how in states the guilt of an injury and the reason why war may be begun, passes from those who are immediately guilty, over to the entire state. Now it is clear that a community, whether civil or of any other kind, is not responsible for the actions of individual members, except by some culpable act of commission or omission on its own part, for no matter how much a state may threaten, there is always left to the will of citizens the natural liberty to do otherwise, so that in no way can a state stand good for the actions of its individual subjects. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxi, § 2, and the illustrations which he adduces from Livy, Bk. XXIX, chap. xvi; Bk. XXXV, chap. xxxi; Bk. XLV, chap. xxiii; Valerius Maximus, Bk. VI, chap. vi, §§ 3, 5. Now of those ways by which the heads of states become exposed to war because of injuries done by their citizens, two come in for special consideration, namely, sufferance and reception. As for sufferance it must be held that he who knows a wrong is being done, and is able and obligated to prevent it, when that does not involve the probable danger of a greater evil, is held to have been guilty himself of the wrong. That is, what is required is a union of knowledge of the fact and of power to prevent it, neither one of these alone being sufficient to implicate one on the crime of another. See Digest, XLVII. vi. 1, § 1. Now it is presumed that the heads of a state know what is openly and frequently done by their subjects, and the power to prevent is always presumed, unless its lack be clearly established. Here belongs a statement of Lycurgus, Against Leocrates [§ 146]: 'Crimes lie upon their authors so long as they have not yet been brought to trial. But so soon as they have been tried and had sentence passed upon them, they lie upon those who have not punished them in accordance with the laws.' Add Polybius, Bk. IV, chap. xxvii, at the beginning; Gratian, Decretum, I. lxxxvi. 1 and 3. As for the matter of reception, and how far a state may furnish cause for war against itself by receiving and defending those who have wronged others, all this is fully set forth by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxi, §§ 3-6.

¹ [Of course Cyrus is meant, as in the passage correctly cited above.—Tr.]

13. Reprisals or violent executions upon the persons or property of citizens of another commonwealth which refuses to do justice, are adequately treated by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. ii. On the equity of reprisals I would only add this: That just as a result of the union into a civil body is that an injury done to one of its members by foreigners is regarded as affecting the entire state, so it does not appear unjust that individual subjects should be obligated to contribute to the debt of the 889 state, since, after all, what they contribute on that score has to be made up to them by their state. But if one or another citizen suffer some loss thereby, he should count it among those inconveniences which almost necessarily attend states, and which, in any event, are but a small part of those which they could have expected outside the shelter of a state.

14. It is everywhere recognized that men wage wars not merely on their own behalf but also frequently on behalf of others. For this to be lawful, there is required in him to whom aid is brought, a just cause for war, and on him who undertakes to bring it to another there should lie a special obligation, whereby he is bound to the principal belligerent, and which is of such a nature, that, in order to favour one man, I can treat another as though he were my enemy. For otherwise the remonstrances of Lucan, Bk. IV [707 ff.], will be in place: 'Who thinks of comparing the leaders, who of weighing the causes? The side he has taken to that does he wish well; just as in the shows of the fatal sand¹ no ancient grudge compels those brought forward to combat together, but they hate those pitted against them.' (R.)

Now among those whom we not only rightly can but should defend, are our subjects; and this not only because they are a part, as it were, of the government, but also because it was to enjoy such defence that free men of their own accord set up governments or submitted to them. Thus, according to Livy, Bk. VII, chap. xxxi, and Florus, Bk. I, chap. xvi, the Campanians, in submitting themselves and their belongings to the Romans, held that the latter were absolutely obligated to take up arms in their defence. Although it should be observed, in this particular case, that since the Campanians had maltreated the Samnites before that time in an unjust war, the Romans could not properly undertake their defence, even though they surrendered themselves, before they had restored the damage done and paid the costs of the war. Yet it is only proper for the heads of states to go to war for individual citizens, if it can be done without entailing a greater hardship upon all or a majority of the other citizens, since their duty is more concerned with the whole body of citizens than with a part, and the greater the part the more closely it approximates the whole. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxv.

¹ [Referring to the arena.—Tr.]

The next persons after subjects for whom we are obligated to take up arms, are allies, who have made this an article of their treaty with us. But they yield under every circumstance to our subjects, provided aid cannot be furnished both of them at once, and no despite is done to the treaty, for no state is obligated to any one more than to its own citizens. Therefore, when a government promises aid to others, it is understood to do so on the condition that such aid can be given without impairing its obligation towards its own citizens. And so he is even¹ a fool who puts any trust in a treaty when its observance is of no importance to the other party. And just as no man should undertake unjust or rash wars, so no man is obligated to give aid to an ally who engages in such wars. And although this statement applies primarily to offensive wars, yet it applies in a way to defensive ones as well, for if any ally of mine sees that he is not the equal of an enemy, even with my aid, and yet persists in courting certain ruin when he could close with him on tolerable terms, it would be insane of me to join myself to his folly. And to this extent we must accept the statement of Grotius, loc. cit., that 'we are not obligated to render aid if there is no hope for a successful outcome, since alliances are formed for good and not for evil', because there is no purpose of entering into an alliance if one is to suffer no peril or loss for one's ally.

After allies come friends, or such as we are joined to by reason of some kindness or favour. Although no certain and definite aid is promised these by an express treaty, yet the striking up of mutual friendship is understood to imply a promise that the safety of the one will be the other's care, so far as more binding obligations permit, and will in fact weigh more heavily with him than the ties of human brotherhood ordinarily demand. And this alone can be sufficient to 890 make a man undertake another's defence against the manifest injuries of his enemies, especially since it can very easily be our highest interest, and in fact redound to the general good of mankind, to prevent a man from injuring and insulting others with impunity. Solon replied, when asked to assure the existence² in the world of the fewest possible injuries: 'If those who were not wronged should feel as bad about it as those who were.' Diogenes Laertius, Solon [59]. A sentence of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. IV, chap. i [9], applies here: 'For there is a natural feeling in behalf of those oppressed.' (W.) Euripides, Suppliants [267-9]:

The beast finds refuge in the rock,
The slave at the Gods' altars; and a state Storm-tossed must cower beneath another's lee. (W.)

¹ [For et iam read etiam.—Tr.]

² [For extinuae read extinuae.—Tr.]

Yet there ought to be some restraint in this, so that not every man, even though he live in natural liberty, should have the right to coerce and punish by war any person who has done any other person an injury, on the sole excuse that the public good demands that injuries to the innocent should not go unpunished, and that what concerns one should concern all. For since he who is attacked in this fashion is not deprived of his right to meet with equal violence the violence of him whom he himself has never injured, the result would be that for one war to distress and embroil mankind there would be two. Nay, for a person to thrust himself forward as a kind of arbitrator of human affairs, is opposed even to the equality granted by nature, not to mention the fact that such a thing could easily lead to great abuse, since there is scarcely a man living against whom this could not serve as an excuse for war. Therefore, an injury done another can only give us cause for war when the injured party calls upon us for aid, so that whatever we do in such a case is done not in our name but in that of the person wronged.

But can a man also take up arms to protect another's subjects, that is, from the injuries of their own sovereign? On this point one may consult the view of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxv, § 8. In our opinion the safest principle to go on is, that we cannot lawfully undertake the defence of another's subjects, for any other reason than they themselves can rightfully advance, for taking up arms to protect themselves against the barbarous savagery of their superiors.

15. On the declaration required for a formal war Grotius, Bk. III, chap. iii, can furnish all the necessary information.

16. Grotius, Bk. III, chaps. iv ff., has given a full account of how large numbers of nations have set no limit or measure on the licence against an enemy, allowed us, as we have already said, by the law of nature. But here it is to be observed that generals commonly prescribe laws to their soldiers as to how far they should proceed against an enemy, and punish when they transgress their orders. That is done not as if the soldiers in question were doing injury to an enemy, but because of the violation of the general's authority, and to preserve military discipline. Thus even when a man in a formal war has exceeded in his slaughter and rapine the limits set by natural law, he would not commonly be held a murderer or thief, or be punished, were he by chance brought before a third nation which was at peace. And this not only because it is not our concern what offences a man has committed elsewhere, but also because it appears that nations have a tacit agreement not to take upon themselves decisions growing out of the wars of others. For why should he who is not an ally of either party rashly assume another's quarrel? Why, scarcely even in a just war can it be known for certain what is a just way to defend oneself, to secure compensation for damage, or demand guarantees for the future! And so it is better to leave such questions to the conscience of the belligerents, than to pass judgement on them to one's own peril; especially since the belligerents themselves have agreed by a tacit pact either to increase or temper the savagery of the war at their own pleasure.

17. How far in particular many peoples commonly extend the licence of war on the persons of enemies, is shown in detail¹ by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. iv. 891

18. A special question, in this connexion, is, whether you may kill an enemy with hired assassins. On this point Grotius, Bk. III, chap. iv, § 18, holds that a distinction should be drawn between those who violate an express or tacit article of faith, such as soldiers, citizens, vassals, refugees, and those who are not so bound, and that to secure assassins from the latter sort is forbidden by no law. Add Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. II. But to use those whose act involves them in perfidy, is regarded among the more civilized nations as disgraceful, although even God-fearing princes frequently offer rewards to any who will make away with rebels and the leaders of pirates or robbers, nor is such an act criticized, owing to the disrepute which gathers around such men.

Practically the same answer can be given to the general question as to whether it is lawful to use in war the help of any persons that can be secured. Here a distinction is commonly drawn between traitors to and deserters from their masters, who voluntarily offer their services, and those who are led by promises or rewards to break their faith. Grotius, Bk. III, chap. i, §§ 21-2, feels that the customs of nations legalize the use of the services of the former, but not of the latter. Yet compare Quintilian, Declamations, cclv. However, his distinction is not to be accepted without some question. For the two things which I have in mind when I seek to wean away the subjects of my enemy, namely, to strip him of his resources, and to inflict some loss upon him, are both entirely lawful for me, if my cause of war be considered just. Why, then, I may not attain that end by corrupting the minds of his citizens with hopes of reward, I cannot see. Especially since all men agree that I can drive the citizens of my enemy to surrender, and so to desert their master, by feigned terrors, and such a desertion is surely not entirely blameless, while military laws inflict capital punishment no less upon such as allow themselves to be imposed upon in this way, than upon those who break their oaths, and traitors, since ignorance and credulity are no less opposed to military service than is perfidy. Furthermore, force as a means of destroying an enemy has so lawful a standing that even fraud is not looked upon as illegal. And although those deserters cannot act as they do without involving themselves in sin, yet no guilt can come from that fact to the man who solicits them, for I am under no obligation to give up asserting my right in whatever way it can be done most conveniently, lest I give occasion of sin to those who have by their injury broken off all communication of right with me. And when I am permitted to kill a man with an iron lance, why may I not attack him as well with one of silver? Especially since it is still left to their judgement, no matter what approaches I make, whether they will treat me as an enemy, or deserve my gratitude by rendering some useful service. But the reason, why, in time of peace, I cannot, for example, make overtures to another man's slave to desert his master in a rascally fashion, and to come to me, is twofold: Because I have no power to interfere in his affairs and because I could have had no right to punish that servant, if he should not accept my offer and flee to me. But both of these rights obtain in the case before us, for as the dominion held by our enemy over his possessions is no concern of ours, to prevent our being allowed to take them from him, so also his right over his subjects is none of our business, because we are not obligated to make it our concern that it persist in him undisturbed. Therefore, the statement usually opposed to this position, namely, that a man cannot incite another to do something which involves him in sin, or, in other words, that a man sins when he is the occasion or cause of another man sinning, can apply, apparently, only among non-enemies. For in respect to me an enemy is in such a state that I need give no heed in pursuing my 892 right against him, as to whether or not it leads him to fall into sin. And so although our money or our promises may actually have led another to perfidy, yet that cannot, apparently, be laid to our account as our own sin, because for the present all interchange of right has been broken off between us by that hostile status, and he has, so far as he was able, given us an unlimited licence against himself. Furthermore, since, when considerations of war demand it, to kill an enemy is not unlawful, no more will it appear unlawful to give him reason for his falling into sin. For it is a distorted reason, which some advance, to the effect that enemies should keep faith, and that therefore the subjects of an enemy cannot be enticed to perfidy. Yet a man should take care that he does not set an example which may work to his own injury, while he who refrains from such conduct, when he might have profited by it, unquestionably deserves the praise accorded to unusual generosity. And truth lies with the following statement of Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. I [viii. 36]:

¹ [For latet read late.—Tr.]

Though he who has found a traitor is pleased at the moment of victory by the service rendered, yet afterwards, moved by suspicion based upon the traitor's past, he hates and fears his benefactor, since he himself has in his own possession the evidences of the other's faithlessness. (D.)

Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VI, chap. v, § 7.

19. What the licence of war allows regarding the possessions of an enemy, as well as whatever is called sacred, is set forth by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. v.

20. A man can acquire, in a just war, by the law of nature, and with a clear conscience, from the possession of enemies, whatever is owed him, or its equivalent, and such things as caused him to take up arms, because his enemies refused to pay them, including all expenses he was put to in vindicating the violation of his right, and whatever else he may have felt was necessary in order that he might secure guarantees from his enemy. Therefore, if a man was led to injure others by confidence in his wealth, it is lawful to take from him, when defeated, his superfluous possessions, so that he may be less over-bearing in the future. But by the customs of nations a man becomes owner in a formal war of such things as he took from the enemy, although they be beyond all bounds and reason, and far exceed the claim for which the war was begun. See Grotius, Bk. III, chap. vi, §§ 1 ff., where he also remarks that this is understood of movable as well as immovable spoils of war. But we should observe, in this connexion, that seizure in war acquires only a right which prevails against some third party, and that for the captor to acquire a dominion which will prevail also against him from whom the things were taken, the latter must have concluded peace with the other, and made a legal transfer. For without this a right to such things is understood to remain with the former owner, whenever he regains enough strength to recover them from his enemy.

21. The question is also raised, to whom the things acquired in a formal war belong; whether to the whole people, or to individuals among the people, or to those who were the first to acquire them. This, we feel, can be answered in a few words. Now it is certain that the right of war, under which is comprehended the right to arm citizens, and to lead them out into the field, as well as the right to levy upon them money, or whatever is needful for war, is vested in the supreme sovereignty. But since wars are undertaken either to assert the private debts of individuals, which an enemy wilfully refuses to pay, or for some reason which concerns the whole commonwealth, it is clearly to be seen, that in the first case, the prime point to be held in mind is that those, for whose sake the war is waged, should receive what is owed them. What is taken over and above such debts, and in wars undertaken for reasons of the state, whosoever it be that first acquires it, whether mercenaries, or citizen soldiery who serve under the orders of the state, and even without pay, belongs to the author of the war, which is the supreme sovereignty. Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. VI, chap. vi: 'A Spartan soldier was not allowed so much as to strip an enemy of his spoils.' But since the burden of war lies heavy upon individual citizens, whether they are called upon for taxes, or for military service, it is both right and humane on the part of him in whom resides the supreme sovereignty, to make it possible for individual citizens to derive some profit from a war. Now this is possible in several ways: If citizens who participate in a war may receive some salary from the public treasury (see Livy¹, Bk. IV, chap. lx; Bk. V, chap. iv); or if all share in the booty, or every soldier be allowed to keep what he has seized (thus we are told by Polybius, Bk. IV, chaps. xxvi, xxxvi, that when a Greek state declared war it 'gave public announcement of the booty', that is, a crier announced it to be the will of the state that every man could take booty); or if the booty is appropriated by the state treasury for future use, to be employed in decreasing the burdens and taxes of the citizens. But mercenary troops are owed nothing beyond their pay, unless it be the desire to use them generously, or to reward them for some distinguished service, or to incite them to great fortitude. Add Grotius, Bk. III, chap. vi, § 8, who goes into this question in great detail. But when he distinguishes between public and private acts of war, of which the latter are only undertaken upon occasion of a public war, it is to be observed that it is questionable whether everything that is taken in war by private acts and on the unbidden initiative of individuals, can belong to those who take it. For it is a part of the right of war to stipulate what persons can injure an enemy, and how far they may proceed. And so private individuals will not be permitted to make booty of an enemy's property, or take off any of his possessions, without permission from the supreme sovereignty, whose province it is also to decide how far private individuals should exercise that licence of plunder, and whether all the booty or only a part should be allowed to them. And so whatever belongs to private citizens in a war, depends entirely upon the indulgence of the supreme sovereignty, or, in other words, the state alone authorizes a man to be a soldier and allows him to commit the acts of offensive war. Therefore, in Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I, chap. xi, Cato 'declares that it is not lawful for a man who is not a soldier to fight with an enemy'. (E.) Add Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. III, chap. v, § 12.
893

22. On the acquisition in war of non-physical things, this special point should be noted, namely, that they can only be acquired along with the subject in which they inhere, whether that be persons or things. Now certain rights inhere in things, such as lands, rivers, ports, cities, territories, and even more to persons, in so far as they possess those things, there belong specific rights over other things or men. But the point of our inquiry in this connexion is, whether this right belongs to that thing by a personal or real pact, that is, whether he who was the first to connect that right with a thing, made a pact whereby that right would lie forever with the possessor of that thing, whoever he may be, and no matter how it may have come into his possession; or whether he wished that right to prevail only when special persons held the thing by a certain title. If a right is connected with some thing in the latter manner, a man cannot exercise that right so soon as he has used some title to seize the thing, but inquiry must be made as to whether it accords with the first establishment of that right, that it should follow the title of seizure in war.

¹ [For Linus read Livius.—Tr.]

Now those rights which belong of their nature and directly to some person, concern either other persons or things. The rights which belong to one person over another person, since they are acquired only with the latter's consent (and this concerned only a certain person and not merely any one), may not be understood as acquired with a person, even though the one to whom they belonged may have fallen into the hands of enemies. Thus when a king has been captured by his foes, it is not supposed that his kingdom has also become theirs, nor does the capture of a husband or father give power immediately over the wife or children. But when a wife is captured along with her husband, the captor secures a right over the captive wife, not from that fact that he took her husband along with her, but solely because of her capture, nor is his right increased or decreased, in case he captured her husband at the same time or not. Nor does the victor secure any conjugal power over another's wife, but only such as is usually acquired over captives. 894 Compare Grotius, Bk. III, chap. vii, § 4.

With regard to rights over things we must make a distinction as to whether a man lives in a commonwealth, or outside one in a mere state of nature. In the latter case it is understood that he who has taken possession of a man's person has also taken all his possessions, or at least acquired¹ the power to take them as well, since there is no one who can rightfully forbid his seizing them. But it is the rule in states that a man's possessions do not perish with his person, but that his right to them passes to other persons of that state, or, in case there are none to receive them, to the public treasury. Therefore, if a citizen is captured by an enemy, whatever there be of his property that is not taken with him, is not secured by his captor, but passes to him whom the laws of the state would have named as his successor, had he died a natural death. But if an enemy has seized a captive's property along with his person, his claim of a prize in war is enough to assure him the dominion over the captured property, nor need he secure that dominion ultimately from the person of the former possessor whom he took with them. And so it is the same thing, so far as the right of the captor over the things captured is concerned, whether he seized their owner along with them or not.

23. These matters are illustrated by the question which was once argued in the Amphictyonic Council, as set forth by Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. V, chap. x [III]: 'When Alexander had demolished Thebes, he found a document in which it was stated that the Thebans had lent the Thessalians a hundred talents. Of this document Alexander made a present to the Thessalians, as he had had their assistance in the siege. But subsequently, when the Thebans were re-established by Cassander, they demanded payment of the money from the Thessalians.' (W.) The reasons set forth by the Thebans can be seen in the same passage, to which the Thessalians could have replied as follows: I. What has been taken by just force cannot be reclaimed, and by the consent of nations force used in a formal war is counted just, so that after peace has been made there remains to the former owner no claim to things taken in such a war. II. The right of war enjoys a validity in such things as are later brought up for judgement, for surely if some controversy arises at the conclusion of a war over a thing which I have acquired during the course of it, all I need do is to claim that it was a prize of war. III. Whatever has been acquired in a just war is rightfully retained even in peace, especially after peace has been established by agreement, for all things on the restoration of which there was no express agreement in the articles of peace, are understood to remain in the hands of their possessor. IV. With a captured person can be acquired those rights which are properly and ultimately founded in things, provided, however, that the captive transfer them to me by his consent, which I have the power to secure by threat of some graver evil. Therefore, just as I can give another my power of action, with the result that a debtor is as much obligated to pay him as he was before to pay me, so, if a captive give his consent to transfer his action to me, his debtor thereupon owes me what he had owed my captive. And in this way Alexander could have taken to himself that credit, even had he left the state of Thebes standing, by forcing them to transfer their right to him. And as a matter of fact he is understood to have done so after he had become master of Thebes without the exception of any thing. On this basis he had the right to require that debt of the Thessalians, or else to make them a present of it; and he could, indeed, have brought direct pressure upon the Thebans to cancel the debt in behalf of the Thessalians. Therefore, when Alexander turned the papers of the debt over to the Thessalians, it was not his purpose that the Theban state, already destroyed by him, should never at any time be able to require the debt, but that he might give open evidence that he would never demand it of the Thessalians on the score of his mastery over Thebes. V. Their statement, that so long as any one of their citizens still lives, he is and is counted to be the creditor for the entire sum, and that he therefore has the same right as the state had to require what was owed it, is 895 false. For the individual citizens who survive the utter destruction of a state can on no count claim for themselves the right of the state, since they no longer constitute that state. Now it is patent that Alexander entirely destroyed the Theban state, so that those who survived that catastrophe could by no interpretation be regarded as a people, while they who later built a city of Thebes were clearly a new people, who, even if the old Thebans had had any special rights left, could never have laid claim to them on that basis, save as they acquired them entirely anew. And this was certainly not done in the matter of the debt of the Thessalians. VI. The Thessalians did not in some informal way get possession of the papers but merely accepted them, when turned over by him who had acquired everything that could be called Theban, and showed that he wished to make his allies a present of their debt.

¹ [For natus read nactus.—Tr.]

24. The way in which sovereignty is acquired over conquered peoples is set forth by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. viii.

25. We must now briefly consider how things seized in war may return to their former owners. On this matter we hold that it is highly agreeable to natural equity that prisoners of war, upon escaping in some way from the hands of their enemies, when not bound to them by their pledged word, and making their way back to their own people, not only recover their former position, but also all their property and rights. As to things, if during the course of the war they are taken back from the enemy either by ourselves, or our citizens or soldiers, it is just that they return to their former owners, and this is true not only of immovable but also of movable property, provided we can clearly identify it. For since it is the duty of a state to offer every possible defence to the property of its citizens, it will also be its function to see that they recover whatever they have lost. Nor does it make any difference if this has been taken back by soldiers, for they are but servants of a state, and whatever they acquire they acquire for the state and not for themselves. Since it would be unfair for the state to take to itself the property lost by its citizens, there is nothing left than for it to be restored to its former owners. See I Samuel, xxx. 22 ff. We read in Homer, Iliad, Bk. XI, that the spoil was divided among those from whom the enemy had formerly taken it. The rules of the Roman law, especially on the right of recovery (postliminium), are accurately set forth by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. ix.

26. If a whole people has either by its own strength, or with the aid of allies, shaken off a foreign yoke, it unquestionably recovers its ancient liberty and status, and if some part of its former possessions still remains in the power of its enemy, it keeps unimpaired its claim to the recovery of the same, so long as the war has not been peaceably concluded. But if a third nation in its own name take away in war a people already subject to its enemy, that people will only change masters and will not recover its liberty. The same principle must apply also to a part of any people. But if a part of a people is recovered by that nation from which it had for a time been separated, or by its allies, it will be joined again to the former body, and will resume its old place and rights although there may possibly be an agreement with the allies whereby they are to keep whatever was formerly ours that they may take from the enemy. Thus we read in Justin, Bk. XXIX, chap. ii, that Demetrius preferred to yield his lost kingdom to Philip rather than to the Romans. But if a part of a people has on its own initiative ejected the enemy's garrisons, it will return to its former body and will not assume to establish a separate state, in case the old state has not renounced its right to that part.

ON PACTS RELATING TO WAR

- | | |
|---|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The division of pacts which presuppose war. 2. Whether pacts which are not concerned with ending a state of war, are valid. 3. The nature of a truce. 4. On its duration. 5. A truce does not concern the cause of war. 6. A declaration of war is not required at the termination of a truce. 7. A truce is concluded by an express pact. 8. On the beginning and end of truces. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 9. When a truce obligates subjects. 10. What is or is not allowed by a truce. 11. What is done with a man who is seized in the enemy's country, after the expiration of a truce, and forcibly retained. 12. The course to be followed in case a truce is broken. 13. On the right of safe conduct. 14. On the redemption of captives. 15. On pacts made by generals in time of war, 16. And those by private citizens. |
|---|---|

WE must now inquire into public pacts which presuppose a state of war. Some of them end the state of war, while others leave it still going on, but mitigate it to some extent. Before we undertake to discuss the latter in detail, we shall have to inquire in general into the validity of the second kind.

2. Now Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xix, reaches the general conclusion that all pacts made with an enemy must be observed. This is, of course, true with regard to pacts which look toward peace, but as regards those which leave a state of war still continuing, and are not concerned with ending it, there may well be some question. For it is not an entirely valid argument to say that a man knows what is going on, and is capable of agreeing to it, and that therefore a second party can acquire a right from his promise, or may be the object of an obligation from him. For a state of war as such regards force as its peculiar method of agency, while the peculiar instrument of peace is faith. Therefore, it seems absurd to use faith when the matter at hand does not concern the restoration or preservation of peace, nay, when it would seem to heighten rather than diminish the state of war. Again, I ask of any person with whom I conclude a pact, that he show faith towards me. And yet it implies a confusion for me to demand that another keep faith with me, and at the same time avow that I intend to remain his enemy, that is, to remain a person who would injure him in every way possible. For a state of hostility of itself grants one the licence to do another injury without limit. Therefore, the promise that I will not exercise the licence of hostility against another seems opposed to actual conditions, so long as I proclaim that I will continue in a full state of war. And so what was said in another connexion [III. vi] will not be able to apply here, namely, that those who conclude pacts with one another have by that act renounced the exceptions, which, being derived from the person of the one, can make the other fear that he will break his faith. For if they seriously renounce those exceptions, they thereupon cease to be enemies, while if they openly avow that their hostility still continues, this fact destroys all confidence in their words, and the more proper presumption must be, that they are but laying traps for one another and hoping to find a way for injury in lulling one another into false security. An illustration of this is the incident given by Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. IV [xxix], when the envoys of Narses sent to Totila asked him:

'What time will you set for battle?' the latter replied, 'We shall fight in eight days'.

897 On hearing this the messengers return to Narses and report the agreement. But he, suspecting Totila of guile, made preparations to battle on the next day, and he was not wrong in his expectation. For at daybreak the next morning Totila appeared in full force before any scout could bring word.

Nay, he who is misled by such a pact can secure no new right against his deceivers, since the state of war already existing with his enemy gives him the right to go to any extreme of violence. But if a man should say that a person ought to stand by agreements of this kind, lest his enemy should be greatly angered at being deceived, and should wreak all the more vengeance upon us, such a person acknowledges by his very statement that these agreements are to be measured by their utility. On this point bear the remarks of Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. I, chap. xxix:

If the day or the spot for a battle has been agreed upon with an enemy, it would be considered an act against justice to occupy the spot beforehand, or to anticipate the time. [. . .] For a deeper vengeance is taken on fiercer foes, and on those that are false as well as on those who have done greater wrongs. (R.*)

Yet we are not obligated to use every licence of war upon an enemy, and often it is deserving of praise to spare one upon whom the most extreme treatment could have been visited. But since war is allowable for this end, namely, that we may defend or assert our rights when that is impossible by peaceful methods, it should be agreed that the shortest way by which that end can be attained is the most agreeable to nature. And so when those pacts which only temper the use of force in war do but increase and nourish war, it is manifest that they are repugnant to nature. Compare Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 27.

However all this may be, the more advanced nations have nevertheless come to include among those customs which are intended to increase bravery in war, that of holding valid also those pacts which are not concerned with putting an end to a state of war, but only of seeing that it is waged with a certain moderation. To these belong a truce of a few days or hours, in order to bury the dead; a pact to grant passage through our guards; an agreement entirely to spare certain places, men, or things; to forbear from fighting at a certain time; to avoid the use of certain weapons and missiles. Thus Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium Persicum, Bk. V, chap. xx, writes that the Turks and Persians agreed that their merchants could carry on their business in safety even in war time, and trade between both countries, since it was to the interest of both nations that their commerce be uninterrupted. In brief, since ambition and lust for wealth drove nearly all mankind into unnecessary wars, it seemed to be to the advantage of human interests to make a kind of business of war and to reduce it into the form of an art, on the ground that injuries to the innocent, at least, might be more tolerable, when war was not allowed to indulge in all the licence properly accorded to it. Another consideration is that a reputation for perfidy, or for tricking others by pacts, is usually harmful to persons engaged in fighting, and that men of judgement are deceived only once. Yet a cautious man would do well not to put too much trust in such pacts, or to grant an enemy an opportunity to do him hurt, because he lured himself into a false security. And so only necessity will lead us to make such agreements, except when we are in a position to retaliate upon our deceiver, or can in other ways look out for our own interests.

3. Among the pacts which do not put an end to a state of war, but only suspend its operation for a time, falls a truce, which is an agreement whereby the acts of war must for a time be stopped, although the war still continues. This definition is illustrated in Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxi, § 1. Now truces can extend over several years, although it may be said in excuse of Varro and Paulus, who define them as being of short duration, that they had in mind only those truces which are generally concluded while both armies remain in the field, and so last regularly only for a few days, and not those which put a stop to all preparations for war and for a certain time are like complete peace, especially when they contain a special clause to the effect that negotiations leading to a complete settlement will be carried on in the meantime. And it should be noted, furthermore, that although truces of the latter kind regularly embrace all territories of both belligerents, it may be, and often is agreed, that they shall be observed only in certain places, while the war may continue in others; for instance, European nations with colonies in the East or West Indies may conclude a truce to be observed in Europe, and continue the war in the Indies. 898

4. In this connexion the question can be raised, as to whether, if peace be concluded for a definite period, such as for twenty or forty years, &c., it should be considered only a truce. It is our opinion that every peace is by its nature eternal, that is, whenever peace is concluded the parties make an agreement that they will never again take up arms over those disputes which gave rise to the war, but that they will now settle them once and for all, or refer them to arbitrators, or find some other amicable solution. And so that eternal peace will never be regarded as broken, even though the same nations come to war later on for some new cause different from the former, for an eternal peace does not mean that one of the parties is obligated forever to swallow indignities offered by the other. Therefore, although the term 'peace' has been used, if a certain time has been set during which it is to continue, and¹ the dispute out of which the war arose has not been settled, it will be no more than a truce which requires for its duration the mutual exercise of the duties of peace. We are informed by Justin, Bk. III, chap. vii, that the Lacedaemonians concluded peace for a period of fifty years, but that when the war broke out again after six years, they complained of a breach of the 'truce'. On the other hand it seems absurd for one to make a truce for a hundred years, as Romulus did with the city of Veii (so Livy, Bk. I, chap. xv, although Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. II [lv], calls it σπονδαί, that is, a treaty²), for there can scarcely be an injury which does not wear itself out, as it were, in so long a period, so that it is absurd to put off its prosecution for a century. For when we read further on in the same author,³ Bk. VII, chap. xx [8]: 'So peace was granted to the people of Caere, and it was resolved that a truce of a hundred years be made and recorded in a decree of the senate'⁴ (F.*), I should feel that this was done that the senate might not detract from its authority by forgiving in so easy a way a manifest injury. According to Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. IX, chap. iv, Theodosius II made a truce with the Persians for a hundred years. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. lx, mentions a peace between the Ambraciots and the Acarnanians for a hundred years, and Ferdinand of Spain and Alphonso V of Portugal drew up a peace for one hundred and one years. Connestagio, De Unione Lusitaniae, Bk. I.

5. Now since a state of war continues during a truce, which would be impossible, were not the claim still standing, and the dispute not yet settled which gave rise to the war, it is clearly absurd to ask a man to make a truce with me, and yet renounce his claim against me. For if he does the latter, what further requirement is necessary for peace? Or why should I want to reserve to myself at the close of a certain time the licence for war, without the cause for renewing the war? See Baudius, De Induciis Belli Belgici, p. 128.

6. It is, furthermore, obvious from the nature of truces, that, if the war is to be renewed at their expiration, it need not be declared anew. Compare Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxi, § 3. And yet in the case of longer truces, and when there has been complete demobilization,

¹ [For ne read nec.—Tr.]

² [Here Pufendorf renders the Greek σπονδαί by 'treaty' although its most common meaning by far is 'truce'.—Tr.]

³ [That is, Livy, not Dionysius.—Tr.]

⁴ [The latest text reads aes, 'on a tablet of bronze' (after Madvig), instead of SC (= senatus consultum).—Tr.]

the truces regularly carry, or at least should carry, a clause to the effect that, during this period, attempts will be made to settle the controversy; and although it is not required, it would at least be generous and honourable to inform our foe, some time beforehand, of our probable intention to renew the war, so that we may have the opportunity to show him that we find no pleasure in it, and that we are not the ones responsible for there being no complete peace.

7. We should also call attention to the fact that a truce, the observance of which carries with it an obligation, can be made only by an express pact or by acts so similar to those of friendship and peace, that they can be referred to no other cause; although negotiations for peace have of themselves not the force of a truce, unless there is an express statement to that end. Therefore, an enemy can in no wise justly conclude, from the fact that I have for a time ceased all hostile acts, that I have consented to a truce with him, nor can he accuse me of breaking any tacit faith, if, after such a lull in hostilities, whereby I led him into a feeling of security, I suddenly make an unexpected attack upon him. It is in this sense that we should explain the meaning of those writers who commonly designate a temporary cessation of hostilities without a pact, as a 'tacit truce'. See Justin, Bk. VI, chap. vii; Livy, Bk. II, chaps. xviii and lxiv; Bk. XXIII, chap. xlvi. The meaning of these passages is that for the period of which they speak the enemy remained inactive in good faith, exactly as if an agreement had been reached to that effect.

8. On the time limit usually put upon truces, one may consult Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxi, § 4. But we cannot agree with his statement that the day from which a period of time is said to commence will not fall within that period, because the preposition 'from' has a disjunctive and not a conjunctive force. For surely its beginning is a part of a thing. Therefore, if it has been agreed that a truce will continue for ten days from the first of July, surely no one will understand this to mean anything other than that the first day of the month is also included in the truce. Nor does the word 'from' always have the force of dividing the word with which it goes from that which follows, but often of including the beginning in a thing. What is more common than the expressions 'from head to foot', 'from egg to apples' ?¹

9. Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxi, § 5, also shows when a truce begins to obligate more particularly the subjects of both warring nations.

10. The things that are and are not permissible during a truce are enumerated by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxi, §§ 6 ff. Yet on this point we feel that every kind of a truce permits acts that are merely defensive, even though the truce may have been requested or obtained on other grounds. And so, for instance, it will not be unlawful during a truce that was only granted for the burial of the dead, for one to withdraw to a safer position, or to throw up earthworks; or for a besieged force to admit fresh troops and supplies, even if they have only bargained that they shall not be attacked. Nor are we convinced by the reason which Grotius gives in section 10, namely: 'Since such truces work to the advantage of one of the parties they should not work any hardship on the one who grants them.' For since a man is never accustomed by any pact to renounce his right of self-defence, he who has granted such a truce may throw the blame on his own easy ways and imprudence for his not taking sufficient care to see that his enemy might not be able to strengthen his position during the truce. See Xenophon, Agésilas [i. 10-11], and Cornelius Nepos, Agésilas, chap. ii, on the truce made by Tissaphernes with Agésilas, on which incident it is our opinion, that, if the former really conferred with his master, the king, as to whether he could on any basis settle upon some terms with the Lacedæmonians, he was not guilty of perjury for the mere reason that he prepared himself for any emergency. Add also Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xvi.

¹ [That is, 'from beginning to end', i.e. of a Roman meal. The expression is from Horace, Satires, I. iii. 6 f.—7r.]

11. The same writer, Bk. III, chap. xxi, § 9, points out that when a man is seized at the expiration of the truce on the enemy's soil, and detained by superior force, he can be held prisoner.

12. If a truce is broken by either party, the injured one can renew hostilities without any formal declaration, although, if he so chooses, he can also wait until the end of the truce. But if they had settled upon a punishment for such a breach it must be paid by him who was the first to commit it, and when the punishment is demanded and paid by the guilty party, the other has, of course, no right to resort to arms because of it, for the purpose of paying the fine is to prevent the deed from having any further effect. On the other hand, if the injured party
900 resumes the war, he is understood to have given up the idea of the punishment, although it is surely repugnant to the pact to give up the penalty and fly to arms. For it is not the rule in such agreements to have it optional with one of the parties, whether he will take the penalty or resume the war. See Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxi, §§ 11-12.

13. On pacts which concern the grant of safe conduct, or, in other words, the guarantee of free passage through territory held by the enemy, and how they should be interpreted, we are fully informed by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxi, §§ 14 ff.

14. Pacts on the redemption of captives are greatly favoured by Christian nations, especially if one is held captive among infidel peoples, when even the sacred treasures of the church are rightfully used for his ransom. See Code, I. ii. 21; Gratian, Decretum, II. xii. 2. 13-15. Although the customs of the Romans, as set forth in Livy, Bk. XXII, chaps. lix, lxi, and Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode v, were entirely different. Silius Italicus, Bk. X [663 f.]: 'For a man with arms in his hands to have allowed himself to be captured was the worst possible crime.' We read in Eutropius, Bk. III [vi. 2], that when Hannibal offered the Romans the opportunity to ransom their captives, the senate replied to him that 'those who could be captured when they had arms in their hands were not necessary citizens.' It was also a law of Plato's, Republic, Bk. V [p. 468 A]; 'And may he who allows himself to be taken prisoner even be made a present of to his enemies? is he not their prey and may they not do as they like with him? Certainly.' (J.*) Quintilian, Declamations, cccxxxix:

In war the most fortunate thing is to win; the most valorous is to die for the cause, if victory be not vouchsafed. Even the third possibility is not¹ a disgrace, namely, to return at all events to one's country, and if victory be not vouchsafed, to escape. For it is possible to believe that the man who does this has saved himself for a second engagement, and has recovered the courage that had at one time given way before adversity. But the man who surrenders himself into slavery,² who throws away his weapons and puts out his hands to have the waiting chains fastened about them, what hope does he give us for the future? [. . .] What hope have we left in our soldiery, if they think there is nothing better than being captured?

What should be observed in such matters is set forth by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxi, §§ 23 ff. In connexion with section 28, we should like to add an incident given by Marinus Barletius, De Vita Castriotae, Bk. VII. When a certain infidel captive, who had been given to Musachius out of the booty, had agreed with him on a ransom of two hundred pieces of gold, he at once took them out of his pocket and counted them out to his captor, who refused to let him go, claiming that he had already acquired the money together with the person of the captive. But when the affair was referred to Castriota he decided in favour of the infidel.

15. On the pacts of generals, and what must be observed in connexion with them, we are informed by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxii. But we should note, in connexion with section 8, that generals can only agree to relatively short truces, and not to such as put a complete end to preparation for war, inasmuch as these last lie in the province of the supreme sovereigns.

16. Finally, the same author, Bk. III, chap. xxiii, sets forth how far private citizens can enter into agreements with enemies in time of war. To his observations may be added the custom followed, according to Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. IX, by the English and Scotch with regard to pacts of this kind:

If any person does not appear on the appointed day, this is his punishment: In their meetings which they regularly hold to recover their property, whoever has the complaint to make that he has been deceived carries about in the sight of all a representation of a hand or a glove upon a long spear. This they consider the greatest disgrace possible, so much so that those who have broken faith are loathed by their friends and relatives, while even a common person will not be seen in their company, or speaking with them, or receive them into his house.

¹ [A necessary emendation by Rohde.—Tr.]

² [For inter virtutem read in servitutem.—Tr.]

Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. I [i], tells of an interesting pact between two soldiers, a Goth and a Roman, who had fallen into the same pit and agreed to help each other to safety; which agreement was later on endorsed by the Goths.

ON PACTS WHICH RESTORE PEACE

-
- | | |
|---|--|
| 1. Whether pacts of peace are weakened by the exception of fear.
2. Whether peace can be legally concluded with rebels.
3. How far upon concluding peace the possessions of private citizens can be left untouched. | 4. The time limit for the fulfilment of peace to be strictly observed.
5. The situation when peace is referred to the decision of battle.
6. A hostage for the person of his prince is no longer held when he succeeds the same.
7. On guarantors of peace. |
|---|--|
-

PACTS by which wars are entirely ended are so fully treated by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xx, that we may add scarcely anything save by way of a brief gleanings. The first question that comes up in connexion with them is, whether they can be made invalid by an exception of fear unjustly inspired. This is denied by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvii, § 20, and Bk. III, chap. xix, § 11, in the case of formal wars, on the ground that the opposite custom has become the law of nations, which holds that, if this were not the case, no end or limit could have been put to such wars, which are only too frequent, while the welfare of humanity demands that they be brought to a close. Yet what has been extorted by an unjust war cannot be kept with good conscience, and just as there is no question about restitution in such a case, so it does not appear clear that there is any law of nations which does not allow one to advance an exception of fear against an unjust victor. And even if such a law were to be found, it does not seem that to neglect it would mean any great loss for the peace of mankind. For, according to Grotius, the effect of formal war, whatever the nature of its justifying cause, is this: That external dominion, to use his phrase, is secured over the possessions of one's enemies. Therefore, if a man later wage a formal war on his former victor, even though he have had no justifying cause beyond the fear of which we are speaking, he will still, when fortune smiles upon him, not only get back what he lost in the unjust war, but also acquire all his enemy's property. It is, therefore, short-sighted indeed for a man who has taken something from another by the use of unjust force, to imagine that his holding is made more secure by some other means than force. No less foolish is the man who, after compelling another by unjust force to accept hard terms of peace, does not see that they are carried out at once, while he holds control over him, but depends only upon the agreement of the vanquished, and leaves him in a state where he has the power to pay back the evil which he suffered. See Guicciar-dinus, History, Bk. XVI towards the end, and Bk. XVII towards the beginning.

Therefore, it seems more true to say that, if a man who has been the victim of an unjust war, undertakes to settle it in a peaceful manner, and deprecates the war, and is still forced to an unjust peace, no law prevents him from advancing the exception of fear to the carrying out of the terms of peace, or from seeking reparation for the injury when an opportunity later arises. So Polybius, Bk. III, chap. xxx, gives it as his opinion that the Carthaginians had just cause for their second war upon the Romans, by reason of the fact that while the life of their state was threatened by civil war, the Romans extorted from them Sardinia and a large sum of money: 'For as they had only yielded to the pressure of circumstances, so they seized a favourable turn¹ in those circumstances to revenge themselves on their injurers.' (S.) Yet our decision would have to be different, if the belligerents at the outset made an agreement to rest their case with the fortune of battle. And this is understood to be the case, when peaceful means are rejected, while the question at 902 issue is not yet clear, and both sides rush to arms, or when the revenge for their injuries and the securing of their claims,² which might have been attained by law or negotiation, are left to the decision of war. For in that case there is an open appeal³ to the arbitrament of Mars, and both sides enter the conflict with the thought: 'Either I will revenge my right or injury in war, or else I will lose still more.' When those who rush into a war in such fashion as this come out the worse for it, they can no more complain of the injury which they receive than can the man who is wounded in a duel of his own making. And so he who gets the worse in such a combat should take to himself the resignation of a character of Plautus, Amphitruo, Act I, sc. i [396]: 'Suit yourself, do what suits you, seeing your fists are too much for me.' (N.) Compare Digest, XLVII. x. 3, § 3, and IX. ii. 7, § 4.

2. Another question on which opinions differ is, whether peace and negotiations with rebellious citizens or their leaders should be kept. Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xix, §§ 6 ff., advances many reasons to show that they should. But it appears to us that the matter should be set forth more clearly like this. When a prince has by force overcome some rebellious subjects, he may decide of his own will what measures to take with them. But if the rebellion is composed by pacts, the very nature of such arrangements shows that the king is forgiving the rebels their crime, and so the pacts cannot be made void on the plea of treason on their part, while the rebels are understood to be joined anew by that agreement to the state, and to promise it obedience, presupposing, as

¹ [For occasionem read occasione.—Tr.]

² [For injuriam, praetensionemque read injuriarum, praetensionumque.—Tr.]

³ [For summitur read sumitur.—Tr.]

⁴ [For b. read §.—Tr.]

a sort of condition of their obedience, that the state will observe¹ the substance of the pact. And so especially in monarchies such a pact may have the force of an understanding, or fundamental law. But such as rebel with the purpose in mind of wringing from a prince what they want, may well note the statement of Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. II, to the effect that 'Subjects have no other security than the loyalty which they owe their king'.

3. How far a state may leave untouched the property of private citizens in concluding peace may be comprehended from the nature of eminent domain, by the force of which the property of private citizens, no matter how it has been acquired, can be given over, when the state finds it imperative or to its great advantage to do so, it being understood, however, that the state is obligated to reimburse private individuals for it out of the public treasury, either at once, or as soon as it begins to be solvent. But the question whether a private citizen's property is to be taken from or left to him, in a monarchy concerns the king, and upon the demand of the king the whole body of citizens is required to make up to individuals whatever loss they have suffered on this score beyond their proper share. But foreigners to whom such property is handed over, need not inquire whether or not it was to the advantage of the state for them to receive that property, since the act of the king in so doing is sufficient to give them lawful dominion, both because of the presumption which attends² the acts of a king, and because there would be no foundation for negotiations with other nations, were it not always accepted that whatever the head of a state does is binding. Furthermore, the law of human society not only seems to advocate that property of this kind handed over to an enemy be made up to individuals by the rest of the citizens to the best of their ability, but also requires the same of losses which they have suffered at the hands of enemies, particularly if no special guilt attached to them for the outbreak of the war. See Digest, XVII. ii. 52, § 4, and XIV. ii. Although it is also clear enough that, in practically every case, such unfortunate citizens are merely told to look upon losses of this kind as an unavoidable calamity.

4. If a period is fixed within which the conditions of peace are expected to be fulfilled, it should be most strictly observed, so that by strict right no excuse is accepted for the least delay, unless one is restrained by a force beyond his control, or there be no suspicion of guile. The reason for this is that even a brief period of time can suffice to cause a great change in affairs. Therefore, if a person were allowed any delay in fulfilling the conditions of peace, it would be easy for him to find an occasion to withdraw from the terms of his agreement. A further consideration lies in the fact that a man cannot be safe in demobilizing his army, the maintenance of which involves a great expense, before the terms of peace have been carried out.

¹ [For praestant read praestandum.—Tr.]

² [For committatur read comitatur.—Tr.]

903 5. Sometimes the terms of peace are left to the decision of some battle, to be fought out¹ between two champions, or four, or six, or more, or even between two entire armies. And here a difficult question arises, whether, namely, the fortune of the whole state may rightly be committed to the chance of such a battle. Of course it appears that this method spares men's blood, and crowds into the smallest possible compass the distresses of war, and yet it seems preferable, on the other hand, for a state even to undergo a bloody war rather than to lose at a single blow, by such a kind of duel, its liberty and safety, since it should be remembered that the fortunes of war can be overcome even after one or two disastrous battles. Yet if there is no hope of a successful outcome, although the entire power of the state take the field, such a single combat may be tried as the lesser of two evils, in case the enemy agree to it. So also when princes wage war, not for the rights of a state but over their private concerns, their states may readily allow them to fight it out among themselves in single combat. See an instance of this in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. IV, chap. lx. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. III [xii]:

He owned that when leaders of armies seek to establish their own power, it is both glorious and necessary for them to engage in single combat in order to acquire it; but when the cities themselves are contending for superiority, he thought it not only hazardous but even dishonourable for them to trust their fate to the decision of a single combat. (S.)

Although, as a matter of fact, even princes are not justified in settling a dispute, which is still undecided, in so violent a fashion. However, we should observe, in this connexion, that those who leave in this way the decision of a dispute to the outcome of a battle, can only gamble with some right which they themselves have, and cannot pass to another a right of which it is not in their power to dispose. Therefore, if a king undertakes to enter the lists over a kingdom which is not a part of his patrimony, nothing will come of his acts, unless he is supported by the consent of the people, and of those who by virtue of their birth have a right to the succession.

Now in formal battles of this kind a dispute often arises over the question who is to be regarded as the victor. And on this point we should recognize that such battles are regularly decisive, so that if two are engaged, he will be the victor who has either slain his opponent, or so weakened and wounded him that he acknowledges his defeat, as did Turnus in Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. XII [931 ff.], after he had received a severe wound. When several fight, that side will be victorious which has slain its opponents, or has thrown them into such disorder that they can offer no further resistance. But if the combat is between two entire armies, to gather the spoils of the battle, to bury the slain, to rest upon the field of battle, and to return again to the conflict, do not of themselves give proof of the victory, since such acts are possible even when the battle has been fought to a draw. But when other factors are present, they are of considerable importance in showing that the enemy had fled. And certainly when a man has quit the field after a battle, there is a strong presumption that he has fled. When neither side¹ can advance sound proofs for victory, the case remains as it stood before the battle, and they will have to fall back upon a new battle or a new treaty. There is a famous example given by Plutarch, Parallels [p. 306 B], and Herodotus, Bk. I [lxxxii]:

¹ [For ineunde read ineundae.—Tr.]

There happened a dispute betwixt the Argives and Lacedaemonians about a claim to the possession of Thyreatis. The Amphictyons gave their opinion for a trial of it by battle, so many and so many of a side, and the possession to go to the victor. The Lacedaemonians made choice of Othryades for their captain, and the Argives of Thersander. The battle was fought, and the only two survivors that appeared were Agenor and Chromius, both Argives, who carried their city the news of the victory. In this interim, Othryades, who was not as yet quite dead, made a shift to raise himself by the help of broken lances, gathered the shields of the dead together, and erected a trophy with this inscription upon it in his own blood. 'To Jupiter the Guardian² of Trophies.' (G.)

For my part I should not hesitate to decide in favour of the people of Argos. Add Jan de Meurs, Miscellanea Laconica, Bk. IV, chap. xiv.

6. With regard to hostages that are given to ensure peace, we should observe, in addition to what is given by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xx, §§ 52 ff., that in case the hostage should become the heir and successor of the person who gave him, he is no longer held upon the death of the prince, even though the treaty may not cease at his death. 904 For such a case is always understood to carry the tacit exception, that a man is no longer a hostage, if he takes the place of the principal debtor, although he must, of course, find another for his place, if that is demanded.

7. A further way in which to assure the security of a peace is when other parties, and especially such as have acted as mediators for the peace, pledge their faith that both sides will stand by their agreements. To such a guarantee there is joined an understanding about aiding the one who is attacked contrary to the agreements, against the author of the injury. Compare Diodorus Siculus, Bk. IV, chap. lv. But the guarantors will be obligated to give this aid only if the peace that has been broken is the one agreed upon, and not if a war arises over some new issue.

¹ [For ne utram read neutrām.—Tr.]

² [For tutuori read tutori.—Tr.]

CHAPTER IX

ON TREATIES

- | | |
|---|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The division of treaties. 2. Treaties whereby no obligation is contracted beyond that of natural law. 3. The nature and number of equal treaties. 4. On unequal treaties. 5. Which¹ of several confederated states should receive aid. 6. Some treaties are real, and others personal. 7. They are distinguished either by special signs, | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 8. Or by general. 9. Whether treaties are concerned with deposed kings. 10. Whether allies made after the conclusion of a treaty are properly so called. 11. Treaties are not understood to be tacitly renewed. 12. What obligations lie upon those who have formulated treaties which have not been ratified. 13. Whether a promise is ratified by the silence of the supreme sovereign. |
|---|--|

WE must now turn to the consideration of that species of public pacts which passes under the special name of treaty. Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VII, chap. lvi, states that they were first invented by Theseus, but his assertion can be allowed only in the sense that he was either the first to strike a treaty in Greece, or that he added to them certain rites and solemnities. We shall divide them by the simplest manner according to their subject-matter, whereby some of them only constitute what was already accepted by natural law, while others contain something over and above the duties of natural law, or at least settle and determine them when they seem indefinite.

2. To the first division belong those treaties which contain some agreement about mere humanity, as it is to be observed on one side or the other, or to prevent injuries to either party. See Genesis, xxii. 23. In the treaty entered into between the Lacedaemonians and the King of Persia we find, according to Thucydides, Bk. VIII [xviii], the following article:

All the territories and all the cities which are in possession of the King, or were in possession of his forefathers, shall be the King's. [...] Against these neither Lacedaemonians nor their allies shall make war, or do them any hurt, nor shall the Lacedaemonians or their allies exact tribute of them. (J.) The King shall have full jurisdiction over them.²

Now we might say that by this article the Lacedaemonians renounced all claims that they might in any way have advanced over Asia, for Asia belonged to the king despite the Lacedaemonian League, and it flows from the nature of dominion both that no man can attack anything which belongs to me, and that I have the final decision on whatever concerns that which is mine. One may compare also a treaty of peace between the Athenians and the Persians, as recorded in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. iv. Now such treaties were considered necessary, especially in the eyes of the ancients, between those who up to that time had had no dealings one with another. Indeed, most men had so completely forgotten¹ the principle of natural law, namely, that all men are related to each other by nature, and that it is wrong, therefore, for one to do violence to another except for some preceding offence, that it was generally believed the duties of humanity should be exercised only towards one's fellow citizens, and that foreigners were no better than enemies, whom we could injure whenever it appeared to be to our advantage. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xv, § 5.

¹ [For Viri read Utri.—Tr.]

² [The last sentence seems not to be in Thucydides at all. The second is from a similar treaty, in chap. xxxvii.—Tr.]

But now between those who in their more advanced culture profess the observance of natural law, such treaties are no longer necessary², except as it is not unbecoming that, as between individuals, so between nations, some more extended proof of friendship may be given when they first come to have more intimate relations with one another. An illustration of this can be found in the words of Cicero, Letters to Friends, Bk. XIII, ep. x: 'Yet, after all, in forming new connexions the first approach is always of consequence, and by what kind of introduction the door of friendship, so to speak, is opened.' (S.) But in general civilized men should almost be ashamed to be a party to a pact the articles of which say no more than that they may not clearly and directly violate the law of nature, as if without such a pact a man would not be sufficiently mindful of his duty. Compare Digest II. xiv. 50. Indeed, treaties of that nature frequently pass under the name of friendship, although, as a matter of fact, the law of friendship, properly so called, requires more than does the common duty of humanity. For although the offices of friendship are not so definite as those which are owed by a pact, yet every one recognizes³ in general that the term friend implies that a man gladly shares what he has with his friend, looks out for his welfare, aids him with advice and counsel⁴, strives with all his might to ward off what threatens him with hurt—and all this with a greater⁵ affection than accompanies the services entailed by mere humanity. Grotius, in the passage just cited, also lists under this head treaties which provide for the interchange of the right of hospitality and of trade, in so far as they are owed by natural law. See above, Bk. III, chap. iii, §§ 9, 11.

But that those are not properly allies and confederates who have made an agreement to observe nothing further than the common duties

¹ [For oblitteratum read oblitteratum.—Tr.]

² [For vir read novit.—Tr.]

³ [For intensione read intensiore.—Tr.]

⁴ [For necessaria read necessaria.—Tr.]

⁵ [For consolendo read consulendo.—Tr.]

of humanity, is shown by Livy, Bk. XLI, chap. xxiv, where the Achaeans because of their dislike for king Perseus forbade the Macedonians to set foot upon their soil. For this reason Macedonia became a place of refuge for runaway slaves of the Achaeans, because the latter feared to enter that country to claim their own men. Out of a desire, therefore, to win them over, Perseus promised in writing that he would hand over to them their runaways, provided they rescinded the decree shutting Macedonians out of Achaea. When the matter was being discussed in the council of the Achaeans, Callicrates was unwilling to comply with the king's request, lest the Romans take offence at it, while Arco contended that they could meet the request of the king and still maintain their treaty with the Romans, giving as his reason: 'No one advises us to form a new alliance, or sign a new treaty [. . .] but merely that we may have the intercourse of affording and demanding justice, and that we may not by excluding his subjects from our territories, exclude ourselves from his dominion, and that our slaves may not have any refuge to fly to.' (M.) Nor, he added, was this opposed to their treaties with the Romans, since they contained no agreement that mentioned Perseus in particular.

3. Of treaties which add further duties to those which men owe each other by the law of nature, some are equal, and others unequal. The former are such as are carried out in the same manner by both parties, or, in other words, when not only are equal promises made by both parties, simply or in proportion to their strength, but they are also carried out in an equal manner, so that neither party is made worse than or subject to the other. We shall see, a little later, what is the 906 character of unequal treaties. Isocrates, Panegyric [176]: 'Those are agreements', that is, equal treaties, 'which stand equally and fairly to both sides, but those are dictates', that is, unequal treaties, 'which (unjustly) put one side at a disadvantage.' (F.) But there is no reason for his addition of the word 'unjustly'. Both kinds are commonly entered into chiefly to form some union or society, the end of which is either commercial relations, or a united front in war, that is, the rendering of mutual aid in offensive or defensive war, or other matters. Equal treaties on commercial relations may take a number of forms: It may be agreed that the citizens of each of the two states on coming to the other's shores or harbours shall pay no duty, or never any more than the present rate, or not above a certain amount, or no more than the citizens of the state or other favoured nations pay, or the like. We have equal treaties relating to a united front in war, if an agreement runs that both parties shall furnish an equal number of troops, ships, or other munitions of war, and this either at any time when one or the other of the allies is invaded, or wishes to attack another, or only when either is attacked. Sometimes, also, aid is promised only for a special war, or against certain specified enemies, or, it may be, against all except the allies of either of the parties. Finally, equal treaties are entered into on other matters, if it is agreed that one party shall not have any forts on the confines of the other, or shall not defend or harbour the other's subjects, but shall apprehend them and return them to the other, or that one shall not allow the other's enemy to march through his territory, and the like. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xv, § 6.

4. After this description of equal treaties it is easy to understand the nature of unequal. Treaties are unequal when the things promised by the two parties are unequal, or when either party is made inferior to the other. Now unequal promises are made either by the superior or the inferior ally. The former is the case if the more powerful promises aid to the other without receiving the same in return, or if he promises more aid than the other, the aid being in that case not proportionate. The latter happens if the inferior ally is obligated to furnish more than he receives from the other.

Some of these treaties also imply some diminution of the supreme sovereignty. Of this kind was the treaty between the Romans and the Carthaginians at the end of the second Punic war, which forbade the latter to make war against the wishes of the Romans. You may also list here the case of greater Armenia, of which we are informed by Appian of Alexandria, Preface [ii], 'which is not subject to the Romans in¹ the way of tribute, and its people appoint their own kings.' (W.) Add also the pact regarding Sicily made by Peter with Theodatus², in Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. I [vi]. On the other hand, the supreme sovereignty is not diminished by such treaties as carry with them only some temporary burden, or one which may be performed at one and the same time, as when by the terms of peace one party is required to meet the bill for the pay of the other's soldiers, or to meet all the costs of the war, or to pay a certain sum of money as a fine; as he may also be compelled to dismantle his fortified cities and forts, to withdraw from certain places, or to hand over hostages, ships, or military equipment. Thus Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XXXIV, chap. xiv [139], writes: 'In the treaty which Porsena granted to the Roman people, after the expulsion of the kings, we find it expressly stipulated, that iron shall be only employed for the cultivation of the fields.' (B. & R.) Compare 1 Samuel, xiii. 19-20. And in this connexion the statement of Procopius, Gothic War, Bk. IV, should be mentioned, to the effect that, when, by the terms of the truce drawn up between Justinian and Chosroes, the former was to pay two thousand pounds of gold, Isdiagunus, the Persian representative, demanded it in one payment. But Justinian wished to pay it at the rate of four hundred pounds a year, so that by using it like a kind of pledge he could keep Chosroes from a breach of the peace. Finally, however, the Romans agreed to their demands and paid the entire amount in cash, for fear it would look as if they were paying annual tribute. So far do men habitually go in order to avoid what may sound base rather than what is actually so.

¹ [For ἐν read ἐς.—Tr.]

² [For Theudato read Theodato.—Tr.]

907 But the principal question in this connexion is, whether such unequal treaties as carry with them permanent and perpetual burdens, do always and of themselves impair the supreme sovereignty, or, in other words, whether an unequal ally is able to maintain his supreme sovereignty. Now perpetual burdens are such as these: When one of the parties is obligated to have the same friends as the other, but not vice versa; and when he may not build forts in certain places, or raise an army. We find an instance of this in the treaty of the Romans with the Latins, in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. VIII [chap. xv], whereby the latter were forbidden to levy armies on their own authority, have their own commanders for their contingents, or lead them forth on a campaign; the result of which was, that, since the decision regarding war and peace lay with the Romans alone, those under whose leadership everything was done reaped the glory and the fruits of the victories, although their allies shared in the toil. Other such burdens are when the number of one's ships is limited, when one may not found a city, may not sail in certain waters, or recruit troops in certain places, and other restrictions of a similar nature; and especially when one of the parties is required to show respect for the other's majesty, and so to recognize him as his superior in dignity, and to show him in all his actions a certain kind of respect. This last is set forth by Cicero, For L. Cornelius Balbus. Isocrates, Panegyric [101-5], writes that the relations of the Athenians with their allies were such that they kept in their own hands the supreme direction of the confederacy, while leaving them their liberty and setting up in them a democratic form of state. Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 21, gives a reply to this question, drawing from Digest, XLIX. xv. 7. But the difficulty arises from the words of the Jurisconsult which immediately follow that passage: 'But defendants from allied states we try in our own courts, and we punish them when found guilty.' For surely it shows subjection for our ally to have power to summon our citizens before his tribunal and to punish them. An example of this is that of Decius Magius, in Livy, Bk. XXIII, chaps. vii ff., and especially the account found in Pausanias, Achaica [VII. x. 9], to the effect that, when, at the suggestion of Callicrates, the Roman ambassador charged the leading men of the Achaeans with favouring the interests of Persius, one of their number, Xenon by name, confident of his innocence, said that he was not afraid to stand trial on that charge even before the Roman senate. This was adroitly interpreted by the ambassador as a voluntary appeal to Rome, and so Xenon and a number of others were sent there, although Polybius, Selections on Embassies, cv [XXXI. viii. 7], says of the men that had been summoned, that 'he did not believe that¹ the Senate had the authority to decide the matter'. The easiest reply to the whole matter is that the words which precede are to be taken of the early period of the Roman state, when it was more careful in observing the articles of its treaties, and in treating those who had voluntarily entered an alliance with them differently from those who had been conquered in war. Thus Cicero, On Duties, Bk. II [viii], says that the early Romans made themselves responsible for their allies, but did not govern them; and Scipio boasts that the Roman state 'preferred² to bind foreign peoples to them by good-faith and social relations, rather than to hold them in grievous slavery'. And the words which follow must be taken of later years, when their respect for their old treaties began little by little to lessen, and their yoke rested upon conquered and allied peoples without any discrimination. See Livy, Bk. XLII, chap. i; Appian, Civil Wars, Bk. I [xcvi], in a passage where he observes that Sulla forced all the allies to contribute taxes, although down to his time they had enjoyed immunity. At the same time the state claimed the further right of taking all suits from their allied states to Rome, and trying the men there as though they were subject to the Romans. And it is perfectly clear from the letter of Proculus, that there once stood a great deal between the first and second statement.

Grotius, after having gone to great pains to enumerate the different kinds of such disputes as may arise between allies, ends by giving no solution to this difficulty. See also Antonius Matthæus, De Criminibus; II. i. 5 and 6, on Digest, XLVIII. But far-sighted men do well in 908 pointing out how frequently it happens that, if the superior in a treaty is far more powerful than the other, he gradually comes to exercise the sovereignty, properly so called, especially if the treaty is perpetual and carries the right to introduce garrisons into towns. See Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. V, chap. vi. Isocrates, Archidamus [51]: 'Those who wish to be free ought to avoid agreements in accordance with dictated conditions as akin to slavery.' (F.)

5. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xv, § 13, takes up this further question: If several allies of the same nation go to war with each other, which of them should the nation aid, which is allied to both sides? See also Simler, History of the Swiss Republic, Bk. I, p. 119. Add on this point that there should be understood as underlying all treaties which a king enters into with foreigners on giving them aid, this exception: 'Provided considerations of his own kingdom can conveniently allow it,' which considerations outweigh all private relations and even those of blood and kinship. Add Gellius, Bk. II, chap. xxix. For since a king is bound to no one more closely than to his citizens, no promise of his to a foreigner can be valid if it is clearly to the disadvantage of the latter. In Guicciardini, History [of Italy], Bk. XVI, king Francis says that first place is taken by the oath sworn at Rheims, whereby the kings of France are forbidden ever to alienate any of the patrimony of their crown. This is the sense in which is to be taken the following statement of Bacon of Verulam, The Wisdom of the Ancients, chap. v: 'For princes there is but one true and fitting basis of faith, necessity—a great deity to the powerful,—danger to their position, and a share in profit.' Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, chap. v, long before put the case more simply: 'For confederacies between states seem to be based upon utility.' Idem, Rhetoric, Bk. III, chap. xiv [III. xvi. 9]: 'Men are unwilling to believe that a man does anything voluntarily except what is to his advantage.' Valerius Flaccus, Bk. IV [744]: 'They are faithful friends who have a common foe.' Isocrates, To Philip [45]: 'States regard neither enmity nor oaths nor anything else but what they suppose to be for their advantage.' (F.*) Thus Polybius, Bk. II, chap. xlvii, says of Aratus: '(<Since> he knew perfectly well that kings look on no man as a friend or foe from personal considerations, but ever measure friendships and enmities solely by the standard of expedience.' (S.) Andr. Maurocenus, Historia Veneta, Bk. I, speaks for the senate¹ of Venice when he says: 'We estimate friendships by the advantage and honour accruing therefrom to the state.' Yet we are told by Polybius, Selections on Embassies, xciii. 6 [XXX. v. 8], that the Rhodians made no treaty with the Romans for one hundred and forty years, although they sent them aid in many wars; and the reason for this, he adds, was: 'They wished that no ruler or prince should be entirely without hope of gaining their support or alliance; and they therefore did not choose to bind or hamper themselves beforehand with oaths and treaties; but, by remaining uncommitted, to be able to avail themselves of all advantages² as they arose.' (S.) Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. II, would have his Utopians strike no treaties, for a different reason. But whoever suffers a loss by reason of a treaty which becomes void when the other signer finds reasons for a change, can only blame himself that he did not inquire more fully into the affairs of his ally. See Digest, L. xvii. 19. Although it is the part of an honest ally, when his affairs will not allow him to remain longer in the alliance, to warn the other party so that he can thereupon consult his own advantage, for, as Euripides, Iphigenia among the Taurians [605-7], says:

¹ [For V. read Vi.—Tr.]

² [For male read malle.—Tr.]

Most base it is

That one should in misfortune whelm his friends, Himself escaping. (W.)

Therefore, in treaties that concern joint action in war the greatest importance is accorded the article that no one may make a 'separate peace with a common enemy, or one that does not include his ally,

¹ [For Statu read Senatu.—Tr.]

² [For pes read spes.—Tr.]

Although equity demands that this article should have the restriction: Provided the other of the allies does not reject fair conditions of peace; 909: for in such a case the treaty appears to be violated, and the other ally is permitted in his own interests to take separate action. Yet this principle must be received with some caution, lest it be made the handle to evade the treaty, and one of the allies be set up as a judge over the other. See Ioh. Labardaeus, Historiae de Rebus Gallicis, Bk. V, p. 313, ed. Paris, 1671.

6. [Now of all treaties, equal as well as unequal, the most common are those which are concerned with furnishing aid in defensive or offensive war, or with regulating commercial relations. But the most binding species of treaties are produced by those which concern some perpetual union of several states.]²

There is an excellent division³ of treaties into real and personal, of which the latter are such as have been entered into with a king, entirely with relation to his person, and expire with him, while the former are such as are entered into not so much with relation to the king himself, or the heads of the state, as to the kingdom itself and the commonwealth, and persist when the heads of the state, with whom lay the administration of the commonwealth at the time when the treaty was made, have passed away. To which class any particular treaty belongs will be clear from what follows.

Now it is certain that all treaties made with any free people are by their nature real, and continue up to the time expressed in that treaty, even though the magistrates who were the instruments in drawing it up may be dead or out of office. And it is an easy inference from this that a treaty entered into by a free people will continue, even when the form of government has been changed from a democracy to a monarchy, and this because the people remains the same, even though the form of the commonwealth be changed, and because it is understood that a king, who has been called to his throne with the consent of a people, assumed together with the crown all the obligations which were contracted by that people in so far as it held in its hands the supreme sovereignty. A further consideration lies in the fact that, since treaties are entered into by those who enjoy the supreme sovereignty, which resides⁴ in the state as a common subject, both acts of the people by suffrage, and those later ones of a king who has been created by the will of the entire people, will be held to be those of supreme sovereignty. Yet we must except from this statement those treaties whose end is the preservation of a present status: If, for instance, two free peoples make a treaty to aid one another against such as would endeavour violently to change the government of the commonwealth. For the moment either

¹ [For '809' read '909'.—Tr.]

² [This paragraph was inserted here by Barbeyrac from the De Officio Hominis et Civis, 2, 17, 6, in order to fill out the sense of a passage left incomplete.—Tr.]

³ [For distinction read distinctio.—Tr.]

⁴ [For eo read est.—Tr.]

people has given its free consent to a change in the form of government, the treaty itself will be understood to cease, since there is no further ground for it.

Now although every treaty made with a free people is as a rule real, it is by no means true that every one made with a king is personal and perishes with him. For in many cases a person is inserted in a pact, not in order to make the pact personal, but in order to have a record of the agency by which the pact was made. Digest, II. xiv. 7, § 8. Yet since it is well known that some treaties are made by kings with the clear thought in mind that they shall cease with their authors, while others are made to continue during the reigns of their successors, there should be certain signs to show under which of these classes every treaty of a king should stand.

7. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvi, § 16, prefers to decide this question upon the definite wording of each treaty, rather than to make any general definition. Therefore, those will be real treaties which contain some express article to the effect that they are perpetual, or that they are made for the good of the kingdom, or that they are entered into with the king and his successors, or if a definite period is set for their duration. But other words also, and sometimes the very contents of the treaty, as well as its impelling cause, may lead to a fairly clear conjecture. Yet if the conjectures on both sides are equal, the result will be that favourable treaties will be considered real, the odious ones personal. Now treaties made for the sake of commercial relations are favourable, although treaties for war are by no means all of them odious, those connected with defensive wars having more than is favourable, while such as concern offensive wars lean toward what is odious.

910 8. But we can answer a little more definitely¹ the question how far a king is bound by the treaties of his predecessor in that office. For it is certain, in the first place, that the successor is obligated to maintain a peace which has been made by his predecessor; for a peace, provided its articles are faithfully carried out, fully does away with the preceding causes which gave rise to the war. In the next place, there is no doubt that a successor is obligated to keep those lawful agreements by which his predecessor conferred a right upon a third party. Again, it is certain that when the other ally performed his part of a treaty, and the king died before he could fulfil his own obligation, it must without fail be performed by his successor. For since that which the other performed on the understanding that its equivalent would be returned, has been to the profit of the commonwealth, or at least was done with that intention, it is surely obvious that, if its equivalent is not performed, the other retains a right to demand it back, on the ground that it was done, as it were, for a man who did not deserve it, and that the successor is therefore bound to return what the other has performed, unless he prefers to pay its equivalent as expressed in the terms of the treaty.

¹ [For distinctius read distinctius.—Tr.]

In the last place, we must apparently come to the general position on those treaties of whose terms either nothing, or an equal amount, has been performed by both parties, that, if a prince has made a treaty as the head of his people, and with the purpose of securing their advantage, he is understood to have made a real treaty, which is binding also upon his successor. For such a treaty is binding also upon a whole people, whose next king, as its head, enjoys the same right, and is under the same burden or obligation as was their former ruler. But when a treaty directly concerned the interests of the king himself and his family, it is patent that, upon the death of the former, or the extinction of the latter, the treaty likewise expires. But it has become customary to renew treaties even though they be unquestionably real, upon the accession of a new king, at least in general terms, lest it might be possible, in view of the fact that the kingdom had as yet received no advantage from the treaty, for the other party to raise the exception that the treaty stood only upon the faith of its author, and does not devolve upon his successor. Especially since treaties are made to promote the advantage of the state, and since a king can have a different feeling from his predecessor on that point, and can also by his right as king take another way in order to secure it, and so pay no attention to a treaty which he feels is now of no use to his kingdom. Add Ioh. Labardaeus, Historiae de Rebus Gallicis, Bk. V, pp. 74-5, ed. Paris, 1671.

We should also observe, that, in case two nations have been related to one another by several old treaties, and undertake to renew them later as a whole, it is always understood that the last is renewed, since the later always annul the earlier. See Polybius, Selections on Embassies, XLI. iv. Yet no excuse can in any way be found for the culpable negligence both of the Achaean ambassadors, and of the body which dispatched them, who, upon deciding to renew their treaty with Ptolemy of Egypt, did not even know what treaties there were between the king and the Achaeans, or which of them they wanted to renew.

9. The question is also raised in this connexion, whether, when a king with whom a treaty has been made has been expelled by his own subjects, the other party to it is obligated to furnish him the aid which he promised him when he was on his throne. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvi, § 17, answers this in the affirmative, on the ground that such a king, who has suffered an injury by being expelled, still retains a right to the kingdom, even though he has lost possession of it. But in our opinion it appears certain that, if the treaty was expressly conceived for the defence of the person of the king and of his line, he should¹ be furnished aid with which to recover his kingdom. But when a treaty is drawn up for the advantage of a kingdom, it is strongly to be questioned whether a banished king can demand aid on the strength of that treaty. For the presumption is that aid is promised only against foreign foes, and a case 911 like this was never thought of. Although surely such a treaty does not appear to prevent us from coming to the aid of a lawful sovereign in driving out a usurper; just as when we have a treaty with a free people, which some usurper within its borders is trying to enslave, we can rightfully give them aid to overthrow him before he has become a legitimate prince. For the qualities in treaties, as, for instance, if the words of a treaty should run, that it is entered ¹ into with a 'king and his successors', signify a right, in the strict sense of the term, and not a mere usurpation, or, in other words, they apply to princes who have acquired a kingdom by just title, and not such as base their power upon unjust force.

¹ [For debenat read debeant.—Tr.]

10. There remains still the well-known question, whether, when a treaty provides that the allies of each party shall be safe from attack by the other, the term 'allies' is to be applied only to those who were such when the treaty was drawn up, or also to the later allies of either party. The arguments brought forward on this question between the Romans and the Carthaginians at the opening of the second Punic war, may be seen in Polybius, Bk. III [xxvii], and Livy, Bk. XXI, chap. xix. It is the decision of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvi, § 13, that the Carthaginians were able to wage war on the men of Saguntum, who had afterwards become allies of the Romans, without any breach of the treaty, and that the Romans were likewise able to undertake their defence, since it is possible, without offence to a treaty, for one of two allies to attack a nation, and the other to send it aid. In fact, it often happens that treaties have express articles on such a situation; see the treaty struck by the Carthaginians and the Romans at the time of the war with Tarentum. Polybius, Bk. III, chap. xxv. Although it is but a step from such an arrangement to an open rupture of treaties, since blows are equally grievous whether given in another's name or in one's own, and especially when the seat of war is transferred to the territory of the assisting ally. See Justin, Bk. III, chap. vii.

11. It is also to be observed that treaties with a time limit are by no means understood to be tacitly renewed at its expiration, not only because no man is presumed to take upon himself a new burden without consideration, but also because, if such were the case, there could be no definite understanding on the duration of such a burden. Whatever is done, therefore, after the expiration of a treaty will necessarily be held as proof of goodwill rather than as signs that the treaty is being renewed. For simple friendship, of course, continues after a treaty has run its course. Moreover, it is part of the common nature of pacts, that, in case one party has not observed the treaty, the other also may break it. Yet it is possible for allies to agree, that, even though one article of a treaty may not be fulfilled, the rest will still be faithfully observed, although this must be understood in such a way that the second party is not obligated to perform his side of the article neglected by the other, and that no positive harm be done him because of such omission.

¹ [For initium read initum.—Tr.]

12. We must now consider engagements, or those public pacts which are made by a minister of the supreme power, upon matters which are its concern but on which he has not received explicit directions. On this point there arises that extremely difficult question touching the obligation which lies upon promisors to those with whom they have agreed, in case the promise was made simply, without the condition being added that it should be ratified by the supreme power, and then that power refuses to ratify it. This point, we read, was heatedly discussed in connexion with the engagement made by the Romans at the Caudine Pass. Livy, Bk. IX, chap. viii ff. And, of course, if we wish to decide the matter by strict law, the Roman Senate and People had but to hand over those who had made the agreement, and were not bound to ratify it or to go back and put their army in the position in which it previously was. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xv, § 16; Valerius Maximus, Bk. IV, chap. viii, § 1; Juan Mariana, History of Spain, Bk. XXI, chap. xii. And yet, if we would weigh the affair by equity and honest dealing, our conclusion would certainly be that the Roman people was under an obligation to ratify that engagement, even though it was made without its approval. Of course, the consuls had no authority, without a special commission to that effect, to decide the issue of the whole war, and to conclude peace and a treaty with the enemy. And yet, since they had good reason for presuming that the state would give its consent, and since so many thousands of citizens, the flower of the state, in fact, could be saved in no other way, and since the enemy had already performed what was practically equivalent to peace and a treaty, it would surely have been but fair for the people to ratify conditions which contained nothing hard or unjust. See Guicciardini, History [of Italy], Bk. XII, pp. 542 and 344, where he describes the agreement between La Trimoville and the Swiss, at Dijon; and Temple, Observations upon the Government of the United Provinces, p. 153, where he writes that, in the year 1668, within five days he concluded three agreements with the States General, without consulting the provinces, because, in observing the regular procedure, they would have been bothered¹ by all the artifices which others could muster, although these agreements were absolutely necessary for the state. And he adds that they were risking their lives in case the provinces did not ratify what they did, since the agreements otherwise exceeded their authority. But, in the case before us, the Roman people could have stubbornly held the ground that they could not be obligated by their magistrates against their will, in case the Samnites had made any intolerable demands. What stung that proud people was the fact that their army was sent under the yoke, a very foolish thing for the Samnite general to do, since that insult would not weaken it, and was certain greatly to arouse the anger of a fierce people. To be sure, the army deserved that disgrace for venturing so rashly into an unknown region, without sending out scouts ahead of them, although it was better for them to suffer it than to allow the Roman state to lose so much of its strength. One may consider the arguments in Livy, Bk. IX, chap. iv, advanced by Lentulus in favour of ratifying the agreement. Nay, a state often ratifies the promises and acts of its generals out of regard for the high authority reposed in them, and to prevent them from transferring their allegiance to others. And so we read in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XII [xviii]: 'Mithridates deliberated on whose mercy he should throw himself [. . .] since none of the Romans on the spot were in sufficient authority to have their promises respected.' (R.) But in this case that proud people refused to consider that they were not always privileged to avoid experiencing for once themselves, what they had often done to others. On the other hand the Samnites acted nobly in not receiving from the Romans the men who had made the agreement. But it was certainly a ridiculous and silly act on the part of Postumius, when the Roman leaders were delivered over, to strike with his knee as hard as he could the leg of A. Cornelius, the fetial, and to cry out, for all to hear, that he was a Samnite citizen, that he had violated the law of nations in striking the fetial who was an ambassador, and that therefore the Romans could wage war with a better right. Nor should we pass over the judgement of Livy himself upon the whole affair: After the Romans had been delivered¹, he says, and rejected, they departed to the Roman camp, 'after having discharged their personal obligations', and then he adds hesitatingly, 'and perhaps those of the state as well'.

¹ [For distrubandi read disturbandi.—Tr.]

13. The final question as to whether, if the supreme power has known of the engagement made by its minister, and has maintained silence about the matter, it may therefore be assumed to approve the engagement, is answered by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvi, § 17.

* [For dediri read dediti.—Tr.]

CHAPTER X

ON THE MISCELLANEOUS PACTS OF KINGS

-
- | | |
|--|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The outline of the chapter.2. How far a king may entirely resume his former rights in dealing with a foreigner,3. And how far in dealing with his own citizens.4. How far the contracts of kings are above the civil laws. | <ol style="list-style-type: none">5. A king cannot put aside a valid oath of his own making.6. How far a citizen has a right of action against a king because of a contract.7. Contracts with citizens are subject to the principle of eminent domain.8. How far the contracts of kings obligate their successors.9. Whether the donations of kings are subject to recall. |
|--|--|
-

IT remains for us to consider the questions which usually arise in connexion with the miscellaneous pacts of kings, which questions can be grouped under three heads: First, whether there resides in the person of a king some special power over his own pacts; second, what privileges he enjoys with regard to obligations made with his subjects; third, on what basis he may obligate his successors.

2. With regard to the first head, the question is this: Since a king can restore his subjects to their former estate when they have been injured in contracts, or can release them for just reasons from a vow, can he do the same thing for himself, when by craft or force he has either entered some losing contract because of the inexperience of youth, or has in some other way been seriously outdone in a contract, or has got his affairs involved by a rash oath? Here we should observe, that, if the question is taken in its blunt form, and as the words actually stand, it implies a contradiction. For 'to restore to former estate', and 'to release from an oath', are such acts as not only have to do with another, but also proceed from one who enjoys some superior power over the other who is to be restored or released. Therefore, the question should more properly be put thus: If a king has been injured either in the drawing up of a contract, or is prejudiced in its fulfilment, can he by his own authority declare that, because of its inherent flaw, he is no longer held by that obligation? On this matter we must bear in mind that, just as those who live in natural liberty, subject to no other man, are the arbiters of their own affairs, so if they are unjustly injured by another in a pact, they can of themselves require that what they have done be restored to them, or that the other party make up his share; provided the hurt and injury be entirely clear, for when there is some question, it would be better to leave the matter to the decision of arbitrators. Therefore, since a king enjoys natural liberty, if he has discovered any fault in a pact of his making, he can of his own authority serve notice upon the other party that he refuses to be obligated by reason of that fault; nor does he have to secure of the other a release from a thing which, of its own nature, is incapable of producing an obligation or right. In Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. II, Louis XIII says that 'there lies a just appeal from a king in bonds to a king in liberty'. But because it may happen that a man who is led by his own wickedness to break his oath, may advance some defect in the pact to cover his own perfidy, states do well in establishing what acts are by their own right to be held invalid and null, and what must be examined and decided by a judge.

3. But if a king is concerned with his own subjects, it would then be my opinion that a decision should be reached upon distinct cases. Now a prince's minority is held to continue so long as the administration of the kingdom is in the hands of his guardians, and during that period he can himself conclude nothing with foreigners. But if he enters into a contract with one of his own subjects, and later finds out that he has been injured in it, there appears no reason why he should¹ not himself also enjoy the same advantage of the laws as he allows others, since otherwise he would be worse off than a private citizen. Furthermore, because of his tender age it cannot be presumed that he was able to renounce the exception belonging to his minority. Now a prince cannot, on the plea of his minority, withdraw from pacts lawfully concluded with foreigners by his guardians, because, if that were allowable, no man would be assured of any agreement with a prince who 914 was still a minor. Yet guardians shall give an account of their administration. But no exception of fear or injury, or even of craft, prevails against agreements or capitulations which a people makes with limited monarchs in granting them the throne.² For if those stipulations seemed too harsh, there was no one to force him to take the kingdom; nor is it presumed that any people would be so thoughtless as to want to bind its king by such laws as would cripple the government or prevent it from acting.

In this connexion we may throw out the query, whether David could have taken back the oath whereby he promised not to punish Shimei, who had upbraided him when fleeing from his throne. This we must deny. For the king did not swear under duress, or because of fear, or in haste, but after careful consideration, in order that the people which had joined in the rebellion might, upon witnessing such clemency, renew their loyalty to him with greater confidence. And as a matter of fact the guarantee of impunity was not of itself unlawful, and the king was able to overlook the offence of Shimei without doing injury to any one else, since it was committed against his own person. But some have raised the question; whether he did right in moving

¹ [For dedit read debeat.—Tr.]

² [For regis read regni.—Tr.]

Solomon, in his last injunctions to him, to take cognizance of the crime. And yet in our opinion David did nothing in this contrary to his oath; for he did not command his son to punish Shimei for his offence, but only advised him to keep his eye upon the man as dangerous and the enemy of his family, so that he might not raise a revolt, and that he might not so easily be granted a pardon if he were again guilty of such a deed. Therefore, Solomon required him to live in Jerusalem under his surveillance, and not to pass beyond the brook Kidron, that he might not again see the place where he so foully reviled David, and felicitate himself on the fact that he had gone unpunished. But divine providence ruled that he should break such easy terms, to which he himself had agreed, so that there might be just reason to turn so worthless a man over to condign punishment.

4. It should be noted, in the next place, that although, when kings exercise some acts with their citizens, not as kings, but as any private man, they are presumed to keep before their eyes the positive laws of the state, which govern the validity of such acts; they are, nevertheless, by virtue of the fact that they are superior to the civil laws, under no necessity of observing the letter of those laws, even in their private acts. Therefore, if they knowingly and willingly enter a contract which would otherwise be invalid in the eyes of the civil laws, they are held to have exempted that contract from the force of civil laws, whatever it may be, and not to have declared it invalid because of the laws, since otherwise nothing could come of their acts. On the action of Philip II of Spain, who, about the close of the last century, undertook on the basis of some laws to rid himself of his debts, see Grotius, Historia Belgica, Bk. V. Yet I should feel perfectly free to admit that, if a king notices afterwards, what he did not see at first, namely, that he was badly cheated in a contract, he may himself rescind that contract, or at least have it corrected. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiv, § 2.

5. It is patent, however, that a king can never take back an oath of his that has been validly sworn, and contains no scruple or flaw, on the mere plea that he is also allowed to relieve his subjects of their oaths. For the oaths from which he releases his subjects were made in the first place upon the condition: 'Provided our superior gives his consent.' And all would agree that no obligation could be contracted if every man could reserve to himself the right not to perform it, if he so chose. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiv, § 3.

6. Now although promises and pacts are as binding upon the conscience of a king as upon that of any private citizen, there is, nevertheless, this difference between the obligation of a king and that of subjects, namely, that it is no trouble for the former to exact what is owed him from a subject, when he demurs, while a citizen, so long as he remains such, has no means within his power to recover his due from a king against his will. Although no king in his senses will refuse to pay his honest obligation, if he considers that his security and honour rest upon his standing by his agreements¹, and that it is unworthy of him who is given his position in order to mete out justice, deliberately to trample it under foot. Yet if kings, despite this prerogative, by a contract with their subjects allow them to institute action against their prince in his own court, such an action is based not so much on civil law as upon natural² equity, as though they could not but be willing to pay their debt when once their obligation had been defined. And so the end sought in such an action is not that the king be required to pay his debt, but that the subject show clear proof that the prince had obligated himself to pay it. And in a process of this kind there is every reason to observe the rule laid down by Sisimethra in Heliodorus, Ethiopica, Bk. X [10]: 'Justice has no respect for high station; but there is one who is king in every decision³ and that is he who surpasses the rest in the reasonableness of his arguments.'

7. It may also happen that a subject is deprived of a right which he has secured through a contract, either by way of punishment or by the force of eminent domain, provided, of course, that, in the latter case, the commonwealth actually has need of it, and is under obligation to make restitution. So also a ruler may for cause defer payment of his obligations, when the great necessity of the commonwealth demands the temporary use of funds which should otherwise go to a private citizen.

From these principles it is clear what decision should be reached upon the subject of the general cancellation of debts, which Solon called a σεισάχθεια [shaking-off of burdens]. See Plutarch, Solon [xv and xvi]; Cicero, On Duties, Bk. II, near end [xxiv].

8. Furthermore, if we are to know whether and how far a king may transmit to his successor an obligation by a private contract, we must first inquire whether a king holds his kingdom as part of his patrimony, or only enjoys the possession of it by a right, as it were, of usufruct⁴. Now he that succeeds a king who holds his kingdom in the first-named manner, succeeds to all his possessions, and he must be supposed in the very same manner to succeed to the debts and obligation which did not terminate finally in his person. But with regard to the debts of kings who hold their kingdom in the second manner, it is the opinion of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiv, § 11, that their successors are not obligated to pay them ἀμέσως [directly], and this for the reason that they are taking another's place. For such kings do not receive their right to a kingdom from the one who has just died, but from the people. Yet

¹ [For pactorum read pactorum.—Tr.]

³ [For iudicio read iudicio.—Tr.]

² [For naturali read naturali.—Tr.]

⁴ [For usu fructuario read usufructuario.—Tr.]

even such successors are obligated for the debt of their predecessors ἐμπέτως [indirectly] and through the medium of the state, and this not personally, but as they are the heads of states which are ultimately affected by any debt made by a king as their head. For that power belongs to kings to obligate the state itself by debts, is obvious from the fact that many times the necessities of a state could not be met except upon the basis that debts are contracted in this way. And since a king is empowered to administer and preserve a state, there will also lie at his disposal all the means without which that end cannot be attained. Yet that power to obligate a state is not unrestricted, but extends only so far as the king may have some good reason for contracting the debt. For, on the other hand, a king should not be so straitened that he can turn over to the state no other debts but what have actually served to its advantage (although local officials may well be limited to this; see Digest, XII. i. 27), but it may be enough if he had a good reason for his policy, although chance may have robbed him of his expectation. See Code, II. iv. 12. Therefore, the contracts of kings, if not manifestly absurd or unjust, will obligate a state, and even in case of doubt the presumption is in favour of the king. And so their successors as well will be obligated, since they are the heads of the state. Nay, even a 916 people will be obligated, if it deposes a king and sets up its own state, for whatever a free people has contracted would obligate both the people and whomever it may later set up, even with the fullest authority. And it is better to settle that question upon this basis, than by drawing a distinction between slight and great injuries. For in the administration of civil business it is much more fair to regard the good reason than the outcome of the undertaking, since an unforeseen situation commonly brings to naught even the best laid plans.

9. What has been said of the contracts of kings should also be applied to their donations, namely, that they cannot be recalled by successors, no matter if they had a good reason. See Suetonius, Titus, chap. viii; Pliny, Letters, Bk. X, ep. lxvi; Gratian, Decretum, II. xxv. i. 15. On the other hand, Galba attempted to take back the largesses made by Nero, leaving every recipient but a tenth part of what he had received. Suetonius, Galba, chap. xv; Tacitus, Histories, Bk. I [xx]. The latter author (Histories, Bk. III [iii]) holds up to scorn the donations of Vitellius, who was ruining the state, 'because to give or to accept them would have involved the destruction of the commonwealth'. Thus the senate made those states tributary again which had purchased their immunity of Sulla, although the action was censured by Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxii]. And surely it seems that the money should have been returned to them, if it had been used for the state. Thus, as we are informed by Zonaras, in writing of Basilius of Macedon, since Michael, the predecessor of Basilius of Macedon, had squandered all the money of the state, the latter issued a decree that whoever had received money for no good reason should return the sum, or at least one-half of it. Add Jerónimo Osorio, De Rebus Gestis Emanuelis, Bk. I, where he tells of the donations made by King John when he was about to die.

But the purpose for which such donations were made must always be kept in mind. If a king made a gift from his own property, it will be impossible to recall it. And if it was made out of the income of property, the administration of which was entrusted to him, we should observe in every case whether it was made with reason and in measure. For as no one would deny that rewards can be given from the treasury for past or present merits, according as the resources of the commonwealth warrant, so if huge sums of money are poured out upon idle and useless men, and the treasury is exhausted to satisfy their ambition, it would, in my opinion, be fair enough to make good the loss from him who was the cause for the state being bankrupt. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, p. 107; Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiv, § 12. It was a very wise policy of Ferdinand of Aragon, as described by Laurentius Valla, De Rebus Gestis [Ferdinandi Aragoniae], Bk. III: 'He was careful to hold on to the royal patrimony, and used to say that those who alienated it made enemies for themselves rather than friends, since they transformed their subjects into petty kings who were always concerned and suspicious lest their rights and licence be impaired.' The same principles will be applied to privileges and immunities; namely, that it be considered whether they have both reason and measure, and whether they can be consistent with the welfare of the state, for there can be no doubt that the last consideration should outweigh the hasty indulgence of a king. Indeed, all such privileges are to be strictly interpreted, in so far as they begin to lie heavy upon the rest of the citizens. Compare Digest, XLIII. viii. 1, §§ 10, 16; Demosthenes, Against Leptines [xcviii]. Appian of Alexandria, The Wars in Spain [xliv], in recounting how the Romans demanded of the Celtiberians tribute and military service, and the latter countered with a claim for the privileges granted them by the Romans themselves, adds: 'And on these terms the matter was settled. But whenever the Senate grants such privileges it always adds the following exception: "This arrangement will stand so long as it is agreeable to the Senate and the Roman¹ people."' In Guicciardini, Histories, Bk. VII, Louis of France, after subduing the rebellion of the Genoese, annulled his old conventions with that state, and then granted them again as privileges and not as pacts; 'So that he might always have the power to take them 917 away again.' But I am inclined to feel that this did not apply to all their privileges, but only² to such as they held by the force of a voluntary grant.

¹ [For Romano read Romano.—Tr.]

² [For uisi read nisi.—Tr.]

CHAPTER XI

THE WAYS IN WHICH A MAN MAY CEASE TO BE A SUBJECT

- | | |
|---|--|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none">1. A man ceases¹ to be a subject when his king dies without a successor.2. So also if he emigrates from a country.3. What should be observed in emigration.4. Whether whole bodies may emigrate.5. Whether it is lawful to pose as a deserter². | <ol style="list-style-type: none">6. Whether a state may banish a citizen at its pleasure.7. On exile.8. Citizenship is lost upon seizure by an enemy.9. Whether a citizen, when surrendered to the enemy but not received by him, remains a subject. |
|---|--|

AMONG the ways in which a man ceases to be a subject some include also that where a king dies without any heir or successor, or has given up his kingdom as derelict, for in such cases, they would say, every man returns to his state of natural liberty. But since it is obvious that what happens here is only that the kingdom is not entirely abolished, but only lapses into a kind of interregnum, it follows, of course, that the obligation formerly existing on the part of citizens to their king who is no more, passes away, but that they remain still united to each other by the original pact which gave rise to the state.

2. The most common way is for a man of his own accord, with the permission of his state, to pass to another with the intention of establishing there the seat of his fortunes. The extent to which such a voluntary removal is allowed citizens is gathered from the ways in which a man is received into a state. For some men pass under the jurisdiction of a state upon being conquered in a just war, or when forced to it by extreme necessity, the amount of liberty allowed them being a matter to be discovered from the laws of the state. But in case a free man who either was never before subject to any one's sovereignty, such as the original heads of families, or has passed out from under that to which he was formerly subject, joins some state of his own accord, it will likewise have to be decided by the laws of that state how much liberty to leave it is allowed him. For there are states which a citizen may not leave without their express consent, while with others permission is granted in conjunction with a certain burden, for instance, by paying a specified sum of money, or by yielding to the state a portion of one's property. Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. XV [28-9], writes of the Argives: 'His country's laws forbade his departure. The punishment of death was appointed to the man who should desire to change his fatherland.' (M.) But when there are no laws on this matter, what a citizen may do must be gathered from the custom or nature of civil subjection, and every citizen is understood to have licence to do what custom allows. If this affords no clear information, and neither party has mentioned the matter in the pact of subjection, the better course is to take for granted that every free man reserved to himself the privilege of migrating at his pleasure, and¹ so prefers, like Socrates, to be a 'citizen of the world', rather than to settle upon a fixed abode. Valerius Flaccus, Bk. VII [227 ff.]:

¹ [For desinitis read desinit.—Tr.]

² [For tansfugam read transfugam.—Tr.]

Hold that to all living creatures belongs this common world and common gods. Therefore, call wheresoe'er the day begins and dies, your fatherland. It cannot be these lands, born under the curse of gods, can hold us for ever beneath this constant cold.² To me, as well as you it is allowed to leave the uncouth Colchians.

For when a man joins a state, he does by no means renounce the supervision of his own actions and property, but his purpose is to secure himself some excellent protection. But since it often happens that the way in which the administration is conducted is of little value to some one man's private interests, or that they can be looked after better somewhere else, and since it cannot be expected that a commonwealth should be altered to suit the pleasure of one or two men, the next best thing is to allow them to look to their interests by going to 918 another state. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. V [xxxvii]: 'Demaratus, the father of our king Tarquin³, not being able to bear the tyrant Cypselus, fled from Corinth to Tarquinii, and settled there. [. . .] Was it, then, an unwise act of him to prefer the liberty of banishment to slavery at home?' (Y.) Add Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvii. In the case of others their state does not offer them a field for the exercise of their endowments, to whom may be applied the line of Statius, Silvae, Bk. I [i. 101]: 'Ere now have I seen boughs upon stranger stock ingrafted overtop their parent tree.' (S.) Others experience the scriptural saying: 'No prophet is accepted in his own country' [John, iv. 44], because the eyes of the slothful fill with envy when⁴ they perceive those, whom they once looked upon as their equals or inferiors, raised by their virtue above themselves. Or the reason may be that given by Lacydes in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. IV [60], that 'images should be viewed from afar', since 'proximity diminishes reputation'. To undertake to deny such men the freedom to migrate to another country, would be the same as to command free men never to dare to rise above the level of their parents. Indeed, the states themselves may even find an advantage in this liberty of movement, from gathering to themselves the outstanding men of other lands. Cicero, For Balbus [xi]:

According to our laws no one can change his city against his will, nor can he be prevented from changing it, if he pleases, provided only that he be adopted by that state of which

¹ [For ut quis read utque.—Tr.]

² [The reading of this line is very far removed in form from that in modern versions, but not in sense.—Tr.]

³ [For Torquinii read Tarquinii.—Tr.]

⁴ [For eam read cum.—Tr.]

he wishes to become a citizen. (And further on): For, in the recollection of earlier times, many Roman citizens of their own free will, not having been condemned by any process of law, nor having been in danger, have left our state and joined themselves as citizens to other states. [xii] For there is a path from all cities to our city, and [. . .] the road to all other cities is open to our citizens. (And this right he praises in the warmest terms [xiii]): Oh how admirable are our laws, and with what god-like wisdom were they established by our ancestors from the very first beginning of the Roman name! [. . .] that no one can be compelled against his will to change his city, nor against his will to remain a citizen of any city. For these are the firmest foundation of our liberty, that every individual should have it in his power to retain or abandon his privileges. (Y.)

Add Digest, XLIX. xv. 12, § 9; Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 24. Nor does it constitute an objection that the heads of families, who first undertook to establish a state, are understood to have bound each and every man by a pact to be willing to join his strength to the united strength of all. For a member can withdraw from other such unions, or organizations, provided he do so without evil intent, nor abruptly and to the hurt of the other members; and especially can he do so if the organization were not formed to run for any fixed period. Although, as a matter of fact, many states show little concern whether their citizens emigrate or not, for the reason that they are already overcrowded, and are more concerned with decreasing their population.

3. Yet since it is usually of some value to a state to know the number of its citizens, every one¹ who is going to leave a state should feel it obligatory, or at least honourable, to give notice of his departure, unless, perhaps, he has good reason to think that the state is not concerned whether or not it know when a citizen leaves its territory. But the express consent of the state will have to be secured by such as have assumed a special office, especially if it be for a stipulated term, as in the case of such as are on a commission or an expedition, or engaged in any other task which they undertook by a special agreement.

A man's departure should also be timely, and when it is not to the special interest of the state that it should not take place. To illustrate this point Grotius, Bk. II, chap. v, § 24, advances the following instances:

If a heavy debt has been contracted, unless the national is prepared to pay his share at once; likewise if war has been undertaken because of confidence in numbers (or in the bravery of certain citizens), and especially if a siege threatens, unless the national is prepared to furnish an equally capable substitute to defend the state. (K.)

See Lycurgus, Against Leocrates. Nor would you call them good citizens who, as Horace, Odes, Bk. I, ode xxxv [26-8], says of his friends, 'scatter so soon as they have drained our wine-jars to the dregs, too treacherous to help us bear the yoke of trouble'. (B.) But we should carefully note that the word 'emigrate' is taken as applying to one who actually passes out of the confines and territory of a state², and not of one who would deny that a state has any sovereignty over him, and yet

¹ [For Ista read Isti.—Tr.]

² [For civitatsi read civitatibus.—Tr.]

919 would continue to reside within its borders. For in the act of delimiting the bounds of its jurisdiction, a state is understood also to forbid any man who refuses to recognize its sovereignty, to make his home there against his will. And in this connexion we should observe that the former practice of the Spanish nobility of renouncing the laws of their country and moving to other places, was an ineffectual and improper way to free themselves from any obligation to their state, which act they believed made it lawful for them to take up arms against their king and country, and impossible for them to be accused of treason. See Mariana, History of Spain, Bk. XIII, chap. xi.

We can infer, from that which has been said so far, what is the power of avocatory mandates, whereby a state undertakes to recall its subjects from the service of foreigners. For instance, if a man who is under no special tie or obligation transfers the seat of his fortunes from a state, which has always granted such a right to all its citizens, to another, the country of his former allegiance has no further right over him, and therefore avails nothing in threatening him with a loss of his reputation and rights. But a state still retains a right over a citizen who broke its laws in leaving it, or was bound to it by a special obligation, or still has possessions, and especially immovable goods, within its borders, or, finally, is away merely for travel while retaining his right of citizenship. In which connexion we should mention in passing a law of Solon's, whereby:

He permitted only those to be made citizens who were permanently exiled from their own country, or who removed to Athens with their entire families to ply a trade. This he did, as we are told, not so much to drive away¹ other foreigners, as to invite² these particular ones to Athens with the fullest assurance of becoming³ citizens; he also thought that reliance⁴ could be placed both on those who had been forced to abandon their own country, and on those who had left it with a fixed purpose. (P.) Plutarch, Solon [xxiv].

Now since a state retains no power over a man who has once been freed from all civil obligation, it is patent that if he be sent by the new state to which he has moved as an ambassador to his former state, he enjoys all the privileges accorded ambassadors, of which the foremost is that he be exempt from the jurisdiction of the prince to whom he is sent. For if any prince does not choose to accord a former citizen such an honour, he can refuse to accept him. And this principle can apparently be extended so far, that, if a citizen with the knowledge of his state transfer his allegiance to another, in order to conduct its business there in the capacity of its public ambassador and minister, the former state is understood to have released him from his civil obligation, since two obligations of the same nature cannot inhere in the same subject. And so such a man will from that moment enjoy in his native state, which

¹ [For summo vendorum read summovendorum.—Tr.]

² [For in vitandorum read invitandorum.—Tr.]

³ [For venturas read venturos.—Tr.]

⁴ [For simulfidos read simul fidos.—Tr.]

he is held by a kind of fiction to have exchanged for another, the rights and privileges falling to ambassadors.

4. But it is the opinion of Grotius, loc. cit., that great numbers of a people may not leave a state, because, if that right were granted, civil society could not exist, that in moral matters that thing is regarded as necessary which is required to obtain some end, and that cannot be done which prevents or destroys this end. Add Livy, Bk. XLI, chaps. viii, ix. Yet his statement is open to some question. For if individuals may leave a country at their pleasure, why may not more do so when it is to their advantage to change the seat of their fortunes at the same time? provided none of the objections we have already set forth interferes with that privilege. Nor does it make any difference if the state is weakened thereby, for if a man has no right to restrain me against my will, no injury is done him if he loses by my departure some future advantage which was not owed him at the time of my departure. Nor is it any more necessary for that state to have so many myriads of citizens, or always to be an object of dread to its neighbours, than for this or that citizen to count his fortune as so many thousands, although, of course, none of them should by illegal means lose what he has. Therefore¹, there seems to be little force in the argument of Grotius. For even if this or that state may be seriously weakened, or even 920 entirely drained of its population by the emigration of its citizens in large numbers, that does not mean the entire destruction of civil society among men. The destruction of one is the creation of another, and the decrease of one works to the increase of another. After mankind had multiplied nature desired that it be gathered into civil societies, but she never commanded that this or that state endure and flourish forever. Thus Babylon was drained of its population by Seleucia, and she in turn by Ctesiphon. Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VI, chap. xxvi. Yet if citizens wish to emigrate in large groups, they must leave the territory of the state just as individuals must. For all governments would be thrown into confusion, if entire cities or districts could withdraw at their will from their allegiance, and either put themselves under another authority, or set up an independent state.

5. In this connexion we should consider the question, whether we should approve the conduct of those who pose as deserters in order that they may thereby work some serious damage to the benefit of their own state on those to whom they make their way. Of course, those who are hasty in placing faith in such men cannot escape censure for their lack of foresight (see 1 Samuel, xxix. 4), nor can one greatly blame those who have meted out just punishment to traitors after their work has been accomplished. See Vopiscus, Aurelian, chap. xxiii. And yet I cannot with decency deceive a person, merely because he falls an easy prey to my machinations, nor, as has been shown above, is a man obligated to commit a felony in order to be of service to a state. Nay, it is without doubt a criminal act for you to pledge your faith, in order that, in the breaking of it, you may find an opportunity to do all the greater harm; and good men should in every age condemn the remark variously attributed to Lysander and Philip, that 'children are to be tricked with toys and men with an oath'. See Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. VII, chap. xvii. Therefore, if a deserter of the kind we are describing, had expressly pledged his word and then violated it in order that he might actually perform or only appear to perform some service for those whom he deserted, he will not be able to do so without involving himself in a villainy. Now some one may reply, that, since he to whom a deserter comes, already knew that such a man could not perform any service for him without committing a villainy, a man could not validly obligate himself to commit a villainy and that therefore the faith he gave was void; accordingly, no injury is done to such a person, if he is deceived while building his trust upon so slender a foundation. But there is no reason for our raising the question here as to whether or not it be a sin to use the services of deserters. For it does not follow that if I sin in using another man's services, he therefore has a right to do me an injury, just as it also does not follow, that, because he who hires an assassin to commit murder is as guilty as the assassin, the latter can therefore turn his dagger against the man who hired him. It is a general principle of the Roman law (Digest, XLI. i. 51), as explained by Cujas, Observations, Bk. IV, chap. ix, and Grotius, Bk. III, chap. i, § 22, that 'we may receive a deserter by the right of war', that is, that it is not contrary to the law of war to receive one who has deserted the enemy's side and chosen ours. But whether this must be understood to apply to the external law of war, as Grotius calls it, or the internal, which agrees exactly with the law of nature, is a matter one may well question. Yet it would be my opinion, that, if a man would undertake to defend the unrestricted licence to make use of the services of deserters, he should rest his case not so much on the fact that even God turns to His purposes the accomplished deeds of the Devil and of wicked men, as on the favour granted a just war, waged to ward off another's threatened injuries, or to gain our own right. This favour makes it unnecessary for the man who wages a just war to inquire too carefully into whether those who have put off their hostile attitude toward him were actuated by honest or dishonest motives, and therefore, since it is allowable for him to assume that they left their former comrades for just reasons, he will contract no guilt because he sets the stamp of his approval upon an unjust desertion.

¹ [For Ude read Unde.—Tr.]

921 But however all this may be, it is clear enough that it is unlawful to make faith an instrument for deception. And it is also patent that the faith of such a deserter, who acknowledges that he deserted without just cause, is valueless, since it tends to give rise to new crimes¹, or to continue the old, and that therefore it is highly imprudent of a man to put any confidence in it. Therefore, deserters who wish to make an impression upon those to whom they go over, or who are seeking by their feigned flight an opportunity to do some mischief, usually claim that they were forced by injuries beyond their endurance to take this way of saving their lives. Who needs to be told how Zopyrus gained the confidence of the Babylonians, and Sextus Tarquinius that of the men of Gabii? Thus the man who lured M. Crassus into the open plains, called Mezeras, a Syrian, by Florus, Abarus, an Arab, by Appian, and Ariamnes by Plutarch, got the confidence of the general by recounting the goodwill and kindnesses which had been shown him by Pompey for his zeal in the Roman cause, and that these had cost him heavily. With what realism does Vergil, Aeneid [II. 57 ff.], describe the cleverness of Sinon, so as to clear the Trojans of any censure of imprudence! The man pretends that he was the object of Ulysses' hatred, in whose case any fraud could be conceived as possible, and whose hatred passed among the Trojans for a recommendation. The reason for the hatred he ascribes to the death of Palamedes, who was killed 'because he opposed the war'. He says that he was set apart for sacrifice, not by the command of the gods—for he would not appear to have refused to serve as a victim for the safety of his fellow citizens—but because of the false accusations of Calchas, who had been suborned by Ulysses and given easy credence by the rest of the Greeks. So deep is the injury, in fact, that he can say with all justice, 'I am not even bound to my fatherland by any of her laws'. And yet the old rascal first calls upon the gods and all things holy to witness that he 'has a right to hate men' who were now so unjustly angered at him, although they had once been citizens of the same country. But despite all this, he did not entirely persuade them until a miracle appeared to confirm his words. It is with justice also that Livy, Bk. XXII, chap. xxii, says: 'A deserter going over to enemies without the betraying of something valuable, is looked upon only as a stigmatized and worthless individual [. . .]' (S.) Add the speech of Indibilis in the same author (Bk. XXVII, chap. xvii); and that of Cn. Marcius to the Volscians in Dionysius of Halicarnassus², Bk. VIII. Thus in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. I [lviii], Segestes says: 'I have chosen my friends and enemies'³ [. . .] not from hatred of my own country—for traitors are abhorred even by those whose cause they espouse—but because I held that the interests of Roman and German were one, and was for peace rather than war.' (R.) See Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XVIII, chap. xi, at the end.

¹ [For seculus read seclus.—Tr.]

² [For Harlincarn. read Halicarn.—Tr.]

³ [Not in Pufendorf, but necessary for the meaning.—Tr.]

Among deserters are not to be included such persons as slip secretly within the enemy's lines to do him some unexpected damage, and do not promise him that they will join his forces. Nor should it be thought, that, because they are within the lines of the enemy, they must have given him a tacit promise not to commit any hostile act against him. For such a tacit promise of faith is presumed only of him who goes over to another in time of peace, not in time of war.

6. The further question is raised, as to whether, on the other hand, a state can not at its pleasure eject a citizen against his will, when he has not committed any offence. Cicero, indeed, in the passage quoted above laid it down as a fundamental principle of liberty that 'a man need not change his country against his will'. Now the statement of Cicero does not make the condition of the state inferior to that of its individual citizens; because the latter can leave it at their pleasure, while the former may not banish them. For when a man takes up his residence in a state, he entrusts to it, for the present at least, all that he has, which would necessarily be insecure or lost, if he might at any moment suffer banishment. And since that fate is regarded as the greatest possible indignity, it is therefore understood, that a citizen makes, as it were, an agreement with a state, that he cannot be ejected against his will, unless he deserves it. But a state, on the other hand, has not built its fortune and security on one or another common citizen, and therefore it is little or not at all concerned whether he make up his mind to emigrate; for when a state has reposed great confidence in some outstanding citizen, it usually binds him to itself with special agreements that keep him from being able to leave it whenever the idea seizes him. Nor should there be dissatisfaction that this understanding allows the citizen a little more than it does the state. For in case the former does not conduct himself as the state would have him, it can easily bring him to time, while if he cannot endure the way in which the state is being conducted, he has no other recourse than to bear it in silence or quit its soil.

Nevertheless, states usually have recourse to a less odious means of getting rid of suspicious or useless citizens, and of reducing their numbers so as to leave more room for the rest: That is, by removing them into colonies. Although the colonists are usually glad enough to go, since such as were struggling with poverty in their native land hope for better fortune in the colonies, while others are happy to get away from the surveillance of a state which looked upon them as undesirables. Thus Isocrates, To Philip, [120], urges the king to found cities in Asia and people them with those 'who are now wanderers from want of their daily bread, and who harass all whom they meet' (F.)—literally, the 'off-scourings of cities'. And in his Panathenaic Oration [166] he commends the Athenians for having done this very thing. Add Bacon, Essays, chap. xxxiii. An excellent account is given in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I, of the practice of many barbarian peoples and of the Greeks in sending forth their youth, under the protection of some tutelary deity, to find new homes; and the same writer, in Book II, says that the Aborigines were such a band of youths, consecrated in the traditional manner to the gods and sent out by their parents to find whatever homes fortune might have to offer. Pliny, Bk. III, chap. xiii, writes that the Picentes were an off-shoot of the Sabines 'Upon the vowing of a Sacred Spring'¹ (Ver Sacrum), while Strabo, Bk. V [iv. 12, p. 250], says that the Samnites descended from the Sabines in the same way. Add Justin, Bk. XXIV, chap. iv, Festus, s.v. Ver Sacrum, and Mamertini; Livy, Bk. XXXIV, chap. xlv. How Lydus and Tyrrhenus were forced by famine to cast lots so as to decide which of them would take a part of the people and leave their native land, may be seen in Velleius Paterculus, Bk. I, chap. i, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I, and Strabo, Bk. V. Paul Warnefrid, History of the Lombards, Bk. I, chap. ii, writes that the same custom obtained among the peoples of Scandinavia.

But colonies may be and usually are planted in different ways. For they either remain a part of the state from which they are sent forth, or they are obligated to show respect to the mother state and to uphold its majesty, and are therefore joined to it by a kind of unequal treaty, or, finally, they treat with it on equal terms and right. Add Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. VII, chap. i.

7. Men cease against their will to be citizens, when they are deported from the state for some crime truly or falsely laid to their charge. For in refusing any longer to recognize a man as a member of its body, and in driving him from its territory, a state remits to him the obligation which formerly lay upon him as a citizen, and by the same act he is given the power to found for himself a new home wherever he can, while there remains to the state no jurisdiction over such exiles. Therefore, in Euripides, Children of Hercules, line 185, Iolaus maintains that the Argives have no right to take the Heraclidae from Athens, since the latter had already been banished by them. Now to be exiled upon a false charge is a grave injury (although a brave man does not lack some kinds of solace with which to face it; see Stobaeus, Anthology, xxxviii); and if it be on a true charge, it is a severe punishment, so much so that Philo Judaeus, On Abraham [xiv], regards it as even worse than death. For even though a man may be left his property, it is a nuisance to transfer it to another country; it is no less a trial to be torn from one's family and friends, while it is surely a deep disgrace for a man to have been held no longer worthy of the position which a state had once accorded him. Add Oppian, On Fishing, Bk. I, lines 274 ff. For he must needs be a man without a sense of shame, to whom could be applied the lines of Juvenal, Satires, Bk. I [47-50]: 'This man has been condemned by a futile verdict—for what matters infamy if the cash be kept? The exiled Marius carouses from the eighth hour of the day and revels in the wrath of Heaven.' (R.) Nor are the following words of Cicero, For Caecina [xxxiv], such as may move a man:

¹ [For vere read vere.—Tr.]

923 Banishment is not a punishment, but is a refuge and harbour of safety from punishment. For those who are desirous to avoid some punishment or some calamity turn to banishment alone—that is to say, they change their residence and their situation, and, therefore, there will not be found in any law of ours, as there is in the laws of other states, any mention of any crime being punished with banishment. But as men wished to avoid imprisonment, execution, or infamy, which are penalties appointed by the laws, they flee to banishment, as to an altar, though, if they chose to remain in the city and to submit to the rigour of the law, they would not lose their rights of citizenship sooner than they lost their lives; but because they do not so choose, their rights of citizenship are not taken from them, but are abandoned and laid aside by them. (Y.)

Add also Polybius, Bk. VI, chap. xii. The Roman law, indeed, was different from all others in that a man could not be deprived of his citizenship against his will. Cicero, For His House [xxix]: 'Has not this principle been handed down to us from our ancestors, that no Roman citizen can be deprived [...] of his status as a citizen, unless he consents to such a thing [...]?' (Y.) And the Porcian and Sempronian laws forbade any magistrates clothed with civil authority to inflict the death penalty upon a citizen without the consent of the people. But in order that offences might not go unpunished, and yet that no citizen should seem to be banished against his will, they wanted it believed that citizens voluntarily chose exile in order to avoid punishment. Exactly the opposite institution is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. III, chap. v, as prevailing among the Ethiopians, while Sallust, Catiline [li. 22], represents Caesar as saying: 'Other laws [...] provide that Roman citizens, even when found guilty, shall not lose their lives, but shall be permitted to go into exile.' (R.) And again [li. 40]: 'The condemned were allowed the alternative of exile.' (R.) But that those men who were under sentence of capital punishment were obligated to leave the country, was clearly enough shown by their being forbidden the use of fire and water, that is, the use of them within the jurisdiction of the Roman people.

Although care should be taken in passing sentence of exile, that no hurt redound to the state by making it possible for the person banished to go over to the enemy. For this reason some peoples never punish with exile, such as the Turks and the Muscovites, and the same was true of the early Jews, although perhaps another reason may have moved them, namely, that the exile might not change his religion. A milder punishment is relegation, whereby a man does not lose the right of citizenship, but is only required to make his home in a certain place, or not to set foot in a specified part of the state. Those upon whom this last restriction was placed were given by the Romans the special designation of 'persons interdicted' (interdicti). See Brisson, Selectae Antiquitates, Bk. III, chap. v; Anton. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, XVIII. i. 6 and 10, on Digest XLVIII. But to some cases of exile one may well apply the saying of Diogenes [the Cynic, in Diogenes Laertius, VI. 49]. When he was told, 'The people of Sinope have condemned you to exile', he replied, 'And I have condemned them to remain where they are'.

8. Another way in which a man changes states against his will is when he has been conquered by an enemy and passes under another's sovereignty as citizen and subject, no matter whether or not he change his residence at the same time. And every one would concede that this may be done not only by individual citizens, or such of them at least as are bound by no other tie than that common to all citizens, but also by whole cities and provinces, where they see no other way of achieving security. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vi, § 5.

9. It is also a matter of common occurrence for a state to surrender one of its citizens to another state because of some injury done it, in order that the latter may not find in the deed a cause for war. See Herodotus, Bk. IX [lxxxvii-lxxxviii], where he tells the story of Timagenides and Attaginus, who were responsible for the Thebans casting in their lot with the Persians. In such a case the question arises: Does or does not a man who is surrendered by his state, and is not received by the other, remain a citizen of the former? This question is raised also in Digest, L. vii. 17. P. Mutius [Mucius] ruled that he did not, because, when a people has commanded that a man be surrendered, it appears to have banished him no less than if it had forbidden him the use of water and fire. The same question also was hotly contested in the case of Mancinus, who was surrendered to the people of Numantia, but not received by them. Later on, when he started to enter the senate chamber, the tribune Rutilius forbade him, on the ground that when the Pater Patratus¹ surrendered him to enemies of the Roman people, in order to clear the state of the sacred obligation of the treaty which he had signed, he had ceased to be a Roman citizen. But the majority favoured a more lenient decision, advancing in particular the argument that his surrender signified nothing, since he had not been accepted by the party to whom he had been surrendered. 924

Now our feeling on the matter before us is this: The injured state had a right over the other country's citizen, to use him as an enemy, but he becomes by his surrender a subject of the other state, so that he can be punished by it as one of its own citizens. After he was once accepted, the first state lost all rights over him, because it was of its own volition that he passed under the sovereignty of another state. Yet when he is not accepted, the state which surrendered him will have the choice either of banishing him entirely, or of punishing him in proportion to his crime. And if neither of these punishments is meted out to him, he will not be held to have lost his right of citizenship, since the surrender of a citizen by one state to another state, is in itself only an offer of that right held by the state over its citizen, and not a full abdication and renunciation of it. Therefore, surrender does not in itself deprive any man of the right of citizenship, unless there be an express law to the effect that, in such a case as this, a man should be held to have lost his citizenship. Cicero, For Caecina [xxxiv], clears up the case before us: 'If a citizen has been surrendered by the Pater Patratus but has not been received by the enemy, he then retains his original rights of citizenship unimpaired.'¹ It may also be gathered from the foregoing that, if a surrender is accepted, and the person concerned happens to return to his former home, it will require some new grant for him to be a citizen. See Digest, XLIX. xv. 4. For the right of postliminium belongs only to those who have passed into the power of others without the consent of their state, and not to those whom the state of its own accord has delivered into the power of others.

¹ [The fetial priest who ratified treaties with religious rites.—Tr.]

¹ [This thought is in Cicero at this point, but not in these words.—Tr.]

CHAPTER XII

ON CHANGES WITHIN STATES AND THE DISSOLUTION OF STATES

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. Although the form of a commonwealth changes the people remain the same. | 5. What results from one state being broken up into several? |
| 2. A state's debts are not cancelled by change. | 6. And what if several unite into one? |
| 3. How far the acts of a usurper are valid after his expulsion. | 7. The extent to which peoples are eternal. |
| 4. What place may a state claim after a change? | 8. How may the body (materiale) of a people perish? |
| | 9. How may its form (formale)? |

CHANGES in a state take place in three ways. A state may change while remaining the same, or it may still continue without remaining the same, or it may change so as to be entirely destroyed. The first kind of change takes place when the form of the state is changed; if, for instance, a monarchy turns into an aristocracy, or if a monarchy is formed out of a democracy or aristocracy. For in such cases the essential form of a state remains, while all that is modified is that form which results from a change in the proper subject of the supreme sovereignty. And so the people remains the same, whether the government is in the hands of a king, of nobles, or of the people. Nay, although it may happen that a free people as a result of conquest come so completely under the jurisdiction of some king that it is henceforth included in his patrimony, it does not for that reason cease to be a people, provided the conquering ruler undertakes for the future to rule the subject people as a distinct kingdom, and not to join it as a province to another people. For since by definition that which contains supreme sovereignty within its confines is a 'people', it makes no difference, so far as concerns the nature of a people, whether a king rules over them with full or limited right, for in either case he is the head of one and the same body.

2. From what has been said we can answer the question proposed 925 by Aristotle, Politics, Bk. III, chaps. i and ii, whether, if a state changes from a tyranny or oligarchy to a free and popular form of government, that free state should honour the συμβόλαια [agreements], pacts and conventions, as also other acts of a tyrant and a body of oligarchs. Those who deny this have advanced the following reasons: What was done by the tyrant or the nobles was not done by the state, which is obligated only by its own acts. And that it is a commonwealth only when everything is ordered for the common benefit, and when this is not done, the rights and name of a commonwealth are not observed, but we have only a display of bare force and power. But such considerations are of no weight. For without setting forth at this time our former remarks upon a tyrant, a head, even though ailing, is a head, and whatever is done by a head, even though deranged, is held to have been done by the state. And who would undertake to deny the existence of a state when it is labouring under some disease? The same question was once discussed in Athens under the following circumstances. The well-known Thirty Tyrants, who then controlled the Athenian state, had negotiated a loan from the Lacedaemonians in the name of the state. After they had been expelled the latter required it of the Athenians, who had in the meantime set up a democracy. The decision prevailed of those who held that it was just and conducive to peace to pay the debt from the state treasury. The judgement of Demosthenes, Against Leptines [xii], on the matter was this: 'The people, they say, determined themselves to contribute and share in the expense, to avoid breaking any article of their convention.' (K.) And later he said to the Athenians: 'You chose to contribute money for the benefit of persons who had injured you rather than break¹ your word.' (K.) The same case is touched upon by Isocrates in his Areopagiticus [68]. Nay, not even when a state has been reduced to a province, and ceases to be a state, does it no longer owe any loan which it has contracted, since such a debt, being based, strictly speaking, not on the state as such, but on the state as possessing certain property, passes at once to whoever holds² that property.

3. But although the matter appears to be perfectly clear regarding borrowed money which has been spent upon the state and is presumed to attach itself, as it were, to the entire body of the state, it is not so plain whether the same answer should be made with regard to all the acts of a usurper, once he has been expelled. Assuredly, if the usurper of a state has made a treaty with another state about securing from it aid against a common foe, and has given it a part of the spoil, or sold it, both the treaty, the gift, and the sale will remain valid after the usurper has been expelled. For the other state surely has acquired a valid right by such acts, since it made these arrangements with the usurper as the head of the state, and as though for its advantage; moreover, it treated as a matter of no concern by what title he attained the sovereignty; and the act is vitiated in no other way.

But what if the usurper has oppressed the citizens, and wrongfully taken from them property which he has sold to a foreign state? Will they be able to demand their property after they have expelled him? Boecler, Dissertatio de eo, quod egit Civitas, feels that if, in such a case, the purchasers took these things with knowledge of the facts, they are obligated to recognize their guilt, and to be willing to part with things which cannot be sold or bought without injury, and that they ought to do so, even when they made the purchase in ignorance of the facts. All of which sounds plausible enough before the tribunal of the conscience. But if we turn to the general custom of peoples,¹ there appears no ground on which those who have been thus despoiled² can claim of a third state what they have lost. For so long as a usurper employs only open violence, he is considered as an enemy of the state, and when the spoils which he has wrung from these citizens have been transferred to a foreign state, they will be held by the same right as other movable goods taken in any war. And in case the sovereignty of that usurper has been confirmed by the consent of the citizens, foreigners can hold such stolen property as though it had been lawfully confiscated. For as neutral nations, which have no concern in a dispute, may and regularly do take no sides with the belligerents, and only await the outcome, so it does not belong to foreigners to pass judgement on the question how another state may settle the point of sovereignty within its own borders. But such acts of unjust usurpers as concern domestic matters can, after their expulsion, by all means be rescinded by the lawful authority, in so far as it may be to the advantage of the commonwealth. And this holds true not only of the laws they pass, but also of all donations and alienations of property which could not be made over to others without prejudice to the commonwealth and its laws.

¹ [For deperiret read deperiret.—Tr.]

² [For possessore read possessorem.—Tr.]

4. Another question commonly raised in this connexion is, what rank or position should be assigned to a king who has acquired the sovereignty over a people formerly free, or to a free people after it has done away with a monarchy. To this Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ix, § 8, replies that a state after such a change deserves the same rank as it or its head enjoyed beforehand in assemblies. But it is our feeling that a distinction should be drawn between the case where³ a king, for instance, who has acquired sovereignty over a free people, remains in the established assembly or league, and that in which he thereupon withdraws from it and sets up a separate administration of his affairs. For in the former case he will unquestionably be able to claim no other rank than that formerly held by the free people, despite the pomp or majesty attending the person of a king. And, on the other hand, a free people, upon doing away with a monarchy, will be able to claim in a common assembly the same rank which its kings once held. But if either a free people, or a king, has completely withdrawn from some established assembly or league, the former rank of that state will carry no prejudice which would compel them necessarily to take a lower place, and to yield to those who once held a rank above them in a common assembly, since the holders of supreme sovereignty are by nature equal.

5. Changes which result in a state no longer appearing the same

¹ [For populorum read populorum.—Tr.]

² [For spoliati read spoliati.—Tr.]

³ [For utrum read utrum.—Tr.]

take place chiefly in these two ways: Either two or more states are formed out of one, or several states unite to form a single one. The first is the result either of mutual consent or of military pressure. Several states are formed out of one by mutual consent, when colonies are sent forth in the manner practised of old by the Greeks. For the custom followed by the Romans, and imitated by most of the present-day nations of Europe, was to found colonies that were to remain as a part of the mother state, or of a greater fatherland. But the colonies planted in the first manner constituted separate states, although in such a way that they were obligated to accord the greater fatherland due honour and a certain filial affection. See Thucydides, Bk. I; Henricus Valesius on Excerpta Peiresciana, pp. 6-7; Hobbes¹, De Cive, chap. ix, § 8. But a colony planted in this fashion will not be obligated to pay debts contracted by the mother state, unless there was that special agreement at the time of its founding, since they concern in the last resort the mother state's resources, with which the colony, as is presupposed, has nothing to do. And although the colonists may have received certain benefits from those obligations, while they were still residents of the mother state, the latter, by sending them forth free, openly declares that she will exact nothing of them on that score. And yet, if we consider the case in all strictness, a state is not changed in planting a colony, nor does it cease to be the same as before, but the result is the same as in natural generation: In the place of one state we have two. But if some kingdom should be divided by common consent into two or more distinct states, it would be but fair for the public property, as well as the debts of the entire kingdom, to be divided equally among them. Although when a division of this sort is voluntarily instituted by the parties concerned, it is scarcely conceivable that there should not be express provisions made in such cases.

- 27 6. Under a change of this kind, whereby a state is no longer what it once was, is classed the case where two peoples are united, not by a kind of treaty or articles of confederation, or under a common ruler, but so as actually to form one state out of two. It is the opinion of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ix, § 8, that in such a case the rights held by each of the states thus uniting are not lost, but are made common to both, as is also true of their burdens and debts, in case they had reached no agreement to the contrary. See Livy, Bk. I, chap. lii, at the beginning. But we should carefully observe, whether two or more peoples so unite as that the entire body so formed enjoys henceforth equal rights and undertakes to establish some new state, instances being when two democracies do away with their former governments and unite to form one people and kingdom, or when two monarchies cast off their fundamental laws, depose their old ruling lines, and establish a new monarchy. It is clear that by such unions the old states are destroyed and a new one founded. But when one state is joined to another in such a way that the one keeps its government and home, while the citizens of the other leave their home and are received into the rights and home of the other state, it is perfectly clear that the one state is entirely destroyed, while the other, which remains, does not cease to be what it was before, even though it be greatly enlarged by such an accession. But there is no way whereby different states¹ can be so united that each shall remain what it was, save by way of a close treaty, which is better adapted to give rise to a system than to a state in the strict sense of the term.

¹ [For Hobb. read Hobb.—Tr.]

7. The final change whereby a state entirely passes out of existence is when the people itself has been either dissolved or destroyed. It is, indeed, a common saying: 'Kings are mortal and states eternal.' But the expression is used not because peoples as well as kings may not be destroyed or scattered by some catastrophe, but because they do not, like mankind, come to a natural end after a definite span of years, since in the change of individuals one succeeds another in an unbroken line, and this either by receiving foreigners in the place of those who pass on, or by the bringing of children into the world. By virtue of this continuation of succession a people always appears to be the same, and enjoys the same rights, however often its citizens may have changed. Lucian, Amores [xix]:

(Nature), well knowing that we are all made of perishable material and that fate had fixed such a short period for each man's life, provided that the death of one man should be the birth of another. She offset against the number of the dying that of those who were entering upon life, so that we might live for ever in a series of constantly succeeding generations.

Vergil, Georgics, Bk. IV [206 ff.], writes of bees: 'Well, then, though the term of a short life awaits individual bees themselves—for not more than the seventh summer is passed by them—yet the race remains imperishable, and the fortune of the house abides unshaken, and grandsires of grandsires are reckoned.' (B.)

In order to understand this the better, we may well note what the ancient philosophers wrote on the subject of difference of bodies, as we find it, for instance, in Plutarch, Conjugal Precepts [xxxiv]:

Philosophers assert that, of bodies which consist of several parts, some are composed of parts distinct and separate, as a navy or army royal; others of contiguous parts, as a house or ship; and others of parts united at the first conception, equally partaking of life and motion and growing together as are the bodies of all living creatures. (G.)

Add Digest, XLI. iii. 30; VI. i. 23, § 5; Cujas, Observations, Bk. XV, chap. xxxiii, and Bk. XXVI, last chapter; Seneca, Letters, cii. That can be expressed also in this way: A body in general is that which is so held together by its εἶς [the nature of its being], coherence, or a binding principle, that it is a single thing. Now that bond whereby the parts of a body are combined into a unity is threefold: natural, artificial, and moral. The natural bond is that whereby natural bodies are held together; the artificial, that whereby things which are naturally distinct are by human ingenuity and labour framed into a single solid thing; and the moral, that whereby different individuals are gathered together by human institution so that they are looked upon as a unit. Although such bodies may also be made up of beasts, as a herd, yet what we are especially interested in at this time is a union of many men. And as a result of these modes of union we have three kinds of bodies, natural, artificial, and moral, all of which have the characteristic that they appear to remain the same so long as that binding principle, through which their parts were at the outset knitted together, continues unbroken and undisturbed. The result of this is that a man does not cease to appear the same, even though the minute components of his body may change in various degrees, and are constantly replaced from the food which he eats. (Thomas Browne, Religio Medici, § 36 [37]: 'All this mass of flesh which we behold came in at our mouths; this frame we look upon hath been upon our trenchers; in brief, we have devoured ourselves.') Here belongs a passage in Seneca, Letters, lviii, and another in Plutarch, De E apud Delphos, p. 392 A B ed. Xylander [xvii]. Add Lucretius, Bk. III, ll. 860 ff., a passage, however, which must be accepted with some reservation, lest it be extended to the Article of Faith on the resurrection of the body. To the general topic of artificial bodies belongs also the question which was animatedly discussed among the ancients about the ship of Theseus; for this had been repaired so often in the course of the years, that not a single one of the planks of the original vessel remained. See Plutarch, Theseus, p. 10 [xxiii]; Digest, V. i. 76; VII. iv. 10, although this law is apparently opposed by Digest, XLVI. iii. 98, § 8; XLV. i. 83, § 5; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I [i], on the hut of Romulus. Add Alexander ab Alexandro¹, Bk. III, chap. i; Michael Piccart, Commentary on the Political Works of Aristotle, Bk. III, chap. iii. Moral bodies are discussed in Digest, V. i. 76.

¹ [For diversas read diversae.—Tr.]

There is also an excellent passage in Plutarch, De Sera Numinis Vindicta [xv]:

For a state is a kind of entire thing and continued body, a certain sort of creature, never subject to the changes and alterations of age, nor varying through process of time
 928 from one thing to another, but always sympathizing and in unity with itself, and receiving punishment or reward of whatever it does or has ever acted in common, so long as the community, which makes it a body and binds it together with the mutual bands of human benefit, preserves its unity. (G.)

He goes on to say that men in the course of time experience more change than states, for if you happen not to have seen one of your friends for a few years, you will find such a change in his bearing and appearance, nay, frequently in his manners as well, that you will scarcely recognize him. On the other hand, if you return to a state even after an absence of thirty years, not only will you find the same buildings, but also the same institutions and customs of the people. Add Grotius¹, loc. cit. Although it is entirely possible in the course of time for a people not to be regarded as the same in all points. See above, Bk. VIII, chap. iii, § 29. Hobbes, Philosophia Prima, chap. xi, § 7, has chosen to set forth this view as follows: 'If a thing is named from such a form as is the principle of its motion, so long as that principle abides, the individual thing will be the same.'

¹ [For Alex. o Alexandro read Alex. ab Alexandro. The reference is to the Genialium Dierum Libri Sex, first published in Rome, 1522, as verified in the edition of Paris, 1539.—Tr.]

8. However all this may be, it is still possible for a people entirely to perish, and this if either the substance (materiale) of the people, that is, the whole number of the citizens, passes away, or the moral tie which binds it together is broken. The materiale or body of a people perishes when either all the parts together are destroyed, without which the body cannot exist, or there is no further reason for its existence. Examples of peoples who have once and for all passed away are given by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. lx, § 4. Add Digest, VII. iv. 21. In this connexion the question arises, whether those who are left in such small numbers after such a catastrophe that they can no longer be called a people, may still retain the rights of the former people (see Digest, VII. iv. 31). It is the opinion of Grotius, in the passage just cited, that the dominion which the people had as affecting the individual may still reside in those few, but not such as belonged to the people as such; that is, that they can lay claim to the possessions and property of the slain citizens, but cannot assert their right to the supreme sovereignty, and to whatever depends upon it. And yet, if that handful, which has been so reduced by some other cause than war, is able to maintain itself against the attacks of foreigners until it has built up its numbers again into a real² people by taking in others, I see no reason why it cannot lay claim to the rights of the former people. See Justin, Bk. V, chap. vi, n. 5. This appears especially reasonable, in view of the fact that there is nowhere any stipulation as to how many fathers of families are required in order to form a people, and that when, in the beginning, mankind first broke up to form peoples, a very small number was sufficient for that end. Justin, Bk. X [i. 6], speaks of the fifty sons of Artaxerxes as 'so great a people', while in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. VI [197], Niobe calls her fourteen children a 'people'. Apuleius, Apologia [47]: 'Fifteen free men constitute a people.' Add Digest, III. iv. 7, § 2, where it is stated that one man may bear the title of the whole (college, not people), but that he must promptly make plans to secure colleagues.

¹ [For Grotius read Grotius.—Tr.]

² [For injusti read in justis.—Tr.]

The multitude of men who together form a people perishes also not only when the citizens die individually, but as well when they separate of their own accord because of pestilence or discord, or are so torn apart by violence that they cannot come together again. Therefore, there was more flattery than truth in the boast of the people of Ilium, that they were the ancestors of the Romans. Justin, Bk. XXVIII, chap. i; Bk. XXXI, chap. viii. The manner in which the Scots were scattered by Maximus may be seen in Buchanan, History of Scotland, Bk. IV, towards the end.

9. The formale or species of a people perishes when either the entire or the established (perfecta) community of right is destroyed. The whole community of right and sovereignty is destroyed if the individual citizens, scattered this way and that, attach themselves to different states, either retaining their personal liberty, or being reduced to the state of slaves. See the example of Capua, in Livy, Bk. XXVI, chap. xvi. The established community of right between members of the same people is destroyed if the individual citizens retain their personal liberty and are left in their towns and farms, but must be subject to the sovereignty of another state. Such peoples are said to be reduced to the form of provinces. But the mere change of country and of towns, or the dismantling of defences, is not sufficient to make a people lose its identity.

The End
Glory to God Alone

LIST OF CLASSICAL AUTHORS AND TRANSLATIONS¹

Author.	Title of Work.	Translator.
Aeschines		Adams
Aeschylus		Plumptre, or Smyth
Ambrose		Romestin
Ammianus Marcellinus		Yonge
Appian		White
Aurelius Antoninus, Marcus		Haines
Apollonius Rhodius		Seaton
Apuleius		Anon. in Bohn's Library
Aristophanes		Rogers
Aristotle	Magna Moralia	Stock
	The Nicomachean Ethics	Welldon, or Rackham
	Politics	Jowett
	Rhetoric	Jebb, or Roberts
Arnobius		Bryce and Campbell
Arrian		Chinnock
Athenaeus		Yonge
Bion		Edmonds
Boethius		Stewart and Rand
Caesar	The Civil War	Peskett
	The Gallic War	Edwards
Callimachus		Mair
Cato		Harrison
Catullus		Cornish
Cicero	Academic Questions	Yonge
	Cato Major	Edmonds
	On Duties	Edmonds
	De Finibus	Yonge
	De Inventione	Yonge
	Laelius	Edmonds
	De Legibus	Yonge
	Letters	Shuckburgh
	On the Nature of the Gods	Yonge
	Orations	Yonge
	On Oratory and On Orators	Watson
	Paradoxes	Edmonds
	De Republica	Yonge
	Tusculan Disputations	Yonge
Claudian		Platnauer
Curtius Rufus		Anon. [London, 1809]
Demosthenes		Kennedy
The Digest of Justinian		Monro

¹ [Pufendorf's De jure naturae et gentium abounds in references to classical authors. Rather than to duplicate the work of translations already made it has been decided to use where possible some standard translation. The following standard translations have been employed, and they are designated in each instance in the text by the initial letter of the translator's name in parentheses following the quotation. An asterisk after the initial letter indicates that there have been some slight modifications made from the original form of the version.—Tr.]

Dio Cassius		Cary, or Foster
Diogenes Laertius		Yonge
Dio Chrysostom		Moss [not yet published]
Diodorus		Booth
Dionysius of Halicarnassus		Spilman
Epictetus		Matheson
Euripides		Way
Florus		Watson
Gellius		Beloe
Grotius		Kelsey
Herodotus		Rawlinson, or Macaulay
Hesiod		Evelyn-White
Homer	Iliad	Lang, Leaf, and Myers
	Odyssey	Butcher and Lang
Horace	Odes and Epodes	Bennett
	Satires, Epistles, Art of Poetry	Wickham
The Institutes of Justinian		Moyle
Isocrates		Freese, or Norlin
Julian		Wright
Justin		Watson
Juvenal		Evans, or Ramsay
Lactantius		Coxe
Lampridius		Magie
Livy		Edmonds, Foster, Mc- Devitte, or Spillan
Lucan		Riley
Lucian		Fowler, Harmon, or Paton (Anthology)
Lucretius		Bailey, or Rouse
Manilius		Creech, or Garrod
Martial		Anon. in Bohn's Library, or Kerr
Moschus		Edmonds
Nepos		Watson
Ovid	Art of Love	Riley
	Heroides and Amores	Showerman
	Metamorphoses	Miller
	Ex Ponto and Tristia	Wheeler
Persius		Ramsay, or Evans
Petronius		Heseltine
Philo Judaeus		Yonge
Philostratus	Life of Apollonius of Tyana	Conybeare
Pindar		Sandys
Plato	Dialogues	Jowett, or Davis
	Letters	Post
Plautus		Nixon, or Riley
Pliny Major		Bostock and Riley
Pliny Minor		Bosanquet, or Melmoth
Plutarch	Lives	Perrin
	Morals	'Translated . . . by several hands, corrected and revised by . . . Goodwin'
	Roman Questions	Rose

Polybius		Paton, or Shuckburgh
Procopius		Dewing
Propertius		Butler
Quintilian	Declamations	Warr
	Institutes of Oratory	Butler, or Watson
Quintus Smyrnaeus		Way
Sallust		Rolfe
Seneca	De Beneficiis, &c.	Stewart
	Epistles	Gummere
	Tragedies	Miller
Sophocles		Storr, or Plumptre
Statius	Silvae	Slater
	Thebaid	Lewis
Strabo		Jones
Suetonius		Rolfe
Tacitus	Agricola	Hutton
	Annals	Ramsay, or Oxford tr.
	Dialogus	Peterson
	Germania	Hutton, or Oxford tr.
	Histories	Oxford tr.
Terence		Sargeant
Theocritus		Edmonds, or Way
Thucydides		Smith, or Jowett
Velleius Paterculus		Watson
Vergil		Bryce, or Fairclough
Xenophon	Anabasis	Dakyns
	The Cavalry Commander	Marchant
	Cyropaedia	Watson, or Miller
	Hellenica	Dakyns, or Brownson
	On Horsemanship	Marchant
	Memorabilia	Dakyns, or Marchant
	Oeconomicus	Marchant
	State of the Lacedaemonians	Marchant

INDEXES

INDEX OF AUTHORS CITED

[All the authors cited by Pufendorf have been listed in this Index together with information regarding their nationality, field of endeavour, date of birth and death, or floruit and title of work. The titles of the works more familiarly known by their English titles have been given in that form. Where possible standard translations have been used in verifying references, vide List of Classical Authors and Translations, p. 1369, supra. In other cases the edition used in verification is indicated immediately after the title of the work. The figures in parentheses following the page references indicate the location of the quotation in the particular work cited.]

Achilles Tatius (Greek novelist; 3rd or 4th century Christian Era).

The Romance of Leucippe and Clitophon, 904 (Bk. I).

Ad Herennium, see Rhetorica ad Herennium.

Aelian (Greek essayist; 2nd and 3rd centuries Christian Era).

Varia Historia, 10 (V. xvi), 67 and 82 (III. x), 90 (II. xxxvii), 251 (VII. xv), 263 (III. xxxvii; IV. i), 320 (III. xlii), 348 (IV. i), 363 (IV. i), 387 (IV. i), 482 (VIII. v), 498 (XII. ix), 510 (XII. viii), 528 (V. xiv), 582 (III. xlv; IV. i), 707 (XIV. xlii), 848 (VI. vi), 861 (IV. i; XII. xxxviii), 878 (XII. xlvii), 890 (VI. iv), 909 (X. xviii), 921 (II. vii), 924 (I. xxxiv bis), 1004 (II. i), 1206 (IV. vii), 1207 (XIV. xxvii), 1227 (V. xviii), 1273 (XIV. i), 1278 (III. xxxiv), 1295 (XIV. xi), 1310 (VI. vi), 1353 (VII. xvii).

Aeneas Tacticus (the earliest of the Greek tacticians; 4th century B.C.).

Fragments, 459, n. 1 (3 f., Loeb Classical Library Edition).

Aeschines (Athenian orator; 389–314 B.C.).

Against Ctesiphon, 182 (general reference), 263 (244), 1036 (6);

Against Timarchus, 842 (general reference);

On the Embassy, 261 (181).

Aeschylus (Athenian tragic poet; 525–456 B.C.).

Agamemnon, 459 (1061);

Choëphorae, 469 (582);

Prometheus Bound, 1107 (324–6).

Aesop (Greek fabulist; if historical at all, in the 6th century B.C.; collection completed before the 11th century Christian Era).

Fables, 304 (401), 350 (228), 391 (175), 472 (353).

Africanus, Julius (Roman encyclopedist; 2nd and 3rd centuries Christian Era).

Keotol, 459 (II. xxxvii).

Agatharchides (Greek explorer; 2nd century B.C.).

De Mari Rubro, 683 (49), 865 (30), 1071 (50).

Agathias (Byzantine historian; 6th century Christian Era).

Histories, 117 (V. iii. 5), 193 (II. x. 23), 235 (I. i), 251 (II. xii. 29, 30), 846 (IV. xxvii), 987 (IV. v), 1093 (IV. x), 1180 (IV. i).

Aggenius Urbicus, see Pseudo-Aggenius Urbicus.

Albericus or Albricus (Italian monk; 11th century Christian Era).

De Deorum Imaginibus (Rome 1517), 218 (22).

Alcinous (Greek philosopher, probably identical with Albinus; 2nd century Christian Era, certainly before Hippolytus, of the 2nd and 3rd centuries Christian Era).

De Doctrina Platonis, 1176 (32).

Alexander ab Alexandro, or Alexander Neapolitanus (Italian jurist; 1461–1523).

Genialium Dierum Libri Sex (Rome, 1522), 692 (IV. xv), 1365 (III. i).

Alexander de Rhodes (Jesuit missionary; 1591–1660).

Divers Voyages, &c. (Paris, 1653), 637 (II. vii), 745 (II. xxx), 870 (II. xi), 1043 (II. vi), 1238 (II. vi).

Alexander of Naples, see Alexander ab Alexandro.

Alvarez, Francisco (Portuguese missionary and explorer; ca. 1465–1541?).

Verdadera Informaçam das Terras do Presto Joam (Lisbon, 1540) (= De-

- Alvarez Francisco (cont.).
scriptio Aethiopiae, 692 (xlv), 819 (xiii), 854 (cxxxiii), 894 (xxxii).
- Ambrose, Saint (Latin Father of the Church; ca. 340-97).
Hexaameron, 183 (V. iii);
On Duties, 365 (III. vii), 374 (I. xxx), 376 (I. xxxi), 381 (I. xxvi), 503 (III. x), 511 (III. xiv), 536 (I. xxviii), 665 (I. l), 709 (III. x), 710 (III. iv), 725 (I. l), 726 (II. xxix), 769 (III. iv), 897 (I. xviii), 1317 (I. xxix).
- Ammianus Marcellinus (Roman historian; 4th century Christian Era).
Histories (Res Gestae), 77 (XV. ii), 139 (XXX. xi), 260 (XXV. iv), 318 (XXVII. xi), 368 (XXXI. iv), 498 (XXIV. v. 39), 511 (XXVII. iv), 659 (XVII. v), 704 (XVI. x), 813 (XXII. xvi), 814 (XXVIII. ix), 875 (XXIII. xii. 76), 876 (XIX. iv), 927 (XI. xxii), 1106 (XXVI. x. 10), 1151 (XV. xii), 1157 (XXVIII. vi), 1184 (XV. iii. 5-6), 1226 (XXIII. vi; XXVIII. ii. 11), 1237 (XVIII. i), 1254 (XVII. v; XXIII. vi), 1289 (XXV. xii), 1354 (XVIII. xi).
- Andocides (Athenian orator; born ca. 440 B.C.).
Orations, 778 (i. 44), 609 (i. 124), 904 (iv. 33), 1182 (i. 96).
- Anonymous.
Bilanx Politica (Dutch work of the 17th century), 1032 (general reference), 1053 (general reference).
Cardinalismus, 1254 (I. iii, pp. 375 ff.).
Nepotismus (sine loco 1692), 510 (Pt. I, Bk. III).
See also Abraham de Wicquefort.
- Anthology, Greek, 348 (XI. clxvi), 851 (IX. cxxxiii), 1019 (IX. xi), 1105 (IX. lxxii), 1244 (VI. i); Carpyllides, better Carphylides (probably later than the 2nd century Christian Era), 297 (IX. lii. 5 f.);
 Lucian (2nd century Christian Era), 376 (IX. cxx), 545 (IX. lxxiv), 1278 (IX. ccclxvii);
 Lucilius (1st century Christian Era), 534 (IX. clxxi); Simonides? (6th century B.C.), 334 (X. cv).
- Antiphanes (Greek comic poet; 4th century B.C.).
 Fragments of Comedies, 1244 (III, p. 116, no. 240a, Kock).
- Antiphon (Athenian orator; ca. 480-411 B.C.).
Orations, 128 (vii. 38), 269 (xi. 4 B 3), 324 (ii. 4), 495 (v. 11), 990 (v. 51), 1089 (v. 76), 1212 (v. 11).
- Antoninus Liberalis (Greek mythological writer; 2nd century Christian Era).
Metamorphoses, 500 (i. 1).
- Apollodorus (Greek grammarian; 1st century Christian Era).
Library, 71 (III. ii. 6), 437 (I. xxv).
- Apollonius Rhodius (Greek epic poet; ca. 295-215 B.C.).
Argonautic Expedition, 436 (IV. 1106-9), 893 (II. 1017 ff.), 1074 (II. 1026-8), 1180 (I. 90).
- Appian of Alexandria (Greek historian; 2nd century Christian Era).
Civil Wars, 511 (I. iv. 31), 750 (II. ii), 759 (I. liv), 1065 (II. xli), 1149 (II. cl), 1334 (I. xcvi);
Gallic History, 1239 (IV. iii);
Mithridatic Wars, 81 (xc), 427 (ix. 64), 1190 (xvi. 112);
Preface, 1332 (ii);
Punic Wars, 111 (cxii), 809 (lxxxi and lxxxix), 1038 (xvi. 106 f.), 1297 (lxi);
Spanish Wars, 1347 (xliv);
Syrian Wars, 906 (lix), 1009 (lii).
- Apuleius Madaurensis (Roman writer; 2nd century Christian Era).
Apologia, 244 (19), 328 (92), 704 (17), 816 (80), 1366 (47);
De Deo Socratis, 495 (5);
De Mundo, 108 (35);
De Philosophia, 79 (II. li), 341 (II. xviii), 984 (II. xxiv);
De Platone et eius Dogmate, 1176 (II. xvii);
Florida, 815 (18);
Metamorphoses, 670 (VI. viii), 1188 (X. iii).
- Aratus. See Germanicus.
- Aristophanes (Athenian comic poet; 5th and 4th centuries B.C.).
Acharnians, 970 (530), 1242 (77-8);
Birds, 632 (1661-6), 959 (376);
Ecclesiastusae, 541 (746 ff.);
Frogs, 1113 (1431 f.), 1272 (739-40);
Wasps, 62 (1253 ff.).

- Aristotle (Greek philosopher; 384–322 B.C.).
Economics, 758 (II. i), 856 (I. iii), 878 (I. iv), 941 (I. v), 1284 (II. i);
Magna Moralia, 75 (I. xxxiii), 76 (I. ix), 77 (I. xvii), 79 (I. ix), 363 (II. xi), 691 (I. xxxiii), 817 (II. i–ii), 1202 (II. vi), 1215 (II. xxxiv);
Nicomachean Ethics, preface (VII. x), 22 (I. i), 23 (VI. iii), 24 (VI. v), 25 (VI. xii), 29 (II. vi), 33 (II. ix), 48 (II. i), 52 (III. iv; IV. ii), 57 (III. iii; vi), 59 (III. vii), 61 (II. ii), 62 (III. iii), 63 (III. i; V. vii), 64 (III. i ter; ii), 72 (III. vii), 73 (V. x), 75 (III. i bis), 77 (III. ii; V. vii; x), 79 (III. vii), 112 (V. x), 123 (V. v), 124 (V. vii; viii), 128 (V. x; xv), 129 (V. x; xi), 130 (V. xv), 186 (X. viii), 189 (V. x), 191 (VII. vi), 260 (III. xi), 261 (V. xv), 315 (V. iv), 339 (VIII. xii), 375 (IX. ii), 376 (IX. vii), 405 (III. vii), 416 (III. i), 471 (IV. xiii), 627 (VIII. xiv), 637 (VIII. xiv), 639 (IX. ii), 677 (V. viii), 687 (IX. i), 690 (V. v; IX. i), 691 (V. viii), 741 (IX. i), 742 (IX. i), 763 (VIII. xvi), 817 (V. x; xiv), 927 (VIII. xvi), 928 (VIII. xiii; xiv), 941 (VIII. xiii), 952 (VIII. xiv), 953 (I. v), 956 (II. i; VII. vii), 962 (IV. i), 1176 (II. ii), 1201 (III. xii; xv; VII. vii; viii), 1215 (V. viii bis), 1241 (I. iii), 1293 (X. vii), 1335 (VIII. v);
Politics, 173 (I. viii), 341 (I. ii), 343 (I. ii; iii), 457 (I. ii), 525 (I. viii), 541 (II. ii), 642 (II. ix; VIII. xii), 677 (I. vi), 684 (I. xi; VIII. ii), 691 (I. vi), 740 (I. vii), 757 (I. vii), 826 (III. ix), 827 (IV. xii), 833 (II. viii), 845 (II. ii), 851 (II. ix), 852 (VII. xvi bis), 867 (II. ii; VII. xvi), 918 (VII. xvi), 937 (I. iii), 953 (III. vi), 956 (I. ii), 988 (IV. viii), 995 (III. i; v), 1020 (IV. viii; ix), 1026 (I. ii), 1037 (III. vii; viii; IV. iii ff.), 1038 (II. x), 1058 (III. xii; xv), 1119 (V. ix), 1201 (II. xii), 1269 (III. iii), 1278 (II. v; vii; VII. iv), 1360 (III. i, ii);
Problems, 150 (xxix. 7), 194 (xviii. 6), 727 (xxix. 2, 6), 991 (xxix. 13), 1199 (xxix. 14), 1202 (xxix. 16), 1208 (xxix. 14), 1214 (xxix. 14), 1269 (xxvii. 5);
Rhetoric, 31 (II. vi bis), 169 (I. xi), 189 (I. xiii), 380 (I. xv), 691 (II. xvi), 1140 (I. xv), 1189 (II. iii), 1197 (I. xii; xiv; II. iii), 1217 (I. vii), 1226 (II. xxi), 1243 (I. v), 1263 (II. xv), 1335 (III. xiv);
Rhetoric to Alexander, 88 (i; ii; iii), 518 (xvii), 833 (xvii).
 Arnisaesus, Henningus (German physician; 1580–1636).
De Republica; seu Reflectiones Politicæ Libri Duo (Frankfurt, 1615), reprinted as Relectiones Politicæ in 1636, 1019 (II. vi. 1, § 56), 1021 (I. vi, § 1; § 57), 1053 (II. vii, § 2), 1102 (II. ii, §§ 10 ff.).
 Arnobius (Latin Father of the Church; 2nd and 3rd centuries Christian Era).
Against the Heathen, 45 (II. iv), 464 (I. lix), 1176 (I. xxxvii), 1190 (VII. viii), 1253 (II. lxxi).
 Arrian, Flavius (Greek historian; 2nd century Christian Era).
Anabasis of Alexander, 300 (VI. xxv), 854 (VII. xiii), 903 (I. xxiii), 927 (VII. xii), 1189 (VII. xxix), 1226 (III. xxvi);
Epictetus, 49 (I. xxviii), 54 (I. xvii; xxix), 80 (I. xxiii), 91 (IV. xii), 102 (I. xxi), 120 (III. xvi), 194 (I. xvi), 211 (I. xiv), 239 (I. i), 240 (II. vii), 241 (II. i), 245 (III. xxiv), 249 (I. xi), 252 (IV. v), 256 (I. i), 268 (I. xxv), 335 (I. xix), 381 (III. ii), 525 (I. xvi), 546 (II. iv), 694 (III. iii), 847 (III. vii), 850 (III. xxi), 926 (II. x), 941 (I. xiii), 944 (III. xxvi), 950 (III. ii), 951 (II. xxi), 954 (II. x), 972 (I. xii), 1163 (I. xii), 1242 (III. xiv); Indica, 227 (xi), 853 (xii).
 Asconius Pedianus, see Pseudo-Asconius.
 Athenaeus (Greek antiquary; 3rd century Christian Era).
Banquet of the Learned, 405 (IV. x), 494 (IX. ix), 544 (VI. xcvi), 844 (XIII. ii), 869 (XIII. i), 904 (XIII. xxi), 1057 (X. x), 1255 (I. iv).
 Augustine, Saint (Latin Father of the Church; 354–430).
On Christian Doctrine, 461 (II. xxiv);
On the City of God, 279 (I. xviii), 631 (III. xxi), 892 (XV. xvi).
 Aurelius Antoninus, Marcus (Roman Emperor; 121–180).
Meditations, preface (VI, § 21), 49 (IX, § 42 bis), 79 (IV, § 3; VII, §§ 22, 63;

- VIII, § 14; XI, § 18), 80 (VIII, § 56), 100 (VI, § 44), 127 (IX, § 5), 170 (IX, § 9), 195 (VII, § 74), 205 (XI, § 8), 207 (II, § 1), 209 (IV, § 4; V, § 16; V, § 29; VII, § 55), 215 (VI, § 44), 218 (IX, § 1), 222 (IX, § 4), 234 (II, § 11), 236 (VI, § 30), 238 (X, § 6), 256 (XII, § 36), 294 (I, § 7; XI, § 8), 347 (III, § 4; IV, § 3; § 4), 377 (IX, § 42 bis), 970 (VI, § 54), 1196 (II, § 10), 1202 (II, § 19), 1242 (III, § 4).
- Aurelius Victor, Sextus (Roman historian; praef. urbi, 389 A.D.).
- De Origine Gentis Romanae*, 321 (vi).
- Ausonius, Decimus Magnus (Latin poet; † ca. 395 A.D.).
- Eidyll*, 1060 (xv. 37 f.);
- Ludus Septem Sapientum*, 1255 (78–80);
- Panegyricus ad Gratianum*, 1257 (xxiv), 1258 (xxv).
- Bachov von Echt, Reinhard (German jurist; 1575–?).
- In Institutionum Juris Divi Justiniani Libros Quatuor Commentarii Theorici [sic] et Practici* (Frankfurt, 1628), 774 (II. xxiii; III. ii).
- Bacon, Francis (English philosopher; 1561–1626).
- Cogitata et Visa* (? see note), vi (pp. 581–2);
- Essays* (London, 1613), 59 (xxxvii), 212 (xxiii), 236 (xviii), 238 (xxvi), 246 (xxviii, xxxiv), 247 (x), 250 (xlviii), 254 (xxx), 256 (ii), 347 (xiii), 383 (xvi), 482 (vi), 632 (vii), 760 (xxxix), 851 (viii), 1117 (xix), 1126 (xv, xxxv, xlix), 1127 (xxix), 1174 (iv), 1243 (xlii), 1244 (xl), 1259 (liii), 1272 (xiv), 1296 (xix), 1355 (xxxiii);
- History of Henry VII* (London, 1622), 643 (p. 127), 1114 (p. 242);
- Novum Organum* (London, 1620), vi (I. lxxxix);
- The Advancement of Learning (De Dignitate et Augmentis Scientiarum)*, London, 1613, 58 (IV. i), 210 (VII. i), 337 (VII. ii), 383 (III. ii), 468 (III. iv), 840 (VII. ii), 956 (VII. ii), 1272 (VIII. iii, n. 3), 1297 (p. 348);
- Wisdom of the Ancients (De Sapientia Veterum)*, London, 1609, 1335 (v).
- Balbus, Caspar (Gasparo Balbi, Venetian traveller; 16th century).
- Viaggi dell' Indie Orientali* (Venice, 1590), 780 (general reference), 1060 (general reference).
- Baldaeus or Balde, Philipp (Dutch traveller and writer; second half of 17th century).
- De Idololatria Indorum* (presumably part of the same work), 493 (last chapter), 847 (II. iii), 1262 (II. xvi);
- Description of the Island of Ceylon, Malabar and Coromandel (Naauwkeurige Beschryvinge van Malabar en Choramandel, &c., Amsterdam, 1672)*, 529 (xlvii), 565 (x, xxii), 1100 (xvii, p. 102), 1262 (xxvi).
- Balsamon, Theodore (Greek canonist; fl. 1193 A.D.).
- Commentaria in Canones Sanctorum Apostolorum, Conciliorum, et in Epistolas Canonicas, Ad Epistulam Basilii*, 278 (i. 43).
- Barbosa, Agostinho (Portuguese canonist; 1590–1649).
- In Codicem Justiniani* (Leyden, 1633), 508 (II. xxvii. 1).
- Barclay, John (Scottish satirist; 1582–1621).
- Argenis* (Paris, 1621), 458 (I).
- Barletius, Martin (Albanian historian; last half of the 16th century).
- De Vita Castriotae* (Strassburg, 1537), 1322 (VII).
- Baronius (Italian ecclesiastical historian; 1538–1607).
- Annales Ecclesiastici a Christo Nato ad Annum 1198* (Rome, 1588–93), 869 (IV, § 125).
- Barthema, Louis di (Italian traveller; 1480–?).
- Itinerario nello Egypto, nella Suria, &c.* (Rome, 1510), 856 (II. xi).
- Bate, George (English physician; 1608–69).
- Elenchus Motuum Nuperorum in Anglia, &c.* (Paris, 1649), 85 (I), 1254 (II, pp. 246 ff.).
- Baudius, Dominicus (Belgian poet; 1561–1613).
- De Induciis Belli Belgici* (Leyden, 1613), 1088 (III, p. 178), 1319 (p. 128).
- Beccadelli of Palermo, Antonio, see Panormita.

Becmann, Johann Christoph (German historian; 1641-1717).

Meditationes Politicæ, &c. (Frankfurt, 1679), 1286 (XXI, § 8).

[Bellaza, 1118, note 2 (Atene et Roma, XXII (1919), pp. 152-5).]

Benzoni, Geronimo (Italian traveller; 1519?-86).

History of the New World (La Historia del Mondo Nuovo, Venice, 1565), 237 (II. xiii), 871 (I. xxxvii).

Bernier, François (French traveller and physician; ?-1688).

De Nuperis Motibus in Imperio Magni Mogolis (Histoire de la dernière Révolution des États du Grand Mogol, Paris, 1670), 1095 (general reference); 1126 (general reference), 1275 (general reference);

De Rebus in Regno Mogolis Gestis (presumably the same work), 746 (p. 57), 900 (general reference).

Bible: Old Testament:

Genesis, 30 (xviii. 25), 47 (xx. 4, 5), 65 (xxxiv. 68 (xxx. 37; xxxvi. 24), 71 (xxx. 37), 138 (l. 20; xlv. 5), 152, note 1 (ii. 18), 157 (iii. 21, 23; iv. 2, 17, 22), 163 (iii. 16), 181 (ix. 5), 353 (xxvi. 20-2), 439 (xxxvii. 475 (xx. 12), 481 (xlii. 498 (xlii. 15), 499 (xxxii. 53), 525 (i. 28-9; ix. 3), 615 (xxiv. 2-3; xlvii. 29; l. 25), 617 (xv. 3; xxv. 5-6; xlviii. 22), 628 (xxi. 10; xlix. 19-20), 630 (xlvi. 22), 631 (xxxvii. 4), 686 (xli. 49; xlvii. 13 ff.), 716 (xxx. 37; xxxi. 39), 841 (xxx. 1-2), 843 (xxxviii. 14), 856 (xxxix. 32), 859 (xvi. 2, 5, 6; xxi. 10-12), 864 (xxiv. 67; xxv. 870 (xxi. 15, 19), 874 (xxix. 888 (xxxix. 1), 898 (xix. 31), 900 (ii. 24), 903 (xx. 12), 917 (xxi. 21; xxiv. 4), 932 (xxvi. 34-5), 934 (xxxii. 7 ff.; xxxiv. 30), 957 (xiii. 5, 6, 9), 958 (xiii. 2; xxiv. 35), 960 (xiii. 7; xxvi. 15, 20-1), 1007 (xxvii. 29, 37), 1059 (xlvii. 19), 1079 (xli. 40, 44), 1126 (xxvi. 16), 1137 (xx. 3; xxvi. 10), 1212 (ix. 6), 1275 (xlvii. 23, 24, 26), 1276 (iv. 4; xiii. 5 ff.; xiv. 14, 21, 23, 24; xxxiv. 30), 1329 (xxii. 23).

Exodus, 15 (iii; iv), 182 (xxi. 28), 274 (ii. 14), 284 (xxiii. 4, 5), 290 (xxii. 2), 316 (xxii. 6), 320 (xxi. 28 ff., 33 ff.), 328 (xxii. 16-17), 480 (i. 17, 19), 530 (xxiii. 29), 531 (xx. 10; xxiii. 12), 663 (xxii. 4), 724 (xxii. 13-15), 727 (xxii. 7-9), 752 (xxii. 25), 755 (xxi. 10-11; xxii. 22, 23, 25-7), 756 (xxiii. 4-5, 9, 11, 12), 781 (xxii. 26-7), 812 (xxi. 33), 936 (xxi. 2 ff.; xxi. 26-7, 32), 941 (v. 13-14), 1013 (xviii. 15), 1058 (xxi. 6), 1143 (i), 1171 (ii. 14), 1208 (xxii. 1, 7, 9), 1215 (xxi. 23; xxi. 29-30), 1218 (xxii. 9), 1279 (xxxvi. 6).

Leviticus, 84 (v. 1), 182 (xviii. 23; xx. 15-16), 183 (xix. 19), 268 (v. 1; xix. 17-18), 303 (xxv. 39), 353 (xix. 9-10; xxiii. 22), 532 (xxv. 23), 678 (xxvii. 3), 727 (vi. 2 ff.), 735 (xxv. 14 ff.), 752 (xix. 14; xxv. 37), 755 (xxv. 14, 31), 756 (xix. 9-10, 13, 33; xxiii. 22; xxv. 6, 10, 11, 35, 36, 37, 39 ff.), 843 (xix. 29), 872 (xviii. 20; xx. 10), 906 (xviii. bis), 936 (xxv. 39 ff.), 941 (xxv. 43), 1058 (xxv. 39), 1215 (xxiv. 50).

Numbers, 286 (xxxv. 324 (xxxv. 353 (xx. 19), 357 (xx. 14), 370 (xiii. 14), 491 (xxx. 3), 522 (xxx. 3 ff.), 531 (xxii. 28, 32), 642 (xxxvi. 653 (xxx. 5, 12), 681 (xi. 28-9), 755 (xxxvi. 767 (xxxiv. 13), 833 (xxxv. 30), 887 (ix. 6 ff.), 892 (xxxvi. 1179 (xxxv. 1278 (xxxvi. 7, 9).

Deuteronomy, 15 (xxiv. 9), 182 (xiii. 15-16), 202 (i. 39), 284 (xxii. 4), 286 (xix. 298 (xxviii. 53), 320 (xxii. 8), 324 (xix. 328 (xxii. 28-9), 353 (xxiii. 24-5; xxiv. 19-21), 357 (ii. 1-4), 438 (xxiii. 18), 491 (xxiii. 23), 503 (xx. 16), 526 (xii. 20), 530 (vii. 22), 531 (v. 14; xx. 19; xxii. 6-7; xxv. 4), 541 (xix. 14), 582 (xxii. 1), 617 (xxi. 16-17), 631 (xxi. 17), 663 (xxii. 1-3), 708 (xxv. 13 ff.), 752 (xxiii. 19), 753 (xxiii. 19), 754 (xxiii. 19), 755 (xv. 2; xv. 7-8; xxviii. 12; xxix. 13), 756 (xiv. 28, 29; xv. 2, 4, 7-11; xxiii. 24-5; xxiv. 10-15, 19-21; xxvi. 12-13); 781 (xxiv. 6), 833 (xxvii. 6; xix. 15), 843 (xxiii. 18), 848 (xxiii. 1), 854 (xxi. 10 ff.), 864 (xxi. 13; xxii. 23-4), 868 (xvii. 16-17; xvii. 17; xxi. 15), 874 (xxi. 15), 882 (xxiv. 883 (xxiv. 1-4), 885 (xxiv. 890 (xxiv. 4), 902 (xiii. 6), 936 (xv. 12 ff.), 1006 (xvii. 14), 1179 (xix. 1182 (xiii. 9), 1214

Bible, Deuteronomy (cont.).

(xxv. 11 ff.), 1216 (xix. 19; xxii. 19, 29), 1218 (xix. 19).

Joshua, 480 (ii. 4), 485 (vii. 19-20), 502 (ix. 3 ff.), 767 (xiv. 2), 1026 (xii), 1225 (vii. 24).

Judges, 372 (xxi. 22), 503 (i. 34; ii. 2; iii. 5-6), 511 (xxi. 7), 628 (ix. 18; xi. 1-2), 659 (xi. 15 ff.), 768 (xiv. 12 ff.), 800 (xi. 31), 981 (ix. 54), 1026 (i. 7), 1301 (xx).

1 Samuel, 15 (x. 6, 9), 284 (xviii. 1, 3), 476 (xxvii. 10), 480 (xix. 12 ff.; xx. 5, 28-9), 498 (xxv. 26), 505 (xxv. 4 ff.), 580 (ix. 3), 670 (xxv. 7, 15, 21), 672 (xii. 3-4), 942 (xxvi. 16), 981 (xxxi. 4), 1057 (xiv. 40), 1067 (viii; xiii. 2; xiv. 48, 52), 1143 (xxii), 1243 (x. 23-4), 1314 (xxx. 22 ff.), 1332 (xiii. 19-20), 1352 (xxix. 4).

2 Samuel, 25 (x. 12), 72 (xxiv. 13, 17), 206 (xviii. 33), 280 (x. 4 ff.), 480 (xiv. 4 ff.), 498 (xiv. 19), 513 (xix. 23), 859 (xx. 3), 868 (xii. 8), 903 (xiii. 13), 1062 (xxiv), 1115 (xv. 25-6), 1145 (xi. 14-16; xii. 9), 1153 (xi. 15; xii. 9), 1199 (xvi. 11).

1 Kings, 71 (xviii. 1), 399 (xx. 3 ff.), 482 (iii. 25), 498 (ii. 23), 503 (xx. 4), 513 (ii. 8), 514 (ii. 20), 617 (i. 35), 779 (xx. 39), 888 (i), 1075 (xii. 7-8), 1101 (i. 5 ff.), 1115 (iii. 26), 1117 (iii. 9), 1144 (xxi), 1224 (xx. 39 ff.), 1242 (iii. 28).

2 Kings, 298 (vi. 28-9), 498 (v. 4, 6), 722 (xviii. 14; xix. 6), 922 (iv. 1), 1116 (xi. 2), 1203 (i. 52; ii. 23).

1 Chronicles, 287 (xxix. 3).

2 Chronicles, 188 (xix. 7), 353 (xxxii. 3), 1116 (xxiii).

Tobias, 328 (vii. 10, 18), 864 (vi. 18).

Judith, 351 (x. 20).

Esther, 874 (ii. 17), 1246 (vi. 8).

Job, 184 (xxxviii. 7), 207 (ii. 4), 541 (xxiv. 2), 781 (xxii. 6; xxiv. 3).

Psalms, 78 (xvii. 3), 146 (cxv. 3), 200 (xcvi. 13), 317 (cxxxvii. 7), 383 (xiv. 1), 759 (xv), 767 (xvi. 6), 1158 (xc. 4).

Proverbs, 196 (v. 3-4; ix. 17-18; xx. 17; xxi. 6), 197 (i. 13 ff.), 202 (vii. 3), 222 (ii. 4; viii. 18; x. 9; xi. 3, 5, 10, 18, 19, 25; xviii. 20; xxiii. 20, 28 ff.), 223 (v. 9-11; vi. 33-5; xi. 31; xii. 13; xiv. 14, 22, 32, 34; xvii. 13; xix. 29; xx. 1; xxii. 5), 244 (vi. 6; xiii. 7), 303 (vi. 30-1; xxx. 9), 338 (xviii. 18), 531 (xii. 10), 766 (xvi. 33; xviii. 18), 777 (vi. 1 ff.; xi. 15; xvii. 18; xxii. 26-7; xxvii. 13), 781 (xx. 16), 955 (xiii. 24; xxiii. 13-14).

Song of Solomon, 874 (vi. 7-8).

Wisdom, 334 (vii. 5).

Ecclesiasticus, Siracides or Son of Sirach, 32 (xlii. 19 ff.), 222 (vi. 5; vii. 37, 39; xxxi. 28), 223 (xix. 3; xxxi. 22 ff., 39, 40), 334 (x. 9 ff.), 617 (xi. 20; xxxiii. 24), 618 (xxxiii. 20 ff.), 759 (xxix. 1 ff.), 777 (xxix. 24, 27 bis), 914 (viii. 25; xxx. 1 ff.), 936 (xxxiii. 25 ff.), 955 (xxx. 1 ff., 12), 965 (viii. 11), 1242 (ix. 15), 1269 (xxviii. 25 ff.).

Isaiab, 30 (v. 3), 202 (vii. 14-16), 615 (xxxviii. 1), 873 (iv. 1), 882 (l. 1).

Jeremiah, 202 (xvii. 1), 475 (xxxviii. 24 ff.), 882 (iii. 1, 6), 890 (iii. 12).

Lamentations, 268 (iii. 28-30), 298 (vi. 10).

Ezekiel, 30 (xviii. 25), 83 (xxxiii. 6).

History of Susanna, 834 (line 51).

Jonah, 202 (iv. 11), 224 (i. 7), 299 (i. 7 ff.).

Micah, 30 (vi. 2).

1 Maccabees, 288 (i. 32 ff.).

2 Maccabees, 296 (vii).

Bible: New Testament:

Matthew, 15 (x. 1, 19, 20), 33 (viii. 21-2), 86 (xviii. 6), 105, note 2 (v. 45), 115 (vi. 5), 120 (xx. 13), 138 (xx. 13-14), 200 (v. 44-5; xviii. 28), 204 (vii. 12), 249 (xxv. 29), 268 (v. 17), 296 (xii. 2, 4), 340 (v. 22), 353 (xii. 1), 430 (xviii. 25-6), 432 (xviii. 25 ff.), 478 (xviii. 10), 498 (xxiii. 16 ff.), 506 (xxv. 27), 514 (xiv. 7), 531 (vi. 26), 584 (xxiii. 44), 676 (ix. 12), 705 (xx. 9), 710 (xxiii. 44), 742 (xx. 4, 7), 757 (xxv. 24), 866 (xxii. 25 ff.), 882 (v. 32; xiv. 19; xix. 8), 896 (xxii. 12), 913 (x. 28), 922 (xviii. 25), 1108 (x. 32), 1246 (iv. 8-9);

Mark, 681 (ix. 38-9), 882 (vi. 2; x. 4);

Luke, 42 (xii. 47-8), 137 (xvii. 9-10), 139 (xviii. 11), 188 (vi. 35), 200 (vi. 36), 202 (ii. 51), 206 (xi. 27), 284 (x. 29 ff.), 322 (xix. 8), 476 (xxiv. 28), 617 (xii. 20), 645 (xix. 8), 981 (xii. 13-14), 1033 (xxiii. 51), 1114 (xx. 25), 1195 (xiv. 5), 1219 (xxiii. 51);

- John*, 477 (vi. 5), 895 (xxi. 7), 1155 (xi. 50), 1170 (viii. 7), 1241 (viii. 54), 1349 (iv. 44);
- Acts*, 33 (vi. 2), 98 (ix. 5), 101 (xvii. 24 ff.), 224 (xxviii. 4), 282 (xvi. 37), 432 (xxiii. 21), 476 (xvi. 3), 678 (viii. 20), 998 (xix. 39, 40), 1213 (xxviii. 4), 1224 (xii. 19);
- Romans*, 30 (ii. 6; iii. 6), 46, note 1 (iii. 8), 84 (i. 32), 187 (i. 32), 188 (ii. 2; iii. 4), 202 (ii. 15), 531 (viii. 19 ff.), 627 (viii. 17), 1114 (xiii. 1 ff.), 1115 (xiii. 5), 763 (xiii. 1 ff.), 1170 (ii. 22), 1257 (xii. 10);
- 1 Corinthians, 33 (vi. 12; vii. 6-9; x. 23), 44 (vi. 12), 58 (vii. 2), 194 (xi. 14), 216 (xv. 15, 19), 225 (vi. 12; vii. 38; x. 23), 426 (xiv. 11), 531 (ix. 9), 716 (xi. 14), 797 (vii. 13), 823 (viii. 13), 850 (vii. 26), 873 (vii. 4), 897 (xii. 23-4), 906 (v. 1), 1118, note 3 (xv. 33);
- 2 Corinthians, 259 (viii. 13-14), 284 (viii. 13), 297 (viii. 13), 374 (viii. 13), 480 (ix. 2-4), 627 (xii. 14), 896 (xi. 17, 19);
- Galatians*, 556 (iv. 1), 823 (vi. 10);
- Ephesians*, 146 (i. 11), 302 (iv. 28), 348 (iv. 28), 919 (vi. 1), 1002 (vi. 5-8);
- Philippians*, 1257 (ii. 3);
- Colossians*, 919 (iii. 20), 1002 (iii. 22);
- 1 Timothy, 196 (iv. 8), 823 (v. 8), 1001 (ii. 2), 1002 (vi. 1);
- Titus*, 815 (i. 12), 1002 (ii. 9);
- Hebrews*, 30 (xi. 6), 188 (vi. 17-18), 835 (vi. 16);
- James*, 71 (v. 17), 432 (iv. 15), 480 (ii. 25);
- 1 Peter, 860 (iii. 6), 1002 (ii. 13);
- 2 Peter, 1194 (ii. 15);
- Revelation*, 100 (xxii. 9), 1218 (xvii. 6).
- Bion (Greek bucolic writer; 2nd century B.C.).
- Idyl*, 245 (iii. 7).
- Boccalini, Trajano (Italian satirist; 1556-1613).
- Ragguagli di Parnaso* (Venice, 1612-13), 869 (II. lxviii).
- Bodin, Jean (French political writer; 1530-96).
- On the Republic* (De la République, Paris, 1576), 565 (I), 642 (V. ii), 664 (I. x), 693 and 694 (VI. iii, p. 1071 f.), 697 (VI. ii, p. 1028), 881 (I. iii), 886 (I. iii), 923 (I. iv), 944 (I. iv), 988 (III. iv, p. 456), 999 (III. vii), 1019 (II. i, p. 287), 1053 (VI. iv), 1074 (III. iv, p. 455), 1079 (I. viii), 1091 (III. ii, p. 417), 1096 (VI. v, p. 1144 ff.), 1184 (IV. vii, p. 734), 1211 (VI), 1215 (VI), 1220 (III. vii, p. 527 ff.), 1259 (III. vi, p. 501), 1269 (III. viii, p. 546 ff.; III. viii, p. 560), 1270 (III. viii, p. 557), 1334 (V. vi).
- Boecler, Johann Heinrich (German jurist; 1610-72).
- Actio Ingrati* (De Actione Legibus Prodit aut non Prodit adversus Ingratos Disquisitio, Strassburg, 1660), 377 (general reference);
- De eo quod Civitas egit* (Strassburg, 1660), 1361 (general reference);
- Dissertatio de Religione Mandati*, 722 (general reference);
- On Grotius* (In Hugonis Grotii, &c. Commentatio, Strassburg, 1633), 110 (I. i. § 9), 164 (Prolegomena), 226 (I. i. § 14; II. iv. § 9), 229 (II. iv. § 5), 269 (I. iv. § 2), 281 (II. i. § 10), 289 (II. i. § 11), 294 (II. i. § 18), 309 (II. ii. § 10), 327 (II. i. § 6), 361 (II. ii. § 14), 366 (II. ii. § 19), 367 (II. ii. §§ 16-17), 371 (II. ii. § 20), 372 (II. ii. § 21), 373 (II. ii. § 22), 389 (I. i. § 4), 535 (II. ii. § 1 and p. 47), 537 (preface, p. 9), 551 (II. ii. § 2), 552 (II. ii. § 2), 557 (I. iii. § 6), 577 (II. ii. § 4), 580 (II. iv. § 4), 595 (II. iii. § 16), 612 (II. vi. § 2), 626 (II. vii. § 13), 628 (II. vii. § 4), 631 (II. vii. § 8), 635 (II. vii. § 6; II. vii. § 7), 637 (II. vii. §§ 9-11), 640 (II. vii. § 9), 644 (II. vii. § 9), 649 (II. iv. § 9), 650 (II. vii. § 8), 653 (II. iv. § 1), 654 (II. iv. § 5), 658 (II. iv. § 2), 664 (II. vii. § 1), 871 (II. v. § 9), 928 (II. v. § 6), 933 (II. v. § 10), 937 (II. v. § 27), 943 (II. v. § 27), 990 (II. v. § 17), 1001 (I. iii. § 6), 1013 (I. iii. § 6), 1071 (I. iii. § 16), 1095 (II. vii. § 13), 1096 (II. vii. § 15), 1097 (II. vii. § 17; § 18), 1109 (I. iv. § 14), 1113 (I. iv. § 10), 1116 (I. iv. § 17), 1155 (I. i. § 6), 1157 (I. i), 1164 (preface, p. 9), 1183 (II. i. § 14), 1256 (II. v. § 21), 1286 (I. i. § 6), 1288 (II. vi. §§ 3 ff.), 1293 (I. iii. § 1), 1347 (I, p. 107);
- On Nepos* (Strassburg, 1640), 904 (Preface, and Cimon).
- Boemus, Johann (German scholar; 16th century).

- Boemus (cont.).
Omnium Gentium Mores (Leyden, 1536), 865 (III. vii).
- Boethius, Arnicius Manlius Severinus (Roman philosopher; ca. 480-524).
Consolation of Philosophy, 232 (V. vi), 333 (III. vi), 1270 (III. vi);
On Cicero's Topics, 775 (x), 1266 (vi).
- Bonfini, Antonio (Italian littérateur; 1427-1502).
History of Hungary (Rerum Ungaricarum Decades tres, Basel, 1543; first complete edition, 1568), 513 (III. ii).
- Boxhorn, Marcus Zuerius (Dutch scholar; 1612-53).
On Suetonius (Suetonii . . . Vitae cum Notis, Leyden, 1632), 856 (Caligula, xl), 889 (Caligula, xl).
- Brisson, Barnabé (French jurist; 1531-91).
Selectarum ex Jure Civili Antiquitatum Libri IV (Paris, 1556), 1358 (III. v).
- Browne, Thomas (English author and physician; 1605-82).
Religio Medici (London, 1643), 409 (§ 20), 1203 (§ 42), 1271 (II. i), 1365 (§ 37).
- Buchanan, George (Scotch historian; 1506-82).
History of Scotland (Rerum Scoticarum Historia, Edinburgh, 1582), 695 (XII, p. 450), 814 (XIV), 855 (IV), 856 (VII), 1207 (VIII), 1219 (IX), 1223 (IV), 1245 (XII), 1322 (IX), 1367 (IV).
- Budeus or Budaeus, Guillaume (French scholar; 1467-1540).
On the Digest (Annotaciones . . . in . . . Pandectarum Libros, Paris, 1508), 692 (XVIII. i. 1), 774 (I. ii. 2).
- Busbecq, Angerius Gislenius, Seigneur de, (Flemish scholar; 1522-92).
Letters (Epistolae, Brussels, 1630), 192 (iii), 690 (iii), 855 (iii), 909 (i), 937 (iii, p. 120), 944 (iii, p. 118), 1137 (iii, p. 155), 1188 (iii), 1238 (iii);
Letters of the Turkish Embassy (Legationis Turcae Epistolae Quattuor, Paris, 1589), 1270 (i).
- Bussièrès, Jean de (French scholar; 1607-79).
Historia Francica (Leyden, 1661), 722 (XI, p. 391), 807 (XIX, p. 39), 815 (VIII), 1150 (XVI).
- Buxtorf, Johann (Jewish scholar; 1599-1664).
De Sponsalibus et Divortiis (Basel, 1652), 883 (general reference).
- Cadamustus, Aloysius (Venetian traveller and writer; 1432-80).
La prima Navigazione (Venice, 1507), 528 (lvii, lx), 855 (lxxv), 897 (x), 1235 (viii).
- Caesar, Gaius Julius (Roman statesman; 100-44 B.C.).
Civil War, 171 (III. x. 7), 432 (III. lxxxvii. 6);
Galic War, 173 (VI. xxiii. 6, 1), 206 (III. xxii), 355 (I. vii-viii. 4), 367 (IV. vii. 4; viii. 2), 370 (II. xv. 4; IV. ii. 2, 6), 563 (VI. xxiii. 1-3), 570 (IV. i. 4-7; VI. xxii. 2), 860 (VI. xix), 865 (V. xiv), 868 (I. liii), 923 (VI. xix), 965 (I. xiv. 5), 1058 (VI. xiii. 2), 1238 (V. xlv), 1249 (I. xxxiv. 2).
- Calaber Smyrnaeus, Quintus, see Quintus.
- Callimachus (Greek scholar and poet; born ca. 310 B.C.).
Hymn to Delos, 295 (122);
Hymn to Zeus, 766 (62-3).
- Calpurnius Flaccus (Roman rhetorician; 1st or 2nd century Christian Era).
Declamations, 59 (ii), 1196 (ii), 1205 (v).
- Campanella, Thomas (Italian philosopher; 1568-1639).
De Civitate Solis (Frankfurt, 1620), 541 (general reference), 866 (general reference).
- Canon Law, see Corpus Juris Canonici.
- Capitolinus, Julius (Roman biographer; 4th century Christian Era).
Antoninus Pius, 139 (ii);
Clodius Albinus, 1104 (general reference);
Lucius Verus, 1041 (i);
Marcus, 734 (xvii), 908 (xix. 29 f.).
- Capitulaires, see Charlemagne, Charles V.
- Carpylides, see Anthology, Greek.
- Carron, Francis (Dutch general; †1674).
Descriptio Japoniae (Beschrijvinghe het Machtig Coninckrijcke Japan, Amsterdam, 1648), 206 (vii).
- Casaubon, Isaac (French classical scholar; 1550-1614).
Exercitationes in Baronium (London, 1614), 296 (I, n. 9), 465 (XIII, n. 13), 1015 (preface);

- Letters (Epistolae*, Haag, s'Gravenhage, 1638), 459 (no. 812 ed. Graevius), 1015 (no. 264 ed. Graevius);
- On Persius (Cum Commentario*, Paris, 1605), 238 (iii. 67), 468 (IV, p. 342);
- On Suetonius (Sine loco*, 1595), 848 (Domitian, vii).
- Cato, Marcus Porcius (Roman statesman; 234-149 B.C.).
- On Farming*, 44 (I. i), 758 (preface), 1140 (V).
- Catullus, Gaius Valerius (Roman poet; 87-ca. 54 B.C.).
- Poems*, 186 (lxviii. 142), 246 (xxvi), 685 (xii. 11-13), 931 (lxii. 60 ff.).
- Cedrenus, Georgius (Greek monk; 11th century).
- Synopsis Historiarum*, 664 (p. 424, ed. Xylander).
- Chalcocondylas, Laonicus (Byzantine historian; fl. 1450).
- Histories*, 574 (III), 890 (III), 1143 (I).
- Chamberlaine, Edward (English statesman; 1616-1703).
- The Present State of England* (London, 1671), 83 (I. xvi), 565 (I. iv), 857 (I. xvi).
- Charisius, Flavius Sospater (Roman grammarian; 4th century Christian Era).
- Ars Grammatica*, 463 (I, p. 50, 25 ff. K.).
- Charlemagne (King of France and Emperor of the West; 742-814) and Louis the Pious (Emperor of the West and King of France; 778-840).
- Capitularies (Capitularia*. In J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum Nova et Amplissima Collectio, ed. Paris, 1901 ff., vols. 17B and 18B), 287 (IV. xxvii; VII. ccxcv), 293 (VI. xix), 322 (III. xlv), 360 (III. xii), 497 (III. xlii), 716 (I. cxxxi; V. ccx), 833 (VII. cclxxx).
- Charles V (Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire; 1500-58).
- Ordinatio Criminalis* (in German, Mainz, 1532), 329 (article 218), 1214 (article 160).
- Charron, Pierre (French philosopher; 1541-1603).
- De la Sagesse* (Bordeaux, 1601), 38 (I. xxxiv), 58 (I. xlii), 148 (I. xxxiv, n. 11), 150 (I. xxxiv, n. 12; I. xxxix, n. 11), 151 (I. xxxviii), 167 (I. xl, n. 6-8), 168 (I. xxxix, n. 8), 189 (I. xxxix; II. ii, n. 7; II. viii), 193 (II. viii, §§ 4, 7), 236 (II. v, §§ 25 ff.), 245 (I. xxi), 246 (I. xxxix, n. 11, § 9; II. vi, n. 1-2), 249 (I. xxxix; III. xiv, n. 19 ff.), 251 (III. xiv, n. 21 ff.), 257 (II. xi, n. 8), 260 (II. xi, n. 18), 492 (III. x, n. 7), 525 (I. xl, n. 3-5), 632 (III. xiv, n. 38), 683 (I. xxxix, n. 11; II. x, n. 2), 820 (I. xxxvii, n. 5), 851 (I. xlvi, n. 2-3), 858 (I. xxxix, n. 11), 881 (I. xlvi, n. 12), 893 (I. xxii), 896 (I. vi), 901 (II. viii, n. 6), 924 (I. xlvi), 950 (I. xxxvi, 6), 1117 (III. ii), 1163 (I. xxxix, n. 9), 1165 (I. xxxvii, n. 8), 1206 (I. xxxix, n. 11), 1244 (I. xxxv, n. 5).
- Chronicles*, see Bible.
- Cicero, Marcus Tullius (Roman philosopher and orator; 106-43 B.C.).
- Academics*, 194 (II. iii), 515 (IV. xlvii), 795 (I. vii);
- Ad Herennium*, see Rhetorica ad Herennium;
- Against Verres*, 414 (II. xv), 490 (V. i. 3), 574 (VI. iii), 682 (V. vii), 713 (V. v), 1188 (II. xlii), 1192 (V. i), 1260 (III. xxiii), 1284 (II. iii);
- Brutus*, 684 (lxxiii);
- For Balbus*, 113 (iii), 545 (xxv), 1333 (general reference), 1349 (xi, xii, xlii);
- For Caecina*, 774 (iii), 805 (xix-xx), 806 (xxv), 812 (xviii), 1276 (xxv), 1357 (xxxiv), 1359 (xxxiv);
- For Caelius*, 844 (xvi ff.);
- For Cluentius*, 488 (I), 906 (vi), 1204 (xxv), 1220 (xlv);
- For Flaccus*, 1262 (xlii);
- For Fonteius*, 1261 (viii);
- For Gnaeus Plancius*, 315 (iv), 1273 (iv);
- For His House*, 1357 (xxix);
- For King Deiotarus*, 833 (xi), 1124 (ix);
- For Milo*, 271 (iv), 290 (iii);
- For Murena*, iv, note 1 (xi. 25), 134 (xxix-xxxi), 1186 (xxix), 1267 (ii);
- For Publius Sestius*, 156 (xlii);
- For Quinctius*, 907 (vi);
- For Rabirius*, 1235 (v);
- For Rabirius Postumus*, 414 (xlii);
- For Roscius the Comic Actor*, 385 (xxiv), 410 (x), 774 (vi);
- For Sextus Roscius*, 629 (xix), 718 (xxxviii, xxxix), 765 (xl);

Cicero (cont.).

- For Sulla*, 1204 (xxv);
For the Manilian Law, 355 (xiii);
Laelius, 209 (viii);
Letters to Atticus, 92 (III. xxiii), 223 (IX. xii);
Letters to Friends, 273 (XI. xxviii), 468 (IX. xxi), 601 (VII. xxx), 774 (VII. xii), 992 (I. ii), 1107 (I. ix), 1248 (III. xiii), 1302 (X. xvi), 1330 (XIII. x);
On Duties, 7 (I. xxviii), 14 (I. xxx), 35 (III. xvii), 45 (I. ix), 83 (I. vii), 167 (I. viii; I. xxvi), 171 (I. vii), 195 (II. iii; III. iii), 196 (I. iv), 209 (I. xiv. 158; III. v. 25), 212 (III. x), 251 (I. vi), 284 (III. xix), 307 (III. v), 314 (III. v), 333 (III. vi), 346 (I. vii; III. v), 350 (I. xvi), 351 (III. xiii), 373 (I. xiv), 374 (I. xvii, xviii), 375 (I. xv), 380 (II. xi), 396 (I. vii), 397 (I. x), 398 (III. xxiv), 419 (III. xxix), 472 (III. xv), 488 (II. xiv), 505 (III. xxix), 509 (I. III. xxxii), 510 (I. III. xxxii), 514 (I. x), 515 (III. xxix), 544 (I. vii), 621 (III. xviii), 637 (I. xvii bis), 639 (I. xv), 656 (II. xxii), 664 (III. xviii), 665 (III. xxv), 666 (III. v), 709 (III. xvi), 710 (III. x), 711 (III. xii; xiii), 712 (III. xvi), 714 (III. xv), 715 (III. xv), 724 (III. xxv), 758 (II. 769 (III. x. 42), 774 (III. xvii. 70), 778 (III. x), 794 (I. xiii), 795 (III. xxxii), 800 (III. xxv), 819 (I. xxiv. 10), 823 (I. xvii), 826 (I. xi), 896 (I. xxxv), 897 (I. xxxv), 952 (III. v. 22), 959 (II. v ff.), 1049 (II. viii), 1059 (II. vi), 1177 (I. xvii), 1201 (I. viii), 1269 (I. xlii bis), 1277 (II. xxi), 1311 (I. xi), 1334 (II. viii), 1345 (II. xxiv), 1346 (III. xxii);
On Ends, 4 (III. i), 167 (II. xxv), 169 (III. xix), 205 (III. v), 209 (III. xx), 212 (II. xi; III. xix), 218 (I. xvi), 349 (III. viii), 847 (III);
On Invention, 64 (II), 71 (I. xxvii), 74 (I. xxx), 77 (II. xxxi), 78 (I. xlix), 81 (II. xxx), 156 (I. ii), 270 (II. xxxii), 295 (II. lvii-lviii), 414 (I. xxxix), 580 (II. v), 681 (II. xxxix), 797 (II. xl), 799 (II. xlix), 803 (I. xxxviii; II. xl), 812 (II. xlii), 818 (II. xxxii, xlii), 820 (II. xlix), 821 (II. xlix), 822 (II. xlix), 1132 (I. xxxviii), 1191 (II. xxxv);

- On Laws*, 107 (II. ix), 164 (III. i), 208 (I. v. 10), 271 (III. xviii), 334 (II. xxxii), 1118 (III. iii), 1196 (I. xiv), 1198 (III. xiv);
On the Nature of the Gods, 100 (I. ii; I. xxv; I. xli), 170 (I. xxvii), 215 (I. ii), 237 (III. xxxv), 252 (I. v), 254 (II. xvi), 347 (II. clx), 528 (II. lx ff.), 1242 (I. xvii);
On the Orator, 14 (II. xxiv), 408 (I. xxxviii), 944 (II. vi);
Paradoxes, 796 (vi);
Philippics, 137 (II. iii), 318 (II. xii. 29), 418 (II. v), 907 (XI. iv. 10), 1199 (II. xxv), 1300 (IV. vi. 14);
The Republic, 195, note 1 (III. xii. 21), 220 (III. xxii. 16);
Topics, 774 (x bis), 808 (iii), 1266 (vi);
Tusculan Disputations, 40 (III. v), 60 (I. iii; IV. xiv. 31), 99 (III. v), 114 (V. xix), 189 (I. xiii-xiv), 192 (V. xxvii), 238 (I. xxii), 262 (I. xxx), 284 (III. xxix), 467 (V. xl), 972 (IV. xx), 1036 (V), 1172 (III. xxx), 1198 (II. iv), 1228 (V. xxvii), 1349 (V. xxxvii).
 Claudianus, Claudius (Latin epic poet; 370-404 A.D.).
Against Eutropius, 849 (I. 187-8), 877 (I. 72-3), 1209 (II. 11 f.), 1259 (II. 321-2);
Against Rufinus, 244 (I. 215-16), 334 (II. 473 ff.);
In Praise of Probinus and Olybrius, 1267 (13 ff.);
On the Consulship of Manlius Theodorus, 243 (1 ff.), 1174 (224 ff.);
On the Consulship of Stilicho, 176 (I. 210-11), 1059 (III. 113 f.), 1270 (II. 122 f.), 1281 (I. 379-80);
On the Fourth Consulship of Honorius, 964 (104-6), 1057 (296 ff.);
On the Sixth Consulship of Honorius, 78, note 1 (general reference);
The Gothic War, 1193 (120 ff.), 1243 (584);
The War with Gildo, 875 (441-3), 1034 (157 ff., 163 ff.).
 Collatio Legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum (Paris, 1660, ed. P. Pithou), 291 (general reference), 541 (13).
 Codinus, Curopalates, Georgius, see Curopalates.

- Collenuccio, Pandolfo (Italian historian; † 1504).
History of the Kingdom of Naples (Historie del Regno di Napoli, Venice, 1539), 304 (V, p. 373), 1097 (IV).
Colossians, see Bible.
 Columella, Lucius Junius Moderatus (Latin writer on agriculture; 1st century Christian Era).
On Farming, 347 (XI. i. 27), 856 (XII, preface), 1012 (I. iii).
 Comines, Philippe de (Flemish historian; 1445-1509).
Mémoires (Paris, 1524), 1117 (I, p. 342; III, p. 388), 1124 (X), 1126 (X, p. 682), 1156 (II).
 Conestaggio, Girolamo (Archbishop of Capua; † 1635).
De Unione Lusitaniae (Dell' Unione del Regno di Portugallo, Geneva, 1585), 832 (II, p. 222), 1091 (III, p. 116), 1099 (III), 1100 (I), 1102 (III, V), 1120 (VIII), 1124 (I, p. 25), 1319 (I).
 Connan, François de (French jurist; 1508-51).
Commentaria Iuris Civilis (Paris, 1538), 396 (V. i), 591 (III. vi), 923 (II. xiii), 1266 (II. xi).
 Conring, Herman (German jurist; 1606-81).
De Civili Prudentia (Helmstedt, 1662), 210 (xiv).
 Constans, Lucius Antistius, see Spinoza, Benedictus de.
Constitutions of Sicily (Constitutiones in Sicilia Friderici in Codex Legum Antiquitatum, Frankfurt, 1613), 293 (xiii), 504 (II. xxviii), 523 (II. lv), 574 (II. xxvii), 584 (III. xxi), 713 (I. lxxxviii, § 1), 909 (III. xx), 932 (III. xxi), 1214 (II), 1216 (II. xiv), 1219 (I. xlvii), 1220 (I), 1232 (I. xx), 1239 (III. xxxiii, § 4).
Corpus Juris Attici, 881 (iv. 1369).
Corpus Juris Canonici:
Canons, 287 (18 of the Council of Nantes, before 896 A.D., in G. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum Nova et Amplissima Collectio, ed. Paris, 1901 ff.); Constitutions of Clement V, 451 (I. iv);
Decretals of Gregory IX, 306 (V. xviii. 10 [3]), 464 (IV. i. 25), 522 (II. xxiv. 19), 768 (V. xxxv), 798 (I. iii. 3), 872 (IV. xiii. 4 and 10), 990 (I. vi. 6), 993 (I. xliii. 1), 994 (I. vi. 36);
Gratian's Decretals, 182 (Causa XV, Questio i. 4), 279 (Causa XXXII, Questio v. 1-4), 328 (Causa XXVII, Questio ii. 39), 374 (Distinctio LXXXVI. xiv ff. and Causa I, Questio ii. 6-7), 499 (Causa XXII, Questio i. 16); Causa XXII, Questio v. 10), 505 (Causa XXII, Questio iv), 507 (Causa XXII, Questio v. 22); Distinctio XIII. ii), 633 (Distinctio LVI. iii), 654 (Causa XVI, Questio iii. 13-14), 678 (Causa I, Questio i. 1-3), 859 (Causa XXXII, Questio v. 2 ff.), 863 (Causa XXVII. Questio ii. 2, 5), 868 (Causa XXXII, Questio iv. 3 and 7), 871 (Causa XXXII, Questio v. 15, 16, 23); Causa XXXII, Questio vi. 2 ff.), 872 (Causa XXXII, Questio iv. 3, 4, and 1); Causa XXXII, Questio vi. 5), 878 (Causa XXXIII, Questio v. 1 ff.), 891 (Causa XXXI, Questio i. 1), 892 (Causa XXXV, Questio i. 2), 990 (Distinctio LXIII. xxxvi), 1172 (Causa III, Questio vii. 3, 4), 1183 (Causa XXIII, Questio viii. 33), 1188 (Causa XXIII, Questio iv. 18 and 24), 1225 (Causa I, Questio iv. 6-8), 1278 (Distinctio LXXXVI. vii-ix), 1305 (Distinctio LXXXVI. i and iii), 1321 (Causa XII, Questio ii. 13-15), 1346 (Causa XXV, Questio i. 15); Sext (Liber Sextus Decretalium Bonifacii VIII), 324, note 1 (V. iv), 990 (V. xii. 29), 991 (I. xxii. 1), 994 (I. vi. 46).
Corpus Juris Civilis:
Code, 93 (V. viii. 1 and 2), 277 (III. xxvii. 1), 291 (III. xxvii. 1), 316 (III. xxxii. 5), 369 (IV. xli), 404 (II. iii. 2), 426 (IV. xix. 20, 21), 445 (VI. li, § 7), 454 (VIII. liv. 4), 488 (IX. xxxi. 9), 504 (II. xxviii), 508 (II. xxvii. 1), 612 (VIII. liii. 1), 628 (VI. lxi. 8, § 5), 632 (V. xxvii. 6 and 7), 635 (III. xxviii. 28; VI. xxv. 10, § 2; lvi), 647 (VII. xxxix. 3 and 4), 667 (III. xxxii. 22), 669 (III. xxxii. 3 and 23; VI. ii. 2; VIII. xlv. 16), 713 (II. xix. 11; IX. xxvii. 6), 715 (IV. xlv. 2), 717 (IV. xlv. 8), 740 (IV. lix. 1), 772 (IV. xlv. 1), 773

Corpus Juris Civilis (cont.).

(IV. xlv. 2; XIV. xlv. 2 and 7), 774 (VIII. xlviii. 6), 779 (IV. xxiv. 35, § 1), 781 (VIII. xvi. 8), 800 (IV. xlix. 17), 805 (VIII. lv), 848 (VIII. lvii), 852 (V. iv. 27), 864 (V. v. 8), 868 (I. ix. 8), 869 (V. v. 2; IX. ix. 18), 880 (V. xvii. 8), 883 (V. xvii. 8), 888 (V. iv. 27), 909 (V. xxvii. 3), 921 (IV. xliii. 2), 922 (IV. xliii. 1; VIII. xlvii. 11), 939 (VI. i. 1), 941 (VII. vi. i. § 3), 1058 (VII. xvi. 10), 1074 (I. ix. 7; X. xii. 1), 1079 (I. iv. 8; VII. xlii. 1; lxii. 19), 1082 (III. xxxiii. 9), 1149 (X. xlix. 3), 1152 (XII. xliii. 2), 1162 (IX. xlvii. 25), 1168 (IX. viii. 6), 1178 (IX. xv. 1), 1181 (IX. xx. 7; xxvii. 1), 1182 (III. xxvii. 1), 1207 (IX. viii. 4), 1211 (IX. viii. § 3), 1216 (IX. ii. 17; xii. 7; xlv. 10), 1225 (IX. xlviii. 22), 1226 (IX. viii. 4), 1234 (VI. lvii; IX. ix. 23, 29), 1236 (I. liv. 1; II. xi. 13; IX. ix. 25), 1256 (X. liii. 10; XII. iii. 1; iv. 2; v. 1; xliii. 3), 1258 (XII. viii. 1), 1260 (XII. viii. 2), 1264 (VI. viii), 1269 (IV. lxiii. 3; XII. i. 6), 1278 (III. xliii), 1299 (I. ix. 14), 1321 (I. ii. 21), 1346 (II. iv. 12);

Digest, 19 (IV. viii. 51; IX. ii. 13), 27 (I. iii. 3-6), 36 (XLVI. iii. 105), 50 (XLVII. xlv. 8), 51 (XLVII. x. 18, § 3; XLVIII. viii. 14), 67 (I. i; IX. i. 2 and 3; ii. 11, 5), 77 (XLVIII. xix. 38, 5), 82 (I. xvi. 4, 2; IX. ii. 37; 45; iv. 2; XLVII. x. 11, 3), 83 (IV. ix. 7; XI. iv. 1; XLVII. ii. 54, 4; 66, 2; vi. 1, 2; xvi; XLVIII. v. 8 and 9; ix. 2, 6; 7; x. 9, 1; XLIX. xvi. 6, 8), 84 (I. xviii. 14; IX. iv. 2; XXVII. viii; XL. viii. 7; XLVII. ii. 52, 13), 86 (II. x. 1, 1), 88 (XVII. i. 2, 6), 107 (XI. vii. 14, 14; XLVII. xii. 3, 4), 109 (L. xxii. 144), 113 (XXVIII. vii. 15), 133 (XLVII. x. 15, 1), 169 (I. i. 3), 173 (XLVII. xxii. 4), 174 (XLIX. xv. 2; L. xvi. 118), 183 (I. i. 1, § 3), 204 (II. ii. 1 and 4), 229 (XLVII. ii. 1, § 3; L. xvi. 42), 259 (XIII. vi. 5, § 4; XIX. v. 14; XXIX. v. 1, § 28; XXXIII. iii. 6; XXXIX. iii. 2, § 9), 262 (IV. ii. 14, § 3; XLVIII. xxi. 3, § 6; XLIX. xiv. 45, § 2), 268 (IV. vii. 4, § 1), 272 (XLVII. xviii. 18, § 3), 276 (XLIII.

xvi. 3, § 9), 277 (IX. ii. 45, § 4), 286 (XLVIII. v. 20, 22, 24, 32), 287 (XLIX. xix. 16, § 8), 291 (IX. ii. 4, 1 bis; 5; XLVIII. viii. 9), 293 (XLVIII. viii. 9), 308 (IX. ii. 29, § 3; 49, § 1; XLIII. xxiv. 7, § 4), 315 (IX. ii. 27, § 12; 49), 316 (VI. i. 62, § 1; IX. ii. 22, § 1; 23; 27, § 8; 30, § 3), 317 (IX. ii. 7, § 7), 319 (IX. ii. § 37 pr.; iv. 2, 3, 4 pr.), 320 (I. xviii. 6, § 7; 14; II. i. 7, § 5, 8; IX. ii. 11, §§ 2, 4, 27; §§ 9, 29, 34, 35; 29, §§ 2-4; 51, § 2; XLIII. xxiv. 15, § 2; XLVII. ii. 21, § 9; vii. 6; x. 34), 321 (IX. ii. 5, § 2; 7, § 3; 44; 52, § 4), 322 (IX. i; XXXV. ii. 68; XXXIX. i; XLVII. ii. 48), 323 (IX. ii. 4, 5, 7, § 4; 51, § 1; XLVIII. viii. 4, § 1), 324 (IX. ii. 5, § 3; 7, §§ 2, 5, 6, 8; 8, 9 ff.; 9 pr., § 3; § 4; 11 pr., § 31, 52, § 2; 13 pr.; 31; iii. 7; XLVII. x. 5, § 1), 325 (XLVII. x. 5, § 1), 326 (IX. i. 3; iii. 7), 327 (IX. ii. 13 pr.), 329 (IX. i; ii. 2 pr.; XII. iii. 9; XIII. i. 8, § 1; XV. i. 3, § 12; XLVII. ii. 56, § 1; ix. 7 pr.), 340 (II. viii. 5, § 1), 353 (XLVII. ix. 10), 362 (XLI. i. 50), 393 (XLV. i. 108, § 1), 401 (XIX. v. 15), 403 (XXII. iii. 24), 404 (II. xiv. 2; XVII. i. 6, § 2; 18; 53; XIX. ii. 13; 14; 51), 405 (I. vi. 8; xviii. 14; III. iii. 2; IX. ii. 5, § 2), 407 (IV. iv. 11, §§ 3 ff.; 24, § 1; 44), 408 (II. i. 15), 410 (XVIII. i. 34; XLIV. vii. 57), 411 (XVIII. i. 9, 10, 11, 14, 41, § 1), 417 (IV. ii. 14, § 3), 418 (XLIV. iv. 8), 419 (II. xiv. 7, § 3), 420 (XVI. iii. 31, § 1), 423 (XXXIX. v. 1, § 1; 19, § 2), 424 (XXXIX. v. 1, 19; 3, § 1; L. xii. 3), 426 (XXII. iv. 1, 4, 5 bis, 7, 8, 10), 429 (II. xi. 2, §§ 3 ff.), 430 (XXIV. iii. 12; XLII. i. 6, 16-21; 49-50; iii. 4, 6, 7), 433 (XXIX. v. 1, § 28), 436 (XXVIII. vii. 15; XLV. i. 35, § 1; 123), 437 (XLV. i. 26, 27), 439 (XII. v. 4, § 3), 442 (XII. v), 445 (XXV. i. 11), 446 (XVIII. i. 7; XLIV. vii. 8; XLV. i. 17, 108, § 1), 447 (XVIII. i. 50; XLIV. vii. 1, 11, and 31), 448 (VII. viii. 8; XXVIII. vii; XLV. i. 73 pr.; 137, § 2), 449 (XV. iv), 451 (I. xviii. 17; XVII. i. 15; XL. ii. 4), 453 (L. xvii. 191), 458 (XLVII. ix. 10), 464

(XXXIII. x. 7, § 2), 486 (XLVIII. iii. 13; xxi. 1), 487 (XLVIII. xvii. 1 pr.), 493 (XII. ii. 3, § 3), 497 (XII. ii. 3, § 4; 4; 5 pr.; 13, § 6; 33), 499 (XII. ii. 5, § 1; § 3; XLIV. vii. 3, § 2), 514 (II. viii. 16), 520 (XII. ii. 1, 3; 34, §§ 6, 7, 9, 38; XXII. v. 3 and 4), 521 (XII. ii), 523 (L. i. 38), 537 (XLI. ii. 1, § 1), 539 (VIII. ii. 26), 541 (XLVII. xxi), 552 (XLI. ii. 3, § 1), 556 (I. v. 7, 26; V. iv. 3), 562 (VIII. iii. 23, § 1), 573, note 1 (XLI. i. 3; 5, § 5), 574 (X. ii. 8, § 1; XLI. i. 5, § 3; 55; XLVII. ii. 26), 576 (XLI. ii. 3, § 14), 578 (XLI. i. 55), 579 (XLI. i. 5; ii. 3, § 14), 580 (XIV. ii. 2, § 8; 8; XLI. ii. 13; 17, § 1), 581 (X. ii. 8, § 2; XLI. i. 3, § 2; 5 pr.; 44), 582 (XLI. ii. 1, § 14; 13), 583 (VI. i. 67; XLI. i. 31; ii. 3, § 3), 584 (XLI. ii. 1, § 1), 587 (VI. i. 5, § 2; 44), 588 (VI. i. 38; XLI. i. 7, § 13; 60), 589 (XLI. i. 7, §§ 10, 11, 12; 9, § 1), 590 (VI. i. 38), 592 (VI. i. 61), 593 (VI. i. 3, § 2; 5; 23, §§ 2, 3), 595 (XIX. i. 13, § 14), 596 (VI. i. 7, § 2), 599 (VI. ii; XLI. i. 48), 600 (VII. v. 1, 2, 7, 11; VIII. ii. 32, § 1), 601 (VII. i. 7, 9, 10-12, 13, §§ 4 ff., 15, 17-18, 27, 44-5, 59, 61-2, 65, 68-70), 601 (VII. iv. 21; v. 56), 602 (VII. iv. 5, §§ 2, 3; 8-10, 12, 23; 28; 30; vi. 5 pr.; viii. 2-7, 9-10, § 3; 11, 12, 15; 18; 22, § 1; VIII. ii. 26), 603 (VII. vi. 1, §§ 1, 2; VIII. i. 15; ii. 10, 20, § 2; 31; 38, 39; iii. 5), 604 (VIII. i. 8; ii. 33), 605 (VIII. iii. 3; § 1; 38), 609 (XIX. i. 3, § 2; XLI. ii. 3, § 1), 610 (XLI. ii. 1, § 21; 51), 611 (III. v. 27, 28; XXXIX. v. 28; XLI. i. 21, § 1), 612 (XVIII. i. 74; XLI. i. 9, § 5; § 6; § 7; ii. 1, § 21; 18, § 2; 51; XLVI. iii. 79), 619 (XVI. iii. 1, § 38; XXXIV. iv. 4; XLVIII. x. 1, § 5), 620 (XLI. i. 61), 627 (XLVIII. xx. 7), 628 (V. ii. 27, § 3; XXV. iii. 5, §§ 1, 5; 8), 629 (XXVIII. ii. 11), 630 (V. ii. 2, 4, 5), 634 (II. iv. 5), 635 (I. vi. 7; V. ii. 15; XXVII. i. 2, § 7; XXIX. iv. 21), 640 (XXIX. v. 12), 644 (III. vi. 5; XI. vii. 14, § 1; XVI. iii. 7, § 1; XXIX. ii. 8; XLI. iii. 3; XLIX. xiv. 11), 646 (XLI. iii. 3), 651 (XVI. iii. 31), 653 (II. xiv. 2, § 1; XIV. ii. 8;

XXII. i. 17, § 1; XLI. i. 9, § 8; 44; XLVII. ii. 43, § 11), 657 (I. ix. 7, § 1; XXXVII. ix. 7 pr.; XXXVIII. xvi. 7; L. xvi), 662 (XI. iv. 1, § 3; XII. v. 4, § 14; XIX. v. 15; XLVII. ii. 43, §§ 4 ff.; § 9), 663 (V. iii. 25, § 3; XVI. iii. 1, § 47; 2, 3, 4; XLVII. ii. 43, §§ 4 ff.), 665 (IV. ix. 1, § 7; XVI. iii. 31, § 1), 666 (XXV. ii. 25; XLVII. ii. 43, § 4), 667 (V. iii. 22; 36, § 5; 38, 39; 40; VI. i. 12, 13; 20, 50; 27, § 4; 31, 48, 65; XII. i. 32; XIII. vi. 3 pr.; XIV. iii. 10, 17, § 4; XVI. i. 7; XIX. i. 30; XX. v. 12, § 1; XXIV. i. 55; L. xvii. 206), 668 (V. iii. 25, § 8, 9; VI. i. 52; 78; XLVI. iii. 47, § 1), 669 (V. iii. 22, 25 pr. and § 1; 25, § 8; XII. i. 23; XIV. ii. 2, § 3; XVIII. i. 16; XXI. ii. 1; XLVII. ii. 48, § 7), 670 (XVIII. i. 34, § 4; L. xvii. 11), 671 (III. v. 6, § 3; VI. i. 17 pr.; XI. vii. 14, 13; XIV. ii. 1), 679 (L. xiii. 1, §§ 4-5), 685 (IX. ii. 63; XXXV. ii. 62, § 1; 63), 687 (IX. ii. 33; XXXV. ii. 63), 690 (XVIII. i. 1 pr.), 696 (XVIII. i. 1; XLVI. iii. 94, § 1), 701 (II. xiv. 17), 704 (XIX. iii. 1; v. 5), 705 (XXVI. vii. 12, § 3), 706 (XVIII. i. 20), 708 (XLVII. ii. 52, § 22; xi. 6, §§ 1, 2; XLVIII. x. 32, § 1), 709 (XVIII. i. 43, § 2; XIX. i. 1, § 1; XXI. i. 7), 712 (XIX. i. 1, § 1), 713 (XVIII. i. 43, § 1; 57, § 3; 46, 62; XXI. i. 17; 65; XXIX. v. 1, § 33; XLVIII. v. 13, §§ 9, 10; xi. 9, § 1), 714 (XVI. iii. 1, § 9; 12 pr.), 715 (XVIII. i. 13 pr., §§ 1-4; XXI. i. 1, § 2), 716 (IV. iv. 16, § 4; XIX. ii. 22, § 3), 717 (XVIII. i. 71; XXI. i. 18, 19), 718 (III. ii. 1; XVII. i. 1, § 4; XLIV. vii. 5 pr., § 1), 720 (XVII. i. 26, § 6; ii. 52, § 4), 721 (XVII. i. 62, § 1), 722 (XLIX. xvi. 3, § 15), 723 (XIII. vi. 3, § 1; 5, § 5; § 8; 17, §§ 3-4; 23; XLIV. vii. 1, § 4; XLVII. ii. 45, § 1), 724 (XIII. vi. 12, § 1; 5, § 4; 18 pr., 5, §§ 4, 7; 18, § 2; 19; 21, 22; XVI. iii. 12, § 3; 18 pr., 1, § 35), 725 (XVI. iii. 1, §§ 45, 46; XLIV. vii. 1, § 5), 727 (XVI. iii. 1, §§ 1, 2, 4; 12 pr.; § 36; XLVII. ii. 1, § 2; 67), 729 (XVIII. i. 1), 730 (XVIII. i. 19, 34, §§ 5, 6; 35, §§ 1, 5, 6-7), 732 (IV. iii. 18; XVIII. xvi;

Corpus Juris Civilis (cont.).

XXXV. ii. 30, § 4; L. xvi. 33, 83, § 7), 733 (XVIII. ii. 2), 734 (XVIII. iii. 2, 3; 5), 736 (VI. ii. 9, § 4; XIX. i. 11, §§ 1 ff.), 737 (VI. ii. 9 pr.; XVIII. i. 8, § 1; XIX. i. 11, § 40; 12; XXI. ii), 740 (XLVII. xi. 6), 741 (XIX. ii. 2; 13, § 11; 14), 742 (XIV. ii. 2, § 1; 6), 743 (XIX. ii. 9, § 4; 15, § 1; 16, § 4; 30), 744 (XIX. ii. 9, §§ 2, 3, 5; 11-13, 25, §§ 3-4, 7-8; 15, § 2; 25, § 6; 27, 30, § 4; 38, 55, §§ 1, 2; 60, § 2; 61 pr.), 745 (L. xiii. 1), 747 (XII. i. 3), 748 (XII. i. 2, § 1), 752 (XII. i. 22; XIII. iii. 4; iv. 3), 758 (VII. v. 1 and 2), 760 (XX. ii. 8; XXII. i. 17, § 3), 763 (XVII. ii. 29; 52, §§ 3-4; 60, § 1; 83), 764 (XVII. ii. 29, § 1; § 2; 70), 765 (XVII. ii. 65, §§ 3 ff.), 769 (XI. v), 771 (II. xiv. 7, § 5), 772 (II. xiv. 7, § 5; § 6; 58; XVI. iii. 1, § 6; 24; 26, § 1; §§ 7, 35; § 8; XVII. ii. 5, § 1; XVIII. i. 7, § 1; 72; 79; 80, § 3; v. 2, 3; XIX. i. 11, § 1; v. 4 and 6), 773 (II. xiv. 2, 13; 7, § 5; XIII. v. 3, § 2; XVIII. i. 72; ii; iii; XIX. i. 6, § 1), 776 (II. xi. 6; xiv. 32; III. iii. 51; XIV. vi. 9, § 3; XVI. ii. 4, 5), 781 (XX. i. 6, 7), 782 (V. iii. 3), 783 (III. v. 43, 48; XLVI. iii. 99), 784 (XVI. ii. 1; XLVI. iii. 1, 3, 4-5, 7-8; 89, § 2; 97; 105), 785 (XVI. ii. 2, 3; 23), 786 (XVI. ii. 7), 787 (II. xiv. 2), 788 (II. xiv. 58; XVIII. v. 2, 3), 790 (XIX. ii. 13, § 11; 14), 791 (XLVII. x. 1, §§ 4, 6; 27), 796 (III. ii. 2, § 1), 798 (I. iv. 4 pr.), 800 (XIX. ii. 15, § 4; XXXIX. ii. 43; iv. 15), 802 (I. iii. 19), 803 (XLV. i. 94; 115), 805 (I. iii. 12), 806 (XLI. xvi. 3, § 8), 807 (XIX. ii. 29; XLIII. xvi. 3, § 5; L. vi. 4), 811 (IX. ii. 7, § 7), 812 (I. iii. 29, 30; V. ii. 28; X. iv. 19; XXXV. i. 76; XLVIII. v. 33, § 1), 813 (XIV. vi. 3, § 3; 7, § 3; XVI. i. 8, § 14; XXIV. i. 5; § 5), 814 (XLIV. vii. 54), 816 (XXXVII. xiv. 6, § 2), 817 (XLVII. ii. 61, § 5), 818 (I. iii. 3, 4, 5-6, 10-13; XL. ix. 12, § 1), 827 (II. i. 10), 828 (IV. viii. 19, 32, §§ 15-16), 829 (XVII. ii. 76 ff.), 834 (XXII. v. 2, 3, §§ 1-4; 4-5, 9, 14, 21, 23-4; XLVIII. xviii. 20), 835 (IV. ii. 13; XLI. ii. 5; XLVII. viii.

2, § 18; XLVIII. vii. 7, 8), 848 (IX. ii. 27, § 28), 851 (XXIII. ii. 19), 852 (I. xvi. 4, § 2), 858 (XLVIII. v. 29, 2, § 6), 861 (XXIV. i. 1-3 pr.), 863 (XXXV. i. 15), 870 (XLV. i. 121, § 1), 871 (XLVIII. v. 13, § 5), 872 (XLVIII. v. 6, § 1), 875 (XVII. ii. 14), 878 (XLVIII. v. 13, § 7; 39 pr.), 879 (XI. iii. 1, § 3), 891 (XXXVIII. x. 4, §§ 3-5), 899 (XXIII. ii. 55), 901 (XXIII. ii. 8, 14, §§ 2-3; XXXVIII. viii. 2, § 1; L. xvii. 32), 905 (XXIII. ii. 54; XXV. vii. 1, § 3; XXXVIII. x. 4, § 8), 906 (XII. vii. 5, § 1; XXIII. ii. 12, §§ 1-3; 15, 39), 909 (XXXII. xlix. § 4), 915 (III. v. 2; XLI. i. 7, § 13), 918 (XXV. iii. 4; XLVII. xi. 4; XLVIII. viii. 8; xix. 38, § 5), 924 (XLVIII. ix. 5), 926 (XLVIII. ii. 11, § 1), 928 (XXXVI. i. 13, § 5; 14 pr.), 932 (XXIII. i. 12, § 1; ii. 21, 22, 25), 933 (XXIII. ii. 2; XLVIII. v. 7), 939 (XLVII. ii. 60), 941 (I. vi. 1, § 2; 2), 942 (I. v. 24; XXIX. v), 984 (I. viii. 6, § 1; II. iv. 10, § 4; III. iv. 7, § 1; XLVIII. xviii. 1, § 7), 988 (II. xiv. 7, § 19; 8; L. i. 19), 990 (III. iv. 3-4; IV. viii. 17, § 6; VIII. iii. 11; X. iii. 28; L. ii. 45), 991 (IV. viii. 27; XLII. i. 38, § 1; 39), 993 (II. iv. 8; III. iv. 7, § 2; XVI. iii. 14; XXVI. vii. 14; XLII. v. 16; XLVI. iii. 101; L. xvi. 85; 173), 994 (III. iv. 3; L. ii. 45), 1004 (XLI. i. 46), 1048 (XLIX. xv. 7, § 2), 1058 (XXVIII. iii. 6, § 5; XL. xiii. 4; xii. 7, § 3; 33; 37), 1067 (I. i. 11), 1079 (IV. iv. 18; XXII. xxv), 1081 (IX. ii. 33; L. xvii. 126, § 1), 1082 (VII. i. 13, § 8; 15, § 1), 1137 (XI. v. 1), 1141 (III. ii. 1), 1146 (IX. ii. 37; iv. 2, § 1), 1149 (XLIX. xvi. 4, § 10), 1151 (XLIX. xvi. 4, § 12), 1155 (III. i. 1, § 6), 1159 (XLI. i. 46), 1162 (XLVIII. xix. §§ 8, 9), 1164 (III. ii. 22), 1165 (XLVIII. xviii. 1, § 23; 18, § 2), 1168 (XLIX. xiv. 34), 1175 (XVIII. vii. 7), 1177 (XLVII. x. 7, § 3), 1184 (XLVIII. xix. 18), 1191 (XL. ix. 12, § 1; XLIX. viii. 1, § 2), 1199 (XLVII. x. 7, § 8; 9, § 1; 17, § 3 bis), 1200 (XLVIII. xiii. 6; xix. 16; 28, § 8), 1202 (XLVII. xvi. 2;

- XLVIII. xix. 28, § 3), 1203 (L. xvii. 138, § 1), 1206 (XLVII. xi. 1, § 2), 1207 (XLVIII. viii. 1, § 3; 3, §§ 1-3; 14), 1208 (XLVII. ii. 17, 36, § 1; 52, 89; xvii. 1; xviii. 2; XLVIII. xix. 11, § 1), 1209 (XLVIII. xix. 16, 10), 1210 (XLVII. ix. 4, § 1; 12, § 1; x. 45; xi. 6; xii. 11; xiv. 1, § 3; xvii. 1; xviii. 1, §§ 1-2; xx. 3, § 2; xxi. 2; XLVIII. viii. 1, § 5; 3, § 5; 16; xix. 1, 10, 16, § 3; 28, § 16), 1211 (IV. iv. 37, § 1; XLVIII. v. 38, § 24; 39, § 4; viii. 1, § 5; xiii. 6; xix. 28, § 2; L. xvii. 108), 1218 (XLVIII. viii. 1), 1223 (XXXV. ii. 63; XXXIX. ii. 24, § 12; 26; XLVIII. xxii. 3), 1225 (XLVIII. xix. 26), 1226 (XXIX. v), 1227 (I. v. 5, § 2; 18; XLVIII. xix. 3), 1228 (XLVII. i. 2; XLVIII. xix. 20), 1233 (XVI. iii. 31, § 1), 1234 (XI. v. 1; XLVIII. v. 6), 1235 (III. i. 1, § 6; ii. 1), 1236 (III. ii. 20; XXXVII. xv. 2; L. xiii. 5, §§ 1-3), 1237 (III. ii. 5), 1244 (I. ix. 1; L. vi. 5), 1245 (I. ix. 8), 1256 (L. iii. 1), 1258 (I. xiv. 3), 1278 (XI. v), 1281 (XXIV. i. 5, § 13; XXXIX. iv. 16, § 7), 1282 (XXXIX. iv. 12), 1286 (XVIII. iii. 8), 1299 (IV. ii. 11-13; XLIII. xxiv. 7, § 3; L. xvii. 176), 1300 (XLIX. xv. 19, § 2; 21, § 1; 24; L. xvi. 118), 1301 (XLVIII. iv. 3), 1304 (XLVII. vi. 1, § 1), 1325 (IX. ii. 7, § 4; XLVII. x. 3, § 3), 1326 (XIV. ii; XVII. ii. 52, § 4), 1330 (II. xiv. 50), 1333 (XLIX. xv. 7), 1335 (L. xvii. 19), 1337 (II. xiv. 7, § 8), 1346 (XII. i. 27), 1347 (XLIII. viii. 1, §§ 10, 16), 1349 (XLIX. xv. 12, § 9), 1353 (XLI. i. 51), 1358 (L. vii. 17) 1359 (XLIX. xv. 4), 1364 (VI. i. 23, § 5; XLI. iii. 30), 1365 (V. i. 76 bis; VII. iv. 10; XLV. i. 83, § 5; XLVI. iii. 98, § 8), 1366 (III. iv. 7, § 2; VII. iv. 21; 31);
- Institutes*, 84 (IV. i. 11), 324 (IV. iii. 5 ff.), 343 (I. v), 442 (III. xix. § 3), 444 (III. xv. § 6), 573 (II. i. § 15; § 16), 574 (II. i. § 14), 635 (III. iii), 706 (III. xxiv. 4), 714 (III. xxvi. 13), 727 (IV. i. § 6), 772 (III. xiv. § 2; xxv. § 1, 2), 774 (II. xxiii. pr.; III. ii, § 8), 915 (II. i. §§ 31-2), 923 (I. ix. § 2), 1058 (I. iii. § 4), 1216 (IV. iv. § 7);
- Novels*, 329 (xxii. 20), 848 (cxlii), 1214 (cxxxiv);
- Twelve Tables*, 290 (VIII. xii Bruns), 291 (VIII. xiii Bruns), 588 (general reference), 641 (V. iii Bruns), 1216 (VIII. ii Bruns).
- Costalius, Petrus (Pierre Coustav; French jurist; 16th century).
- On the Digest (Adversarium ex Pandectis, &c., Leyden, 1554)*, 451 (III. iii. 65).
- Covarruvias y Leyva, Diego de (Spanish canonist; 1512-77).
- Peccatum* (Salamanca, 1554), 306 (II, § 1, n. 3).
- Creuxius or Ducreux, François (French Jesuit; 1596-1666).
- Historia Canadensis* (Paris, 1664), 1100 (I).
- Cujas, Jacques (French jurist; 1522-90).
- Observations* (Paris, 1566), 291 (XIV. xv bis), 574 (IV. ii), 652 (XLI. iii. 1), 740 (X. xix), 993 (XII. xvi), 1214 (VII. xiii), 1353 (IV. ix), 1364 (XV. xxxiii; XXVI);
- On Paulus* (Paris, 1558), 774 (II. xiii).
- Cumberland, Richard (Bishop of Peterborough; 1632-1718).
- De Legibus Naturae* (London, 1672), 25 (iii. 4, n. 4), 27 (iv. 4. 1), 28 (v. 9), 36 (viii. 14), 39 (ii. 9), 40 (ii. 10), 56 (i. 20; iii), 61 (ii. 26, 27), 90 (v. 27), 104 (prolegomena, § 14; v. 40), 125 (viii. 6), 147 (vii. 6), 149 (ii. 4; ii. 33), 152 (ii. 28), 170 (ii. 18), 171 (ii. 29), 173 (general reference), 185 (v. 9), 186 (v. 13; prolegomena, § 6), 196 (ii. 29, n. 2), 202 (prolegomena, §§ 5-8), 202 (iv. 3), 203 (v. 1), 207 (i. 14, 18), 210 (i. 4), 212 (v), 219 (i. 11; v. 1), 220 (i. 10), 224 (v. 25; general reference), 292 (v. 26), 332 (ii. 7), 843 (v. 46), 851 (vi. 9), 892 (vii. 9), 902 (viii. 9), 953 (ii. 2), 971 (ii. 22), 1139 (v. 5), 1210 (v. 39), 1296 (ii. 15).
- Curopolatas, Georgius Codinus (Byzantine historian; †1434).
- De Officialibus Palatii Constantinopolitani*, 664 (v. p. 61c).
- Curtius Rufus, Quintus (Roman historian; 1st century Christian Era).
- Histories*, 171 (VII. viii. 27), 262 (IV. xvii), 285 (IX. vi. 8), 300 (IV. xvi. 9),

Curtius Rufus (cont.).

305 (VII. i. 33), 338 (VII. vi), 405 (VII. iv. 1), 493 (VII. viii. 29), 514 (VII. vii), 682 (VIII. ix. 19), 775 (V. ix), 802 (IV. xi. 19), 854 (VI. v), 905 (VIII. ii), 919 (IX. i. 25), 965 (VIII. i), 1018 (VII. ii), 1080 (V. ix. 45), 1153 (VII. ii), 1177 (IV. xii. 16), 1208 (IV. vi. 5 f.), 1226 (VII. xi; VIII. vi), 1249 (VII. viii. 16), 1286 (III. iv).

Davila, Enrico Caterino (Italian historian; 1576-1631).

De Bello Civili Franciae (Venice, 1630), 294 (XV, p. 1027), 1123 (XIV, p. 969).

Delrio, Martin (Spanish scholar; 1551-1608).

Commentary on Seneca (ed. Antwerp, 1576), 899, note 3 (Thebaid, 134);

Essay on Magic (Disquisitionum Magicarum Libri Sex, Louvain, 1599-60), 769 (IV. iv).

Demosthenes (Athenian statesman and orator; 384-322 B.C.).

Against Aristocrates, 182 (general reference), 286 (56), 289 (60), 1148 (54-5), 1165 (68);

Against Eubulides, 904 (20);

Against Euergus, 835 (1 ff.);

Against Leptines, 641 (102), 1347 (98), 1361 (12);

Against Meidias, 108, note 1 (224), 1200 (74);

Against Neaera, 856 (122), 858 (52);

Against Timocrates, 290 (180), 1214 (114), 1217 (139 ff.);

De Falsa Legatione, 493 (71);

Olynthiacs, 197 (II. 10);

Philippics, 275 (III. 17).

Descartes, René (French philosopher; 1596-1650).

Les Passions (Paris, 1649), 31 (205), 32 (207), 46 (170, 177), 60 (general reference; 50), 71 (144-6), 206 (82; 83), 339 (152), 376 (194), 841 (90), 858 (169);

Principia Philosophiae (Amsterdam, 1644), 183 (general reference).

Deuteronomy, see Bible.

Dictys Cretensis (Greek epic poet; 4th century Christian Era).

Ephemeris Belli Troiani, 354 (II. ii), 515 (V. x), 635 (III. xxvi), 1293 (II. xxi).

Didymus (Greek grammarian; born 63 B.C.).

On Homer, 498 (Iliad I. 234), 495 (Iliad VI. 236).

Digby, Sir Kenelm (English author and diplomat; 1603-65).

De Origine Mundi (Institutionum Peripateticarum . . . Appendix Theologica de Origine Mundi, Leyden, 1646), 952 (ix. §§ 8 ff.).

Digest, see Corpus Iuris Civilis.

Dinarchus (Greek orator; 4th and 3rd centuries B.C.).

Against Aristogeiton, 351 (II. ix).

Dio Cassius Cocceianus (Greek historian; born 155 A.D.).

Roman History, 103 (LIX), 174 (LIV. xxii), 616 (LIX. i), 619 (L), 631 (LVI), 714 (XLII. i), 794 (LVII. xvii), 809 (LVI), 814 (LV), 848 (LVI), 941 (LX. xxix. 7), 1080 (LIII), 1093 (XXXVI. liii), 1120 (LII), 1125 (LII. xxxv), 1145 (XLIII. ix), 1188 (LII), 1282 (XLII), 1286 (XLII. li).

Dio Chrysostom (Greek rhetorician; born ca. 50 A.D.).

Orations, 178 (i. 27, p. 6c), 201 (x. 28, p. 110c), 214 (xii), 221 (xii), 407 (lxxiv. 638m), 528 (lxiv, p. 592), 571 (xxxi. 47), 842 (De pulchritudine, xxi. 3), 939 (lxv. 21 ff.), 945 (xiv), 984 (xxxvi. 20), 989 (xi. 145), 1065 (lxii. 3), 1198 (i. 43), 1211 (xxxii. 49), 1263 (lxv. 4), 1271 (xi), 1282 (lxxix. 5);

Rhodian Oration, 183 (p. 340, ed. Morelli), 1273 (general reference).

Diodorus Siculus (Greek historian; 1st century B.C.).

Historical Library, 83 (I. lxxvii), 107 (XII. xx; xxi), 111 (XIII. c), 111, note 2 (general reference), 137 (X. xii), 156 (I. viii; I. xliii), 173 (III. xlix), 198 (XXV. i), 206 (III. vii), 221 (XII. xxi), 252 (I. xlix), 253 (I. xlv), 255 (I. lxxiv; XII. xli), 263 (II. lvii; III. xxxiii), 298 (III. xl), 332 (XIII. xxx), 348 (I. lxxvii), 349 (I. xlii-xv; I. xliii), 363 (II. xlii), 365 (I. lxxvii), 372 (XIV. cvii), 411 (II. xxviii), 415 (XIV. xxv), 460 (I. viii), 488 (I. lxxvi), 491 (I. lxxvii), 493 (X. ix. 2), 514 (IV. lxxv; XI. lviii), 520 (I. lxxix), 526 (I. lxxix),

- 528 (III. xxxii), 542 (I. viii), 557 (XII. xv), 571 (V. ix; V. xxiv; V. xlv), 616 (II. xxxii), 623 (XV. xix), 685 (V. xxix; xvii; xxvi), 693 (III. xlv), 738 (V. x), 745 (I. lxxxii), 756 (XIX. xxiv), 762 (I. lxxix), 775 (IV. xxxii), 778 (X. iv), 780 (I. xciii), 781 (I. lxxix), 791 (I. xcii-xciii), 805 (XV. ix), 827 (I. xcv), 850 (XII. xii), 854 (II. xlv; III. liii and lv), 855 (I. xxvii), 864 (II. lviii), 865 (III. xv; III. xxiv; III. xxxii), 877 (XII. xviii), 889 (V. xviii), 892 (XII. xviii), 893 (I. lxxxviii; XIV. xxxi), 904 (I. xxvii), 916 (I. lxxx), 918 (I. lxxvii; II. lviii), 919 (I. lxxx), 924 (IV. xlv), 937 (I. lv), 1009 (XX. liv-lv), 1018 (XIV. lxxiii), 1035 (III. vi), 1051 (XV. xxviii; XVI. lxi), 1056 (I. lxxii), 1065 (XII. xvii), 1071 (III. xlvii), 1073 (I. lxxi), 1080 (IV. xxxii, xxxiii), 1103 (I. xc), 1112 (II. xviii), 1118 (I. lxxi; XII. xii), 1123 (I. lxxv-lxxvi), 1125 (I. lvii), 1126 (I. xxi), 1143 (XXVI. xiv. 2), 1149 (I. lxxiii), 1153 (XIV. lxxiii; XIX. xlviii), 1157 (XX. lv), 1159 (III. v), 1183 (V. xlv), 1191 (XV. xi), 1192 (XII. xix), 1193 (XIII. xxxiii), 1205 (I. lx; I. lxxv), 1207 (XI. liv), 1214 (I. lxxv), 1216 (I. lxxvii; XII. xvii), 1227 (I. lxxvii), 1228 (XVII. xci; XIX. xxxiii), 1231 (I. lxxx), 1236 (I. lxxviii), 1239 (V. xxviii), 1244 (XIX. xxxiv), 1262 (I. lxxiv), 1268 (V. xxx), 1270 (I. xcii), 1275 (I. xxi, lxxii; II. xl), 1281 (I. lxxii), 1283 (IV. lxxiii), 1299 (XIV. xlvii), 1319 (XII. lx), 1327 (IV. lx), 1328 (IV. lv), 1330 (XII. iv), 1349 (I. lxxvii), 1357 (III. v).
- Diogenes Laertius (Greek biographer; fl. 225 A.D.).
- De Clarorum Philosophorum Vitis* . . . 78 (X. 120), 79 (II. 95), 124 (X. 50-1), 131 (VII. 120), 180 (IX. 57), 191 (Prologue I. 6), 192 (IX. 23-4), 195 (II. 93; IX. 61), 204 (V. 21), 205 (VII. 85), 234 (VII. 23), 244 (II. 25), 248 (V. 18), 252 (II. 80; X. 87), 350 (V. 17 and 21), 352 (VIII. 23), 406 (I. 57), 460 (X. 76), 524 (VI. 37), 527 (VIII. 13), 534 (V. 53), 557 (I. 56), 582 (I. 57), 629 (VI. 88), 664 (VI. 54), 717 (I. 105), 740 (I. 26), 746 (II. 62), 777 (I. 73), 815 (IX. 56), 827 (I. 87), 866 (VII. 131), 869 (II. 26), 878 (VIII. 21), 889 (II. 74), 894 (VI), 895 (III. 86), 905 (Preface), 929 (V. 19), 966 (II. 68), 982 (X. 125), 1260 (VI. viii), 1272 (I. 59), 1349 (IV. 60), 1358 (VI. 49);
- Democritus*, 348 (IX. 39);
- Heracitus*, 1036 (IX. 2);
- Solon*, 658 (I. 53), 1218 (I. lvii), 1272 (I. 59), 1306 (I. 59);
- Thales*, 737 (II. 28);
- Theophrastus*, 1015 (V. 38).
- Diomedes (Latin grammarian; 4th century Christian Era).
- Ars Grammatica*, 463 (II).
- Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Greek historian; ca. 70-7 B.C.).
- Roman Antiquities*, 74 (I. lviii), 88 (X. iv), 98 (I. v), 177 (VI. lxxxvii), 336 (VII. xli), 367 (I. lvi ff.), 371 (II. xxx), 372 (II. xxx), 381 (II. lxxv), 422 (VIII. xxxvii), 430 (V. lxxvi), 506 (XI. xi), 544 (I. x), 853 (VI. i), 876 (II. xxv), 919 (I. xvi), 922 (II. xxvii), 923 (II. xxvi-xxvii), 976 (II), 977 (IV), 1091 (II), 1102 (I. lxx), 1180 (I. lxxxii), 1227 (VIII. lxxx), 1266 (II. viii), 1270 (III. xi), 1283 (IV. ix), 1287 (III. i), 1319 (II. lv), 1327 (III. xii), 1333 (VIII. xv), 1354 (VIII), 1356 (I. bis; II), 1365 (I. i).
- Diphilus (Athenian comic poet; fl. 300 B.C.).
- Comedies*, 353 (fragment 62 Kock).
- Donatus, Aelius (Latin grammarian; born ca. 333 A.D.).
- Vergilii Vita*, 616 (p. 33, ll. 10-14, Diehl).
- Drepanius (Latin rhetorician; 4th century Christian Era).
- Panegyric*, 1034 (xxvii. 1), 1124 (xxvii. 1).
- Ducas, Michael (Byzantine historian; 15th century).
- Historia Byzantina*, 499 (xxiii).
- Ecclesiastes*, see Bible.
- Ecclesiasticus*, see Bible.
- Ennius, Quintus (Roman poet; 239-169 B.C.).
- Medea*, 911 (fragment 222 Ribbeck).
- Ephesians*, see Bible.
- Epictetus (Greek philosopher; born ca. 50 A.D.).

Epictetus (cont.).

- Discourses*, 177, note 1 (III. xiii. 4), 1248, note 1 (III. xiv. 12);
Enchiridion, 45 (xxxv-xxxvi. 2), 205 (xxxviii. 2), 320 (xxxix), 416 (xxxv), 493 (xliv), 843 (xlvii), 844 (xlvii). See also Arrian.
 Erasmus, Desiderius (Dutch scholar; 1467-1536).
Letters (Basel, 1529), 249 (XVII. xii), 349 (To Servatius), 1302 (VI. xxix).
 Erythraeus, Janus Nicius, see Rossi, Giovanni Vittorio.
 Espagne, Jean d' (French theologian; 1591-1659).
Les Erreurs Populaires (The Hague, 1639), 383 (I. vi).
 Estienne (Stephanus), Henri (French classical scholar; 1531-98).
Anthology (Epigrammata Graeca, Selecta ex Anthologia, Geneva, 1570), 579 (IX. 133);
Apology for Herodotus (Geneva, 1566), 75 (xv), 93 (xl), 510 (xvi), 761 (i. 6), 1194 (xviii), 1208 (xvii).
 Eumenius (Roman rhetorician; fl. 290 A.D.).
Panegyric, 244 (xv).
 Euripides (Athenian tragic poet; 480-406 B.C.).
Alcestis, 206 (653-705), 623 (1020 ff.), 912 (666 ff.);
Andromacha, 874 (464 ff.), 881 (672 ff.), 891 (675-6), 904 (173 f.), 931 (987-8), 1043 (471 ff.);
Bacchanals, 194 (201 ff.);
Children of Hercules, 381 (890-1), 1356 (185);
Cyclops, 157 (120), 708 (137);
Electra, 244 (80-1), 874 (1035 ff.), 891 (921 ff.), 1248 (37-8), 1271 (551);
Hecuba, 186 (800), 512 (850 ff.), 895 (568), 929 (600), 1174 (1250-1);
Helena, 177 (1617-18), 235 (757), 661 (903 ff.), 1059 (286), 1211 (299 ff.), 1240 (1000-1), 1295 (39-40);
Hippolytus, 75 (1334-5), 247 (253 ff.), 472 (925 ff.), 513 (612), 514 (1315), 746 (921-2), 841 (616 ff.), 858 (465 f.), 884 (640-1), 1206 (1047), 1262 (409-10);
Ion, 221 (1621 ff.), 237 (449 ff.), 921 (1535-6);

- Iphigenia among the Taurians*, 851 (57), 1335 (605-7); Iphigenia in Aulis, 340 (337 ff.), 343 (1400-1), 402 (1142);
Medea, 366 (222), 823 (743-4), 841 (1090 ff.), 860 (230 ff.), 898 (471), 907 (76), 911 (250-1), 949 (85-6);
Orestes, 287 (820), 351 (46, 513), 638 (805-6), 880 (602 ff.), 911 (552 ff.), 1180 (515);
Phoenician Maidens, 332 (535-8), 480 (998), 488 (471 ff.), 532 (558), 955 (499 ff.), 1080 (general reference), 1248 (442), 1264 (814 ff.);
Rhesus, 139 (162-3), 1122 (626);
The Suppliants, 156 (202 ff.), 232 (1080 ff.), 288 (775 ff.), 871 (40-1), 985 (1188 ff.), 1053 (405 ff.), 1061 (879-80), 1306 (267-9).
 Eusebius (Bishop of Caesarea; 264-ca. 349).
De Praeparatione Evangelica, 191 (I. iii; X. 2750 ff.), 848 (VI. viii. 10, p. 2790);
Ecclesiastical History, 262 (VIII. xxiv, xxvii), 497 (IV. xiv).
 Eustratius (commentator on Aristotle, 12th century).
In Ethica Nicomachea Commentaria, 57 (III. xiii), 60 (III. viii), 64 (III. i), 79 (I. ix).
 Eutropius (Latin historian; 4th century Christian Era).
Breviarium Historiae Romanae ab Urbe Condita, 1322 (III. vi. 2).
 Evagrius (Greek ecclesiastical historian; 6th century Christian Era).
Ecclesiastical History, 109 (III. xxxix), 1126 (IV. xxxi).
 Everard, Nicholas (Dutch jurist; 1461-1532).
Topica Iuris sive Loci Argumentorum Legales (Louvain, 1516), 801 (xl), 802 (viii).
Excerpta Peiresciana, or de Virtutibus et Vitiis or Valesiana (Selections on Virtues and Vices), a collection of selections from various writers compiled under the direction of Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus, and first published from a manuscript of Peiresc by Henri de Valois (1634), see Polybius.
Exodus, see Bible.
Ezekiel, see Bible.

- Faber, Peter, see Faur, Pierre du.
 Faur, Pierre du (French classical scholar; 1530-1615).
Semestria (Leyden, 1570-95), 1235 (II. vi).
 Felden, Joannes à, see Graswinckel, Dirk.
 Festus, Sextus Pompeius (Latin grammarian; 3rd century Christian Era).
De Verborum Significatu, 848 (uxorium), 1356 (ver sacrum, Mamertini).
 Ficino, Marsiglio (Italian philosopher; 1433-99).
On Plato (Commentaria in Platonem, Venice, 1496), 79 (IX, preface), 864 (V, preface).
 Florus, P. Annius (Roman historian; 2nd century Christian Era).
Epitome Rerum Romanarum, 171 (IV. x), 263 (IV. vii), 270 (III. ii), 300 (II. xviii), 355 (II. xviii), 367 (III. iii), 797 (I. xi), 908 (IV. ii), 1152 (II. ii), 1303 (II. xi), 1305 (I. vii).
 Froissart, Jean (French chronicler; 1337-1410).
Chroniques (Paris, before 1506), 1288 (IV).
 Frontinus, Sextus Julius (Roman antiquary; ca. 40-106 A.D.).
De Re Agraria, 541 (p. 277, ed. Keuchan); Stratagemis, 481 (I. xi; II. vii).
 Fulgentius (Latin grammarian; 5th and 6th centuries Christian Era).
Mythology, 236 (I. xviii), 717 (I. xviii), 880 (I. xxvii), 1247 (I. lv-lvii).
 Gabriel Barthélemy, Seigneur de Gramond (French historian; 1590-1654).
Historiarum Galliae (Toulouse, 1643), 337 (VIII), 443 (V), 447 (XVI, p. 708), 448 (XVI), 497 (V), 522 (XVI), 664 (XVI), 756 (V), 1074 (V, p. 277 ff.), 1120 (III), 1145 (XVI), 1200 (XIII), 1255 (III), 1256 (III), 1326 (II), 1343 (II).
 Gaius (Roman jurist; fl. 138-161 A.D.).
Institutes, 573 (II. i. 12), 774 (VI), 1266 (general reference).
Galatians, see Bible.
 Gassendi, Pierre (French philosopher; 1592-1655).
Syntagma Philosophiae Epicuri (The Hague, 1659), 125 (III. xxvi-xxviii), 197 (III. xxiv-xxv), 530 (III. xxvii).
 Gellius, Aulus (Latin grammarian; 2nd century Christian Era).
Attic Nights, 85 (I. iii; II. xviii), 245 (X. xvii), 252 (XIII. viii), 254 (XIX. x), 271 (IV. xiv), 290 (XI. xviii), 291 (XX. i. 8), 376 (I. iv), 430 (XX. i), 464 (X. iv), 466 (I. x), 484 (I. xxiii; XII. xii), 509 (VII. xviii), 631 (VII. xiii; XVII. vi), 638 (V. xiii), 647, note 1 (XVII. vii), 709 (IV. ii), 716 (XII. xii), 720 (I. xiii), 723 (VII. xv), 726 (VI. xv), 799, note 1 (IX. xvi), 815 (V. x), 816 (IX. xvi), 827 (I. iii), 848 (I. vi), 857 (III. xvi), 860 (X. xxiii), 869 (XV. ii), 876 (IV. iv), 879 (IV. iii), 916 (XII. i), 921 (V. xix), 927 (II. vii), 928 (II. ii), 992 (IX. xv), 1202 (X. xix), 1209 (IV. viii), 1210 (XX. i), 1216 (XX. i), 1279 (IV. xii), 1296 (VI. iii. 31-2), 1334 (II. xxix).
Genesis, see Bible.
 Gentili, Alberico (Italian jurist; 1552-1608).
De Iure Belli (Hanau, 1598), 274 (I. xiv), 659 (I. xxii), 797 (III. xx; III. xxi), 801 (III. xx);
Pleas of a Spanish Advocate (Hispanicae Advocacionis Libri Duo, Hanau, 1613), 275 (I. ix), 565 (I. viii, xiv), 579 (I. iv).
 Gentius, Georg (German orientalist; 1618-87).
Edition of Sadi (Amsterdam, 1651), 695 (iii).
 Germanicus, Claudius Caesar (Roman statesman; 14 B.C. to 19 A.D.).
Aratea, 528 (136).
 Glycas, Michael (Byzantine historian; 12th century).
Annals, 322 (IV, p. 587 ed. Bonn), 450 (IV), 604 (IV), 616 (IV), 854 (II. p. 270, ed. Bonn).
 Godefroy, Denis (French jurist; 1549-1622).
Edition of Cicero's Letters to Friends (Leyden, 1588), 1267 (VII. xxix);
On the Code (Opuscula Juris Varia, Novellarum Titulorum in Codice, sine loco 1586), 871 (I. ix. 7);
On the Digest (in above work), 848 (XLVIII. viii. 4, § 2);
On the Institutes (in above work), 573 (II. i, § 15);

Godefroy, Denis (cont.).

On the Novels (in above work), 848 (cxlii).

Godefroy, Jacques (French jurist; 1587-1652).

De Imperio Maris (Geneva, 1637), 664 (xi);

De Praecedentia (Geneva, 1627), 1244 (I. v, § 35), 1251 (I. i), 1253 (I. iii), 1255 (III), 1256 (II. iii, §§ 17-18);

Dissertatio de Aequalitate et Functione in Mutuo (Sine loco 1645), 747 (general reference);

Dissertatio de Mutatione et Augmento Monetae Aureae (published with the above work), 698 (general reference);

On Tacitus (?), 848 (III);

On the Code (Geneva, 1652), 1219 (IX. viii, 5, §§ 9-10);

On the Digest (same as above), 109 (L. xlii, 144), 323 (IX. ii, 10), 579 (XLI. i, 5), 719 (L. xvii, 23), 1081 (L. xvii, 126);

On the Twelve Tables (Heidelberg, 1616), 290 (general reference).

Gomara, Francisco Lopez de (Spanish historian; 1511-57).

Historia Generalis Indiae Occidentalis (Historia general de las Indias, Antwerp, 1552), 698 (cxvii), 967 (xliv and lxxv), 1073 (xcv), 1100 (xii, xxviii).

Gramondus, see Gabriel Barthélemy, Seigneur de Gramond.

Graswinckel, Dirk (pseudonym Joannes à Felden; Dutch jurist; 1600-66).

On Grotius (Amsterdam, 1654), 94 (II. xiii, § 1), 123 (I. i, § 8), 226 (II. ii, § 20; II. viii, § 1), 535 (II. ii, § 2), 557 (I. iii, § 6), 587 (II. viii, § 18), 841 (I. i, § 11).

Gratianus, see Corpus Juris Canonici.

Graziani, Antonio Maria (Italian historian; 1537-1611).

De Bello Cyprio (Rome, 1624), 1299 (V).

Grégoire, Pierre (French jurist; 1540-1616?).

Syntagma Iuris Universi (Lyon, 1582), 694 (XXXVI. ii), 774 (XXIII. v, § 2), 1217 (XXXI. x).

Gregoras Nicephorus (Byzantine historian; ca. 1295-ca. 1360).

Byzantina Historia, 361 (IV), 629 (V), 1080 (IV), 1281 (VI).

Gregorius Tholosanus, see Grégoire, Pierre.
Gregory Nazianzen (Greek Church Father; ca. 329-ca. 389).

De Vita Sua, 376 (ii, 16, ed. Colon 1690).

Groenewegen van der Made, Simon von (Dutch jurist; 1613-52).

De Legibus Abrogatis (Leyden, 1649), 293 (IX. ii, 4), 508 (II. xxvii, 1).

Grotius, Hugo (Dutch jurist; 1583-1645).
Apologeticus (Paris, 1622), 1051 (i);

De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra Commentarius Posthumus (Paris, 1647), 1018 (i), 1120 (i, n. 13), 1131 (iii, n. 3, 4, and 11; iv, n. 1), 1184 (iii, n. 1);

De Iure Belli ac Pacis (Paris, 1625), preface (general reference), 30 (I. i, §§ 10-12), 33 (I. i, § 10; ii, § 6), 34 (II. xxiii, § 1), 44 (II. xxiv, § 5), 45 (II. xxiii, § 2), 69 (III. i, § 4; ii, § 9), 74 (II. xx, § 19), 77 (III. ii, § 4), 86 (II. xvii, §§ 6 ff.; xxi, §§ 1 ff.), 90 (I. i, § 9; ii, § 6), 114 (III. iv, § 2; x, § 2), 120 (I. i, § 8), 126 (II. xvii, § 2), 174 (II. xv, § 5), 180 (Prolegomena, I), 183 (I. i, § 10), 187 (I. i, § 10), 195 (Prolegomena, I), 225 (I. i, § 10), 229 (II. iv, § 5 bis), 260 (II. xix, § 5), 265 (I. ii; iii, § 3), 268 (I. ii, § 8), 271 (II. i, § 3), 275 (II. i, § 5), 280 (II. i, § 10), 281-2 (II. i, § 10), 283 (II. ii, § 8; iii, § 3), 289 (II. i, § 11), 292 (II. i, § 12), 294 (II. i, § 18), 303 (II. ii, § 6), 308 (II. ii, § 10), 315 (II. xvii, § 3), 319 (II. xvii, § 11), 321 (II. xxvii, § 21), 322 (II. xxvii, § 21), 329 (II. xvii, § 16), 342 (II. xxii, § 11), 352 (II. ii, § 12), 354 (II. ii, § 13 bis), 358 (II. ii, § 13), 361 (II. ii, § 15), 365 (II. ii, § 19), 366 (II. ii, §§ 16-17), 368 (II. ii, §§ 18-19), 370 (II. ii, § 20), 372 (II. ii, § 22), 384 (II. xxiv, § 6), 393 (II. xi, § 2), 395 (II. xi, §§ 3-4), 396 (II. xi, § 1), 403 (II. xxiv, 420 (III. xix, § 3), 421 (II. xi, § 7), 423 (II. xi, § 20), 424 (II. xi, § 14; xvi, § 32), 425 (II. xi, § 15), 437 (II. xi, § 9 bis), 438 (II. xi, § 9), 446 (II. xi, § 8), 451 (II. xi, § 17 bis), 452 (II. xi, § 17; § 18), 464 (III. i, § 8), 466 (II. iv, § 3), 471 (III. i, § 9), 474 (III. i, § 11), 475 (III. i, § 8), 477 (III. i, § 8), 478 (III. i, § 12), 482 (III. i,

§ 13), 491 (II. xiii, § 1), 499 (II. xiii, § 11; § 12), 502 (II. xiii, § 4), 503 (II. xiii, § 14), 505 (II. xiii, § 14; III. xix, § 2), 507 (II. xiii, § 7; § 18; III. xix, § 7; § 18), 508 (II. xiii, § 16), 517 (II. xiii, § 17), 523 (II. xiii, § 20), 545 (II. ii, § 2), 547 (II. ii, § 5), 557 (I. iii, § 6), 559 (II. iii, § 7), 561 (II. iii, §§ 7-8), 569 (II. iii, § 1), 571 (II. ii, § 4), 572 (II. iii, §§ 5, 19), 575 (II. viii, § 1), 577 (II. ii, § 5), 580 (II. viii, § 2), 581 (II. viii, § 3), 584 (II. viii, § 7), 585 (II. iii, § 4), 587 (II. viii, § 22), 590 (II. viii, § 21), 592 (II. viii, § 19), 595 (II. iii, § 16), 597 (II. viii, §§ 8 ff.), 600 (I. i, § 4), 605 (II. viii, § 25), 609 (II. viii, § 25), 613 (II. vi, § 14), 625 (II. vii, § 3), 627 (II. vii, § 4), 631 (II. vii, § 8), 634 (II. vii, §§ 7-8), 636 (II. vii, § 5), 644 (II. vii, § 9), 653 (II. iv; iv, § 9), 657 (II. iv, § 10), 660 (III. vi, § 7), 663 (II. x), 664 (II. vii, § 1), 667 (I. x, § 4; II. x, § 3), 668 (II. x, § 5), 676 (II. xii, § 14), 689 (II. xii, § 14), 696 (II. xii, § 17), 702 (II. xiii, § 3; xvi, § 10), 705, note 1 (II. xii, § 4), 706 (II. xiii, § 5; § 6), 710 (II. viii, § 7), 716 (II. xii, § 26), 721 (II. xvi, § 21), 736 (II. xii, § 15), 739 (II. xii, § 16), 745 (II. xii, § 19), 760 (II. xii, § 21), 764 (II. xii, § 24 bis), 767 (III. xx, § 42), 781 (III. xx, § 60), 786 (III. xix, § 19), 788 (III. xix, § 14), 816 (II. xvi, § 25), 820 (II. xvi, § 29), 826 (II. xiii, § 7), 827 (II. xxii, § 9; xxiii, § 11), 829 (II. xxiii, § 47), 830 (II. xxiii, § 48), 835 (II. vii, § 2), 882 (II. v, § 9), 898 (II. v, § 12), 906 (II. v, § 12), 910 (II. v, § 1), 919 (II. v, § 2), 925 (II. v, § 3), 937 (III. vii, § 2), 938 (III. xiv), 942 (II. v, § 29), 944 (II. v, § 27), 990 (II. v, § 17), 993 (II. v, § 22), 1002 (I. iv, § 7), 1021 (I. iii, §§ 9, 17), 1033 (I. iii, § 9), 1045 (I. iii, § 12), 1048 (I. iii, § 21), 1052 (I. iii, § 21), 1058 (I. iii, § 7; § 8), 1067 (I. iv, § 3), 1075 (I. iii, § 10), 1079 (I. iii, § 11), 1081 (I. iii, § 12), 1085 (II. iii, § 4; ix, § 1), 1087 (I. iv, § 19; II. iv, § 14), 1090 (I. iii, § 7), 1100 (II. vii, § 24; § 27), 1101 (II. vii, § 27), 1102 (II. vii, §§ 28 ff.), 1107 (I. iv, § 4), 1111 (I. iv, § 7), 1115 (I. iv, § 15; vi, § 5),

1116 (III. vii, § 6), 1145 (II. xxvi, § 4), 1155 (II. xxv, § 3), 1157 (III. xi, § 18; xx, §§ 52 ff.), 1167 (II. xx, § 2), 1168 (II. xx, § 2, n. 3), 1170 (II. xx, § 3), 1175 (II. xx, § 5; § 6), 1176 (II. xx, § 7 bis), 1180 (II. xx, § 8), 1181 (II. xx, § 9), 1182 (II. xx, § 14), 1185 (II. xx, §§ 19, 20), 1187 (II. xx, § 22), 1191 (II. xx, § 24), 1196 (II. xx, § 30), 1197 (II. xx, § 29), 1202 (II. xx, § 31), 1204 (II. xx, § 30), 1209 (II. xx, § 35), 1213 (I. ii, § 5; II. i, § 14), 1218 (II. xx, § 32), 1221 (II. xxi, § 8), 1223 (II. xxi, § 10), 1225 (I. iii, § 8; II. xxi, § 12), 1227 (II. xxi, § 14), 1254 (I. iii, § 10), 1256 (II. v, § 21), 1263 (II. vii, § 8), 1288 (I. iii, § 12; iv, § 10; II. vi, §§ 3 ff.; III. xx, §§ 5 ff.), 1291 (III. xx, §§ 5 ff.), 1295 (II. xxii; xxiii, §§ 7, 11; xxiv), 1297 (III. i, § 9), 1299 (III. i, §§ 2-4; § 5; xi-xvi; xvii), 1301 (I. iii, § 4 bis; III. iii, § 2), 1304 (II. xxi, § 2), 1305 (II. xxi, §§ 3-6; III. ii), 1306 (II. xxv bis), 1307 (II. xxv, § 8; III. iii; iv ff.), 1308 (III. i, §§ 21-2; iv, § 18), 1309 (III. v), 1310 (III. vi, §§ 1 ff.), 1311 (III. vi, § 8), 1312 (III. vii, § 4), 1314 (III. viii; ix), 1316 (III. xix), 1318 (III. xxi, § 1), 1319 (III. xxi, § 3), 1320 (III. xxi, § 4; § 5; §§ 6 ff.), 1321 (III. xxi, § 9; §§ 11-12; §§ 14 ff.), 1322 (III. xxi, §§ 23 ff.; xxii; xxiii), 1324 (II. xvii, § 20; III. xx; xix, § 11), 1325 (III. xix, §§ 6 ff.), 1328 (III. xx, §§ 52 ff.), 1330 (II. xv, § 5), 1332 (II. xv, § 6), 1333 (I. iii, § 21), 1334 (II. xv, § 13), 1337 (II. xvi, § 16), 1338 (II. xvi, § 17), 1339 (II. xvi, § 13), 1340 (II. xv, § 16), 1341 (II. xvi, § 17), 1344 (II. xiv, § 2; § 3), 1345 (II. xiv, § 11), 1347 (II. xiv, § 12), 1350 (II. v, § 24 bis), 1352 (II. v, § 24), 1353 (III. i, § 22), 1358 (II. vi, § 5), 1362 (II. ix, § 8), 1363 (II. ix, § 8), 1366 (II. ix, § 8; lx, § 4);

Excerpta ex Incertis Auctoribus (probably in Excerpta ex Tragœdiis et Comoediis Graecis, tum quae Exstant, tum quae Perierunt, Paris, 1626), 251-2 (p. 939) [See note]; Florum Sparsio (Paris, 1642), 272 (XLVIII. viii. 14), 287 (XLIX. xix.

Grotius (cont.).

- 16), 487 (XLVIII. xvii. 1 pr.), 496 (XII. ii. 33), 630 (V. ii. 2 and 4), 655 (L. xvi. 177), 679 (L. xiii. 1, §§ 4-5), 871 (XLVIII. v. 13), 918 (XLVIII. xix. 39), 991 (p. 98), 1183 (XLVIII. v. 22), 1184 (XLVIII. viii. 14), 1207 (on the Code, IX. viii. 4), 1213 (XLVIII. viii);
- Historica Belgica* (Amsterdam, 1657), 573 (V), 1344 (V);
- On Campanella's Politica* (in Quaedam Hactenus Inedita, Amsterdam, 1652), 817 (general reference);
- On the Bible* (Paris, 1641-4), Genesis, 498 (xxiv. 2), 526 (ix. 3), 527 (xvi. 34), 843 (xx. 9), 898 (xix. 31), 903 (xx. 12), 1213 (ix. 6), 1275 (xvii. 26); Exodus, 320 (xxi. 28 ff., 33 ff.), 726 (xxii. 12), 918 (xxi-xxii), 942 (xxi. 4), 1179 (xxi. 12); Leviticus, 491 (v. 4), 735 (xxv. 29), 1174 (xix. 18); Numbers, 643 (xxvii. 8 ff.); Deuteronomy, 487 (xiii. 8), 630 (xxi. 17), 834 (xix. 16), 849 (xvi. 18), 888 (xxiii. 2), 890 (xxiv. 4), 925 (xxi. 18 ff.); Joshua, 1226 (i. 18); Judges, 262 (xvi. 30), 1067 (i. 1); 1 Kings, 359 (x. 29), 399 (xx. 3 ff.), 888 (ii. 17), 1210 (ii. 6), 1277 (xvi. 24); 2 Kings, 1069 (xi. 17); Esther, 818 (iv. 16), 1182 (ix. 10); Proverbs, 84 (xxix. 24); Wisdom, 232 (xii. 1); Jonah, 259 (i. 12); 1 Macabees, 288 (ii. 37); Matthew, 60 (v. 22), 89 (general reference), 494 (v. 34), 500 (v. 33), 507 (xv. 6), 523 (v. 37), 819 (xii. 3), 844 (v. 27), 864 (i. 18), 883 (v. 31-2), 892 (i. 16), 1138 (v. 27), 1184 (v. 28), 1213 (v. 40); Luke, 755 (vi. 35), 757 (vi. 35), 1124 (iii. 13); Hebrews, 480 (xi. 31);
- On the Truth of the Christian Religion* (Paris, 1627), 180 (§ 7), 224 (I, §§ 19-22; II, § 9), 235 (IV, § 11), 875 (II, n. 13);
- Opuscula de Dogmatis Republicae Noxii* (in Quaedam Hactenus Inedita, Amsterdam, 1652), 55 (general reference).
- Gudelinus, Petrus (Dutch jurist; 1550-1619).
- De Iure Novissimo* (Antwerp, 1620), 576 (II. ii).
- Guicciardini, Francesco (Italian historian; 1482-1540).

- History of Italy* (La Historia di Italia, Florence, 1561), 802 (V, pp. 134, 146), 808 (XV, p. 433 b), 828 (XI; XII, p. 345), 830 (IV), 855 (VI, p. 178), 1093 (V), 1099 (XII, p. 367), 1115 (I), 1324 (XVI), 1325 (XVII), 1334 (XVI), 1340 (pp. 542 and 344), 1347 (VII).
- Gunther (French Cistercian monk; fl. 1205).
- Ligurinus* (Sine loco 1507), 57 (III. 289 ff.), 450 (VI. 656 ff.), 494 (III. 511 ff.), 506 (VIII. 793 ff.), 1147 (VII), 1157 (X), 1181 (I. 527 ff.), 1190 (I. 478 ff.), 1277 (III. 480 ff.).
- Haythonus (Hetoum, Hethoum, or Haiton; Armenian historian; 13th and 14th centuries).
- History of the Tartars* (Haguenau, 1529), 487 (xlviii), 906 (xlviii), 1135 (xlviii).
- Hebrews*, see Bible.
- Heliodorus (Bishop of Tricca; 4th century Christian Era).
- Ethiopia*, 347 (II. 31), 419 (I. 29), 421 (V. 26), 480 (I. 26), 849 (VIII. 17; IX. 25), 993 (I), 1232 (V. 20; V. 31), 1345 (X. 10).
- Helmold (German historian; †1183).
- Chronica Slavorum* (Frankfurt, 1581), 363 (I. lxxxii).
- Heraclides (Greek philosopher; 4th century B.C.).
- De Politiis*, 83 (Aristotle, Fragments, DCXI. xx), 263 (ibid. xxix), 268 (ibid. xviii), 735 (ibid. xii), 861 (ibid. lviii), 1278 (ibid. xx).
- Herbert, Sir Thomas (English traveller and author; 1606-82).
- Travels* (London, 1634), 895 (pp. 21, 240).
- Herodes Atticus, Tiberius Claudius (Athenian rhetorician; 101-177 A.D.).
- De Republica*, 1296 (13).
- Herodian (Greek historian; 3rd century Christian Era).
- Histories*, 265 (IV. v), 659 (VI. ii, iv), 1033 (I. vi), 1043 (IV. i), 1066 (I. iv. 6), 1220 (III. vi), 1271 (V. i), 1287 (II. iv).
- Herodotus (Greek historian; born 484 B.C.).
- History*, 58 (IX. cxxii), 73 (VIII. iii), 193 (II. cxxviii), 263 (I. ccxvi), 305 (VIII. cxi), 405 (I. cxxxi), 422 (III. cxxix), 483 (I. clxxxvii), 497 (IV), 510 (IV.

- cci), 512 (IV), 596 (II. cix), 692 (II. cix), 743 (II. cix), 752 (I. cxxxviii), 791 (II), 801 (II. cxxx), 814 (VI. lxxxix), 849 (VIII. cvi), 857 (I. viii), 861 (I), 865 (IV. civ), 869 (V. xxxix, xl), 870 (III. lxix), 879 (V), 889 (I; IV; V), 893 (I; IV), 894 (I. viii), 897 (II. xxxv), 905 (III), 912 (I. clxiii), 937 (VI. cxxxvii), 942 (IV), 954 (I. cxxxii), 959 (I. xcvi f.), 977 (III), 1052 (III), 1065 (I. xxix), 1101 (VII. ii, iii), 1126 (VIII. iii), 1155 (VII. cxxxiv), 1156 (III. clvii), 1181 (IV. cxlvi), 1192 (III. xxxvi), 1203 (I. xiii; VII. cxciv), 1205 (II. cxxxvii), 1214 (II. cxxxvii), 1226 (III. cxviii), 1243 (III), 1264 (II. clxxi), 1269 (II), 1273 (II. clxxii), 1279 (II. clxxvii), 1304 (III. xxxvi), 1328 (I. lxxxii), 1358 (IX. lxxxvii-lxxxviii).
- Hesiod (Greek poet; fl. ca. 800 B.C.).
Works and Days, 180 (276 ff.), 270 (711 ff.), 524 (686), 557 (330), 603 (343 ff.), 639 (707), 1282 (40).
- Hippodamus (Greek architect; 5th century B.C.).
De Felicitate, 245 (fragment 1 ed. Mul-lach).
- Hobbes, Thomas (English philosopher; 1588-1679).
De Cive (Paris, 1642), 87 (xiv, § 1), 88 (xiv, § 2), 89 (iii), 95 (xv, § 5), 97 (viii, § 2), 104 (xiv, §§ 11-13), 117 (iii, § 5), 120 (iii, § 6), 121 (iii, § 6), 124 (iii, § 6), 125 (i, § 7), 126 (i, § 7), 130 (iii, § 7), 157 (x, § 1), 158 (i, § 7), 165 (ix, § 3; xiii, § 7), 166 (i), 168 (viii, § 1; xiii, § 7), 175 (v, § 2), 177 (xiii, §§ 7-8), 189 (ii, § 1), 204 (iii, § 26), 210 (i, § 2), 219 (iii; xv, § 3), 226 (xiv, §§ 4-5), 330 (i, § 3), 338 (iii, §§ 15-18), 375 (iii, § 8), 382, note 1 (xiv, § 19), 382 (xiv, § 19; xv, § 2; § 5; § 19), 390 (ii, §§ 3 ff.), 395 (ii, §§ 6 ff.), 412 (ii, § 11), 422 (ii, § 16), 431 (ii, § 14), 432 (ii, § 18), 493 (ii, § 23), 539 (i, § 6; § 11), 585 (ix, § 4), 699 (ii, § 9), 826 (i, § 9), 828 (iii, § 14), 871 (vi, § 16; xiv, § 9), 910 (ix), 927 (ix, § 8), 937 (viii), 944 (ix, § 9), 949 (i), 952 (i), 960 (i, § 2), 962 (v, § 1), 964 (ii, § 11), 968 (vi), 979 (v, § 8), 980 (vi, § 13), 981 (ii, §§ 8-9; vii, §§ 7 ff.), 982 (vii, § 9), 983 (xiii, § 3), 986 (xii, § 8), 995 (v, § 11), 998 (xiii, §§ 12-13), 1006 (ii, § 4), 1012 (vi, § 6; § 8), 1015 (preface; vi), 1018 (vi), 1029 (vii, § 5), 1031 (vii, §§ 8, 9), 1035 (vii, § 2), 1053 (x), 1057 (vi, § 14), 1059 (x, § 8), 1077 (v, § 6 bis; § 9; vi, § 13; § 17), 1078 (vii, § 16; ix, § 11), 1082 (vii, § 16), 1090 (vii, § 5), 1091 (vii, §§ 15-16), 1094 (ix, § 15), 1096 (ix, § 19), 1103 (viii, § 7), 1104 (xii, § 9), 1117 (x, § 10), 1121 (xiii, § 15), 1124 (xxiii, § 10), 1126 (xiii, §§ 12-13), 1127 (xiii, §§ 7-8), 1133 (xiv, § 10; § 14), 1134 (vi, § 16; xiv, §§ 9-10), 1137 (xiv, § 9), 1138 (iii, § 23; xii, § 1), 1140 (xii, § 2), 1159 (ii, § 18), 1164 (xiv, § 7), 1165 (ii, § 19), 1174 (iii, § 11), 1210 (iii, § 11; xiii, § 16), 1230 (i), 1241 (i, § 2), 1246 (xv, § 9), 1247 (xv, § 9), 1274 (vi, § 15; xii, § 7), 1276 (xii, § 7), 1276, note 7 (vi, § 15, note 1), 1280 (xii, § 9), 1282 (xiii, § 10), 1317 (iii, § 27), 1363 (ix, § 8);
- De Corpore Politico* (London, 1650), 413 (I. ii. 10);
- De Homine* (London, 1658), 25 (x), 54 (xi, § 2), 58 (xiii), 59 (xiii, § 9), 60 (xii), 235 (xiv, § 12), 1015 (xiii, § 8);
- Leviathan* (London, 1651), 12 (xvi), 60 (vi), 85 (xxv), 104 (xxvi), 124 (xv), 125 (xv), 138 (x), 165 (xiii, § 7), 166 (xiii), 168 (xiii), 204 (xv), 250 (iv), 251 (xlvii), 331 (xiii), 376 (xi), 423 (xiv), 461 (iv), 498 (xiv), 922 (xx), 955 (xi), 966 (xxx), 977 (general reference), 983 (conclusion), 984 (introduction), 997 (xxx), 998 (xxx), 999 (xxx), 1015 (xii, xxix, xlvi, xlvii), 1018 (xxix), 1034 (xxix), 1035 (ii, § 19), 1041 (xxix), 1043 (xxii), 1044 (xix; xxii; xxvi), 1053 (xix), 1075 (xxx), 1077 (xxix), 1083 (xix), 1092 (xxi), 1116 (xlv), 1120 (xlv), 1121 (xxx ter), 1123 (xxv, xxx), 1124 (xi), 1125 (xxx), 1160 (xxviii), 1172 (xxviii), 1175 (xxviii), 1197 (xxvii), 1210 (xxvii), 1226 (xxviii), 1238 (xxvii), 1239 (x; xxx), 1241 (x), 1245 (x), 1268 (x);
- Philosophia Prima (Elementorum Philosophiae sectio prima, De Corpore*, London, 1655), 1366 (xi, § 7).

Homer (Greek epic poet; 9th (?) century B.C.).

Iliad, 234 (XIX. 86-7), 254 (XVIII. 104), 258 (IX), 414 (III. 105-6), 472 (IX. 312-13), 514 (X. 307 ff.), 728 (VII. 472 ff.), 729 (VI. 236; IX. 122), 730 (VI), 767 (VII. 171), 803 (III-IV; IV. 13), 804 (III. 281), 879 (IX. 341 f.), 1146 (XII. 243), 1177 (XI. 793), 1180 (IX. 702 ff.), 1258 (I. 277 ff.), 1259 (I. 280-1), 1281 (I. 125-6), 1314 (XI);

Odyssey, 173 (III. 73; IX. 252), 174 (III. 74), 287 (XI. 109), 298 (VII. 216-17), 324 (XV. 272), 363 (VI. 207-8; VIII. 546), 607 (VIII. 318), 623 (XVII. 78 ff.), 638 (VIII. 585-6), 729 (VIII. 393; XIII. 11), 776 (VIII. 351 ff.), 903 (X. 7), 957 (IX. 112 ff.), 1180 (XV. 272 ff.), 1211 (XXII. 462).

Horatius Flaccus, Quintus (Latin poet; 65-8 B.C.).

Art of Poetry, viii (351 ff.), 58 (general reference), 418 (267-8), 466 (70 ff.), 544 (173 f.), 590 (19 f.), 794 (72);

Epistles, 58 (I. i. 39-40), 134 (I. xvi. 55-6), 167 (II. i. 83 ff.), 239 (I. i. 99), 244 (I. x. 32; xii. 4), 245 (I. ii. 56; II. ii. 190 ff.), 246 (II. ii. 195-6), 247 (I. ii. 58-9), 248 (I. ii. 62 ff.), 253 (II. i. 83 ff.), 254 (I. ii. 27), 255 (I. iv. 12 ff.; 15), 347 (I. ii. 27), 351 (I. vii. 14 ff.), 418 (I. xvi. 46 ff.), 545 (II. ii. 111 ff.), 629 (II. ii. 190 ff.), 655 (II. i. 34 ff.), 713 (II. ii. 13), 1052 (I. ii. 14), 1244 (I. i. 8-9), 1282 (I. i. 45);

Epodes, 245 (i. 33-4);

Odes, 75, note 1 (I. ix. 24), 216 (III. ii. 15 f.), 241 (II. iii. 1; x. 21; III. iv. 65; xxix. 41 ff.), 242 (III. ii. 18 ff.), 244 (III. xvi. 39 ff.), 245 (III. xvi. 17; IV. ix. 45 f.), 246 (III. xxix. 53 ff.), 250 (IV. iv. 33), 258 (III. ii. 13), 334 (I. iv. 13 f.; I. xxxiv. 12; II. xiii. 13; III. xxix. 49 f.), 342 (IV. ix. 34 ff.), 349 (IV. ix. 29-30), 386 (I. xxxiv. 1 ff.), 480 (III. xi. 35-6), 560 (I. iii. 21 ff.), 571 (III. xxiv. 9 ff.), 845 (III. vi. 17 f.; IV. v. 23), 917 (IV. iv. 33 f.), 1056 (III. i. 6), 1119 (III. xxiv. 35-6), 1322 (III. v), 1350 (I. xxxv. 26-8);

Satires, 58 (II. viii), 134 (I. iii. 115-17),

151 (II. i. 27-8), 155 (I. iii. 99 ff.), 194 (I. iii. 98, 111 ff.), 241 (II. vii. 83 ff.), 244 (I. i. 92 ff.), 265 (II. i. 44-5), 336 (I. iii. 73 ff.), 348 (II. ii. 103), 447 (II. v. 84 ff.), 448 (II. v. 84 Scholiast), 460 (I. iii. 100), 545 (II. ii. 129 ff.), 717 (I. ii. 103-5), 1270 (I. vi), 1320, note 1 (I. iii. 6 f.).

Horn, Johann Friedrich (German jurist; born 1633).

De Civitate (Utrecht, 1664), 840 (I. i, § 2), 861 (I. i), 935 (I. iii, § 5), 956 (I. iv, § 6), 960 (I. iv, § 6), 1003 (II. i), 1018 (III. i, § 3), 1026 (III. i), 1085 (II. ix, § 2), 1087 (II. ix, § 4).

Hotman, François (French jurist; 1524-90).

Franco-Gallia (Geneva, 1573), 1071 (xii);

Observations (Basel, 1560-75), 761 (II. i);

Quaestiones Illustres (Paris, 1573), 320 (33), 1045 (1), 1081 (1).

Huarte y Navarro, Juan (Spanish physician; ca. 1530-92).

Scrutinium Ingeniorum (first edition, Examen de Ingenios, Pamplona 1578; first Latin edition, Vienna, 1637), 58 (v), 464 (xi), 898 (i), 1264 (xvi, pp. 488 ff.).

Hyginus (Roman antiquary; age uncertain, probably before the 5th century Christian Era).

Fables, 61 (cxxxii), 437 (xxiii), 778 (cclvii), 1154 (xli).

Iamblichus (Greek philosopher; † ca. 330 A.D.).

Protrepticon, 151 (xx, p. 123A), 208 (xx, p. 123A), 216 (xiii, p. 76A), 221 (xiii, p. 83A), 1178 (ii, p. 4A).

Isaeus (Athenian orator; fl. 385 B.C.).

Orations, 407 (ix), 627 (iii. 42; iii. 68; vi. 28), 636 (viii. 32), 640 (vii. 30), 832 (iii; viii, 6), 949 (iii. 66), 1280 (vi).

Isaiah, see Bible.

Isidore of Seville (Spanish historian and theologian; ca. 570-636).

Etymologies (Originum sive Etymologiarum Libri XX), 774 (V. xxv).

Isocrates (Athenian orator; 436-338 B.C.).

Aegineticus, 642 (general reference), 907 (8);

Against Callimachus, 88 (general reference), 266 (39), 380 (27 f.), 1237 (10);

Against Lochites, 1195 (general reference);

- Archidamus*, 44 (37), 659 (26), 1244 (4), 1334 (51);
Areopagiticus, 122 (21 f.), 197 (34), 254 (45), 766 (23), 984 (14), 1038 (55), 1119 (39 ff.), 1231 (general reference), 1361 (68);
Busiris, 255 (20), 562 (12), 1193 (45), 1247 (228), 1283 (21 f.);
De Permutatione, 268 (27), 1176 (14), 1216 (18);
On Peace, 197 (26), 949 (7; 28), 1035 (133);
Oration to Philip, 189 (35), 1295 (38), 1335 (45; 120);
Panathenaic Oration, 174 (227), 343 (163), 477 (240), 984 (138), 1120 (144), 1136 (21 f.), 1355 (166);
Panegyric, 343 (184), 563 (118), 1025 (105), 1331 (176), 1333 (101-5);
Praise of Helen, 252 (4 f.), 1243 (general reference), 1263 (44);
To Demonius, 61 (32), 488 (37), 493 (23), 768 (37);
To Nicocles, 457 (general reference), 730 (1), 874 (40), 1052 (25 f.), 1117 (6; 10 f.), 1118 (27; 29), 1120 (17; 31), 1125 (21);
Trapeziticus, 833 (27 f.).
 Ives or Yves de Paris (French scholar; 1593-1678).
De Iure Naturali a Deo Rebus Creatis Constituto (Paris, 1637), 183 (general reference).
 James I (King of England; 1566-1625).
Donum Regium (Edinburgh, 1599), 1123 (II), 1190 (II).
Jeremiah, see Bible.
Job, see Bible.
John, see Bible.
 Jonae, Arngrimur, see Vidalin, Arngrimur Jonsson.
Jonah, see Bible.
 Jornandes (Gothic historian; 6th century Christian Era).
History of the Goths, 854 (viii), 1174 (xxix).
 Josephus (Jewish historian; 37-95).
Against Apion 288 (I, p. 1050e);
Antiquities of the Jews, 288 (XII. i; viii), 298 (IX. ii), 353 (IV. viii), 399 (VIII. viii), 438 (IV. viii), 481 (II. iii), 511 (V. ii), 540 (I. iv), 616 (XVII. x), 619 (XVI. viii), 662 (IV. viii. 29), 663 (IV. viii), 800 (X. x), 811 (II. iii), 848 (IV. viii), 878 (III. x), 882 (XV. ix; XVIII. vii), 890 (IV. viii), 903 (VII. vii), 1013 (III. iii), 1213 (XVI. i), 1215 (IV. viii. 35), 1216 (IV. viii. 34), 1234 (IV. viii. 15);
Jewish War, 260 (III. xxv), 298 (VI. xxi), 698 (VI. xxxii), 1143 (IV. xix), 1237 (IV. xxxix).
Joshua, see Bible.
Judges, see Bible.
Judith, see Bible.
 Julianus, Flavius Claudius (Roman Emperor; 331-363 A.D.).
Misopogon, 1190 (p. 371b).
The Caesars, 627 (p. 334d), 1185 (p. 314c); Justinus, Marcus Junianus (Latin historian; 3rd century Christian Era).
Histories, 174 (XLI. v), 190 (II. ii), 291 (II. ii, § 6), 430 (IX. i), 511 (III. iii), 539 (II. ii), 542 (XLI. i), 574 (XLI. iii), 599 (XVIII. v, n. 14), 689 (XI. iv), 766 (I. x; XVIII. iii), 807 (XVIII. v), 810 (II. xii, § 14), 826 (VIII. i, n. 4 ff.), 827 (VIII. iii, n. 15), 831 (VI. vi, n. 1), 845 (III. iv), 854 (II. iv), 889 (XVIII. v, § 4), 1009 (XV. ii; XLI. iv-v), 1026 (I), 1057 (III. ii, § 8), 1059 (XXXVIII. ii), 1087 (III. v; XL. ii), 1093 (XXXVI. i), 1094 (XLI. v, n. 10), 1096 (XXI. i, ii), 1101 (II. x; XVI. ii, vii), 1106 (IX. vi), 1107 (XV. iii, n. 9 ff.), 1116 (XVI. v), 1149 (XXXII. iii), 1153 (XII. v, n. 8), 1208 (II. ii), 1222 (XXVIII. i), 1226 (X. ii; XXI. iv, n. 8; XXVI. i), 1240 (V. iv), 1294 (II. iii. 12), 1315 (XXIX. ii), 1319 (III. vii), 1320 (VI. vii), 1339 (III. vii), 1356 (XXIV. iv), 1366 (V. vi, n. 5; X. i. 6), 1367 (XXI. viii; XXVIII. i).
 Juvenal, Decimus Junius (Latin satirist; ca. 40-ca. 125).
Satires, 14 (vii. 135-7), 82 (xiv. 233-4), 86 (ii. 79 f.), 102 (xiii. 193 ff.), 115 (vii. 215-16), 147 (xv. 159 ff.), 167 (xv. 35 ff.), 174 (xv), 218 (xiii. 193), 240 (xiii. 104-5), 241 (x. 365), 242 (x. 347 f.; xiii. 20 ff.), 244 (v. 6; xiv. 316 ff.), 245 (xiv. 136-7), 246 (xi. 37-8), 253 (xi. 34), 427 (xiii. 75-6), 499 (xv.

Juvenal (cont.).

37-8), 541 (iii. 230-1), 582 (iv. 50 ff.), 629 (xiv. 136-7), 682 (xi. 16), 693 (xiv. 291), 746 (vii. 159 ff.), 754 (xiv. 103-4), 768 (i. 89 f.), 876 (vi. 142 ff.), 884 (vi. 448 ff.), 929 (vii. 184 f.; xiv. 70 ff.), 941 (xiv. 126), 945 (v. 66), 950 (ii. 23), 954 (xv. 159 ff.), 1066 (i. 56-7; vi. 281-2), 1172 (ii. 22 ff.; 38-40), 1189 (vi. 220; viii. 166), 1197 (vi. 97), 1198 (viii. 140-1), 1242 (iv. 139), 1247 (vi. 130), 1253 (v. 130-1), 1266 (viii. 272 ff.), 1267 (viii. 8), 1270 (xiv. 269), 1272 (xi. 11), 1357 (i. 47-50).

Koran:

On Disputation, 506 (general reference);
On Doors, 831 (general reference);
On Light, 835 (general reference);
On the Table, 769 (general reference);
On Wives, 324 (general reference), 643 (general reference), 907 (general reference).

La Barde, Jean de (German philosopher; 1600-92).

Historiae de Rebus Gallicis (Paris, 1671), 518 (VI, p. 329), 761 (VI, p. 393), 1074 (III, pp. 132-3), 1112 (X, p. 684), 1336 (V, p. 313), 1338 (V, pp. 74-5).

Labardaues, Joannes, see La Barde, Jean de.
 Lactantius, Lucius Caecilius Firmianus (Latin apologist of Christianity; † ca. 325).

De Falsa Religione, 846 (xx);

De Opificio Dei, 958 (iv);

Divine Institutes, 179 (III. vii), 184 (I. xxi), 195 (V. xvi), 200 (V. xvi), 218 (VI. xxiv), 220 (VI. viii), 259 (III. xviii), 284 (VI. xviii), 301 (V. xvii), 336 (III. xxi), 337 (III. xxi), 346 (VI. x-xi), 543 (V. v), 709 (V. xvii), 813 (I. xx), 816 (III. vi), 867 (III. xx), 877 (V. xxi), 914 (V. xviii), 918 (VI. xx), 982 (III. xvii), 1176 (IV. xxi).

On the Anger of God, 382 (viii), 956 (xii); Lampridius, Aelius (Latin biographer; 4th century Christian Era).

Alexander Severus, 114 (xxiv), 531 (xxii), 693 (xxxix), 761 (xxi), 1214 (xxviii), 1269 (lviii);

Commodus, 721 (i);

Elagabalus, 682 (xxix).

Law of the Bavarians (in Lindenbrog, Codex Legum Antiquarum, Frankfurt, 1613), 716 (XV. ix, § 1).

Law of the Burgundians (in Lindenbrog), 293 (I. xvi. 1 and 2), 324 (tit. xlv), 353 (xxviii, § 1), 363 (xxx, § 1), 467 (general reference), 932 (XII. v), 1212 (X. i), 1279 (LXXXIV, § 1).

Law of the Frisians (in Lindenbrog), 293 (v).

Law of the Lombards (Paris, 1515), 287 (I. ix. 19), 360 (III. i. 21), 579 (I. xxii. 4 and 6), 589 (I. xxvii, § 1), 1149 (III. xiii, § 1).

Law of the Visigoths (Paris, 1579), 67 (VIII. iv. 16), 275 (IX. iv. 6), 279 (III. iii. 6), 293 (VII. ii. 16), 317 (VIII. ii. 1-3; iii. 3), 319 (VII. iii. 5; VIII. i. 1), 324 (XI. i. 6), 436 (II. v. 7), 516 (II. iv. 5), 593 (X. i. 7), 644 (VII. ii. 19), 818 (II. i. 12), 832 (II. iv. 3; 12), 833 (III. iv. 10; V. iv. 14; vii. 11; VI. iv. 3), 860 (IV. iv. 3), 918 (VI. iii. 7), 921 (V. iv. 12), 932 (III. ii. 8), 945 (V. vi, §§ 17, 21), 1217 (VI. iv. 3), 1234 (II. iv. 9).

Law, Salic (in Lindenbrog), 581 (xxxv), 1238 (xxxii).

Le Grand, Antoine (Dutch philosopher; 17th century).

Institutio Philosophiae secundum Principia R. Descartes (London, 1672), 54 (VII. v), 55 (VIII. xvii, xviii), 60 (VII. xix), 242 (VIII. x. 420), 248 (VIII. xii), 527 (VI. iii).

Leibnitz, Gottfried Wilhelm (German philosopher; 1646-1716).

Nova Methodus Jurisprudentiae (1667), 617 (p. 56).

L'Empereur, Constantin (Dutch orientalist; 1570-1648).

Baba Kama (Leyden, 1637), 322 (general reference), 325 (viii, § 1), 507 (ix, § 20), 574 (vii, § 7), 927 (viii, § 3), 1215 (viii, § 1).

Leo I, Flavius (Emperor of Constantinople; † 474 A.D.).

Novels, 762 (lxxxiv), 1058 (lix).

Leo Mutinensis, or Leo of Modena (Jewish scholar; 1571-1654?).

De Ritibus Hebraicis (Historia degli Rite Hebraici, Paris, 1637), 522 (II. iv, § 4), 753 (II. v), 822 (V. v, § 1), 846 (IV. ii), 868 (IV. ii).

- Leo of Africa (Joannes Leo Africanus; Moorish geographer; fl. 1526).
- Description of Africa* (Antwerp, 1556), 684 (III), 692 (VII), 897 (I), 1245 (I).
- Léry, Jean de (French traveller; 1534-1611). Itinerary (Histoire d'un Voyage . . . en la Terre du Brésil, Geneva, 1578), 894 (viii).
- Lesbonax (Greek rhetorician; 2nd century Christian Era).
- Oratio Hortatoria*, 1264 (II. 12, 13).
- Leviticus*, see Bible.
- Libanius (Greek rhetorician; 314-ca. 390 A.D.).
- Chirae*, 9 (i. 6), 317 (ii. 13), 889 (i. 10); Declamations, 51 (xxxv, p. 780 B,C,D, ed. Morellius), 113 (xxiii. 20), 150 (ix. 345-6), 209 (xiii. 30), 215 (v, p. 79), 240 (xxi, p. 535c), 266 (xxiii. 8, 10), 267 (iii. 24), 279 (ii. 193, p. 223b), 347 (xiii. 26), 481 (xxix, p. 664d), 521 (iii, p. 249A), 648 (iii. 16), 684 (xlviii. 29), 746 (xxix. 1, 143), 812 (xxxix. 36; xl. 75), 921 (ix. 43), 924 (xxxix. 36; xl. 75), 993 (xxx), 1154 (I. xxvii. 42), 1177 (xx), 1196 (viii. 22), 1198 (xxix. 1, 111), 1201 (x. 16, 17);
- Legatio ad Julianum*, 1122 (xv), 1202 (xv. 54);
- Orations*, 108 (v. 2, p. 51), 369 (iii), 442 (v), 912 (xx. 43), 1123 (v), 1124 (lix. 15), 1220 (xiii), 1241 (VII. xiv. 21);
- Progymnasmata*, 9 (p. 5), 82 (p. 12d), 1025 (iv), 1212 (general reference);
- Vituperationes*, 248 (vii).
- Lindenberg, Friedrich (German jurist; 1573-1648).
- Codex Legum Antiquarum* (Frankfurt, 1613), 768 (glossary).
- Lipsius, Justus (Belgian scholar; 1547-1606).
- On Tacitus, Annals* (ed. Antwerp, 1581), 848 (III).
- Politica* (Antwerp, 1589), 485 (IV. xiv, n. 32);
- Livy (Titus Livius; Latin historian; 59 B.C.-17 A.D.).
- Ab Urbe Condita*, 24 (XXII. xxxix), 64 (I. lviii), 75 (I. lviii), 98 (V. xxxvi), 107 (X. ix), 108 (II. i), 115 (XXXVIII. xlviii), 294 (IX. i), 295 (IX. iv), 300 (V. xl; XXVI. xv), 327 (XLV. xxxix), 337 (III. liii; XXXIV. iv), 342 (XXVI. ii), 354 (XXXIV. lxii), 356 (XXI. xx; XXXVIII. xxxviii), 364 (XLI. xxiv), 365 (II. xxxvii-xxxviii), 369 (V. xxxiii; XLIII. v), 372 (IV. iii), 372, note 1 (IV. iv. 12), 399 (XXXVI. xxviii), 430 (VIII. xxviii; XL. xxi), 442 (II. xxxi), 459 (V. xli), 466 (XL. xlii), 497 (XXII. xxxviii. 1 ff.), 511 (XXXIX. xxxvii), 570 (V. lv), 619 (XL. xxxiv), 623 (XXXII. xxxviii), 660 (XXXIV. lxii), 722 (XLIV. xxxiv), 734 (XXXI. xiii), 770 (XXIII. xlix; XXV. iii), 775 (XXXII. xxxviii), 794 (I. xxiv), 798 (IX. xxxiv), 801 (XXXVIII. xxxviii), 809 (XXVI. xlviii; XXX. xxxii; XXXIII. xxx; XXXVIII. xxxviii; XLII. xxi; XLII. xli), 813 (XXXV. vii), 825 (IX. i), 827 (III. lxii), 831 (IX. xiv; XLIV. xix), 853 (XXXVIII. xxxvi), 878 (XXXVIII. xxiv), 896 (III. xxvi), 923 (I. 1), 964 (XXII. xxii), 979 (VIII. xxi), 1000 (II. lix), 1018 (II. xxiii, xxxii, lviii; III. x, xx, xxiv; IV. i, v, lviii; V. ii, x), 1028 (II. iii), 1048 (XXXVIII. xxxi), 1049 (XXIII. vii, x; XXXIII. xlvii), 1051 (XXXVIII. xxxi-xxxii), 1053 (I. liv. lvi), 1057 (XXVI. xxxvi), 1059 (VII. xxxi), 1079 (VI. xxxviii; VIII. xxxiii; XXII. xxv), 1080 (III. xxxviii), 1088 (III. vi; XXIII. xxi; XXXV. xvi), 1089 (II. i), 1090 (I. xvii), 1091 (I. xvii), 1097 (XXXIX. liii; XL. xi), 1100 (XXIX. xxix), 1115 (XXIII. xx), 1149 (V. vi), 1152 (VII. xxxiv), 1155 (III. i), 1164 (XXIV. xvi), 1180 (I. xxviii; I. xxxiii), 1183 (III. lv), 1192 (VIII. xxxv), 1210 (XXIII. xiv), 1220 (XXVIII. xxvi), 1258 (XLII. xxxiv), 1266 (I. xxxiv; X. viii), 1267 (IV. ii; VI. xxxvii; VI. xlii; X. vii bis), 1269 (XXI. lxiii), 1270 (IV. iii), 1272 (XXII. xv, xxii), 1280 (XXXIV. ix), 1281 (V. xxxii), XXX. xlv), 1286 (XXXI. xiii), 1297 (XLII. xlvii), 1302 (XXIV. xxxvii), 1303 (XXI. xviii; XXXVIII. xlv ff.; XLI. vii), 1304 (XXIX. xvi; XXXV. xxxi; XLIV. x; XLV. xxxii), 1305 (VII. xxxi), 1311 (V. iv; VI. lx), 1319 (I. xv; VII. xx. 8), 1320 (II. lviii; II. lxiv; XXIII. xlv), 1321 (XXII. lix, lxi), 1331 (XLI. xxiv), 1333 (XXIII. vii ff.), 1334 (XLII. i)

Livy (cont.).

- 1339 (XXI. xix), 1340 (IX. viii ff.),
1341 (IX. iv), 1352 (XLI. viii, ix), 1354
(XXII. xxii; XXVII. xvii), 1356
(XXXIV. xlv), 1363 (I. lii), 1367
(XXVI. xvi);
Epitome, 631 (XLI).
Loccenius, Joannes (German historian; 1597-1677).
De Iure Maritimo (Stockholm, 1650),
664 (I. vii, § 9), 770 (II. v).
Londorp or Lundorp, Michael (German historian; first half of the 17th century).
Continuatio Sleidani (Frankfurt, 1615-
19), 710 (general reference).
Lopez, Eduardo (Spanish traveller; 2nd half of the 16th century).
De Regno Congo (Relazione del Reame di Congo, Rome, 1591), 854 (II. ix).
Lucanus, Marcus Annaeus (Latin epic poet; 39-65 A.D.).
Pharsalia, 44 (I. 282), 58 (VIII. 365),
195 (VIII. 488 ff.), 239 (II. 381 ff.), 244 (IV. 381), 246 (I. 181-2), 262 (III.
689-90), 285 (V. 685 ff.), 337 (V. 340
ff.), 612 (VII. 739-40), 616 (II. 628),
866 (II. 326), 944 (III. 152), 1042
(I. 92 ff.), 1060 (I. 670), 1125 (III.
152), 1153 (III. 706-7), 1193 (II.
141 ff., 198 ff.), 1239 (I. 460 ff.) 1244
(I. 135), 1247 (V. 385-6), 1296 (III.
101), 1305 (IV. 707 ff.).
Lucian (Greek writer of dialogues; born ca. 120 A.D.). See also Anthology, Greek.
Abdicatus, 640 (xviii), 829 (xi);
Adversus Indoctum, 59 (xxv), 683 (xiii);
Amores, 214 (xxvii), 1364 (xix);
Asinus, 833 (v);
Bis Accusatus, 251 (general reference);
Charon, 251 (general reference), 693
(general reference);
Convivium, 252 (xxxiv), 253 (xxxiv);
De Dea Syria, 363 (xii), 481 (general reference);
De Domo, 834 (xx);
De Luctu, 791 (general reference);
De Mercede Conductis, 86 (xlii), 746
(general reference), 1122 (xxix);
Demonax, 242 (xli);
De Sacrificiis, 905 (xiii. 5);
De Saltatione, 459 (general reference), 1203 (lxxxiv);

- Dialogues of the Dead*, 55 (xxx), 334 (X.
xxv. 2), 903 (general reference);
Epistolae Saturnales, 1255 (xxxii);
Eunuchus, 268 (i);
Hermotimus, 746 (lxxxii);
Iudicium Vocalium, 1258 (iv);
Jupiter Confutatus, 55 (general reference);
Nigrinus, 545 (xxvi), 681 (xxxi);
Phalaris, 491 (I. i), 1036 (I. vii), 1180
(I. viii);
Pro Imaginibus, 80 (xxviii), 233 (xvii),
340 (xxi);
Pro Lapsu in Salutando, 253 (xi), 499
(xviii);
Prometheus, 352 (general reference), 525
(xv); Simylus et Polystratus, 615 (general
reference);
Somnium, 527 (xviii);
Toxaris, or Friendship, 622 (xxii);
Tragopodagra, 506 (271 ff.);
The Lover of Lies, 413 (xv);
The Tyrannicide, 811 (preface).
Lucilius, see Anthology, Greek.
Lucretius Carus, Titus (Latin poet and philosopher; ca. 96-55 B.C.).
De Rerum Natura, 155 (V. 925 ff.), 157
(VI. 816-17), 198 (V. 1151 ff.), 241
(III. 1000 ff.), 244 (V. 1117), 248 (III.
1085 ff.), 349 (V. 1 ff.), 460 (V. 1027 ff.),
478 (I. 935 ff.), 479 (I. 935 ff.), 815
(IV. 471-2), 1120 (VI. 973 ff.), 1365
(III. 860 ff.).
Luke, see Bible.
Lycurgus (Athenian orator; †323 B.C.).
Against Leocrates, 369 (27), 1120 (102),
1149 (129 f.), 1187 (9), 1206 (8), 1304
(146), 1350 (general reference).
Lysias (Athenian orator; ca. 458-378
B.C.).
Against Agoratus, 68 (xiii. 87);
Against Alcibiades, 1191 (ii. 9);
Against Simon, 1207 (42);
Against Theomnestus, 268 (x. 2), 812 (x. 7;
xi. 4);
On the Sacred Olive Tree, 833 (general
reference);
Orations, 141 (xii), 279 (i. 33), 320 (xxxi.
10), 495 (xxxii. 13), 542 (xviii. 17), 856
(i. 6), 1035 (xxiv. 3), 1089 (xxxi. 6),
1199 (vi. 17);
Pro Caede Eratosthenis, 286 (30 f.).

Maccabees, see Bible.

Machiavelli, Niccolò (Italian historian; 1469-1527).

Discorsi sopra la Primadeca di Tito Livio (Rome, 1531), 1139 (I. ii);

Il Principe (Florence 1532), 227 (xii), 1124 (xvi);

Storie Fiorentine (Florence, 1537), 505 (III), 1264 (III), 1265 (V).

Macrobius, Ambrosius Theodosius (Latin grammarian; 4th century Christian Era).

Saturnalia, 543 (I. viii), 1278 (III).

Maestert, Jacob (Dutch jurist; 1610-58).

De Justitia Romanarum Legum (Leyden, 1634), 924 (xxvii).

Maiores, see Maria de Conti, Marcus Antonio.

Mamertinus, the elder, Claudius (Latin panegyrist; 3rd century Christian Era).

Panegyric of Julian, 680 (xi. 3);

Panegyric of Maximian 81 (I. xi. 5).

Mandelslo, Johann Albrecht von (German traveller; 1616-64).

Itinerarium (Morgenländische Reise. Beschreibungen, Schlesswig, 1650), 1249 (II), 1262 (II. x).

Manilius, Marcus (Latin astronomer; 1st century Christian Era).

Astronomica, 4 (III. 39 ff.), 62 (V. 226), 149 (II. 105-8), 150 (IV. 4 ff.), 151 (II. 592 ff.), 155 (I. 68), 166 (V. 495 ff.), 167 (V. 120 f.), 234 (IV. 79 ff.), 334 (III. 525 ff.), 348 (IV. 537 ff.), 778 (II. 586-8).

Manutius, Paulus (Paolo Manuzio; Italian printer and critic; 1512-74).

De Legibus Romanis (Paris, 1557), 631 (general reference), 1278 (general reference bis).

Maria de Conti, Marcus Antonio (Italian humanist; 1514-55).

Orations (Venice, 1582), 465 (general reference).

Mariana, Juan (Spanish historian; 1536-1624).

History of Spain (Historiae de Rebus Hispaniae, Toledo, 1592), 694 (XV. ix), 855 (XXIV. v), 1102 (XX. ii, iii), 1340 (XXI. xii), 1351 (XIII. xi).

Mark, see Bible.

Marselaer, Frederic de (Belgian jurist; 1584-1670).

Legatus (Antwerp, 1618), 228 (II. xiii), 426 (I. xxx), 798 (II. xxxix), 802 (I. xxxviii), 1127 (II. xi), 1155 (I. xxxiii), 1240 (I. xxxiii).

Martial (Marcus Valerius Martialis; Latin writer of epigrams; *†*ca. 103 A.D.).

De Spectaculis, 241 (XXXI. i);

Epigrams, 218 (X. xxiii), 251 (II. lxxxvi. 9-10), 255 (I. xv. 11-12), 260 (XI. lvi), 261 (II. lxxx), 267 (VI. lxiv. 6), 268 (VII. lxiv. 65), 418 (XI. lviii), 689 (VI. xxx), 756 (I. lxxxv; II. xiii), 783 (VI. xxx), 806 (II. xx; VI. xii), 842 (I. xc), 848 (VI. ii), 860 (VIII. xii. 3-4), 877 (X. xli), 878 (VI. xc), 1122 (VIII. xv), 1250 (X. x. 8).

Martini, Martin (Jesuit missionary; 1614-61).

Historia Sinica (Munich, 1658), 204 (IV. xxv), 255 (I. xxxiv), 531 (V), 546 (V. xxiv), 582 (IV. xxi), 584 (V), 778 (IV. xi), 857 (III. xxviii), 901 (I), 909 (VI. i), 927 (I), 930 (IV. ii; VI. i), 1062 (III. i), 1075 (V. xxxvii; VI. i), 1097 (VI. i), 1270 (preface), 1287 (IV. xxiv).

Matthaeus, Antoine (Dutch jurist; 1635-1710).

De Criminibus (first edition at Ticino before 1685), 77 (V. v. 6 on Digest XLVIII), 83 (V. iii. 16 on Digest XLVIII; X. i. 1-2 on Digest XLVII), 141 (XIX. i on Digest XLVIII), 262 (V. i. 9 on Digest XLVIII), 286 (III. iii, 13 ff. on Digest XLVIII), 306 (XLVII. i. 7), 504 (XVI. v on Digest XLVII), 518 (XVI. v on Digest XLVII), 648 (XIX. iv and XX. iv. 14 on Digest XLVIII), 664 (I. iv. 4 on Digest XLVII), 779 (XIV. ii. 13 ff. on Digest XLVIII), 871 (III. i. 13 on Digest XLVII), 918 (V. i. 5 on Digest XLVII), 1183 (V. ii on Digest XLVIII), 1193 (XIX. v on Digest XLVIII), 1202 (I. i. 9 on Digest XLVII; XVIII. iv. 28 on Digest XLVIII), 1206 (V. iii. 10 and XVIII. iv on Digest XLVIII), 1208 (I. iii. 2, 3 on Digest XLVII; VIII. i, ii on Digest XLVII), 1214 (I. ii on Digest XLVII), 1216 (IV. ii. 2, 3 on Digest XLVII), 1220 (XVIII. iv. 30 on Digest XLVIII), 1221 (XVIII. iv. 30 on Digest XLVIII), 1226 (II. v. 10

- Matthaeus (cont.).
 on Digest XLVIII, 1334 (II. i. 5, 6 on Digest XLVIII), 1358 (XVIII. i. 6 and 10 on Digest XLVIII); Prolegomena to De Criminibus, 76 (ii,
 §§ 5-8), 82 (i, § 13), 83 (i, § 11; i, § 15;
 xiii), 84 (i, §§ 9-10, 14), 85 (i, § 7), 86
 (i, §§ 6 f.), 130 (iii, §§ 2-3), 183 (ii, § 1), 229 (iii, § 5), 256 (iii, § 4), 318 (i, §§
 7-9), 1206 (i, §§ 5-6).
- Matthew, see Bible.
- Maurocenus (Andrea Morosini; Venetian historian; 1558-1618).
Historia Veneta (Venice, 1623), 415 (V,
 p. 193), 695 (XIV, p. 641), 990 (XVII), 1064 (XIII, pp. 517 ff.), 1149 (IV, p.
 147), 1251 (VIII, pp. 301 f.; XII,
 p. 484), 1279 (XVII), 1335 (I).
- Maximus of Tyre (Greek philosopher; 2nd century Christian Era).
Dissertations, 14 (xxxix. Vb), 116 (xiii.
 IXa and b), 117 (xli. Va), 481 (xiii.
 IIIId), 483 (xx. IXe), 690 (xxxv. II), 730 (xxxix. Ic; xl. Ic), 1293 (xxiv. IIe).
- Mela, Pomponius (Latin geographer; fl.
 50 A.D.).
De Situ Orbis, 173 (III. iii), 790 (III. ii.
 3), 861 (II. ii), 865 (I. viii), 893 (I. xix), 1155 (I. vii).
- Melanchthon, Philip (German scholar; 1497-1560).
Epitome Philosophiae Moralis (Strassburg, 1539), 1067 (general reference).
- Mémoires touchant les Ambassadeurs, see Abraham de Wicquefort.
- Menagius (Gilles Menage; French scholar; 1613-92).
Origines de la Langue Française (Paris, 1650), 1152 (general reference).
- Menander (Athenian comic poet; born ca.
 342 B.C.).
Monastichoi, 209, note 1 (29 and 543), 249 (557), 251 (96), 918 (96 and 557), 1270 (30).
- Meurs, Jan de (Dutch historian; 1579-1639).
Miscellanea Laconica (Amsterdam 1661), 1328 (IV. xiv).
- Micah, see Bible.
- Michael of Ephesus (Byzantine monk and philosopher; 11th and 12th centuries).
In Ethica Nicomachea Commentarium, 124
 (V. viii), 128 (XXIII C, p. 53, 8 ff.), 130 (V. xv).
- Milton, John (English poet and essayist; 1608-74).
On the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce
 (London, 1643), 883 (II, p. 86).
- Modestinus, Herennius (Roman jurist; fl.
 240 A.D.).
Commentary on the Digest, 108 (I. iii. 7), 1219 (VII. iv. 21).
- Monconys, Balthasar de (French traveller; 1611-65).
Voyages (Lyon, 1665-6), 775 (I, p. 465).
- Montaigne, Michel (French essayist; 1533-92).
Essais (Bordeaux, 1580), 140 (II. vii), 190
 (I. xxx), 193 (I. xxii), 194 (I. xxii), 249
 (I. xxiv), 262 (I. xvii), 333 (I. xxx),
 365 (III. vi), 470 (I. ix; II. xviii), 513
 (I. vii), 544 (I. xxx), 632 (II. viii), 666
 (I. xxi), 717 (I. xxi), 721 (I. xxvi), 841
 (III. v), 878 (III. v) 893 (II. xii), 896
 (I. xxxv), 1124 (III. vi), 1149 (I. xv),
 1165 (II. v), 1222 (II. xxxvi), 1235
 (III. i), 1243 (I. xxx), 1250 (I. xvi), 1321 (I. xvi).
- Moquet, John (French explorer; born 1575).
Itinerarium (Rouen, 1645), 1105 (IV).
- More, Thomas (English statesman; 1478-1535).
Utopia (Louvain, 1516), 262 (II), 368 (II),
 541 (general reference), 693 (II), 1124
 (I), 1147 (II), 1194 (II), 1195 (II), 1214
 (I), 1235 (II), 1308 (II), 1335 (II).
- Mornacius (Antoine Mornac, French jurist; †1620).
On the Code (Observationes in XXIV primos Libros Digestorum et in IV priores Libros Codicis, Paris, 1616-19), 508 (II. xxvii. 1);
On the Digest (Paris, 1616-19), 182 (IX.
 iii. 7); 287 (I. i. 3), 630 (V. ii. 2 and 4), 696 (XVIII. i. 1), 704 (XIX. v. 5), 720 (XVII. i. 26, § 6), 738 (XIX. i.
 12).
- Mornay, Philippe de (French Protestant apologist and jurist; 1549-1623).
De la Vérité de la Religion Chrétienne (Antwerp, 1581), 461 (xxvi), 956 (xvi).
- Moschus (Greek poet; 2nd century B.C.).
Idyls, 204 (v. 6), 466 (i. 8-9), 670 (i).

- Naevius (Latin epic and dramatic poet; ca. 270-ca. 199 B.C.).
Bellum Punicum, 1252 (fragment 63 Baehrens).
- Naudeus or Naudé, Gabriel (French philosopher; 1600-53).
Coups d'État (Rome, 1639), III (iii, p. 193).
Nehemiah, see Bible.
- Nepos, Cornelius (Latin historian; ca. 100-ca. 24 B.C.).
Agesilaus, 472 (iii), 1321 (ii);
Alcibiades, 15 (i. 3-4), 574 (xi), 1241 (vi);
Atticus, 719 (xv), 958 (xiii);
Epaminondas, 191 (iv), 342 (vii, viii), 722 (vii, viii), 850 (x);
Eumenes, 480 (iii), 1009 (xiii);
Lysander, 198 (general reference);
Miltiades, 447 (i), 681 (vi), 1036 (viii), 1276 (ii);
Pelopidas, 664 (i. 2);
Preface and Cimon, 904 (iv. and i. 2 and 4).
Nepotismus, see Anonymous.
- Neuhof or Nieuhoff, Nyhof, Nyhov, Johann (Dutch statesman; 1618-72).
Generalis Descriptio Chinae (Geschiedenissen . . . on der het Reizen die Sinesche Landtschappen, Amsterdam, 1665), 294 (i), 364 (i), 679 (iii), 1074 (i), 1123 (i bis), 1246 (iv);
Legatio (Latin edition of the above work, Amsterdam, 1668), 349 (pp. 267-8), 917 (p. 281), 927 (general reference), 1060 (general reference), 1270 (p. 280).
- Nicephoras Gregoras, see Gregoras Nicephorus.
- Nicetas Choniates or Acominatus (Byzantine historian; †ca. 1216 A.D.).
De Imperio Andronici, 858 (II), 905 (general reference), 1073 (I), 1114 (p. 9A), 1280 (I).
- Nicolaus of Damascus (Greek historian; born ca. 74 B.C.).
De Moribus Gentium, 72 (fragment 105 Jacoby), 384 (fragment 103b Jacoby), 528 (fragment 103i Jacoby), 727 (fragment 103l Jacoby), 845 (fragment 103d Jacoby), 1199 (fragment 103c Jacoby).
- Nicole, Pierre (pseudonym, Willelmus Wendrockius; French essayist; 1625-95).
Notes on Pascal (Litterae Provinciales . . . Notis Illustratae (Sine loco, 1661), 42 (general reference).
Nicole, Wendrock, see Nicole, Pierre.
- Nonius Marcellus (Latin grammarian; 4th century Christian Era).
De Compendiosa Doctrina, 847 (general reference).
- Nonnus (Greek poet of Egypt; 4th and 5th centuries Christian Era).
Dionysiaca, 77 (XLII. 325 f.).
Numbers, see Bible.
- Ocellus Lucanus (Greek philosopher; 1st century B.C.).
De Natura Universi, 904 (IV. 12).
- Olearius (Adam Oelschlaeger or Olearius; German traveller and scholar; ca. 1600-71).
Itinerarium Persicum (Zee en Landt Reyze deur Persien naar Oost Indien, Amsterdam, 1658), 286 (V. xxii), 484 (IV. vii), 730 (I. i), 760 (V. xxxvi), 762 (III. vii), 775 (V. xxiii), 795 (IV. xxx), 821 (V. xxxi), 876 (V. xxii), 922 (III. vi), 1141 (V. xxxii), 1211 (III. vi), 1318 (V. xx).
- Oppian (Greek poet of Cilicia; 2nd and 3rd centuries Christian Era).
On Fishing, 157 (II. 16 ff.), 165 (II. 44 ff.), 181 (I. 702 ff.), 307 (III. 197 ff.), 841 (I. 702 ff.), 927 (V. 89), 1244 (I. 683), 1356 (I. 274 ff.).
The Chase, 149 (III. 151 f.), 181 (I. 239 ff.), 282 (IV. 35), 841 (III. 107 ff.), 867 (III. 237 ff.), 1243 (III. 68);
- Orosius, Paulus (Latin historian and Christian apologist; fl. 410).
Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri VII, 440 (V. xviii), 698 (general reference).
- Orphica (Jewish-Christian period), Argonautica, 437 (1321 ff.).
- Osiander, J. Adamus (German scholar; 1622-97).
Notae ad Grotium (Tübingen 1671), 28 (p. 60).
- Osorius, Hieronymus (Jeronimo Osorio da Fonseca; Portuguese bishop; 1506-80).
De Gestis Regis Emanuel (Lisbon, 1571), 630 (IV, p. 117), 722 (XI), 853 (II), 1100 (passim), 1184 (X, p. 384), 1256 (I), 1262 (II), 1347 (I).

- Ovid (Publius Ovidius Naso; Latin poet; 43 B.C.-17 A.D.).
Amores, 62 (III. iv. 9 ff.), 440 (I. x. 29 ff.), 495 (III. iii. 13-14), 679 (I. x. 37 ff.), 878 (III. iv. 37-8);
Art of Love, 352 (III. 93-4), 679 (II. 163), 709 (I. 250-1), 1215 (I. 655-6); Fasti, 1006 (V), 1172 (VI. 647-8), 1250 (V. 298), 1253 (V. 26);
From the Pontus, 73 (I. vii. 37-8), 100 (II. ix. 23-4), 141 (I. i. 62 ff.), 254 (I. v. 44), 374 (IV. viii. 37), 1193 (I. ii. 125);
Heroides, 68 (II. 147-8), 195 (I. iv. 131 ff.), 240 (II. 85 f.), 246 (I. xv. 66), 439 (VI. 137-8), 440 (XII. 131-2), 500 (XXI. 135 ff.), 685 (XVII. 71-2), 716 (IV. 75), 1206 (X. 82);
Metamorphoses, 60 (VII. 19), 78 (IX. 468 f.), 102 (VIII. 59), 148, note 1 (I. 76-7), 157 (I. 107), 163 (III. 122-3), 180 (XV. 75 ff.), 247 (II. 781 ff.), 352 (VI. 349 ff.), 440 (VIII. 130-1), 513 (II. 101-2), 527 (XV. ii), 543 (I. 135 ff.), 544 (I. 89 ff.), 558 (VI. 349), 563 (III. 587), 578 (V. 518-19), 579 (VIII. 427), 634 (IX. 24), 899 (X. 346 ff.), 902 (IX. 458, 535, 558 ff.), 903 (IX. 457-8, 537-58), 1072 (XII. 626 ff.), 1081 (III. 588), 1154 (VIII. 170), 1225 (IV. 669-70), 1244 (IX. xi. 437-8), 1245 (VI. iv. 127 ff.), 1252 (XIII. 140-1), 1259 (XIII. 366-7), 1348 (XV. 28-9), 1366 (VI. 197);
Remedy for Love, 499 (II. 783-4);
Tristia, 84 (V. xiv. 45-6), 176 (V. ii. 71), 467 (V. x. 37), 495 (IV. iv. 45-6), 768 (II. 483-4), 801 (III. xi. 27-8), 826 (V. x. 43), 832 (III. x. 35-6), 1238 (V. x. 43).
Palaephatus (Greek mythographer; 4th century B.C.).
De Fabulosis Narrationibus (= De Incrediblebus), 854 (I. xxxiii).
Palladius Rutilius Taurus Aemilianus (Latin writer on agriculture; 4th century Christian Era).
De Re Rustica, 297 (I. vi).
Panormita, Antonio Beccadelli (Italian philosopher; 1394-1471).
De Rebus Gestis Alfonsi (Pisa, 1485), 482 (II).
Pascal, Blaise (French philosopher; 1623-62).
Lettres Provinciales (Paris, 1657), 42 (v), 478 (ix), 485 (xv), 761 (viii);
Pensées (Paris, 1670), 45 (vii. 3).
Paul of Venice or Paulus Servita, see Peter Suavis.
Paul Warnefrid (Paulus Diaconus; Lombard historian; ca. 720-ca. 798 A.D.).
History of the Lombards, 261 (XV), 505 (II. xxvii; V. xl), 507 (XVIII), 749 (general reference), 775 (II. vii), 869 (XI), 1281 (III. xvi), 1287 (III. xvi), 1356 (I. ii).
Paulus, Julius (Roman jurist; †235 A.D.).
In the Digest, 670 (XVIII. i. 34, § 4), 696 (XVIII. i. 1).
Paulus de Genazono (Gregorius de Arimino; Italian monk; 15th century).
Sententiae (Paris, 1482), 541 (II. xvi).
Pausanias (Greek geographer; fl. 175 A.D.).
Description of Greece, 1048 (VIII. x. 9), 1333 (VII. x. 9).
Perez, Antoine (Spanish jurist; 1585-1672).
On the Code (Amsterdam, 1669), 306 (VI. ii. 3).
Persius Flaccus, Aulus (Latin satirist; 34-62).
Satires, 238 (iii. 133 f.), 1117 (iii. 71 f.).
Petronius, Gaius (Latin satirist; †ca. 66 A.D.).
Satires, 447 (141), 558 (100), 1199 (107).
Phaedrus (Latin fabulist; early 1st century Christian Era).
Fables, 332 (I. xxvii), 375 (I. xxiii), 676 (III. xii), 778 (I. xvii bis), 929 (III. xvi).
Philippians, see Bible.
Philo Judaeus (Jewish philosopher; 1st century Christian Era).
Against Flaccus, 1211 (general reference).
De Caritate, 755 (pp. 701-2);
De Confusione Linguarum, 834 (xxvii), 1207 (xxxi);
De Iudice, 834 (ii);
De Migratione Abrahami, 1242 (xxix);
De Praemiis et Poenis, 1018 (ix);
De Profugis, 1116 (xvi);
De Temulentia or De Ebrietate, 192 (xlvii xlviii);
De Victimis, 316 (general reference);

- Legum Allegoriae*, 928 (III. iii);
On Abraham, 194 (xxxiv), 1244 (xlvii), 1356 (xiv);
On Joseph, 1132 (vi);
On Monarchy, 120 (ii. 13);
On Noah's Planting, 724 (xxiii), 1081 (xvii);
On Nobility, 1271 (general reference);
On Sacrifices, 491 (xxviii);
On Special Laws, 65 (p. 608), 182 (III. viii), 275 (III. xv), 496 (II. i), 677 (II. viii), 882 (III. vi; III. lxxx), 899 (III. iii), 904 (III. xxii), 918 (general reference), 1195 (general reference), 1201 (III. xvii), 1207 (xvi, xvii), 1208 (general reference), 1213 (general reference), 1227 (general reference);
On the Cherubim, 524 (general reference);
On the Creation of the World, 461 (general reference), 1013 (general reference), 1025 (general reference);
On the Embassy to Gaius, 908 (x);
On the Life of Moses, 286 (I. lvii), 363 (I. vii), 635 (III. xxxii);
On the Ten Commandments, 832 (xxvii), 1138 (general reference), 1195 (general reference);
That Every Virtuous Man is Free, 546 (general reference);
That God is Immutabile, 346 (iv);
That the Worse is Wont to Attack the Better, 1184 (xxvi. 97).
 Philostratus (Greek sophist; 2nd and 3rd centuries Christian Era).
Life of Apollonius of Tyana, 73 (V. x), 139 (VI. xxi), 218 (VII. xvii), 287 (VI. v), 347 (V. i), 437 (III. xxiv), 469 (IV. xi. 33), 470 (II. xxx), 470, note 2 (II. xxx), 479 (V. v), 494 (VI. ix), 584 (II. xv; VI. xvi), 692 (II. iii), 740 (I. xv), 766 (III. ix. 30), 788 (III. xx), 850 (VIII. vii), 922 (VIII. vii. 12), 1034 (III. ix; III. xxx), 1059 (V. xxxv), 1073 (III. x. 34), 1206 (I. xxxvii), 1244 (VI. xvi), 1255 (III. xxvii); Lives of the Sophists, 584 (II), 800 (I. xxvi).
 Photius (Byzantine scholar; 10th century Christian Era).
Bibliotheca, 1036 (v), 1165 (p. 47a Bekker);
Nomocanon, 769 (XIII. xxix).
 Piccart, Michael (German scholar; 1574-1620).
On Aristotle's Politics (Commentarii in Politicos Aristotelis Libros, Leipzig, 1615), 852 (VII. xvi), 1365 (III. iii).
 Pindar (Greek lyric poet; born ca. 522 B.C.).
Isthmian Odes, 268 (IV. 31-2);
Nemean Odes, 472 (V. 30 ff.), 488 (VII. 70-1), 1174 (IV. 52);
Olympian Odes, 60 (VII. 30-1), 268 (X. 39-40), 340 (IX. 58-9), 625 (X. 88-90), 756 (X. 9 ff.), 1121 (XIII. 6 ff.), 1243 (VI. 123-4), 1247 (I. 55 ff.), 1248 (IV. 26 f.);
Pythian Odes, 96 (II. 173), 1025 (II. 87-8).
 Pinto, Ferdinand Mendez (Portuguese adventurer; 1509-83).
Peregrinaçam (Lisbon, 1614), 459 (lxi), 645 (xxi; lx), 916 (liv), 1149 (x), 1227 (lv).
 Pisasecius or Piasecki, Paulus (Polish historian; 1580-1649).
Chronica (Cracow, 1645), 1091 (year 1632).
 Pithou, Pierre, see Collectio, &c.
 Plato (Athenian philosopher; ca. 428-347 B.C.).
Alcibiades, 190 (I, p. 110E), 858 (I, p. 121 B C), 1263 (I, p. 120E);
Apology, 46 (p. 29D), 221, n. 1 (p. 41C D), 258 (p. 28D), 1145 (general reference);
Convivium, 28 (p. 180E), 398 (p. 183);
Cratylus, 179 (p. 436D), 462 (p. 383A B; p. 384C; p. 385A), 463 (p. 385C);
Critias, 1176 (p. 106B);
Crito, 929 (p. 45D), 1165 (p. 50 f.);
Epistles, 190 (x, p. 358C), 346 (ix, p. 358A), 1107 (vi, p. 331C D), 1142 (vii, p. 329D), 1248 (x, p. 358C); Euthydemus, 680 (p. 304B);
Gorgias, 98 (p. 483A ff.), 249 (p. 484D), 251, note 1 (p. 506A), 1175 (p. 525 f.), 1178 (p. 512B);
Hipparchus, 693 (p. 231D);
Laws, 58 (VIII), 78 (V, p. 731C), 83 (XII, p. 955B), 84 (IX, 856B), 165 (I, p. 625E F), 181 (VIII, p. 840D E), 191 (VIII), 194 (VII, p. 794D E), 259 (IX, p. 873C), 279 (IX, p. 874C), 283 (IX, p. 872C), 285 (IX, p. 869B C; IX, p. 869C), 286 (IX, p. 869D), 287 (IX, pp. 865-6), 290 (IX, p. 874B), 321 (XI, Plato (cont.).

p. 936c d), 353 (VIII, 844B; VIII, p. 845A), 363 (XII), 370 (VIII, p. 847 B c), 383 (IX), 488 (XI), 520 (XII, p. 949A B), 541 (VIII, p. 843A), 546 (V, p. 739D E), 557 (XI, p. 927C), 574 (VIII, p. 843D), 582 (X), 584 (XI, p. 913A ff.), 603 (VIII, 842E ff.), 644 (XI), 649 (XII, p. 954C ff.), 695 (V, p. 742A), 709 (XI, p. 916A B; XI, p. 917C), 710 (XI, p. 921A B), 731 (XI, p. 915D E), 835 (XI), 840 (IV, p. 721A), 842 (VIII, p. 839A), 846 (XI, p. 930C), 847 (IV, p. 721B; XI), 881 (XI, p. 974), 901 (VIII, p. 838C), 904 (V), 917 (VII, p. 808D), 926 (IV, p. 717B C; XI, p. 932; p. 973E), 943 (XI, p. 930D E), 955 (VI, p. 766A), 968 (V, p. 737D), 1014 (XI, pp. 934E-935A), 1015 (VII, p. 801 C D), 1148 (VIII, p. 831A), 1176 (IX, p. 854D), 1178 (VII, p. 808D), 1179 (IX), 1180 (XI, p. 934A), 1201 (IX, p. 867B), 1205 (XII, p. 941C D), 1231 (XI), 1278 (VI, p. 775A B);

Menexenus, 1025 (pp. 238E-9A);

Minos, 62 (p. 320A); 1172 (p. 320B);

Phaedo, 259 (pp. 62B-3A);

Politicus, 1140 (p. 299C);

Protagoras, 198 (p. 323A B), 741 (p. 328 B c), 1174 (p. 324B);

Republic, 55 (II, p. 379), 117, note 1 (X, 617E), 249 (VII, p. 536E), 253 (V, p. 480A), 481 (III, p. 389B), 852 (V, p. 460E ff.), 864 (V), 866 (V, p. 461 B ff.), 917 (VI, p. 491E), 958 (II, 369 B ff.), 962 (II, 360C), 1118 (I, p. 342E), 1322 (V, p. 468A);

Symposium, 989 (p. 194B);

Theaetetus, 1271 (p. 175A);

Timaeus, 929 (p. 121C);

Timaeus, 79 (p. 86E), 527 (general reference).

Plautus, Titus Maccus (Roman comic poet; †ca. 184 B.C.).

Amphitruo, 267 (703-5), 270 (1142), 1325 (396);

Asinaria, 171 (495), 700 (519-20), 731 (199), 871 (874);

Captives, 704 (378 ff.), 740 (489), 833 (791);

Casina, 942 (general reference);

Cistellaria, 1063, note 1 (35);

Curculio, 412 (705 f.), 843 (33 ff.);

Epidicus, 1280 (226 f.);

Rudens, 412 (1371-4), 573 (971-4);

The Baccides, 833 (791);

The Haunted House, 1126 (379 f.);

The Menaechmi, 941 (87);

The Merchant, 719 (376), 871 (Act IV), 874 (824-5);

The Persian, 737 (549 ff.), 741 (586), 940 (594 ff., 738 ff.);

The Pot of Gold, 55 (743 f.), 62 (750 f.), 583 (general reference);

Trinummus, 584 (175 ff.), 1237 (81 f.);

Truculentus, 76 (831 f.), 267 (768), 352 (563 f.), 834 (489), 1172 (160 f.).

Plinius Caecilius Secundus, Gaius (Latin writer of letters; 62-ca. 114).

Letters, 283 (II. x), 295 (I. xii), 393 (II. xx), 430 (III. xix), 480 (III. xvi), 492 (IV. xxv), 495 (II. xx), 570 (IV. xv), 615 (VIII. xviii), 622 (II. vi; IV. x; V. vii), 631 (VII. xxiv), 714 (VII. xiv), 717 (I. xxiv), 737 (VIII. ii), 849 (I. xiv), 918 (IX. xii), 940 (VIII. xiv), 988 (II. xii), 992 (VII. xiv), 1057 (IV. xxii), 1107 (III. xiv), 1142 (III. ix), 1172 (VIII. xxii), 1219 (VI. xiii), 1230 (V. iii), 1259 (IX. v), 1279 (VI. xix), 1346 (X. lxvi);

Panegyric, 41 (lxxiv. 3), 101 (xxxviii. 7), 117 (lvi), 151 (lxxvi. 4), 242 (lxxi. 4), 337 (ii. 4), 373 (xxxviii. 4), 575 (lxxxi), 635 (xxviii. 5), 644 (xxxvii. 2), 828 (lxxx. i), 860 (lxxiii. 4 and 7), 968 (xli. 2), 979 (lxvi), 989 (lxii), 1043 (general reference), 1055 (vi. i), 1057 (xlv), 1066 (lxv), 1124 (xli), 1144 (xxxiv-xxxv), 1216 (xxxv. 3), 1282 (xxxvi. 4; xli. 3).

Plinius Secundus, Gaius (Roman naturalist; 23-79).

Natural History, v, note 1 (preface xxi and xxiii), 62 (XIV. xxii), 150 (XVIII), 152 (VII, introduction), 209 (IX. xlv), 252 (III, preface; XI. iii. 6), 255 (VII. xl), 257 (II. vii), 324 (XXIX. i), 349 (XXV. i), 362 (XXVI. i), 457 (XI. li. 271), 458 (VII. i), 464 (VI. xxx), 506 (XXV. ii), 528 (VIII. xlv), 542 (XXIII. i), 562 (IX. xv), 571 (IV. xii), 574 (XI. v), 581 (IX. xix), 678 (XII. i. 6), 679 (XVI. iv. 7, li), 680 (VII. xii), 681 (IX. xxv; xxxv), 682 (VI. xvii. 20;

Plinius Secundus (cont.).

- IX. xvii, xxxiv; X. xxix; XII. xiv, xvii, xix; XIII. xv; XXII. ii. 21; XXXIII. preface v; XXXVII; XXXVII. iv, 683 (VIII. lvii), 691 (XXXIII. iii), 693 (XXXIII. iii; XXXIV. xiv), 695 (VI. xxii), 704 (XXXIII. iii), 728 (XXXIII. i), 740 (VIII. xxxvii), 746 (VIII. xxxiii), 748 (IX. lv), 813 (XVIII. iii), 829 (preface x), 833 (VIII. xxii), 842 (X. lxiii), 847 (V. xvii), 852 (VI. xxii), 857 (VII. v), 865 (V. viii), 919 (IX. xxiii), 937 (VII. lvi), 1073 (VII. xxii), 1198 (V. i), 1211 (II. lxiii), 1278 (VI. xxiii; xxviii; XII. xviii), 1279 (III. xx), 1329 (VII. lvi), 1332 (XXXIV. xiv. 139), 1352 (VI. xxvi), 1356 (III. xiii).
- Plutarch (Greek philosopher and biographer; ca. 50-ca. 120).
- Ad Principem Ineruditum*, 1056 (iii, p. 780c), 1063 (iv, p. 781B);
- Advice about Keeping Well*, 253 (xxiv, p. 135E), 254 (xxiv, p. 135E);
- Against Colotes*, 103 (xxx, p. 1125E), 966 (xxx);
- Amatoriae Narrationes*, 84 (iii);
- Amatorius*, 878 (xxiii, p. 769A);
- An Virtus Doceri Possit*, 82 (ii, p. 439D);
- Apophthegms*, 84 (Cato), 101 (ii, p. 172E), 198 (p. 229A B), 206 (Epaminondas, x, p. 193A), 630 (p. 184A ff.), 639 (p. 188A), 689 (p. 185E), 888 (p. 175F), 928 (p. 196A), 988 (p. 188A), 1074 (p. 174B, 183F), 1137 (p. 175 f.), 1256 (p. 191F), 1271 (pp. 183D, 187B, 225F), 1280 (p. 190A);
- Banquet of Seven Wise Men*, 181 (xxi, p. 163E), 893 (xv, p. 158F), 1201 (p. 155F), 1256 (general reference);
- Bruta Animalia Ratione Utii*, 528 (viii, p. 991C);
- Conjugal Precepts*, 857 (xxxiv), 874 (xliv), 1364 (xxxiv);
- Convivium*, 364 (vi, p. 151A);
- De Audiendis Poetis*, 481 (general reference);
- De E apud Delphos*, 1365 (p. 392A B);
- De Esu Carnium*, 528 (II. iv, p. 998B), 531 (I);
- De Garrulitate*, 484 (p. 507B ff.);
- De Invidia et Odio*, 351 (vi);
- De Sanitate Tuenda*, 36 (xxiii, p. 135F);
- De Seta Numinis Vindicta*, 965 (ii, pp.

- 548D E, 549B; xi, p. 555E), 966 (ix, p. 554A), 1160 (iv, p. 549F), 1221 (xv), 1225 (xvi), 1227 (p. 552D), 1365 (xv);
- De Tranquillitate Animi*, 858 (p. 467E F);
- De Vitando Aere Alieno*, 353 (i, p. 827D), 752 (v, p. 829C);
- Greek Questions*, 578 (xxx), 749 (liii);
- How to Study Poetry*, 72 (xiii, p. 35C);
- How to Tell a Flatterer from a Friend*, 827 (i, p. 48 f.), 1118 (xvi, p. 58F), 1247 (general reference);
- Instituta Laconica*, 83 (p. 237C, viii), 266 (p. 239C), 689 (p. 238E);
- Laconian Apophthegms*, 111 (lxxiii), 304 (pp. 223C, 229D), 323 (p. 233F, xxxiv), 466 (xix), 481 (p. 214E), 507 (p. 263D), 631 (p. 227, xv), 801 (p. 223A), 847 (xiv), 935 (p. 213C, ii), 1136 (p. 234A), 1256 (p. 208D), 1297 (p. 209B).
- On False Modesty*, 427 (x, p. 533B), 1271 (xiv);
- On Listening to Lectures*, 153 (i, p. 37D), 220 (i, p. 37D), 742 (p. 41D E);
- On Noble Traits of Women*, 844 (p. 249 D E), 892 (p. 249C);
- On Superstition*, 241 (viii, p. 169C), 288 (general reference);
- On the Fortune of Alexander*, 742 (ii, pp. 333-4);
- On the Love of Brothers*, 121 (xii), 630 (xviii, p. 489E ff.), 637 (general reference);
- On the Love of Offspring*, 183 (iii, p. 495 B C);
- Parallel Lives*:
- Agessilaus*, 111 (xxx. 4), 199 (xxiii. 4), 357 (xvi), 1076 (pp. 612-13);
- Agis*, 642 (p. 797);
- Alcibiades*, 1212 (xiii);
- Alexander*, 111 (pp. 672D, 679A), 251 (vii. 5), 288 (lix), 1219 (xi);
- Antony*, 619 (lviii), 1124 (p. 926B), 1238 (lxxv);
- Artaxerxes*, 1101 (ii), 1134 (xxiii. 3);
- Brutus*, 399 (vi. 5);
- Caesar*, 1207 (lxvii);
- Camillus*, 98 (xvii), 848 (ii), 1281 (pp. 132-3);
- Cato the Elder*, 683 (xviii), 688 (iv. 4), 759 (xxi), 825 (xv. 3), 941 (xxi);
- Cato the Younger*, 866 (xxv, p. 771);
- Cicero*, 956 (xli);

Plutarch (cont.).

- Cimon*, 354 (xvii. 1), 904 (p. 480e);
Crassus, 1280 (ii), 1280, note 1 (ii. 8);
Demetrius, III (p. 900), 512 (p. 890),
 742 (xxvii, p. 901b), 906 (xxxviii),
 1009 (p. 896b), 1093 (p. 914b), 1133
 (xxiv);
Demosthenes, III (xxvii);
Dion, 1034 (xlvii);
Eumenes, 756 (p. 591c);
Fabius, 928 (xxiv, p. 188A);
Gaius Sempronius Gracchus, 1245 (iv);
Lucullus, 922 (xx, p. 504c d);
Lycurgus, 511 (xxxi), 694 (ix), 847
 (xv. 2), 866 (xv. 6 f.), 918 (xvi), 1026
 (xix), 1137 (general reference);
Lysander, III (vii. 2), 356 (xxvii. 3);
Marius, 173 (vi. 1), 279 (xiv, p. 413), 511 (xxix, p. 432), 713 (xxxviii,
 p. 427e), 1090 (ix);
Nicias, 1212 (xi);
Numa, 866 (p. 76b), 922 (p. 71e);
Pelopidas, 99 (xxiv. 3), 342 (xxiv), 664
 (general reference);
Pericles, 369 (xxix. 4), 813 (xxx);
Phocion, 265 (xxxii), 823 (ix, p. 745c d);
Pompey, 258 (1);
Pyrrhus, 177 (xii), 960 (xii. 4), 1238
 (xxxi);
Romulus, 679 (xiii. 6), 808 (xvii), 833
 (i, p. 25b), 881 (xxii), 1043 (general reference), 1266 (xiii);
Solon, 102 (xv), 353 (xxiii), 588 (xxiii),
 641 (xxi. 2), 737 (p. 80), 755 (xv),
 791 (p. 189e), 866 (xx), 878 (xx),
 922 (p. 85), 926 (xxii, p. 90), 929
 (xxii), 1064 (v), 1065 (viii), 1149
 (xxxi), 1207 (xvii), 1209 (xxi), 1345
 (xv and xvi), 1351 (xxiv);
Themistocles, 190 (xxvii), 904 (xxxii);
Theseus, 1154 (xv), 1365 (xxiii, p. 10);
Parallels, 1328 (p. 306b);
Political Precepts, 36 (xxv, p. 818A), 1260
 (p. 211b);
Quomodo Quis suos in Virtute Sentiat Profectus, 78 (pp. 82f, 83);
Roman Questions, 352 (lxxv), 492 (xliv),
 508 (xxviii), 821 (cxiii), 891 (cviii),
 904 (vi, p. 265c), 1189 (lxxxii), 1266
 (p. 278c d);
Symposiacs, 72 (II. i, p. 633 A-C), 351
 (VII. iv), 374 (VIII. vii), 405 (VII.

- ix-x), 424 (IX. xiii), 528 (IV. iv), 529 (VIII. viii), 804 (IX. xiii), 1256 (I. ii,
 iii);
The Education of Children, 251 (x, p. 8A),
 916 (v, p. 3c), 917 (vii, p. 4c), 921
 (xiii, p. 9b), 988 (ix, p. 6b), 1271
 (p. 3A).
 Pollio, Trebellius (Latin biographer; 4th century Christian Era).
Gallienus, 1093 (general reference), 1282
 (vi);
Thirty Tyrants, 870 (xxx).
 Pollux, Julius (Greek rhetorician; ca. 130-ca. 188).
Onomasticon, 847 (III. 48).
 Polyaeus (Greek tactician; fl. 160 A.D.).
Strategemata, 198 (I. xlv), 240 (III. ix.
 17), 468 (I. xi; V. xvi), 481 (I. xxxiii),
 482 (II. n. 6, 12), 504 (VIII. xxiii. 1), 509 (II. vi), 510 (VII. xxxiv), 513 (V.
 xii. 2), 692 (III. x. 1), 694 (VI. xlvii),
 802 (VI. xv), 892 (VIII. lxiii), 1065
 (II. xxxiii), 1297 (II. x. 5).
 Polybius (Greek historian; ca. 130-ca. 188).
 in Excerpta Peiresciana, 268 (XL. v. 12),
 351 (XXX. xx), 665 (XXXIII. xii), 689 (XXXII. xiii. 10 f.), 1204 (VII. xii.
 11), 1215 (XII. xi. 4), 1278 (X. xxii.
 5);
Histories, 157 (IV. xlv), 165 (XV. xx), 174
 (III. xxiv), 362 (III. xxii; xxiv), 412
 (VI. lvi), 414 (VIII. i, ii; X. xxxiv),
 459 (X. xxxix. 44), 475 (XII. vii), 482
 (XVI. xi), 510 (XII. iv), 609 (XII. vii),
 663 (VI. xxxi), 694 (VI. xlvii), 795
 (XII. vi), 796 (VI), 809 (XV. xviii),
 810 (XXXVI. iv), 956 (XVIII. xv), 968
 (VI. xlv), 1018 (I. ix), 1038 (VI), 1048
 (IV. xxiv), 1153 (I. ix), 1219 (V. xlix),
 1220 (XI. xxvii), 1272 (V. xxvi), 1292
 (XII. xiv), 1297 (I. lxxxiii), 1305 (IV.
 xxvii), 1311 (IV. xxvi, xxvii), 1325 (III. xxx), 1335 (II. xlvii), 1339 (II.
 xxvii; III. xxv), 1357 (VI. xii);
Selections on Embassies, 356 (XXII. xv. 3), 399 (XX. ix), 512 (VIII), 693 (XXVIII.
 v), 798 (XXIII. ix), 809 (XXXV. iv), 992 (XXIII. i. 5 ff.), 1048 (XXX.
 xxxii), 1202 (XXXII. v); 1220 (XXVIII.
 iv), 1286 (XXXVIII. ix. 10), 1333
 (XXXI. viii. 7), 1335 (XXX. v. 8), 1338 (XLI. iv).

- Pontano, Giovanni (Italian humanist; 1426-1503).
Neapolitan History (De Bello Neapolitano), Hagenau, 1530, 1097 (II).
- Porphry (Greek philosopher; 233-304).
On Abstaining from Animal Food, 494 (III. xvi), 529 (IV. iii ff.), 531 (III. xx. 9).
- Priolo, Benjamin (French historian; 1602-67).
History of France (De Rebus Gallicis), Charleville, 1665, 510 (II), 1207 (I. vi).
- Priscian (Latin grammarian; 5th and 6th centuries Christian Era).
De Metris Terentii, 244 (16).
- Proclus (Greek philosopher; 5th century Christian Era).
On Timaeus, 55 (general reference).
- Procopius (Byzantine historian; 6th century Christian Era).
History of the Gothic Wars, 81 (I. vii. 19), 170 (II. xv. 22), 249 (I. ii. 12, 14), 260 (IV. xii. 11), 263 (II. xiv), 854 (IV), 877 (IV. xx. 22), 1043 (I. i. 24 f.), 1141 (I. vii. 19), 1296 (IV. xx), 1309 (I. viii. 36), 1317 (IV. xxix), 1323 (I. i), 1332 (I. vi; IV);
History of the War of the Vandals, 650 (I. iii. 3), 794 (I. xi. 3 f.), 875 (II. xi. 13), 1188 (II. xvi. 19), 1200 (II. iv. 30);
Persian War, 206 (I. iii. 6), 275 (II. iii. 50), 499 (I. iv), 846 (I. v), 1098 (I. xi), 1126 (I. xxiv), 1280 (II. xxvi. 22);
Secret History, 1126 (general reference), 1234 (II).
- Propertius, Sextus (Roman poet; ca. 48-ca. 16 B.C.).
Elegies, 61 (IV. viii. 32).
- Proverbs, see Bible.
- Prudentius Clemens, Aurelius (Christian Latin poet; 348-ca. 410).
Against Symmachus, 990 (I. 604 ff.).
- Pseudo-Aggenius Urbicus (Latin scholar; 5th or 6th century Christian Era).
Commentary on Frontinus, 597 (I. p. 16, II. 25 ff.; I. p. 17, II. 9 ff.).
- Pseudo-Asconius (4th and 5th centuries Christian Era).
On Cicero Against Verres, 631 (II. i. 107), 735 (Divinatio in Q. Caecilium, 50).
- Pseudo-Phocylides (Jewish - Christian period).
Gnomes, 83 (136), 334 (III), 353 (24-6), 531 (84 f.), 842 (188 ff.), 847 (175 f.), 904 (182), 906 (179 f.).
- Publius Syrus (Roman writer of mimes; fl. 43 B.C.).
Sententiae, 557 (332), 644 (222), 877 (223, 340).
- Pufendorf, Samuel (German jurist, author of the work here translated; 1632-94).
De Officio Hominis et Civis (London, 1673), 232 (I. iv), 374, note 1 (I. viii, § 5), 375, note 2 (I. viii, § 6), 379, note 1 (I. i, § 2), 708, note 3 (I. xv, § 3), 959, note 2 (II. v, § 7), 962, note 1 (II. v, § 8), 1011, note 1 (II. vii, § 2), 1035, note 1 (II. viii, § 10), 1057, note 1 (II. ix, § 4), 1107, note 1 (II. ix, § 4), 1118, note 5 (II. xi, § 2), 1154, note 1 (II. xiii, § 2), 1295, note 1 (II. xvi, § 3), 1336, note 2 (II. xvii, § 6); Elementa Jurisprudentiae Universalis (Amsterdam, 1660), preface (general reference).
- Puteanus, Erycius (Dutch scholar; 1574-1646).
Historia Insubrica (Louvain, 1614), 1043 (II).
- Quintilianus, Marcus Fabius (Roman rhetorician; ca. 35-ca. 100).
Declamations, 84 (cclv), 152 (cccvi), 170 (v), 197 (ccclv), 244 (xiii), 247 (ccxcvi), 257 (iii; iv), 262 (iv), 267 (vii. 4), 271 (xiii. 11), 279 (cccxliv), 294 (ix. 18), 314 (xiii), 332 (iii), 342 (xiii. 8), 353 (v. 6), 369 (xii. 4), 415 (cccxi), 419 (cccxxx), 501 (cccxlvi), 574 (xiii), 618 (cccxlvi), 631 (cccliv), 632 (v. 12), 640 (cccxi), 644 (ccclxxiii), 683 (xii. 21), 725 (ccclv), 727 (ccclv), 765 (cccxx), 777 (ccclxxiii), 778 (xvi), 803 (cccxxxii), 812 (cccxxxii), 813 (cccliv), 818 (cccxxxii), 820 (ccclxxiv), 828 (ccclxxii), 832 (cccxi), 843 (xiv. 2, 3), 857 (ccclix), 863 (ccclvii), 888 (ii. 14; cccvi), 911 (cccxxxviii), 926 (ix), 928 (x), 929 (ccclxxviii; ccclxxv), 932 (ccclvi), 939 (vi. 17), 990 (cccliv), 992 (ccclxv), 1121 (cccliv), 1133 (ccclii), 1155 (cccliii), 1163 (xi. 8), 1164 (cccxlvi; cccxxxviii), 1181 (ccclxxiv), 1198 (iii. 15), 1199 (ccclii), 1200 (ccclxv), 1207 (ccclxxii), 1215 (xi).

Quintilianus (cont.).

5), 1216 (xi. 6; cccxxxi), 1220 (xi. 7), 1227 (cdlxxvii), 1244 (cccv), 1250 (cdlii), 1293 (ix. 13), 1308 (cdlv), 1322 (cccxxxix);

Institutes of Oratory, iii (V. x. 120), iv, note 1 (VIII. xx. 23), v (XII. xi. 27-8), vi (III. vi. 65; VIII. vi. 32), 63 (VII. iv. 12), 67 (I. x. 33), 68 (VII. iii. 31), 73 (VI. iii. 28), 77 (I. vi. 2), 198 (III. viii. 44), 209 (II. xvi), 249 (VI. v. 11), 253 (III. i. 6; vi. 65; XII. xi. 6), 274 (V. xiii. 21; VIII. v. 15), 320 (IV. v. 3; VII. vi. 2), 458 (II. xvi), 462 (I. vi. 16), 463 (I. vi. 34), 464 (XI. iii), 466 (I. vi. 20), 471 (I. v), 489 (II. xvii. 27; XII. i. 41), 679 (XII. vii. 8; XII. ix), 684 (XII. vii), 794 (I. vi), 797 (VII. ix), 798, note 2 (VII. vii. 5), 799, note 1 (VII. vii. 4), 801 (VII. vi. 8), 806 (VII. iv. 10), 811 (VII. viii. 4), 844 (IX. ii. 64), 848 (V. xii. 19), 966 (XII. vii. 2), 989 (X. vii. 21), 1200 (VI. i), 1207 (V. ix. 13), 1216 (XII. ix. 9), 1244 (II. i. 7), 1306 (IV. i. 9), 1312 (V. x. 111).

Quintus Calaber Smyrnaeus (Greek epic poet; 4th century Christian Era).

Posthomerica, 151 (I. 464 f.), 981 (XIII. 269 f.), 1036 (V. 478 f.), 1238 (IX. 283), 1243 (V. 263 ff.), 1244 (V. 155 f.).

Rachel, Samuel (German jurist; 1628-91).

Edition of Cicero (Sine loco 1668), 204 (On Duties, §§ 38 ff.).

Radevicus (continuator of Otto of Freising; 12th century).

De Gestis Friderici (Strassburg 1515), 500 (II. xxv), 579 (I. xxvi).

Rauwolf or Rauchwolf, Leonhard (German botanist; †1596).

Itinerarium Orientale (Aufgang inn die Morgenländer, Lauingen, 1582-3), 905 (II. xv).

Revelation, see Bible.

Rhetorica ad Herennium (a treatise on rhetoric ascribed to Cicero or Q. Cornificius, composed ca. 86-82 B.C.), 452 (II. xiii), 797 (I. xii), 805 (I. xi), 814 (II. xxviii), 820 (II. x), 1196 (II. xix), 1204 (II. iii).

Richier or Richerius, Christophe (French diplomat; 1523(?)—53).

De Moribus Orientalium (probably part of work cited post, as sub-title reads De Moribus et Institutis illius Gentis), 937 (p. 101);

De Rebus Turcarum (Paris, 1540), 427 (general reference), 834 (general reference), 869 (general reference).

Rochefort, Charles de (French scholar; †1690).

Descriptio Antillarum (2nd edition of Louis di Poincy's work edited by Rochefort at Rotterdam, 1665), 194 (II. viii. § 6; II. ix), 527 (I. xviii; II. xi), 529 (II. viii), 571 (II. viii. § 8), 692 (II. viii, n. 8), 894 (II. ix), 1179 (II. xix), 1236 (II. viii), 1246 (II. xix).

Roger, Abraham (Dutch traveller; †1670).

De Braminibus (Religie ende Gods-dienst der Bramines, Leyden 1651), 260 (II. xviii), 529 (I. i, xviii), 852 (I. xi), 870 (I. xiii), 878 (I. xiii), 907 (I. xii), 1143 (I. xix), 1228 (I. xix, xx), 1234 (I. ii), 1262 (i, ii).

Romanus, Ludovicus (Italian jurist; 1409-39).

Navigatio (Novum Itinerarium Aethiopiae, &c., without date or place), 855 (V. vii), 865 (V. viii).

Rossi, Giovanni Vittorio (Italian scholar; 1577-1647).

Pinacotheca (Köln, 1643), 679 (II. xxix), 682 (III. xvii, xxiv).

Roy, Hugo de (Huguenot philosopher; 17th century).

De eo quod Iustum est (Utrecht, 1645), 650 (III. iii, iv), 652 (III. iii, iv; III. iv. 8).

Sadi (Persian poet; ca. 1184-1291).

A Persian Rose Garden (Rosarium Politicum . . . de Persico in Latinum versum, Amsterdam, 1651), 480 (i), 689 (iv), 719 (vii), 897 (viii), 943 (i), 1057 (i), 1179 (i), 1190 (viii).

Salic Law, see Law, Salic.

Sallust (Gaius Sallustius Crispus; Roman historian; 86-36 B.C.).

Catiline, 544 (vi), 826 (li), 954 (x), 1206 (li), 1357 (li. 22; 40);

Jugurtha, 177 (vi), 251 (preface ii), 874 (lxxx), 962 (xiv. 4), 1055 (xxxi), 1153

- (vii. 2), 1155 (general reference), 1250 (xiv), 1260 (iv), 1263 (lxxv. 38; lxxxv. 15).
 Sallustius (Roman philosopher; 4th century Christian Era).
De Diis et Mundo, 55 (ix), 1037 (xi), 1247 (iii).
 Salmasius (Claude de Saumaise; French scholar; 1588-1653).
De Usuris (Leiden, 1638), 174 (I. xii), 687 (general reference);
Edition of Spartianus (Leiden, 1620), 1151 (Hadrian, xviii);
On Plautus, 813 (Bacchides, 976).
 Samuel, see Bible.
 Sanderson, Robert (English divine; 1587-1663).
On the Obligation of Conscience (De Obligatione Conscientiae), London, 1660, 104 (vii, §§ 22 ff.), 1063 (ix, §§ 16 ff.; x, §§ 13, 16, 22, 23), 1166 (vii, §§ 13 ff.);
On the Obligation of Oaths (De Juramenti Promissorii Obligatione), London, 1646, 492 (i, § 6), 495 (i, § 4), 521 (iii, § 18), 1184 (iii, § 18).
 Sarpi, Pietro Paolo. - See Suavis, Petrus.
 Saxo Grammaticus (Danish historian; † ca. 1184).
History of Denmark (Paris, 1514), 807 (IX).
 Scaliger, Joseph Justus (French scholar; 1540-1609).
Edition of Festus (Amsterdam, 1699), 848 (s.v. uxorium).
 Scheffer, Johann Gerhard (German philologist; 1621-79).
De Philosophia Italica (Upsala, 1664), 528 (xiv).
 Schouten, Joost (Dutch explorer; 17th century).
Descriptio Regni Siam (Beschryvinghe . . . der Koninkrijcks Siam), Amsterdam, 1648, 493 (general reference), 644 (general reference), 692 (general reference), 1100 (I).
 Scipio Ammiratus (Italian historian; 1531-1601).
Discorsi sopra Cornelio Tacito (Florence, 1594), 842 (V. v).
 Selden, John (English lawyer; 1584-1654).
De Iure Naturali et Gentium (London, 1640), 15 (II. iv), 27 (I. iv), 180 (I. v), 182 (I. iv), 183 (I. iv), 194 (I. vi), 204 (VII. xii), 217 (I. vii), 220 (I. viii), 221 (I. ix; VII. ix-x), 279 (IV. iii), 302 (VI. vi), 303 (VI. vii), 353 (VI. vi), 385 (I. iv), 432 (IV. vii), 439 (V. iv), 503 (VI. xvi), 507 (VII. ii), 525 (VII. i), 526 (VII. i), 536 (VI. i), 572 (VI. iv), 574 (VI. xi), 579 (VI. iv), 582 (VI. iv), 598 (VI. ii), 663 (VI. iv), 716 (VI. v), 731 (VI. i, iv), 752 (VI. ix), 769 (VI. xi), 834 (VII. vi), 842 (V. iv), 846 (V. iii), 864 (V. iv), 865 (V. xi), 868 (V. vi bis), 881 (V. vii), 900 (V. i and ii; xviii), 901 (V. xvi), 902 (V. i; viii), 905 (V. xi bis), 907 (VI. xi), 908 (V. vii), 918 (IV. i), 927 (VII. ii), 940 (VI. vii), 941 (VI. viii), 1058 (VI. vii), 1162 (IV. xi), 1179 (IV. ii), 1181 (I. iv), 1182 (IV. iv), 1211 (VII. vi), 1213 (IV. i; VII. vi), 1234 (IV. iii), 1235 (IV. v), 1296 (VI. iii, xii);
De Successionibus ad Leges Ebraeorum (London, 1631), 642 (xxiv);
Mare Clausum (London, 1635), 229 (I. ii), 565 (II. xx-xxii);
Marriage and Divorce among the Hebrews (Uxor Ebraica, seu De Nuptiis et Divortii, &c.), London, 1646, 868 (I. ix), 877 (III. vi, vii), 882 (III. xxii), 889 (II. iv), 907 (V. xi).
 Semonides (Greek poet; 7th and 6th centuries B.C.).
Iamboi, 880 (6).
 Seneca the Elder, Lucius Annaeus (Roman rhetorician; ca. 60 B.C.-ca. 37 A.D.).
Controversies, 137 (IV. vii), 139 (I. vi), 290 (X. vi), 295 (IV. xxvii), 316 (V. v), 342 (VII. vi. 18), 417 (IX. iii. 9), 418 (IV. viii), 419 (V. xii), 421 (IV. xxvi), 657 (I. vi. 3), 799 (I. v), 799, note 1 (X. ii), 812 (IX. iv. 9), 817 (IX. iv. 9), 841 (II. v. 7-8), 906 (VI. vii), 926 (I. ix), 991 (I. v. 3), 994 (VII. iv), 1141 (IX. iv. 10), 1150 (I. vii. 1), 1163 (IX. i. 10), 1172 (VI. v), 1183 (I. iv; IV. xxiv), 1215 (X. vi), 1271 (I. iv. 4).
 Seneca the Younger, Lucius Annaeus (Roman philosopher; † 65 A.D.).
Agamemnon, 243 (102 ff.), 899 (34-6), 1206 (995-6);
Consolation to Helvia, 682 (xi);
Consolation to Marcia, 334 (xi), 915 (xviii), 920 (xii. 2);
Hercules Oetaeus, 243 (691 ff.), 263 (996),

Seneca (cont.).

- 437 (480-1), 811 (859-60), 856 (407), 867 (233);
Hercules Raging, 51 (1237), 270 (362 ff.), 679 (172 f.), 1198 (745-6), 1206 (513), 1270 (339-40);
Hippolytus, 181 (913-14), 236 (195 ff.), 249 (459-60), 279 (735), 543 (525 ff.), 840 (466 ff.);
Letters, 332 (xxx), 337 (xlvi. 11), 346 (xcv. 51), 347 (xcv. 52), 349 (vi), 378 (lxxxii), 542 (xc), 787 (lxxxii), 941 (xlvi), 956 (ciii), 992 (xxi. 9), 1241 (xxvii), 1270 (xliv), 1364 (cii), 1365 (lviii);
Medea, 440 (500, 503), 1172 (500 ff.);
Octavia, 542 (395 ff.), 857 (189 ff.);
Oedipus, 141 (826), 234 (980 ff.; 1019), 243 (882 ff.), 1126 (542-3), 1296 (542-3);
On Anger, 61 (II. iv), 68 (I. xvi), 97 (II. xi), 166 (I. iii), 168 (III. xxxiv), 204 (III. xii), 207 (I. v), 222 (II. xiii; xxx; III. v, xxvi), 226 (II. xxxii), 268 (II. xiv; II. xxxii), 294 (II. xxxiv; III. xxvi, xxvii, xlii), 313 (II. xxxi), 330 (I. iii), 332 (I. xiv), 337 (II. xxviii), 525 (II. xxvii), 720 (I. xvi), 941 (III. iv), 1132 (II. xxvii), 1174 (I. xvi), 1175 (I. v; vi), 1177 (II. xxvii), 1178 (I. xvi), 1180 (I. vi), 1181 (III. xix), 1186 (II. xxi), 1189 (I. xix), 1193 (II. x), 1197 (I. xix), 1250 (III. xxxvii), 1304 (III. xvi);
On Benefits, 10 (II. xxxiv), 14 (IV. vii), 25 (VII. i), 51 (II. xix; V. xiii), 94 (V. vii ff.), 140 (III. xxi, xxii), 208 (IV. xviii), 256 (IV. xvii), 297 (II. xv), 314 (IV. xvii), 327 (V. xxiv), 351 (IV. xxix), 374 (general reference), 377 (III. vi ff.), 378 (VI. iv-v), 387 (III. xv), 398 (IV. xxxv, xxxix), 414 (IV. xxvii), 415 (IV. xxvii), 427 (VII. x), 430 (VII. xvi), 534 (VII. xii), 535 (VII. xii), 665 (IV. x), 682 (VII. ix), 684 (VI. xv), 687 (VI. xv), 692 (V. xiv), 700 (III. xv), 716 (VI. xxxviii), 725 (IV. x), 746 (VI. xv), 757 (VII. x), 787 (VI. iv ff.), 820 (IV. xxxv), 853 (IV. xxxv), 876 (III. vi. 16), 927 (III. xxxix-xxx), 930 (III. xxx ff.), 930, note 2 (xxxix), 984 (VI. xix-xx), 1142 (II. xxi), 1178 (VII. x), 1207

- (V. xiv), 1270 (III. xxviii), 1277 (VII. iv), 1287 (VII. vi), 1291 (VI. xx);
On Clemency, 114 (I. xviii), 923 (I. xv), 941 (I. xviii), 1175 (I. xxii), 1185 (I. xxii), 1186 (II. vii), 1188 (I. xxiii);
On Providence, 1152 (iv);
On the Happy Life, 988 (ii);
On the Shortness of Life, 1247 (xvi);
On the Steadfastness of the Wise Man, 51 (vii), 116 (vii), 226 (xiv), 1212 (iv);
Phoenician Women, 76 (249 ff.), 260 (190-2), 265 (294), 899 (134 ff.);
Thyestes, 334 (597 ff.), 434 (643 ff.), 484 (320), 569 (204), 1056 (612);
To Polybius, 97 (xxix);
Trojan Women, 81 (870-1), 82 (291), 476 (597 ff.), 1141 (870-1).
 Septalius, Ludovicus (Lodovico Settala; Italian physician; 1552-1633).
De Ratione Status (Della Ragion di Stato, Milan, 1627), 755 (II. xv).
 Serres, Jean de (French historian; 1540-98).
Inventaire Général de l'Histoire de France (Paris, 1600), 1093 (general reference).
 Servita, Paolo. See Suavis, Petrus.
 Servius (Roman grammarian; 4th and 5th centuries Christian Era).
On Aeneid, 349 (VI. 663-4), 367 (XI. 316 ff.), 555 (IV. 58), 846 (III. 551).
Sext, see Corpus Juris Canonici.
 Sextus Empiricus (Greek philosopher and physician; 2nd century Christian Era).
Against the Mathematicians, 466 (I. iii. 82; x. 178), 815 (II. p. 81), 959 (I. iv. 33);
Pyrrhoneiae, 174 (III. xxiv. 214), 190 (II. v), 191 (III. xxiv. 199 ff.), 194 (III. xxiv. 235), 680 (I. xiv. 143), 905 (I. xiv. 152; III. xxiv. 205 bis).
 Sharrock, Robert (English philosopher; 1630-84).
De Officiis secundum Jus Naturae (Oxford, 1660), 205 (ii. 11).
 Sichard, Johannes (German jurist; 1499-1552).
On the Digest (In Codicem Justinianum Praelectiones, Tübingen, 1535), 277 (IX. ii. 45, § 4).
 Sigismund, Baron of Herberstein (German geographer; 16th century).
De Rebus Muscoviticis (Vienna, 1549), 922 (general reference), 1135 (general reference).

- Silius Italicus, Gaius Catius (Latin epic poet; ca. 25–100).
Punica, 254 (III. 145), 255 (III. 141–2; IX. 376 ff.), 475 (XVI. 610), 1246 (I. 149), 1294 (III. 330–1), 1297 (I. 219), 1322 (X. 663 f.).
- Simler, Josias (Swiss Protestant clergyman and historian; 1530–76).
History of the Swiss Republic (De Republica Helvetiorum), Zurich, 1574), 1334 (I, p. 119).
- Simonides, see Anthology, Greek.
- Simplicius (Greek philosopher; 6th century Christian Era).
On Epictetus, 54 (i, p. 22), 320 (xxxix), 493 (xliv), 901 (xlvi).
- Sionite, Gabriel (Jewish scholar; †1677).
De Urbibus et Moribus Orientalium (Amsterdam, 1633), 644 (xvi), 833 (iii).
- Siracides (Son of Sirach)*, see Bible.
- Sleidan, Johannes (German historian; 1506–56).
De Statu Religionis et Reipublicae (Strassburg, 1555), 562 (XX).
- Socrates (ecclesiastical historian of Constantinople; born 379).
Ecclesiastical History, 368 (IV. xxviii), 480 (III. xii), 688 (III. xv), 869 (IV. xxxi), 1206 (VII. xlv), 1217 (V. xix), 1220 (II. x), 1231 (VII. xxv).
- Solinus, Gaius Julius (Roman geographer; 3rd century Christian Era).
Collectanea Rerum Memorabilium, 148 (i. 53), 696 (lxvi), 847 (xxxviii), 852 (lxvi), 861 (xv), 865 (xxxv. 22; xliii), 1042 (ii. 14), 1073 (xxii. 13 f.; lxvi), 1228 (lxv).
- Sopater (Greek sophist; 4th century Christian Era), 924 (cf. note on that page).
- Sophocles (Athenian tragic poet; 496–406 B.C.).
Ajax, 102 (1073 f.), 177 (688 ff.), 376 (520 ff.), 1248 (1251 f.), 1260 (1322–3); Antigone, 239 (1348), 247 (648), 252 (710 f.), 473 (495 f.), 493 (264 f.), 518 (388 f.), 738 (1055), 1063 (506 f.), 1140 (453 ff.);
Electra, 481 (61);
Oedipus at Colonus, 458 (1188), 493 (650), 920 (508–9);
Oedipus the King, 220 (865 f.), 349 (314), 351 (244 ff.);
- Philoctetes*, 82 (387–8), 480 (108–9);
Trachinian Women, 470 (454), 616 (1192 ff.).
- Sozomen Hermias (Greek ecclesiastical historian; 5th century Christian Era).
Ecclesiastical History, 15 (II. xvi), 78 (VI. xxx), 848 (I. ix), 889 (I. viii; V. ix), 1319 (IX. iv).
- Spartianus, Aelius (Latin biographer; 4th century Christian Era).
Aelius Verus, 871 (v);
Caracalla, 1120 (x), 1145 (viii);
Hadrian, 584 (xviii), 942 (xviii), 1151 (xviii), 1253 (xv);
Pescennius Niger, 1247 (xi), 1284 (vii); Severus, 1104 (general reference).
- Spinoza, Benedictus de (pseudonym Lucius Antistius Constans; Jewish-Dutch philosopher; 1632–77).
De Jure Ecclesiasticorum (Amsterdam, 1665), 345 (iii);
Theologico-Political Treatise (Tractatus Theologico-politicus, Sine loco, 1670), 159 (general reference), 383 (xvi).
- Statius, Publius Papinius (Roman epic poet; ca. 61–ca. 96).
Achilleid, 983 (I. 457–8);
Silvae, 245 (II. ii. 150–3), 618 (IV. vii. 33–40), 848 (IV. iii. 13), 1252 (III. iii. 45), 1349 (I. i. 101);
Thebaid, 235 (II. 582 ff.), 248 (X. 703–5), 258 (X. 615), 330 (XII. 555–7), 334 (X. 712), 1042 (I. 130), 1080 (I), 1225 (I. 688 ff.).
- Stephanus, Henricus, see Estienne, Henri.
- Stobaeus, Joannes (Greek anthologist; 5th century Christian Era).
Anthology, 117 (III. ix. 21; III. i. 114), 151 (iii. 26), 251 (III. xxxv. 6a), 268 (xix), 422 (III. xxvi), 510 (III. xxviii), 640 (IV. xxvii), 731 (XLII), 844 (vi), 846 (lxv), 847 (lxv), 848 (lxxiii), 918 (lxxxi), 918, note 1 (III. xxxv. 6a), 927 (lxxvii), 941 (V. xix), 1186 (II. vii. 11d), 1234 (lxxv), 1263 (lxxxiv–lxxxv), 1271 (lxxxiv–lxxxvii), 1356 (xxxviii); Florilegium, 494 (iii. 13).
- Strabo (Greek geographer; ca. 60 B.C.–A.D. 24).
Geography, 72 (IV. iv), 263 (X. xi. 3), 227 (X), 263 (X. xi, p. 513), 316 (XII. ii. 8), 341 (I, p. 66), 359 (VIII. vi. 20), Strabo (cont.).

- 387 (XV. i. 34; XV. i. 53), 479 (I. ii), 528 (XV. i. 59), 596 (XVI), 680 (XVII. i. 15), 683 (II. v. 26), 685 (IV. iv. 5), 693 (XVI. iv. 18), 700 (XV. i. 53), 739 (XVII. xiii, p. 798), 795 (VI. i. 15), 801 (IX. ii. 4), 848 (VII. iii. 3, p. 296), 851 (XV, p. 504), 852 (XV. ii. 14, p. 727), 865 (VII; XI; XVI. iv. 25), 884 (XV. i), 889 (XI), 905 (XV. iii. 20, p. 735), 919 (XV. i. 30; XVII. ii. 5, p. 824), 1035 (XVII. ii. 3, p. 823), 1036 (XIV, p. 441), 1059 (XII. ii. 11, p. 540), 1071 (XV. i. 55), 1100 (XVI. iv. 3), 1218 (XV. i. 54), 1222 (X. ii. 25, p. 463), 1228 (XV, p. 1041), 1244 (XV. i. 54), 1275 (XV. i. 40), 1279 (XV. i. 41; XVI. iv. 26), 1356 (V; V. iv. 12, p. 250).
- Strauch, Johannes (German jurist; 1612-80). Dissertatio de Imperio Maris (Jena, 1674), 546 (i, § 8), 549 (i).
- Struve, Georg Adam (German jurist; 1619-92). Exercitationes (Helmstedt, 1643), 669 (XI, § 13); Syntagma (Jena, 1653), 534 (XI. lv).
- Suavis, Petrus (Pietro Paolo Sarpi, Pietro Soave, Paolo Servita, Father Paul, Paul of Venice; Italian theologian; 1552-1623). De Inquisitione (Historia della Sacra Inquisitione, Serravalle, 1638), 504 (pp. 55-7); Historia de Concilio Tridentino (London, 1619), 15 (II, pp. 214-15), 372 (I. lii), 500 (I; V, p. 358), 692 (II. xxxviii), 695 (II. xxi), 856 (II. xxxviii), 889 (II. xxxvii; II. xxxix), 906 (I. xv), 908 (I. lviii), 987 (IV, p. 788), 1006 (II, p. 213), 1009 (V, p. 354), 1251 (V, p. 402), 1255 (VIII).
- Suetonius Tranquillus, Gaius (Roman antiquary and biographer; born ca. 70 A.D.). Augustus, 366 (xlii), 698 (xli), 737 (lxxv), 759 (xxxix), 813 (xxxiv), 1151 (xxiv), 1251 (xxvi. i); Caligula, 16 (lv), 406 (xxxviii), 574 (v), 619 (xxxviii), 668 (xvi), 807 (xxxviii), 856 (xl); Claudius, 141 (xvi), 482 (xv), 894 (xxxii), 899 (xv), 941 (xxv); Domitian, 528 (ix), 848 (vii), 858 (viii);

- Galba*, 619 (ix), 832 (vii), 1346 (xv); Julius Caesar, 78 (vii), 512 (lxxiv), 705 (l), 869 (lii), 1286 (xlii); Nero, 262 (ii), 888 (xxxv), 1178 (xxxvi); Tiberius, 55 (lxix), 523 (xxxv), 813 (xxxv), 814 (lxi), 1150 (viii), 1206 (lxi); Titus, 1144 (viii), 1346 (viii); Vespasian, 384 (xi), 1260 (ix).
- Sylvius (Piccolomini), Aeneas (later Pope Pius II; 1405-64). Historia Bohemica (De Ortu, Regione, et Gestis Bohemorum, Rome, 1475), 505 (xviii).
- Syrus, see Publilius Syrus.
- Tacitus, Cornelius (Roman historian; ca. 55-post 117). Agricola, 63, note 1 (xxx), 898 (vi), 1142 (iv), 1250 (xiv), 1258 (xxxix), 1267 (general reference), 1284 (xix); Annals, 16 (IV. xxxvii-xxxviii), 36 (XIV. xlv), 77 (XI. iv), 80 (I. xxxv), 82 (III. xvii; IV. xx. 5), 107 (XIII. xlii), 112 (XII. vi), 218 (VI. vi), 261 (VI. xxix), 273 (II. i), 300 (XIV. xxxii-xxxiii), 336 (XII. xxxvii), 368 (XIII. lv), 371 (I. lv), 376 (IV. xviii), 393 (IV. xi. 40), 415 (XI. xix), 471 (XVI. i ff.), 506 (III. lxx), 510 (XII. xlvii), 574 (II. i), 648 (XIV. xviii), 659 (VI. xxxi. 3, 4), 688 (VI. xvii. 4), 713 (XIV. xiv), 802 (XII. xlvii), 813 (XV. xix), 814 (II. xxx; V. ix), 843 (II. lxxxv), 850 (II. xxxvii), 852 (III. xxxiii-xxxiv), 858 (II. lxxxv. 3), 860 (XIII. xxxii), 877 (II. lxxxvi), 907 (XII), 935 (VI. xx), 941 (XIV. xlv), 968 (I. xxxii), 1019 (I. xii), 1072 (XIII. iv. 2), 1107 (XII. xi), 1125 (III. lv), 1140 (VI. viii), 1142 (XIII. xlii), 1144, note 2 (IV. xxx), 1145 (III. xvi), 1163 (I. xlviii), 1168 (XII. liii), 1176 (III. liv), 1178 (XV. lxviii. i), 1185 (III. liii), 1189 (III. lxx), 1190 (III. i), 1193 (III. xxv, xxxvii), 1194 (III. liii and liv), 1198 (III. lxx), 1209 (III; III. liv), 1220 (I. xlv), 1226 (XIV. xlv), 1227 (III. xii), 1240 (XIV. lxii), 1258 (VI. viii), 1279 (XIII. i), 1282 (XIII. li bis), 1295, note 5 (XV. i), 1341 (XII. xviii), 1354 (I. lviii); Germany, 173 (xlv), 177 (xxxv), 178 (xxxvi), 324 (xxi), 405 (xxii), 570

- (xxvi), 643 (xx, xxi, xxvi), 728 (v), 852 (xx), 860 (xix, xxv), 868 (xviii), 936 (xxvi), 1180 (xxi);
- Histories*, 138 (I. lxxi), 190 (III. xxxiii), 235 (I. xxii), 285 (I. xxix), 337 (I. xvi), 340 (I. xxxvi. 13), 515 (IV. xli), 570 (V. i), 634 (IV. lv), 722 (I. lxxxiii; II. xxxix), 817 (II), 900 (V. v), 919 (V. v), 998 (I. lxxxiv), 1019 (IV. lxxiv), 1052 (IV. lxxiv), 1053 (IV. viii), 1107 (IV. lxxiv), 1139 (I. lxxxiii), 1140 (II. xxxix), 1144 (IV. viii; xlii), 1146 (II. xxv), 1176 (II. x), 1177 (III. lxxx), 1207 (II. lxxvii), 1279 (IV. lxxiv), 1294 (IV. lxxvi), 1346 (I. xx; III. iii).
- Tavernier, Jean Baptiste (French traveller; 1605-89).
- Voyages* (Paris, 1676), 510 (II. xiv).
- Temple, Sir William (English statesman and author; 1628-99).
- Observations upon the United Provinces of Netherlands* (London, 1672), 1340 (p. 153).
- Terentius Afer, Publius (Roman comic poet; †159 B.C.).
- Andria*, 351 (330 f.), 399 (629-38), 484 (794), 512 (724 ff.), 667 (625-8), 719 (629 f.);
- Brothers*, 95 (69-71), 240, note 1 (386-8), 505 (188 f.), 1199 (254 f.), 1232 (188 f.);
- Eunuch*, 267 (761), 945 (486);
- Phormio*, vi, note 3 (265), 151, note 3 (265);
- The Self-Tormentor*, 347 (77), 472 (679 ff.), 603 (57), 671 (796), 1177 (75 ff.).
- Tertullianus, Quintus Septimius Florens (Latin Father of the Church; ca. 160-ca. 240).
- De Velandis Virginibus*, 797 (iv).
- Theages (late Pythagorean philosopher).
- De Virutibus*, 916 (Mullach II, p. 22).
- Theano (Pythagorean philosopher; early 5th century B.C., if historical at all).
- Letters*, 940 (III. vi, 2 Hercher).
- Themistius (Greek rhetorician; ca. 315-ca. 390).
- Orations*, 81 (xix, p. 230b), 377 (xxii, p. 268b), 795 (xxiii, p. 286c), 1005 (vi, p. 73c), 1034 (x, p. 131A), 1037 (xvi, p. 336), 1042 (vi, p. 76b), 1122 (viii, p. 117b), 1184 (ix, p. 123b), 1191 (v), 1243 (xiv, p. 36b), 1280 (xiv), 1294 (x, p. 131A).
- Theocritus (Greek pastoral poet; fl. 270 B.C.).
- Idyls*, 77 (xxii), 78 (xxi. 44-5), 152 (xxv. 50), 245 (xvi), 254 (xiv. 70), 268 (xxii. 180), 352 (xxv. 5), 478 (xv. 40), 642 (xvi. 59), 845 (xvii. 44), 903 (xvii. 130-1), 961 (v, viii).
- Theodoret (ecclesiastical historian; ca. 393-ca. 457).
- Ecclesiastical History*, 477 (III. viii).
- Theodoric the Great (King of the Ostrogoths; ca. 454-526).
- Edict* (edited by Lindenbrog in Codex Legum Antiquarum, Frankfurt, 1613), 83 (cxvi), 582 (lviii), 589 (cxxxvii), 833 (xlvi-xlix; ci), 921 (xciv-xcv), 942 (lxvii), 1211 (xci), 1218 (xiii, i).
- Theodosian Code*, 1151 (VII. xiii. 4 and 10; 5; xxii. 1), 1152 (VII. xiii. 8; 11; 16).
- Theognis (Greek poet; 6th century B.C.).
- Elegies*, 964 (831), 1104 (25 f.).
- Thessalonians*, see Bible.
- Thuanus (Jacques Auguste de Thou; French historian; 1553-1617).
- History of His Own Time* (Historiarum Sui Temporis Libri, Paris, 1604-8), 183 (VI), 832 (LI), 855 (XIII; XX; XXXVII), 1009 (XLVI), 1100 (XLV), 1240 (CIV).
- Thucydides (Greek historian; ca. 460-ca. 401 B.C.).
- The Peloponnesian War*, 85 (III. xliii), 92 (II. xxiv; VIII. xv), 171 (III. xi), 173 (I. v), 275 (VI. xxxviii), 413 (III. xii), 564 (V. lvi), 788 (I. cxxiii), 795 (V. xlii), 801 (II. v-vi), 802 (IV. xcvi), 810 (VII. lxxvii), 826 (I. lxxvii), 976 (II. xl), 1026 (I. xiii), 1030 (II. xxii), 1168 (III. xlv), 1297 (I. lxxvi), 1329 (VIII. xviii), 1329, note 2 (VIII. xxxvii), 1363 (I).
- Tibullus, Albius (Roman elegiac poet; †19 B.C.).
- Elegies*, 236 (III. vi. 49-50), 440 (II. iv. 14), 542 (I. iii. 41 ff.), 1263 (IV. i. 25 ff.).
- Timothy*, see Bible.
- Trigaut, Nicolas (French missionary; 1577-1628).
- De Regno Chinae* (Relatione . . . dalla Cina, Rome, 1624), 260 (I. ix).

Tryphiodorus (Greek epic poet; 5th ? century Christian Era).

The Destruction of Ilum, 241 (310-11).

Tryphonius, Claudius (Roman jurist; 3rd century Christian Era).

In the Digest, 665 (XVI. iii. 31, § 1).

Vulpian, Nicholas (Dutch physician; 1594-1674).

Observationes Medicae (Amsterdam, 1641), 299 (general reference).

Twelve Tables, see Corpus Juris Civilis.

Ulpian, Domitius (Roman jurist; ca. 170-228).

In the Digest, 225 (IV. vii. 4, § 1), 342 (I. i. 4), 397 (II. xiv. 1), 712 (XIX. i. 1, § 1);

On Edict, 291 (V).

Valerius Flaccus, Gaius (Latin epic poet; † ante 90 A.D.).

Argonautica, 205 (V. 643), 498 (III. 707 ff.), 958 (VI. 329 ff.), 1295 (V. 563 ff.), 1335 (IV. 744), 1349 (VII. 227 ff.).

Valerius Maximus (Roman antiquary; 1st century Christian Era).

Factorum et Dictorum Memorabilium, 82 (II. viii. § 2), 111 (VI. v. § 3), 115 (I. viii. § 6; II. vii. § 1), 190 (I. i. § 2), 243 (VII. ii. § 1), 263 (II. vi. §§ 7-8), 286 (IX. i. § 13), 322 (II. viii. § 4), 349 (II. vi. § 7), 377 (II. vi. §§ 6-7; V. iii. § 5), 393 (VII. viii. §§ 5-6), 408 (VII. vii. § 1), 465 (VII. iii. §§ 8-9; IX. xv), 466 (II. ii. § 2), 493 (II. x. § 2), 512 (VII. iii. § 4), 528 (VIII. i. § 8), 615 (VII. viii), 621 (IX. iv), 627 (VII. vii. § 2), 638 (IV. vii), 640 (V. v), 644 (VII. ii. § 11), 697 (IV. iii. § 12), 702 (VIII. ii. § 2), 706 (V. ii. § 10), 710 (VIII. ii. § 1), 713 (VIII. ii. § 3), 722 (III. viii. § 1), 723 (VIII. ii. § 4), 725 (VII. iii. § 5), 738 (IV. i. § 7), 790 (II. vi. § 10), 801 (VII. iii), 813 (VIII. vi), 818 (III. vii. § 1; viii. § 6), 834 (IV. i. §§ 10-11), 841 (VII. ii. § 1), 848 (II. ix), 876 (II. ix. § 2), 878 (VI. i. § 2), 879 (II. i), 883 (IX. ii), 888 (VII. vii. § 4), 896 (II. i. § 7), 906 (V. vii. § 1), 923 (V. viii. §§ 2, 3, 5), 924 (V. ix. § 4), 928 (II. ii. § 2), 989 (III. vii. § 1), 1079 (II. vii. § 8), 1151 (VI. iii), 1174 (II. ix. § 3), 1181 (II. ix. § 3), 1183 (VI. i. § 13), 1196 (VIII. i), 1206 (VI. i. § 8), 1214 (VI. v. § 3), 1226 (VI. ii), 1234 (VII. vii), 1245 (IV. iv. § 1), 1304 (VI. vi. §§ 3, 5), 1309 (VI. v. § 7), 1340 (IV. viii. § 1).

Valesius, Henricus, see Valois, Henri de.

Valla, Laurentius (Italian humanist; 1407-57).

De Rebus Gestis Fernandi Aragoniae (Rome, 1520), 1347 (III).

Valle, Pietro della (Italian traveller; 1586-1652).

Viaggi (Rome, 1650), 83 (II. i), 496 (II. i; iii. 3), 705 (II. i), 844 (III), 855 (III. vii), 865 (III. vii), 876 (II. xvii), 909 (II. v), 917 (I. xvii), 1100 (III. vi), 1255 (II. v).

Valois, Henri de (French scholar; 1603-76).

Polybii . . . Excerpta, &c. (Paris, 1634), 1363 (pp. 6-7).

Varen, Bernhard (German geographer; 1622-50).

De Religione Japoniae (part of work cited post), 790 (p. 35), 1227 (xi, p. 192);

Descriptio Regni Japoniae (Amsterdam, 1649), 493 (xviii), 528 (xxiii), 630 (xv), 860 (xiii), 861 (xii), 876 (xiii), 886 (xii), 932 (xii bis), 1148 (xix), 1227 (xviii), 1246 (p. 21).

Varro, Marcus Terentius (Roman writer; 116-27 B.C.).

On Farming, 283 (I. i), 613 (II. i), 1244 (II. ii);

On the Latin Language, 687 (V. clxxvii).

Varthema, Louis di, see Barthema, Louis di.

Vasquez de Menchaca, Fernando (Spanish jurist; 1512-69).

Controversiarum Illustrum . . . Libri Tres, (Salamanca, 1559), 184 (I. xxviii, §§ 9 ff.), 399 (I. x. §§ 20 ff.), 1168 (I. xxviii, §§ 12, 13).

Vega, Garcilasso de la (Spanish historian; ca. 1535-1616).

Comentarios Reales (Lisbon, 1609), 205 (I. xxi), 255 (iv), 427 (VIII. xvi), 458 (VII. i), 464 (VI. ix), 494 (II. iii), 575 (VI. vi), 683 (III. xx), 692 (I. xi), 693 (V. vii), 842 (III. xiii), 892 (IV. viii), 903 (IV. ix), 920 (IV. xix), 932 (VI. xxxvi), 1085 (II. xix), 1100 (IV. x), 1125 (II. xiv; IV. vii), 1199 (II. xiv),

- 1203 (II. xiv), 1208 (II. xii, xiii), 1224 (VI. iii), 1227 (II. xiii), 1231 (V. ix; xi), 1275 (V. ii; v), 1278 (V. xi), 1285 (V. vi; VIII. v, vi), 1287 (V. iv), 1356 (VII. i).
- Vegetius, Flavius Renatus (Latin writer; 4th and 5th centuries Christian Era).
De Re Militari (Epitoma Rei Militaris), 496 (II. v), 796 (III. i), 1152 (I. vi).
- Velleius Paterculus (Roman historian; 1st century B.C.—1st century Christian Era).
Historia Romana, 177 (I. xii), 683 (I. xiii), 831 (II. i), 1202 (II. iii), 1207 (II. viii), 1356 (I. i).
- Velthuysen, Lambert de (Dutch clergyman; 1622–85).
Dissertatio de Principiis Justi et Decori (? 1651), 69 (p. 161), 73 (p. 174), 79 (pp. 165 ff.), 187 (p. 254), 188 (p. 52), 200 (pp. 114 ff.), 202 (p. 81), 259 (pp. 122 ff.), 266 (pp. 33, 118), 538 (pp. 100 ff.), 539 (p. 266), 894 (pp. 59 ff.), 1210 (p. 200).
- Vergil (Publius Vergilius Maro; Roman epic poet; 70–19 B.C.).
Aeneid, 99, note 1 (II. 104), 151, note 3 (VIII. 19 ff.), 173, note 1 (IX. 612 f.), 180 (VI. 724 ff.), 206 (I. 606), 260 (VI. 436 f.), 287 (II. 720 ff.), 300 (IX. 722 ff.; XI. 883 ff.), 331 (X. 376), 348 (VI. 610–11), 349 (VI. 663–4), 361 (I. 543 ff.), 366 (XII. 192 ff.), 367 (XI. 316 ff.), 399 (I. 76), 467 (XII. 646), 494 (IX. 300), 499 (XII. 396), 581 (VII. 483 ff.), 615 (IV. 34), 768 (V. 328), 807 (I. 371), 844 (IV. 550), 863 (IV. 338–9), 1112 (VIII. 495), 1117 (VI. 852–3), 1154 (VI. 20), 1212 (X. 830), 1243 (V. 344), 1299 (X. 533), 1327 (XII. 931 ff.), 1354 (II. 57 ff.);
Eclagues, vii, note 1 (III. 91), 372 (II. 73), 735 (III. 104–5), 961 (III. 25 ff.; VII); Georgics, 155, note 1 (I. 133), 157 (II. 336), 243 (I. 186), 542 (I. 125 ff.), 543 (I. 126 f.), 562 (I. 57), 971 (IV. 212 f.), 1364 (IV. 206 ff.).
- Victoria, Franciscus a (Spanish theologian; ca. 1480–1546).
Relectiones de Indis (Lyons, 1577), 364 (V, § 3), 370 (general reference).
- Victorinus, Gaius Marius (Latin rhetorician; 4th century Christian Era).
Expositio in Ciceronis Rhetoricam, 799, note 1 (p. 298, 1 ff. Halm), 820 (II. xlix, p. 298, l. 22 Halm).
- Vidalin, Arnggrimur Jonsson (Icelandic antiquary; 1568–1648).
De Islandia (Copenhagen, 1593), 850 (viii).
- Vinn or Vinnen, Arnold (Dutch jurist; 1588–1657).
De Pactis Tractatus (Leyden, 1646), 774 (ix ff.);
On the Institutes (Commentarii, &c., Leyden, 1647), 576 (II. i, § 13), 703 (IV. vi. 28).
- Virgilius, Polydorus (Italian historian; ca. 1470–1555).
De Rerum Inventoribus (Venice, 1499), 692 (II. xx); Historia Anglica (Basel, 1534), 807 (V), 856 (X), 1102 (XIX), 1192 (XXVI), 1288 (XX).
- Vitruvius (Roman writer on architecture; 1st century B.C.).
De Architectura, 460 (II. i), 680 (VIII, preface iii), 742 (X, preface), 813 (II. viii), 929 (VI, preface).
- Vopiscus, Flavius (Latin biographer; 3rd or 4th century Christian Era).
Aurelian, 398 (xxxv), 512 (xxii), 808 (xxxv), 1352 (xxiii);
Probus, 368 (xviii).
- Voss, Isaac (Swedish scholar; 1618–89).
De Nilo (The Hague, 1666), 854 (xix).
- Vulcatius Gallicanus (Latin biographer; 4th century Christian Era).
Avidius Cassius, 1104 (i), 1174 (xii), 1214 (vi), 1220 (ix), 1227 (xii).
- Weigel, Erhard (German mathematician; 1625–99).
Analysis Aristotelica ex Euclide (Jena, 1671), 24 (general reference).
- Wicquefort, Abraham de (Dutch diplomat; 1598–1682).
Mémoires touchant les Ambassadeurs (Rouen, 1677), 12 (p. 542), 450 (pp. 582–3, 588), 1251 (p. 328), 1255 (p. 428), 1256 (pp. 534 ff.), 1261 (pp. 519 ff.).
- Wisdom*, see Bible.

Wissenbach, Joannes Jacobus (German jurist; 1607-65).

Disputationes Juris Civilis (Franeker, 1648), 723 (xxiv. 19).

Xenophon (Athenian historian; ca. 430-ca. 354 B.C.).

Agesilaus, 1321 (i. 10-11);

Anabasis, 784 (III. ii. 7), 861 (VII), 893 (V), 1065 (VI. iv. 8), 1136 (IV. vi. 14), 1178 (V. viii. 18);

Art of Horsemanship, 248 (vi. 13);

Economics, 856 (general reference), 942 (ix. 5);

Greek History, 44 (VI. iii. 6), 472 (III. iv. 20-1), 634 (III. iii. 2), 713 (III. ii. 31), 814 (II. iii. 20), 1051 (IV. viii. 14; V. i. 28), 1303 (V);

Hiero, 878 (p. 578);

Memorabilia, 58 (I. ii. 23), 84 (II. vi. 36 ff.), 101 (III. ix. 10 ff.), 104 (I. ii. 45), 167 (II. vi. 21), 222 (II. i. 21 ff.), 238 (IV. ii. 24), 253 (I. iii), 257 (I. iv. 7), 374 (I. iii. 3), 375 (II. iii), 480 (IV. ii. 17), 603 (II. ii. 12), 637 (II. iii), 684 (II. v), 711 (II. vi. 36), 716 (II. x. 4), 746 (I. vi), 897 (I. iv. 6), 899 (IV), 927 (II. ii), 976 (III. vii. 2), 1118 (III), 1119 (I. ii. 32), 1276 (II. lii. 2);

The Cavalry Commander, 818 (ix. 1);

The State of the Lacedaemonians, 353 (vi. 3-4), 866 (i. 7), 1137 (ii. 7 ff.), 1178 (vi. 1 f.);

Training of Cyrus, 75 (III. i. 38), 255 (II. i. 21; VIII. ii. 5), 376 (VIII. iii. 19), 377 (I. ii. 7), 574 (I. ii. 10), 617 (VIII. vii), 637 (VIII. vii), 640 (VIII), 849 (VII. lviii f.), 856 (VII. v. 56), 923 (I), 931 (VIII. v. 10), 945 (VIII. i. 4), 971 (V), 1062 (III), 1085 (IV. iii. 10), 1095 (VIII. vii. 9-11), 1118 (I. i. 3), 1122 (VIII), 1183 (III), 1259 (VIII. iv. 2), 1285 (VIII. ii. 19 ff.), 1297 (I. vi. 19).

Xiphilinus (Greek monk; 11th century).

Epitome of the History of Dio Cassius, 349

(LXIX. xix. 2), 529 (general reference), 721 (general reference), 784 (general reference), 802 (general reference), 814 (LXIII. ii. 4), 865 (LXII. vi. 3), 893 (LXXVI. xvi), 978 (LXI. vii. 3), 1071 (general reference), 1106 (general reference), 1114 (LXXXIV. ix. 1 ff.), 1122 (LXIV. ii. 2), 1192 (general reference), 1249 (LXIII. vii).

Ziegler, Caspar (German jurist; 1621-90).

On Grotius (3rd edition, Frankfurt, 1686), 36 (II. xx, § 1), 266 (I. iii, § 3), 299 (II. i, § 3), 318 (II. xvii, § 9), 322 (II. xxvii, § 21), 327 (II. xvii, § 15), 329 (II. xvii, § 16), 356 (II. ii, § 13), 358 (II. ii, § 23), 365 (II. ii, § 23), 452 (II. xi, § 17), 498 (II. xiii, § 10), 533 (II. ii, § 1), 535 (II. ii, § 1), 540 (II. ii, § 2), 549 (II. ii, § 2), 557 (I. iii, § 6), 560 (II. ii, § 3), 564 (II. iii, § 11), 576 (II. ii, § 5), 581 (II. viii, § 3), 582 (II. viii, § 3), 587 (II. viii, § 18), 595 (II. iii, § 16), 597 (II. viii, §§ 8 ff.), 636 (II. vii, § 5), 649 (II. iv, § 9), 653 (II. iv, § 1), 654 (II. iv, § 8), 665 (II. vii, § 1), 667 (II. vii, § 2; x, § 3), 669 (II. x, § 7), 670 (II. x, § 9), 671 (II. x, § 10), 732 (II. xii, § 15), 803 (II. xvi, § 7), 919 (II. v, § 2), 933 (II. v, § 10), 993 (II. v, § 17), 1111 (I. iv, § 7), 1206 (II. xx, § 39), 1211 (II. xx, § 33), 1311 (III. v, § 12).

Zonaras, Joannes (Byzantine historian; †1130 A.D.).

Epitome Historiarum, 138 (III), 440 (III), 450 (III), 584 (II), 604 (III), 612 (II), 616 (III), 659 (XIII. ix), 721 (II), 981 (III), 1106 (II), 1114 (II), 1153 (II), 1172 (II), 1277 (II), 1346 (II).

Zosimus (Greek historian; 5th century Christian Era).

History, 348 (V. xxiii), 497 (V. li), 888 (V. xxviii), 1289 (III).

SUBJECT INDEX

[From the great mass of illustrative material only such authors and subjects have been included in the index as were the subject of special comment or criticism. A complete reference list of this material is found in the Index of Authors Cited.]

- Acceptance of gifts, cannot be made by heirs, 453
- 'Accepted offence', defined, 69
- Acceptilatio*, defined, 787
- Accessions:
 - acquisition of, 586 ff.
 - belong to owner of a thing, 586
 - different kinds of, 586 ff.
- Accidentals, in a pact, 410
- Accidents:
 - defined, 5
 - of a democracy or aristocracy, 1037 f.
 - of states, 1023 f.
- Achaean, oath of, regarding the Romans, 511 f.
- Acquisition, derivative ways of. See Dominion, transfer of
- Acquisition of accessions. See Accessions, acquisition of
- Act of avoidance, 67. See also Action
- Action. See also Acts:
 - mixed, 63
 - nature of such, as conforms with law of nature, 196
 - spontaneous, 57
- Action, compulsory:
 - Aristotle on, 64
 - defined, 64
 - examples of, 64 f.
- Action, involuntary:
 - Aristotle's view of, 64
 - defined, 63
- Action, legal, a citizen's right of, against a king on a contract, 1344 f.
- Action, voluntary:
 - initiative of, proceeds from understanding, 38 f.
 - requirements for, 57, 63
- Actions, moral:
 - absolute estimation of, 131
 - as positive entities, 70
 - basis of imputation of, 6, 70 f.; see also Imputation
 - defined, 66
 - estimation of, 131
- evil, lack one or more requisites, 114 ff.
- forbidden, 113 f.
- formal element in, 68 f.
- good, have all requisites, 114 ff.
- how effects of, are destroyed, 140 ff.
- intention required by God in, 132, and by courts, 132, 137
- justice of, 118 f.
- material element in, 67 f.
- necessary and lawful, 113
- perfect or complete, 132 f.
- perfectly and imperfectly lawful, 114
- physical effects of, 141 f.
- pure and mixed, 118
- qualities of, 113 ff.
- quantity of, 131 ff.
- relative, 134
- unjust, 127 f.
- voluntary, 66
- when attaining merit, 138 ff.
- Acts:
 - divisible and indivisible, 319
 - elicit and enjoined, 52
 - of another, when to be imputed to a man, 80 f.
 - what can be imputed in, 71 ff.
 - when imputed to both parties, 81
- Acts, evil:
 - may be praiseworthy, 63 f.
 - when lighting upon lawful objects, 51
- Acts, moral:
 - answer to Aristotle's position on, 29
 - are non-existent without laws, 19
 - origin of, only in laws of God, 27 ff.
- Acts, voluntary:
 - elements of, 66 f.
 - reflexive feature in, 66 f.
 - two ways to be considered, 66 f.
- Addictio in diem*, 733 f.
- Additional pacts. See Pacts, accessory
- Admitting a timber, servitude of, 604
- Adultery:
 - no one desires offspring conceived in, 855
 - reparation for damage consequent upon, 327 f.

Adultery (cont.).

- Seneca's verdict upon, 51
- warrants divorce, 877 f.
- whether committed by polygamy, 871 f.

Advantage:

- two kinds of, 195
- whether foundation of natural law, 194 ff.

Adventitious obligation. See Obligation

Advice, guilt of, 84 f.

Advocate, whether allowed to deceive to save a guilty client, 487 ff.

Aes alienum, reason for term, 750

Affirmative precept, matrimony as, 849

Agency, intelligent, 4 f.

Agent of a mandate:

- how far to be reimbursed, 719 f.
- nature of, 718
- should show utmost diligence, 719
- whether an equivalent can perform for, 720 ff.

Agents for contracting obligations in general:

- cannot reduce a debt, 784
- death of, before matter is concluded, 451
- difference between, and mediators, 451 f.
- whether a third party can accept for, 452 f.

Agesilaus, on utility, 199

Aggressor:

- in a natural state, 274
- in commonwealths, 275 ff.

Agnate succession, defined, 1099

Agnation, succession in, 1046

Agreements. See also Facts; Treaties:

- common, differ from law, 88 f.
- must be observed, 380 f.
- necessity of, in human society, 379 f.
- written, 426 f.

Alexander, whether a debt to the Thebans was acquired by, 1312 ff.

Alienation:

- is a consequence of dominion, 606
- must take place absolutely or conditionally, 607
- of a kingdom and its parts, 1288 ff.
- of possessions of crown, 1390 f.
- requires consent of two parties, 606, 613
- revocable, 614
- whether a mutuum is, 749 f.
- whether delivery of possession is required for, 607 f.
- whether possible by a will, 613 f.

Allies:

- rank among, 1256 f.
- war may be justly waged on behalf of, 1306
- whether properly called, if made after a treaty, 1339
- which of several, should receive aid, 1334 ff.

Alluvial deposits, 593 ff.

Amazons, irregular marriage of, 853 ff.

Ambassadors:

- independence of, 228 f.
- representative character of, 212

Ambiguity, 797

Anger, nature of, 248

Animals:

- abuse of right over, is to be reproved, 531
- damage done by, 320 ff., 329
- defence of slaughter and eating of, 529 ff.
- do not have a law in common with men, 180 ff.
- doubts as to right to slaughter and eat, 526 ff.
- Hebrew law on acts done by, 182 f.
- liberty of, 147 f.
- man's right to use, 99
- nature of, 147 f.
- restrictions on hunting of, 572 ff.
- whether unlawfully captured, belong to captor, 575 ff.
- who owns wounded, 579
- young of, go with dam, 587

Antecedent conscience. See Conscience

Antecedent ignorance, 47 f.

ἀντίχρησις, 780

Approach to foreign shores, right of, 361 ff.

Approbation of the will, simple, 52. See also Volition

Aptitude:

- of Grotius, 20
- to expect honour from others, 1242

Arbitrators. See also Mediator:

- do not alone insure peace of mankind, 963
- in a state of nature, 827
- no pact between, and parties, 827 ff.
- not obligated to render a just decision, 828
- parties not obligated to abide by decision of, 829
- pronouncement upon possession by, 830
- similarity of, to a judge, 832
- when disputes should be referred to, 826 f.

- when in doubt, are bound by the law, 829 f.
- Aristocracy:
 accidents of, do not establish a peculiar species of state, 1037 f.
 defined, 1025
 how established, 1031 f.
 vices of men in, 1034
- Aristotle:
 answer to views of, on intrinsically wicked acts, 29 answers Socrates' theory of virtue, 79 on actions, 64
 on a mixed state, 1037 f.
 on cause for introduction of money, 690 f.
 on equity, 817
 on ignorance, 48, 76 f.
 on injustice and justice, 128
 on man being a 'political animal', 952 f.
 on natural justice, 189
 on need as basis of price, 677
 on some men being slaves by nature, 341 ff.
 on the kinds of justice, 124
 on usury, 757 f.
 on vices, 72
- Armistice, deception not allowable in concluding, 484 f.
- Army:
 on allowing innocent passage to, 354 ff.
 on leading, through another's territory, 796 size of, 796
- Arnisæus, on the division of parts of supreme sovereignty, 1021
- Arrogance. See Pride
- Assailant, whether to be fled from, 282
- Assassins, whether lawful to kill an enemy by hired, 1308 f.
- Assault. See Self-Defence
- Assembly, power of, in a limited monarchy, 1075
- Assertion, a mere, does not obligate, 393
- Assertive oath, 518 f.
- 'Assignment with a time-limit', 733 f.
- Astrology, evil of, 234 f.
- Asylum for criminals, 286 f.
- Atheism: evil of, 233
 to be forbidden, 381 ff.
- Atheists:
 no confidence to be put in promises of, 415
- not enemies of, but rebels against God, 382 ff.
 on oath to, 505
- Athenian law. See Law, Athenian
- Attributive justice, in obligation of parents to maintain their children, 627. See also Justice
- Auction, reason for cheapness of things at, 689
- Augusti, Roman, form of state under, 1041 f.
- Author of evil, not to be sought in God, 116 f.
- Authority of a king, basis of, 101
- Avarice, increase of, by reason of money, 691
- Avocatory mandate, nature of, 1351
- Axioms, 23 f.
- Bacon of Verulam, corollaries of, from the social nature of man, 210
- Bad faith, possession in:
 defined, 663
 illustrations of, 663 f.
- Bad faith, possessor in. See Possessor in bad faith
- Bail, 779
- Balsamon, Theodore, absurd position of, on self-defence, 278
- Banishment of a citizen, 1355
- Barbarians, Greek view of, 343 f.
- Bartering, how carried on, 728 ff.
- Bastards, status of, 1234
- Battle, situation when peace is referred to decision of, 1327 f.
- Bearing a burden, servitude of, 604
- Beasts. See Animals
- Bees:
 decoying of, 574
 swarm of, how differing from a state, 969 ff.
- Beliefs, the right of a state to inculcate certain, 1014 f., 1017 f.
- 'Benefaction of release and posteriority', 777
- Benefactors, whether ranking above kinsmen in inheritances, 639 f.
- Beneficence, nature of, 373
- Beneficium excussionis et ordinis*, 777
- Benefit, nature of, 373 f.
- Blank papers, fraud of, 450
- Blasphemy, defined, 297
- Blood, nobility of, little valued in some places, 1270 ff.

- Blushing, causes of, 32
- Bodinus, on evils connected with legacies, 642
- Bodies, corporate:
 crimes of, extinguished with passage of time, 1221 f.
 how punished, 1218 ff.
- Bodies, illegal, and factions, 997 f.
- Bodies, subordinate:
 kinds of, 995 f.
 rights belonging to, 996 f.
- Body, duty of caring for, 253 f.
- Boecler:
 on elements in usucapion, 658 f.
 on origin of supreme civil sovereignty, 1001
- Bond, in a contract, 706 f.
- Booty of war, how recoverable, 1314
- Bottomry, contract of, 706
- Box on the ear, how concerning self-defence, 280 ff.
- Breach of faith, releases other party from obligation, 788 f.
- Brothers, marriage between sisters and, 901 ff.
- Browne, Thomas, on heir of Lazarus, 409
- Buildings, how far going with ground, 588 f.
- Burdens:
 added to a promise, 453 f.
 when perpetual, in unequal treaties, 1333 f.
- Burial, right of, in war, 229
- Burning lime, servitude of right of, 605
- 'Business transacted', action of, 670
- Buyer. See also Buying:
 duty of, to seller, and vice versa, 736 f.
 should examine title of thing bought, 669
- Buying:
 defined and elucidated, 728 ff.
 how coinciding with letting and hiring, 741 f.
 of prospects, 737 f.
 on monopolies, 738 ff.
 on the risk and gain of a thing sold, 731 ff.
 when a contract of, is closed, 730 f.
 whether nature allows fraud in, 716 f.
- Canon law. See Law, canon
- Canonization, 16
- Canvas, the, goes with picture, 589 f.
- Captives in war:
 obligation of towards their master, 937
- on redemption of, 1321 f.
- Carriage, servitude of, 605
- 'Cases of conscience'. See Conscience
- Cassius, on selling, 729
- Causa*, as used by Roman Jurisconsults, 700
- Cause:
 accessory and principal, of a damage, 317 f.
 man as principal or instrumental, 298
 moral. See Moral Cause
- 'Cause by accident', 69
- 'Cause in itself', 69 f.
- Causes, unjust, of war, 1295 ff.
- Cavils, excluded in oaths, 509 f.
- Celibacy, virtue of, 850
- Cessation from work, damages under Hebrew law for, resulting from injuries, 326
- Characteristics of supreme sovereignty. See Sovereignty, supreme
- Charity:
 due to unfortunate citizens, 1125
 law of, 289 f., 380 f.
- Charron, on soul of man, 38
- Chastity, defence of, 279
- Child:
 consent of, has no force, 404
 eldest, inherits kingdom, 1095, 1097
- Children:
 correction of, 76, 1177 f.
 damage done legitimate, by adultery, 327 f.
 disinherited, allowed by Roman law to enter complaint against the will, 629 f.
 exposure of, 912, 918 f.
 Hebrew law on marriage between parents and, 900 f.
 how far capable of dominion, 556 f.
 how far capable of sovereignty in infancy and childhood, 920 f.
 how far falsehood may be used to, 478 f.
 how punishable for sins of a father, 136 marriage between parents and, is wicked, 898 ff.
 obligation of emancipated, 922 f.
 owed maintenance by their parents, 627 f.
 parents succeed, for want of, 635 f.
 power of parents over. See Paternal power
- preferred in inheritance, 627
- property need not be divided equally among, 630 ff.

- right of representation in case of, 635
the right of legitimate, takes precedence over that of natural, 632 ff., provided father acknowledges, 634, or has not disinherited them, 635
what is owed, beyond maintenance, 629 f.
whether able to contract marriage without consent of their parents, 931 ff.
who come under the head of, 628
Choice, power of, in the will, 52
Christian faith:
according to Milton, allows divorce for domestic infelicity, 883 ff.
trains citizens in good behaviour, 1119 f.
whether enjoining flight before an assailant, 283 ff.
Cicero:
on agreements with robbers, 505
on disclosing of faults in a contract, 711 f.
on expediency, 195
on the difference between men and brutes, 196
on the kinds of necessity, 295
on wills drawn up under misapprehension, 408 Citizens. See also Subjects:
alienation of a kingdom requires consent of, 1288 ff., as also the enfeoffment or mortgaging, 1290
can be surrendered by one state to another as hostages, 1156 f.
contracts of kings with, are subject to principle of eminent domain, 1345 definition of, 995
deprived of right of war within states,
1299 f.
do not everywhere owe dominion of their possessions to state, 1275 ff.
exile of, 1355 ff.
how far a king may entirely resume his former rights in dealing with, 1343 f.
how far an injury done to, furnishes a cause for war against a state, 1304 f.
how far possessions of private, can be left untouched upon concluding peace, 1326
how the head of a state can injure, 1104 f.
lives of, can be exposed to peril in time of war, 1148 f.
may not lawfully use force against a man merely because he is called a tyrant,
1109 ff.
obedience of, due an invader when king has been driven from his realm, 1114 ff.
of different states, how compared, 1260 f.
often complain unjustly of civil sovereignty, 1104
pacts made by private, in time of war,
1322 f.
power of supreme sovereignty over the lives of, 1148 ff., 1158 ff.
rank of, is fixed by the supreme sovereignty, 1257 ff.
removal of, to colonies, 1355 f.
resources of, are to be increased, 1125 f.
right of action of, against a king on a contract, 1344 f.
shall be prevented from injuring one another, 1122
special functions of, 998 f.
to be trained in good behaviour, 1119 f. use of possessions of, can be regulated by the state, 1277 ff.
what constitutes good in, 954 ff.
whether able to refuse military service because of a pact with enemy, 1149 f.
whether a state can injure, 1103 f.
whether a state can surrender innocent,
1154 f.
whether a state may banish, 1355 f.
whether remaining subjects, when surrendered to the enemy but not received by him, 1358 f.
Citizenship: is lost upon seizure by an enemy, 1358
right of, 20
City property, servitudes on, 603 ff.
Civil law:
how far able to rule upon marriage, 851 ff.
how far contracts of kings are above, 1344
many refer usucapion to, 652 f.
Civil obligation. See Obligation
Civil society, many faults in man disturb,
953 ff. See also State Civil sovereignty. See Sovereignty, civil Civil war, defined, 1300
Cognate succession, defined, 1099
Cognition, succession in, 1046
Cohabitation, whether consummating marriage, 863 f.
Collateral heirs, order of, in inheritances,
640 f.
Colonies:
removal of citizens to, 1355 f.

- Colonies (cont.).
 status of, 1363
- Command. See also Sovereignty:
 affirmative, requirements of, 297
 defined, 19
 established by a pact, 454
 negative, requirements of, 297 whether citizens bound to obey, of invader, 1114 ff.
- Commerce, things excluded from, have no
 price, 677
- Commissions, different kinds of, 449 f.
- Commodatum*, how different from a mutuum, 747
- Common price:
 causes which raise or lower, 687 ff.
 defined, 686 f.
- Commonwealth. See State
- Commonwealths, how in a state of nature, 163
- Community. See also Dominion:
 arguments against idea of primitive,
 547 ff.
 arises immediately from agreement of men, 536 f.
 definition of, 532 ff.
 exists only between more than one, 535 f.
 is a moral quality, 532
 on primitive, 537 ff.
 steps of departure from primitive, 539 f.
- Commutation, Roman law on, 812 f.
- Commutative justice. See Justice
- Compensation for a debt:
 how made, 784 ff.
 where possible, 786 f.
- Compensation in damages. See Reparation
- Compulsion:
 defined, 74
 kinds of, 75
 prevents imputation, 74
- Concomitant ignorance. See Ignorance
- Concubinage, 33
- Concubine, rights of children of, 633
- Conditional sale, 734
- Conditions:
 added to a contract, 731
 addition of place and time in, 448 affecting promises, 444 arbitrary, and pacts, 448
 breaking of, 789 f.
 causal or potestative, 618 impossible and wicked, 447 f.
 kinds of, 445 ff.
 nature of, 444
 of promises, 444 ff.
 tacit, properly accompany an oath,
 513 f.
 when laws may assume form of, 805
 whether referring to present or past time,
 444 f.
- Confederacy. See System of states
- Confederacy of men, necessary as a defence against wickedness of men, 968
- Confusion touching debts, 791
- Congenital obligation. See Obligation
- Conjectures. See also Interpretation; Words:
 by which a law is restricted, either because of original defect of will of lawgiver, 815 ff., or because of some case arising that opposes his will, being either unlawful, 817 ff., or too severe, considering reason of act, 819 f.
 employed to find sense of words, 797 f.
 from reason of law, 804 f.
 in evasion of a law, 812 ff.
 in extension of a law, 810 ff.
 rules of, when different laws in some case seem to be opposed to one another,
 820 ff.
 sought from matter at hand, 800 ff., from their effect, 802, and from allied considerations, origin, or even place,
 803 f.
- Connan, François, on the force of verbal agreements, 396 ff.
- Conquered, ways by which sovereignty may be acquired over, 1314
- Conscience:
 affected by civil law, 386
 antecedent and consequent, 41
 'cases of', 41
 corollaries of Grotius on, 43
 defined, 41
 doubtful, 45
 ideas of Schoolmen upon, 41
 pangs of, 386
 'right' and 'probable', 41 f.
 rules of probable, 42 f.
 scruple of, in case of war, 1145 ff.
 scrupulous, 46
- Conscientious objector in an unjust war,
 1145 ff.
- Consensual contracts, 772

Consent:

- as required in promises and pacts, 402 ff.
- as the basis of obligation, 101
- defined, 53
- hampered by great drunkenness, 405 ff.
- in the case of minors, 407 f.
- is given expressly or tacitly, 402 ff.
- is nullified by error, 408 f.
- of people required for enfeoffment or mortgaging of kingdom, 1290, as also of possessions of crown, 1290 f.
- on part of acceptor of a promise, 423 ff.
- presupposes use of reason, 404 f.
- signs and tokens of, 425 ff.
- whether consummating marriage, 863 f.
- Consequent conscience. See Conscience
- Consequent ignorance, 47
- Consumable commodities:
 - defined, 747
 - principal kinds of, 748
 - two-fold use of, 747 f.
- Consumption, whether taxes levied solely on basis of, 1283 f.
- Contract, gainful, has no place for equality, 714
- Contracts. See also Contracts, onerous; Contracts subject to chance; Pacts; Promises:
 - concerning property taken from true owner are void, 663, 671
 - consideration of intent in, 737
 - difference according to Hobbes between pacts and, 699, according to expounders of Roman law, 699 f.
 - error in, 409 ff.
 - gainful and onerous, 702 f.
 - mixed, 705 ff.
 - named and nameless, 702
 - of bottomry, 706
 - of estimation, 704 f.
 - of kings, how far above the civil law, 1344, how far obligating their successors, 1345 f.
 - of partnership. See Partnership
 - of state not cancelled by change, 1360 f.
 - origin of slavery in, 936
 - real, consensual, verbal, and written, 701 f.
 - sanctioned by an oath, 508 f.
 - that amount to usury, 759 ff.
 - unilateral, bilateral, and midway between, 701

- when a king has been injured in, 1342 f.
- whether citizen has right of action against a king on, 1343 f.
- Contracts, onerous. See also Bartering; Buying; Hiring; Letting; Mutuum; Partnership; Selling:
 - faults known to both parties need not be indicated, 712 f.
 - how far an inequality that arises in, should be corrected, 714 ff.
 - kinds of, 703 f.
 - no one should be intimidated into making, 713 f.
 - require the showing of faults, 708 f.
 - there should be equality in, 708
 - whether faults which do not of themselves touch the thing should be indicated, 711 f.
- Contracts subject to chance. See also Gambling:
 - in games, 768 f.
 - in peace, 766
 - in war, 767 f.
 - of insurance, 706, 770
 - of lottery, 769
 - of the 'pot of fortune', 769 f.
 - of wager, 768
- Contradiction of terms, 798 ff.
- Convenience, necessity of, 295
- 'Corporal oath', 516
- Corporeal things, how possession is taken of, 609
- Council:
 - is bound by vote of majority, 986 f.
 - limitations of this rule, 989 f.
 - number of men required for, 993 f.
- Counsel, difference between, and law, 87 f.
- Counsellor:
 - when the right of a, ceases, 88
 - when to be held responsible, 84 f.
- Country property, servitudes on, 605
- Courier, effect of death of, carrying promises, 451
- Courts, civil:
 - how far concerned with intention, 132
 - offences it is idle to punish in, 1183 ff.
- Craft, may be used against an enemy, 1297
- Crime. See also Offence:
 - death inflicted in self-defence is not, 286 ff.
 - heinousness of, depends on position of injured, 51

Crime (cont.).

it is not right to commit a, at command of superior, 1143 ff.

Matthaeus on distinction between, and penalty, 306 f.

whether defendant in court may deny his, 485 ff.

Crimes:

how nullified, 140 f.

length of time for prescription of, 648

not condoned because of drunkenness, 406 of a corporate body are finally extinguished with passage of time, 1221 f.

whether a civil law can define, as it pleases, 1134 ff.

Criminal:

asylum for, 286 f.

can obtain no reward for his deed, 437 ff.

whether a, should deny his crime in court, 485 ff.

Cruelty, to animals, 531

Cujas, theory of, that usucapion is opposed to natural law, 652

Cumberland, Richard:

on Hobbes' idea of the state, 971 on the basis of law of nature in right reason, 202

on sanction, 104 f.

Cure, cost of, how estimated by Hebrew law on injuries, 325

Customs, what should be observed in levying of, 1281 f.

Customs of nations are not a basis for natural law, 187 ff.

Cutting stakes and wood, servitude of right of, 605

Damage:

accidental, 320 f.

caused by a thief, 328 f.

defined, 314 ff.

done by a ravisher, 328

five counts according to Hebrew law for which reparation is owed in mutilations, 324 ff.

Hobbes' views upon, 124 f.

how fixed by Hebrew law, 324 ff.

inflicted by a man's possessions, 320 ff.

on judging amount of, 316 f.

principal and accessory causes of, 317 f.

reparation for, in case of murder, 322 ff., or mutilation, 324 ff.

rule governing obligation of those who have caused, 318 ff.

should be made good, 314

ways in which inflicted, 320 ff.

when consequent upon adultery, 327 f.

who may cause, 317 f.

Daughters, share in parents' estate, when they have passed into other families, 631

Death:

obligations which cease with, 790 f.

various laws upon all causers of, 286 ff.

vicarious, 779

Debasing of money, evil of, 694

Debt:

cannot be reduced by agent, 784

confusion of, 791

delegation of, 791

how cancelled by debtor, 427

how compensation may be made for, 784 ff.

how far discharged by mutual dissent, 788, by change of status on which obligation was based, 789 f.

how made void by time, 790, by death, 790 f.

is discharged by a release, 787 f.

not paid by death, 329 of a state not cancelled by change, 1360 f.

of deceased, how far heir is obligated to pay, 644 f.

of subordinate bodies, 997 paid without debtor's knowledge, 782 f.

renewal of, 791 f.

to whom to be paid, 783

what must be paid, 783 f.

when paid, 784

Debtors, insolvent:

Muscovite law on, 431

principles governing, 429 f.

Debtors, seizure of goods of, 835 f.

Decalogue, whether commands of, are civil laws, 1137 f.

Deceased:

how far oath of, obligates an heir, 516 ff., as to debts, 644 f.

will of. See Successions to a person intestate

Deceit. See Deception

Deception:

how far lawful in things, 476

not allowable in concluding armistice, 484 f.

of an enemy, 476

- whether suspicion of, makes pacts invalid, 411 ff.
- Declaration of war, 1307
- Decree, necessity of, upon formation of a state, 974 f.
- Defects, when to be assumed in will of speaker, 815 ff.
- Defence:
- against other men, must be sought from men themselves, 967 f.
 - cause of founding of states, 959 ff.
 - innocent and of one's person. See Self-Defence
 - of property, 288 ff.
- Defendant in court, whether able to deny his crime, 485 ff.
- Degrees of relationship, in successions, 628
- Deification, 16
- Delegation of a debt, 791
- Delivery of possession:
- true and fictitious, 611 f.
 - whether required for alienation, 607 f., 610 f.
- Democracy:
- accidents of, do not establish a peculiar species of state, 1037 f.
 - appears to be the oldest form of state, 1025 f.
 - defined, 1024
 - how established, 1029 f.
 - on pact establishing sovereignty in, 975
 - ordinary requisites of, 1030 f.
 - rule of, 755
 - supreme sovereignty exists in, 1026 ff.
 - vices of men in, 1034
 - way of acquiring sovereignty in, is uniform, 1084
- Demonstration:
- defined, 23 f.
 - possible in moral sciences, 25 ff., 32
- Deposit:
- defined, 724
 - diligence required of holder of, 724 ff.
 - return of, to a thief, 420
- Depositor:
- expenses properly belonging to, 726
 - obligation upon, 726
- Depravity of men, Hobbes' views on, 412
- Derelict things, belong to taker, 580 ff.
- Dereliction:
- injury to unborn children by, of parents, 656 ff.
- usucaption based on tacit, of former owner, 653 ff.
- Derivative ways of acquisition. See Dominion, transfer of
- Descartes:
- on conscience, 46
 - on pride, 339
- Deserter:
- the use of, in war, 1308 f.
 - whether it is lawful to pose as, 1352 ff.
- Desertion, wilful, warrants divorce, 877
- Determination, physical, in human actions, 55
- Dictates of sound reason, 203 f.
- Differences in view disturb peace of mankind, 964
- Digging sand, servitude of, 605
- Dignity of man, 38
- Diligence, degree of, required of recipient of a deposit, 725 f.
- Directors of states. See King; Prince; Sovereign
- Discharge of a debt:
- by a release, 787 f.
 - by mutual dissent, 788
- Discrimination, on whether one person may be refused what men in general have a right to, 372 f.
- Disfigurement, reparation for, 326 f.
- Disgrace, cost of, how estimated by Hebrew law in injuries, 326
- Dishonesty, is not of abiding advantage, 199 f.
- Dispensation, defined, 110 f.
- Disputes:
- in natural state there is no judge of, 825 f.
 - manner of settling, in a natural state, 825 ff.
 - when to be referred to arbitrators, 826 f.
- Dissent, mutual, how far a debt is discharged by, 788
- Dissimulation, not always wicked, 471 ff. See also Falsehood
- Dissolution of states. See States
- Distributive justice. See Justice
- Divisible act, defined, 319
- Divorce:
- adultery and wilful desertion warrant, 877 ff.
 - allowed by canon law for impotence, 885
 - before forbidden by divine law, 33
 - opinions of some on law of God

Divorce (cont.).

concerning, 881 ff., and especially those of Milton, 883 ff.

whether allowed by law of nature, 875 ff.

whether intolerable habits are cause for, 879 ff.

Documents, in case of loss of, 832

Domestic infelicity, held sufficient by Milton to warrant divorce, 883 ff.

Dominion. See also Community, primitive: alienation of a thing is allowed by, 606 diminution of, 533 f.

eminent and common, 533

governing wills, 616 f.; see also Wills

Grotius on origin of, 545 ff.

how far children are capable of, 556 f.

how far secured by pacts alone, 610 f.

ideas of ancients on origin of, 542 ff.

in what sense belonging to natural law, 555 f.

is either derived from or involves possession, 608 means of securing. See Occupancy obligations which arise from. See Obligations of husband over wife, 859 ff., whether this is immediately conferred by God, 861 ff., and necessarily involves right of life and death, 863 of sea, 382 ff.

of testator, 614

of their possessions, not everywhere owed by citizens to the state, 1275 ff.

on object of, 558 ff.

open ocean is free from, 565 f.

origin of, 532 ff.

over wild animals, 575 f.

price of things is based upon, 677 required a measure of things (price), 675 return of lost articles required by, 663, 665

Roman law on origin of, 608 secured by usucapion, 648

transfer of, 606 ff.; see also Alienation when passing from buyer to seller, 733 f.

whether usucapion arises from a tacit relinquishment of, 653 f.

usefulness of, to mankind, 541 f.

usucapion and, 656

Donation:

because of marriage, 804 f.

between husband and wife, Roman law on, 861

Hobbes' view that sovereignty is made over as a kind of, 981 in case of death, difference between, and will, 623 f.

of a king, how far subject to recall, 1346 f.
reciprocal, 730

Donor, whether gift of, is valid before its acceptance, 451 f.

Doubtful conscience. See Conscience

Doves, hunting of, 573 f.

Drawing of water, servitude of, 605

Dreams, things done in, cannot be imputed, 77 f.

Drunkenness:

affecting responsibility, 62 affecting the will, 61 f.

does not clear of crimes, 406 excessive, hinders giving of consent, 405 ff.

Duel:

not dishonourable to refuse, 1237 ff.

not necessary to accept, and no damage may be claimed from, 439 pact between participants in, 767 f.

Duelling, does not allow claim of innocent defence, 278

'Dust of usury', 752

Duties:

order of, among the early Romans, 638

rules for, touching other men, 313

Duties of humanity. See Humanity, duties of Duties of man toward himself:

his mind and duty should be known, 238 f., and his strength, 239

how far man should strive for fame, 242 f., for riches, 243 ff., and pleasures, 246 how far one's life should be spent in service of others, 257 f.

in care of body, 253 f.

in preserving his life, 254 ff.

in use of life, 254 f.

man should know himself, 237 f.

man should not strive beyond his strength, 239 ff.

non-religious ideas should be banished, 233 ff.

of belief in God, 233

of instructing the mind, 232 f.

of literary study, 248 ff.

of self-development, 231 f.

passions should be governed by reason, 246 ff.
Duties of supreme sovereigns. See also Sovereign, supreme:
must be carefully learned by them, 1117 f.
source for knowledge on, 1117

Easement, defined, 19

Eating of animals:

defence of, 529 ff.
doubts as to, 526 ff.

Education. See also Learning; Literary study:

as basis of obligation of children to parents, 928 f.

most necessary part of, 242

place of, in development of understanding, 39 right of a state to control, 1014 f., 1017 f.

Effects:

distinct from efficient cause, 617 of good and evil actions, 222 ff.

Efficacious ignorance. See Ignorance

Efficient cause, 617

Eldest child, shall inherit kingdom, 1095, 1097

Election, kinds of, in case of sovereigns, 1088 f.

Emasculation, evil of, 848 f.

Embassies, in time of war, 228 f.

Embryo:

destruction of, 8

right of, 8

Emigration:

rules of states on, 1348 ff.

what should be observed in, 1350 ff.

whether allowable to whole bodies, 1352

Eminent domain:

contracts of kings with citizens are subject to principle of, 1345 right of, 1285 f.

touching possessions of citizens after a peace has been concluded, 1326

Eminent price. See also Price:

defined, 676

necessity of, 690 f.

Emphyteusis, contract of, 706

Emphyteutic right, 598

Enactor, part of, in force of a law, 87 f.

ἐναντιοφάνεια, 798

Endeavour, utmost, whether always sufficient, 431 f.

Enemy:

citizenship is lost upon seizure by, 1358

craft may be used against, 1297 faith need not be kept with, 1308 f.

how whole peoples may be taken back from, 1314 f.

lawful deception of, 476 licence on person of, 1308 proper to lie to, 484 f.

subjects of, may be corrupted, 1308 f.

what may be used against, 1298 f.

whether it is lawful to kill, by hired assassins, 1308 f.

Enfeoffment of a kingdom, requires consent of people, 1290

Entities, moral:

as modes, 15 ff.

as substances, 6 f.

classification of, 6

defined, 5

force of, 6

how abolished, 21

imposition of, 5, 21

origin and variety of, 3

purpose of, 5

subdivisions of, 4

Envy, described, 247

Epicureanism, evil of, 233 f.

Epicurus, on justice and injustice, 197 f.

Equality:

has no place in gainful contracts, 714

of power, 344

of right between all men, 332 f.

of votes, 990 f.

Equality, natural, of all men:

Hobbes on, 330 ff.

how stipulating division of property, 337 ff.

makes men mutually helpful, 335 ff.

popular reasons for, 333 ff.

sinned against by pride, 339 f., by insults, 340 to be respected by all men, 330

true nature of, 330 ff.

Equality, the, to be observed in onerous contracts. See Contracts, onerous Equity:

compared with justice, 33

defined, 33

difference between, and dispensation, 110 f.

in a case of arbitration, 829

in a loan, 723 f.

- Equity (cont.).
 in payment of a debt, 784
 when used, and limitation of, 817 f.
- Equivalent, whether a mandate can be fulfilled by, 720 ff.
- Equivocality, 797
- Error:
 defined, 48
 different effects of, 49
 in acts enjoined by laws, 50 f.
 in execution of an evil action, 51
 in indifferent matters, 50
 in marriages, 888 f.
 in pacts and contracts, 409 ff., 772
 nullifies consent, 408 f.
 prevents imputation of an action, 51
 regarding necessary actions, commands, and prohibitions, 49 f.
 superable or insuperable, 48 f.
- Essentials in a pact, 410
- Esteem:
 a moral quantity in a person, 20
 definition and division of, 1229 f.
- Esteem, intensive:
 defined, 1241 f.
 fixed by supreme sovereignty, 1258
 foundation of, 1242 ff.
 foundations of, produce only an ability to . receive honour, 1247 ff.
 should be sought, 242 f.
 whether power alone is foundation of honour, 1245 ff.
- Esteem, simple civil, is wanting either from one's status, 1233 ff., or from a former offence, 1236 f.
- Esteem, simple natural:
 defined, 1230
 entire, 1230
 entirely lost, 1231 ff.
 impaired, 1230 f.
 not dependent upon whim of those who are in power, 1239 f., and cannot be used up in their interest, 1240 f.
 of states, 1232
- Estimation of moral actions. See Actions, moral
- Eunuchs, evil of making, 848
- Evil or evils:
 befalling mankind, three kinds of, 222
 may be compared and chosen, 63 f.
 occasion of, is one thing, its cause another,
 1223 ff.
- of fate, definition of, 222
- Evil command, whether, of superior can ever be carried out without sin, 1140 ff.
- Exception: caused by a negative accessory pact, 773
 of fear, whether weakening pacts of peace, 1324 f.
 to a debt, 775 f.
 to a pact relating to war, 1317
- Exchange of services, 401
- Execution of a judgement, 835 f.
- Exile, nature of, 1356 ff.
- Expediency. See Advantage
- Expenses:
 unusual, not to be estimated in fixing of
 price, 688
 whether taxes should be levied solely upon, 1283 f.
- Expletive justice, in obligation of maintenance of one's children, 627. See also Justice
- Exports, may be regulated by state, 1282
- Exposure of children, 912, 918 f.
- Expromissores*, 778
- Expulsion of guests and strangers, 366 f.
- Extension of a law, a conjecture which means an, 810 ff.
- Extortion, kinds of, 671 f.
- Factions:
 illegal bodies and, 997 f.
 should be prevented, 1126
- Falsehood:
 ambiguous speech and, 476 f.
 difference between, and untruth, 470 ff.
 how far allowable in speaking to children,
 478 f.
 how far a part of the truth may properly be withheld, 475
 how far deception in things is lawful,
 475 f.
 how far heads of states may disseminate,
 481 f.
 judges may lie to ferret out truth, 486 f.
 may be spoken for safety of others, 479 ff.
 may be used to an enemy, 484 f.
 nature and source of right violated by,
 473 ff.
 nature of, 470 f.
 on mental reservations, 477 f.
 to the maliciously curious, 482 f.
 untruth is not always wicked, 471 ff.

- what defendant's counsel may do with respect to, 487 ff.
 whether a defendant in court may deny his crime, 485 ff.
 Fame, how far a man may strive for, 242 f.
 Family: duty to, 625
 whether a state, 931 f.
 Fancy, price of, 684 f.
 Father of a family, whether a prince developed from, 1007
 Father, sovereignty of. See Paternal power Faults:
 in subject-matter of contract should be indicated, 708 ff.
 nature and degrees of, 129
 when known to both parties, need not be indicated, 712 f.
 when overlooked in a contract, how far to be corrected, 714 f.
 whether, as to extraneous matters in contract should be indicated, 711 f.
 Faults of men:
 do not establish a peculiar species of state, 1035 ff.
 in states, 1033 ff.
 which disturb civil society, 953 ff.
 Fear:
 as cause of founding of states, 959 ff.
 contracts extorted by, are void, 713 f.
 described, 248
 in pacts, 508 f., 713
 interferes with rise of obligations, 411 ff.
 makes promises and pacts invalid, 416 ff., 713 oaths extorted by, 503 ff.
 Roman law on, 417 f., 420 f.
 two kinds of, 411 f.
 whether pacts of peace are weakened by exception of, 1324 f.
 Fecundity, nature of, 841 f.
 Feudal contract, 706
Fidei-commissum, 774 f.
 Fields, private, when changed by a river, 595 ff.
 Fire, allows razing of houses, 308
 First occupation, Hobbes' theory of, 338
 Fishes, whether belonging to owner of lake, 579 f.
 Fishing, subject to proprietorship, 562
 Fleet, size of, 796 f.
- Flight:
 teaching of Christianity on, 283 ff.
 when necessary from an assailant, 282
 Flow of water, servitudes of, 604 f.
 Forbidden degrees of marriage, 906 ff.
 Force: cannot create an obligation, 95 ff.
 place of, in an obligation, 101
 Force, just, how far sovereignty may be seized by, 1084 ff.
 Force, unjust:
 how far sovereignty may be seized by, 1086 f.
 makes pacts invalid, 417 f.
 Foreigners:
 contracts made with, 407 f.
 entering another country are bound by a tacit pact, 403
 how far a king may resume his former rights in dealing with, 1342 f.
 on allowing a residence to, 366 ff.
 Foreknowledge, divine, does not affect the freedom of the will, 55
 Form, change of, in an object, 591 ff.
 Formal element, in moral actions, 67
 Formality in religion, the evil of, 236 Forms of states. See States, forms of Fort, nature of, 797
 Fortitude, not based upon a belief in immortality, 216 f.
 Fortune, of a wife, how much power a husband has over, 861 Foundations: of honour, whether power alone, 1245 ff.
 of intensive esteem, 1241 f.
 of intensive esteem produce only an ability to receive honour, 1247 ff.
 Fraud:
 evaded by a conjecture, 812 f.
 in pacts, 508 f.
 on part of an agent, 449 f.
 used to elicit an oath, 501 ff.
 whether nature allows, in buying, 716 f.
 Freedom:
 how attained by slaves, 945 f.
 of the sea. See Sea of the will, 145. See also Will Friends:
 war may be justly waged on behalf of, 1306 f.
 whether to be preferred to kinsmen in inheritances, 637 ff.

- Friendship, ordained by nature, 213 f.
 Frugality, should be urged upon citizens by laws, 1125 f.
 Fruition of the will, defined, 53
 Fruits: different kinds of, 586
 restoration of, 667 f.
 Functions, special, of citizens, 998 f.
 Future evil, cannot be imputed, 78
 Future punishments and rewards, certainty of, 237

 Gain, of a thing sold, 731 ff.
 Gambling, the contract concerned with, 768 f.
 Games, contract concerned with prizes of, 768 f.
 General:
 pacts made by, in time of war, 1322
 power of, in war, 1302
 Generation, act of:
 whether establishing an obligation on part of children, 927 ff.
 whether establishing sovereignty over children, 913 f.
 Gestures, use of, 459 f.
 Gift:
 donee not obligated to restore, he has disposed of, 668 f.
 in case of death, 623 f.
 restoration of, when made with a bad motive, 671 f.
 whether valid if donor dies before acceptance of, 451 f.
 Gloominess, described, 247
 Glory, desire of men for, 950 f.
 God:
 as author of crimes, 55
 as author of states and supreme sovereignty, 1001 ff.
 as source of the obligation of law of nature, 217 ff.
 belief in, is conducive to a moral life, 233 f.
 does not smile at some sins, 236
 enjoins a social life upon men, 217 f.
 is not bound by Fate, 234
 justice of, 146 f.
 liberty of, 146 f.
 might He have ordained that evil deeds be duties, 184 f.
 name of, used in an oath, 491 f., 494 ff.
 nature of, 232
 necessity of belief in, 233
 not the author of evil, 116 f.
 obligation to believe in, 381 ff.
 omnipotence of, 184 f.
 power of, over all created things, 524 ff.
 promises of, 186
 relation of, to natural law, 185 ff.
 right of, to know the truth, 473 seriousness of an offence against, 1194 f.
 sins against, 296
 vindictive justice of, 186 f.
 vows made to, 425
 whether majesty is directly derived from, 1003 f.
 wills that man make use of other creatures, 524 f.
 Golden Rule:
 how to be interpreted, 284
 various formulations of, 204 f.
 Good faith:
 how far required in usucapion, 648
 in a partnership, 765
 possession in, 663, 666. See also Possessor in good faith Good, the:
 befalling mankind, three kinds of, 221 f.
 defined, 55 f.
 degrees of, 33
 imaginary, 56
 nature of, agreed upon by mankind, 56 not always recognized, 57
 Goods, obligation to sell, 368 f., and to buy, 369 f.
 Governor:
 power of, in war, 1302
 whether able to make war on presumed will of supreme sovereign, 1303 f.
 Grand, Antoine le, on sin, 54
 Grant, voluntary, how different from a loan, 723 f.
 Grateful mind, a, 374 ff.
 Gratitude, nature of, 374 ff.
 Gratuitous promise. See Promise Grotius:
 answer to view of, on intrinsically wicked acts, 30 bases usucapion upon a tacit dereliction of former owner, 653 f.
 corollaries of, on probable conscience, 43
 definition of a will, 613
 denies superiority of a sovereign to an entire people, 1058 f.

- holds that a lesser thing is taken over by a greater, 590 f., 592 f.
- holds that arbitrators should not pronounce on possession, 830
- holds that pacts involving a base deed must be kept, 437
- on a second buyer, 736 f.
- on action for a gift against an heir, 452
- on approach to foreign shores, 361 f.
- on aptitude, 20
- on balance between life of a robber and object stolen, 289, 292
- on beginning of a truce, 1320
- on choice of arbitrators, 829
- on concluding peace with rebels, 1325
- on continuous possession in usucapion, 649
- on contracts, 705, 706
- on damage done by several persons, 319
- on delivery of possessions, 607 f.
- on difference between words and things, 464
- on divisions of the parts of supreme sovereignty, 1021 f.
- on doubtful conscience, 45 f.
- on equity, 817
- on equivalent of usury, 760
- on exception of fear in pacts of peace, 1324
- on expletive and attributive justice, 120 f., 280
- on forms of promises, 452
- on Hebrew law on consummation of marriage, 864, and on usury, 755
- on honour involved in a box on the ear, 280 ff.
- on how to gather conjectures of the will, 800 ff.
- on keeping an oath, 502
- on kingship of Saul, 1067 f.
- on letting same service to several at same time, 745
- on lying, 471, 474
- on lying to children, 478, and to maliciously curious, 482
- on measure of price, 676
- on migrations of large bodies, 1352
- on money, 696
- on monogamy, 875
- on monopoly of Joseph, 739
- on natural obligation, 384
- on nature allowing fraud in buying, 716
- on necessity of a belief in God, 232 ff.
- on oaths extorted by fear, 503 f.
- on obligation of a possessor in a state of nature, 827
- on obligation of an heir from the oath of the deceased, 517
- on occupancy of sovereignty, 585
- on offspring following the womb, 942
- on origin of dominion, 545 ff.
- on origin of paternal power, 910
- on origin of supreme civil sovereignty, 1002 f.
- on ownership and theft, 303 ff.
- on ownership of fishes in a private pond, 580
- on pacts entered into through fear, 421
- on pacts made with an enemy, 1316
- on pacts made with malefactors, 420
- on pardon, 1191
- on partnerships, 764 f.
- on passions, 60 f.
- on paternal power, 925
- on place of a state after a change of government has been made, 1362
- on power of a people to elect any person it chooses, 315 f.
- on proprietorship of parts of sea, 561
- on public and private acts of war, 1311
- on public official having a right to wage war, 1301
- on reason in some animals, 180 f.
- on reparation in cases of murder, 322 f.
- on restrictions in interpretation of words, 816
- on right of innocent passage for persons, 354, and for goods, 358
- on right of life and death in a system of states, 1048
- on right of necessity, 303 f.
- on rights and necessity in a just war, 308 f.
- on rule of our Saviour on divorce, 882
- on rules to follow when different laws seem in some case to be opposed to one another, 820 ff.
- on seizure of sovereignty, 1085
- on signs of consent, 423
- on signs of obligation, 475 f.
- on size of an army, 796
- on temporary supreme sovereigns, 1079
- on things derelict, 581

Grotius (cont.).

- on things planted going with ground, 587
- on three periods in the life of children, 919
- on two subjects of supreme power, 1058
- on use of deserters in war, 1308
- on validity of promises, 446
- on valuation of stolen property, 329
- on what is allowed by a truce, 1320 f.
- on what offences should be punished in a civil court, 1185
- on whether citizen may refuse to serve in unjust war at command of his sovereign, 1145 f.
- on whether citizens can repel violent acts of sovereign, 1111
- on who holds the power to exact punishments, 1170, 1176 ff.
- rules of, on interpretation of things favourable and odious, 806 ff.
- rules of, touching the obligation of a possessor in good faith to make restitution, 667 ff.

Guarantors of peace, 1328

Guile, age of, 10

Habitation, 600, 602 f.

Habits:

- defined, 58
- intolerable, whether cause for divorce, 879 ff., and Milton's views on, 883 ff.

Hate, described, 247

Head of a family:

- as affecting the origin of the first state, 1026
- as causing rise of inequality among men, 344

Hebrew law. See Law, HebrewHeir. See also Wills:

- cannot make acceptance of gifts, 453
- disappointment of, 618 f.
- how far obligated by an oath of deceased, 516 ff.
- how far obligated to pay the debts of deceased, 644 f.
- legal fiction in case of, 606
- when will is lacking in certain formalities, 620 f., may attack it as if none had been made, 622 f.

Helplessness, whether cause for establishment of a state, 958 f.

Herds, servitude of leading to water, 605

Hiring:

- contract of, 714
- how coinciding with buying and selling, 741 f.

Historians, 37

Hobbes:

- comparison of a state to a man by, 984, 998
- definition by, of a citizen, 995
- denial of free will opposed, 54
- denial of view of, on vices and virtues, 59
- holds that all supreme sovereignty is likewise absolute, 1077 f.
- holds that laws of nature are not laws, strictly speaking, 219
- holds that nature has given a right to all things, 95, 1276
- holds that nature has ordained discord, 210 ff.
- holds that power gives rise to an obligation, 95 f.
- holds that states were formed out of fear, 213 f.
- holds that the state of nature is one of mutual war, 165 f.
- holds that there is no judge in a state of nature, 826
- on a temporary monarch, 1082
- on atheism and right of God to punish, 382 f.
- on choice of a lesser evil, 435
- on commands of the Decalogue, 1137 f.
- on condition of a state upon death of its sovereign, 1091 f.
- on damage, 125 f.
- on debt of reverence owed by children, 927 f.
- on difference between a swarm of bees and a state, 969 ff.
- on difference between contracts and pacts, 699
- on distributive justice, 120
- on duelling, 1239
- on families as states, 931, 934
- on fear of deception in contracts, 412 f., 422 f.
- on formation of an aristocracy, 1031
- on how power of a master and condition of slaves are derived from war, 937 f.
- on justice and injury, 124 ff.
- on kinds of lot castings, 338

- on lack of an obligation in a democracy and an aristocracy, 1031 f.
- on man's rights in a state of nature, 158 ff.
- on natural equality between men and why men stand in mutual fear of each other, 330 ff.
- on natural law, 189
- on natural law of nations, 226
- on original power over children lying with the mother, 910 ff., which is then derived from her upon others, 912 f.
- on pacts to undergo ills, 432 f.
- on power as the sole foundation of honour, 1245 ff.
- on promises in future tense, 395
- on punishments, 1172 f.
- on right of states to inflict punishments, 1160, 1172 f.
- on 'right to all things', 391 f.
- on rule of 'people' in a state, 986
- on self-love of man, 949 f.
- on signs used in passing on a kingdom, 1094 f.
- on slavery and liberty, 944 f.
- on states with provinces, 1044
- on succession to a kingdom, 1096
- on sufficiency of utmost endeavour, 431
- on taxes on profits or expenses, 1283
- on 'transfer of right', 391 f.
- on whether civil laws can possibly be repugnant to natural laws, 1133 ff.
- on whether there was anything just before there were civil laws, 1138 f.
- recognizes but one pact in formation of a state, 977 f., 1029 f.
- rule of, for knowing laws of nature, 204 f.
- views of, on ethics and politics, 25 f.
- Homosexual relations, 191 f.
- Honour:
 - the foundations of intensive esteem produce only an ability to receive, 1247 ff.
 - whether involved in a box on the ear, 280 ff.
 - whether power alone is foundation of, 1245 ff.
- Honourable conduct, necessity of, 295 f.
- Honours, civil, duration of, how far dependent upon judgement of a state, 1272 f.
- Hope, described, 248
- Hornius:
 - denies that sovereignty of husband over wife is by nature, 861 ff.
- on aristocracies and democracies, 1026 ff.
- on natural consequence of a state, 956 f., 961
- on origin of slavery, 935 f.
- on origin of supreme civil sovereignty, 1003 ff., and how a vassal may secure this, 1007 f.
- on seizure of sovereignty, 1085 f.
- on whether, when a free people or a monarch resigns sovereignty into another's hand, that act can produce sovereignty, 1008
- Hospitality, the duty of, 363 f.
- Hostage:
 - for a prince, when he succeeds the same, 1328
 - obligation of, 779
 - obligation to, 419
 - one state can surrender to another a citizen as a, 1156 f.
- Humanity:
 - general duties of, 346 ff.
 - law of, 380 ff.
- Hunting of animals:
 - law of nations on, 576 f.
 - open to all, 573, or only to princes, 574 f.
 - restrictions on, 573 ff.
 - whether wild animals captured illegally belong to captor, 575 ff.
- Husband, power of, over the wife:
 - source of, 859 ff.
 - whether immediately conferred by God, 861 ff.
 - whether involving right of life and death, 863
- Ideas, moral, origin of, 4
- Ignorance:
 - Aristotle on, 76
 - consequent and vincible, antecedent and invincible, 47 f.
 - defined, 47
 - efficacious and concomitant, 47
 - insuperable, does not exist, 40 f.
 - of law and of fact, 48
 - of natural law, 381
 - prevents imputation, 75 ff., but not when self-caused, 76, or of universals, 76 f.
 - voluntary and involuntary, 47
- Illegal acts, no obligation can command performance of, 436
- Immigrants. See Foreigners

- Immovable objects:
 how occupancy of, takes place, 569 ff.
 time for usucapion of, 649, 655
 when understood to be occupied, 577 f.
- Immunities, granted by kings, how far subject to recall, 1346 f.
- Importation of goods, laws governing, 370
- Imposition of moral entities, 5 f.
- Impossibilities:
 are incapable of obligation, 73 distinction between physical and moral, 73
 Velthuysen on, 73 f.
- Impotence, allowed by canon law as cause for divorce, 885
- Imputation of moral actions:
 from act, 135
 from debt, 136 f.
 from favour, 135 f.
 general consideration of, 66 ff.
 intention required in, 137 f.
 what acts may or may not be imputed,
 71 ff.
 what can be effectively imputed, 137 f.
- Imputativity: basis of, 69
 cannot be laid to God, 86
 of a moral action, 68 f.
- 'In the gross', sale, 735
- Incomes, whether taxes should be levied solely according to a man's, 1283 f.
- Incorporeal objects:
 how far acquirable by war, 1311 f.
 how possession is taken of, 609
- Indemnity, obligation of, in natural liberty and in states, 1160 f.
- Indifferent matters, 50
- Indivisible act, 319
- Indulgences, evil of, 235
- Inequality, when arising in contracts, how far to be corrected, 714 ff., 773 f.
- Inequality of men:
 Hobbes on, 330 ff.
 not due to wealth, 345
 source of, 344 f.
- Informers, just punishment of, 1144
- Ingratitude, 376 ff.
- Inheritance. See also Succession to a person
 intestate:
 Hebrew law on, 635 f.
 the legal fiction of, 548 f.
- Injury:
 a slave is capable of receiving, 940 ff.
- citizens should be prevented from doing, to one another, 1122
 comes from choice, 128
 defined, 127 f.
 Hobbes' views upon, 124 ff.
 how done, 128
 how many kinds of, can be done a citizen by the head of a state, 1104 ff.
 in contracts, 715
 is done one against his will, 129 f.
 is not caused by men's consumption of plants, 526
 measure of gravity of, 715 memory of, in man, 955 of a citizen, how far furnishing a cause for war against a state, 1304 f.
 such as it is idle to punish in a civil court,
 1183 ff.
 when done in drunkenness, 62
 whether a citizen can suffer, from a state, 1103 f.
 whether the extravagant, by a prince can be resisted, 1106 ff.
- Injustice:
 Aristotle on, 128
 defined, 127
 Epicurus on, 197 f.
 existed before civil laws, 1137
- Innocent passage, right of:
 for armies, 354 f.
 for goods, 358 f.
 for persons, 354 ff.
 when to be resisted, 356 f.
- Innocent profit:
 and approach to a foreign shore, 361 f.
 with regard to tolls, 360
- Insane, how far capable of dominion, 556 f.
- Insanity:
 clears one of the crime of suicide, 262
 prevents the force of consent, 404
- Instinct, natural, 840 f.
- Instrumental cause, an agent as, 449
- Insults, are a sin against natural equality of men, 340
- Insuperable ignorance. See Ignorance
- Insurance:
 contract of, 706, 770
 in a partnership, 764
- Intelligence:
 in man, 4 f.
 whether in beasts, 180 f.
- Intensive esteem. See Esteem, intensive

- Intention. See also Actions, moral:
 good, cannot alone make an action good, 115 f.
 in the will, 52 f.
 of swearer of an oath, 499 ff.
 plenary and semi-plenary, 53
- Interpretation:
 applications of, 794 ff.
 necessity of right, 793 f.
 of oath should not always be strict, 511 ff., and in light of intention of one who requires it, 514 f.
 of pacts, 793 ff.
 of statement that a man may not wage war without permission of another, 809 of words, 'Carthage will be free', 809 f.
 rules of, 806 ff.
- Interreges, defined, 1091
- Interregnum:
 defined, 1089 ff.
 when a posthumous successor is expected,
 1092 f.
- Intestate person. See Succession to a person
 intestate
- Intimidation, should not be used to force one into making a contract, 713 f.
- Invader:
 how far a citizen shall obey commands of,
 when king has been driven from his realm, 1114 ff.
 when to be considered a lawful prince,
 1113 f.
- Inventors, great service of, 349
- Invincible ignorance:
 defined, 47
 divisions of, 47 f.
- Involuntary ignorance. See Ignorance
- Islands, created by a river, 593 f.
- Israelites, oath of, to Benjaminites, 511
- Jewish law. See Law, Hebrew
- Job, calamities of, 97
- Joshua, oath of, to Gibeonites, 503
- Joy, described, 247
- Judge:
 may lie to ferret out a crime, 486 f.
 nature of oath of, 519
 none in a state of natural liberty, 825 f.
 of disputes about successions in kingdoms,
 1100 ff.
- Judgement, execution of a, 835 f.
- Judicial power:
 divisions of, 1017 ff.
 reason for being vested in states, 1012 f.
- Juniority, 10
- Jurisconsults, Roman. See also Law, Roman:
 definition of a will, 614
 definition of law of nations, 615 definition of law of nature, 180, 183 meaning of causa among, 700
 on actions arising from promises, 401 on bequests, 442
 on deeds giving rise to infamy, 1235 on division of contracts, 701
 on habitation, 602 f.
 on ignorance, 48
 on law of nature and nations, 226 f.
 on loss caused by rickety property, 308 on promises obligating another, 442
 on 'quasi-contracts', 749
 on restrictions on hunting, 573
 on right of the possessor, 305
 on specification, 591
 on the paper going with the writing, 589, and the canvas with the picture,
 589 f.
 on usucapion, 658
 rules of, to restore what belongs to
 another, 666
- Just, whether there was anything just before there were civil laws, 1137 f.
- Justice:
 Aristotle on, 128
 Aristotle's divisions of, 123 f.
 as attributed to God, 146 f.
 as defined by Roman juriconsults, 117 f.
 cause of, in persons or things, 117 f.
 commutative, and punishments, 121,
 1166 ff.
 compared with equity, 33
 distributive, and punishments, 119 ff., 1166 ff.
 Epicurus on, 197 f.
 existed before civil laws, 1137 f.
 expletive and attributive, 122 f.
 Grotius on, 121 ff.
 Hobbes' views upon, 124 ff.
 of actions, 118 f.
 species of, to which is to be referred exaction of punishments, 1166 ff.
 true nature of, 139
 universal and particular, 119

Justice, vindicative:

defined, 36

is none in a civil court, 1210

King:

basis of authority of, 101

'can do no wrong', 85

cannot enfeoff or mortgage kingdom without consent of people, 1290, or alienate possessions of crown, 1290 f.

cannot put aside a valid oath of own making, 1344 enjoys natural liberty, 1342 f.

how far able to resume former rights in dealing with foreigner, 1342 f., and how far in dealing with own citizens, 1343 f.

how far bound by treaties of predecessor, 1338

how far contracts of, are above civil law, 1344

how far contracts of, obligate successor, 1345 f.

how kings may meet without contention, 1254 f.

may become a private citizen, 1112 f.

not obligated to give way to another king, 1254 ff.

power of, over possessions, if the kingdom is his own patrimony, 1274 f.

right of citizen against, on a contract, 1344 f.

rights of, over possessions of state, 1287 f.

whether donations of, are subject to recall, 1346 f.

whether treaties are concerned with deposed, 1338 f.

will of, in monarchy is will of state, 985 ff.

Kingdom:

alienation of, and of its parts, 1288 f.

established by the free consent of people, 1082 f.

may not be enfeoffed or mortgaged without the consent of people, 1290 on succession in patrimonial, 1093 ff.

patrimonial, 1080 ff.

Kinship, of all mankind, 212 f.Kinsmen:

in succession to a person intestate, 636 f.

order among, 640 f.

whether benefactors should rank above, 639 f.

whether friends are to be preferred to, 637 ff.

why marriage is forbidden between, 891 f.

Koran:

on degrees within which marriage is forbidden, 907

on dowry, 607

on games of chance, 769

on oaths, 506

on remarriage, 890

on war between Moslem nations, 831

Labour, how contributed in a partnership, 764Labours, of servants, 600, 603*Land:

added by a river to nations, 593 ff., and to private fields, 595 ff.

how occupancy of, takes place, 570 ff.

laws on, in legacies, 642 f.

should be considered in determining the value of money, 696 f.

submerged, 596 f.

Landlord, whether an interruption in the use of a thing works to the loss of, 742 f.Latitude, in moral quantities, 35 f.*Law:

defined, 89 f.

differs from counsel, 87 f., from agreements, 88 f., and from right, 89 general nature of, 87 ff.

how annulled, 92 f.

how obligating, 89

of humanity, in contracts, 710 required by nature of man, 145 ff., by his proneness to evil, 149 ff., his diversity of nature, 151 f., and weakness, 152 f.

Law, a:

a conjecture which means an extension of, 810 ff.

divine and human, 111 f.

essential parts of, 104 f.

how made known, 103 f.

natural and positive, 112

on restriction of, because of an original defect of will of lawgiver, 815 ff., because of some case that opposed his will, being either unlawful, 817 ff., or too severe considering reason of act, 819 f.

should be known, 103, 220

- voluntary, 112
- when assuming form of a condition, 805
- Law, Athenian:
 - on chastity, 279
 - on contracts made by women, 407
 - on husband slaying an adulterer, 286
 - on inheritances, 636
 - on marriage, 868 f.
 - on the instrument of an evil act, 182 f.
 - on witnesses, 835
- Law, canon, on good faith in usucapion, 648
- Law, civil:
 - command and permission of, 1136 f.
 - nature of, in general, 1131 ff.
 - relation of, to natural law, 199
 - whether crimes can be defined by, as it pleases, 1134 ff.
 - whether possibly repugnant to natural, 1133 f.
 - whether the Decalogue is a, 1137 f.
 - whether there was anything just before there was, 1138 ff.
- Law, Hebrew:
 - allowing polygamy, 868
 - on a goring ox, 67, 182
 - on a robber by night, 290
 - on age of guilt, 182
 - on consent of minors, 407
 - on consummation of marriage, 864
 - on divorce, 882 f., 885 ff., 889
 - on eating of pork, 296
 - on escaped beasts and lost goods, 582 f.
 - on fishing, 579
 - on five counts warranting reparation in injuries, 324 ff.
 - on fraud in contracts, 716
 - on inheritances, 635 f.
 - on legacy of land, 642 f.
 - on marriage, 846 f., 885 f.
 - on marriage between kinsmen, 892 f., between parents and children, 900 f., brothers and sisters, 902 f., and within the forbidden degrees, 906 f.
 - on paternal power, 925
 - on possession of broken stairs and vicious dogs, 320
 - on preservation of chastity, 279
 - on price of individuals, 677 f.
 - on prostitution, 843
 - on redemption of land, 735
 - on retaliation, 1214 ff.
- on second marriage, 890
- on slavery, 940 f.
- on status of certain occupations, 1235 f.
- on suicide, 260
- on theft, 303
- on use of deceit to ferret out a crime, 487
- on usury, 752 ff.
- on witnesses, 834
- requiring virginity for marriage, 889
- whether in every case an adequate measure of punishments, 1212 ff.
- Law, Mohammedan:
 - on accidental murder, 324
 - on alms, 821
 - on polygamy, 869 f.
 - on right of natural children, 632
 - on usury, 759 f.
 - on witnesses, 835
- Law, Muscovite, on insolvent debtors, 431
- Law, natural. See Law of nature
- Law of nations:
 - things included under, 227 f.
 - whether distinct from law of nature, 226 ff.
- Law of nature. See also Natural liberty; State of nature:
 - a stronger control is needed to restrain men than mere, 964 ff.
 - Aristotle's definition of, 189
 - as defined by Roman juriconsults, 615
 - as fixing the sole obligation in a treaty, 1329 ff.
 - Cujas' opinion that usucapion is opposed to, 652
 - defined, 179, 226 f.
 - divisions of, 229 f.
 - each, is strictly speaking a proposition, 219
 - forbids acts because they are improper, 183
 - fundamental rule of, 207 ff.
 - general discussion of, 179 ff.
 - holds all men equal, 330 ff.
 - how different from civil law, 1133
 - in what sense dominion may be said to belong to, 555 f.
 - is opposed to wandering lust, 842 ff.
 - is the relationship between states, 1136
 - mere respect for, does not insure the peace of mankind, 962 f.
 - not common to man and beasts, 180 ff.
 - not dependent on agreement of nations, 187 ff.
 - obligation of, comes from God, 217 ff.

Law of nature (cont.).

- on duties toward other men, 313 ff.
- on right of necessity, 297
- on successions to a person intestate, 625 ff.
- precepts of, not eternal, 31
- refutation of Hobbes' view that it ordains discord, 210 ff.
- regarding self-defence, 265 ff. See also Self-Defence
- sanctions of, 221 ff.
- should be deduced from right reason, 201 ff., 215 f.
- shown by Selden to have been known to Gentiles, 220 f.
- the two views which find it in God, 185 f.
- things improperly read back into, 225 f.
- things included under, 227
- true basis of, found in nature of man, 205 ff.
- understandable by educated men, 203 f.
- Velthuysen on, 187 f.
- whether a civil law can be repugnant to, 1133 ff.
- whether allowing fraud in buying, 716 f.
- whether common to God and man, 185 ff.
- whether distinct from law of nations, 226 ff.
- whether dominion is due to, 536 f.
- whether foundation of, is advantage, 194 ff.
- whether polygamy is opposed to, 870 ff.
- whether to be seen from end of creation, 200 f.
- whether usury is opposed to, 754 ff.
- whether wills proceed from, 615 ff., 618 ff.

Law of the Twelve Tables:

- on stolen property, 647
- on wills, 641

Law, Persian, on husband slaying adulterous wife, 286

Law, positive:

- great care of, in case of a will, 620 f.
- how far wills proceed from, 618 ff.

Law, Roman. See also Jurisconsults, Roman:

- allows no consideration of price of fancy, 685
- holds that a mixed power belongs to every magistrate, 1301
- on 'a suit of recovery for a thing not owed', 749

- on accessory affirmative pacts, 773
- on accessory pacts, 771
- on action of 'business transacted', 670
- on breach of a trust, 774
- on building going with the ground, 588 f.
- on change of value in a mutuum, 752
- on closing contract of buying and selling, 730
- on compensation, 786
- on conditions of present or past time, 444 f.
- on delivery of possession, 608
- on difference between a contract and pact, 699 f.
- on diligence required of agent of a mandate, 719, 726
- on discharge from a debt, 787 f.
- on donations between husband and wife, 861
- on escaped slaves, 582
- on fear in pacts, 417, 420 f.
- on gainful and onerous contracts, 703
- on good faith in usucapion, 648
- on insolvent debtors, 430
- on kinds of frauds, 813
- on limiting amount of property left to women, 631
- on loss to tenant, 744
- on lost articles, 662
- on marriage, 851
- on marriages between parents and children, 899
- on mortgages, 781
- on nature allowing fraud in buying, 716 f.
- on negative pacts, 700
- on novation, 791 f.
- on occupancy in time of war, 584 f.
- on option lying with legatee, 797
- on origin of dominion, 608
- on physical alienation, 610 f.
- on pledges, 780
- on private property of sons, 920 f.
- on promises including a third party, 452 f.
- on prostitution, 439 f.
- on protection of surety, 777
- on punishment of recipient of a deposit, 727
- on real and personal actions, 611
- on reasons for introduction of usucapion, 649 f.
- on restitution of payment for another's property, 671

- on right of heir and legatee, 851 f.
- on right of life and death in a system of states, 1048
- on risk of an article sold, 731 f.
- on servitudes, 602
- on showing reasons for disinheriting a son, 629 f.
- on slavery, 939 f.
- on the child following the womb, 912
- on the divisions of obligations, 1169
- on things planted going with the ground, 587 f.
- on those branded with infamy, 1235
- on usucapion, 646
- on usufruct, 600 f.
- protecting women in suretyship, 777
- Lawful act, defined, 34
- Laws:
 - are not passed in respect of rare cases, 27
 - danger of there being too many, 1120 f.
 - directive and coercive power of, 107 f.
 - how promulgated, 220
 - imperfect, 106
 - matter of, 110
 - of regular marriage, 855 ff.
 - permissions in, 108 f.
 - place of, in development of understanding, 39
 - should be enforced, 1121
 - whether requiring consent of subjects, 104
 - whom obligating, 110 f.
- Lawyer. See Advocate
- Leading of herds to water, servitude of, 605
- League. See System of states
- Learning:
 - elegant and curious, 250
 - idle, 250 f.
 - should serve an end, 252, be profound, 252, and not all-absorbing, 253
 - useful, 250
- Legacies, Bodinus on evils connected with, 642
- Legal fiction, in case of heir, 606
- Legal price, 686
- Legatee, option lying with, 797
- Legislation, limit of matters covered by, 387
- Legislative power:
 - on division of, 1017 ff.
 - reason for, in a state, 1010 f.
- Legislators, moral compulsion of, 108
- Legitimate children, right of, takes precedence over that of natural, 632 ff., provided father acknowledges them, 634, or has not disinherited them, 635
- Legitimate price, 685 ff.
- Leibnitz, on nature of wills, 617
- Lessee, an interruption in uncertain use of a thing works to loss of, 743 ff.
- Lesser evil, Hobbes on choice of, 435
- Lessor, an interruption in definite use of a thing works to loss of, 742 f.
- 'Letter and design of the writing', 800
- Letting:
 - an interruption in definite use of a thing works to loss of the lessor, 742 f., and in uncertain use, to loss of lessee, 743 ff.
 - how coinciding with buying and selling, 741 f.
 - whether same work can be let to several at same time, 745 f.
- Lex:
 - Atinia, on stolen articles, 647
 - Cincia, 679
 - Falcidia, 803
 - Maenia, 847
 - Voconia, 631
- Lex Commissoria, 734, 1290
- Liberal arts, salary for teaching of, 745 f.
- Liberty:
 - as appearing in God, 146, and in animals, 147 f.
 - defined, 19, 53
 - explanation of, 344
 - general character of, 145 f.
 - held in different degrees, 146
 - of specification, 53
 - personal, is not subject to usucapion, 646 f.
 - requisites of, 53
 - why priceless, 677
- Liberty of belief, right of a state to curtail, 1014 f., 1017 f.
- Licence:
 - of man in a state of nature, 159 f.
 - of war, sacred objects are not excepted from, 1309
 - on the person of an enemy, 1308
 - taken by nations in war, 1307 f.
- Lie. See Falsehood
- Life and death, power of:
 - in a system of states, 1048
 - instances of, 923 ff.
 - should not extend over children, 919

- Light, servitude of, and of not hindering, 604
- Lime, servitude of right of burning, 605
- Limitations, tacit, properly accompanying an oath, 513 f.
- Lineal succession:
cognate and agnate, 1099
defined, 1098 f.
- Literary study: different kinds of, 250 f.
pursuit of, is a duty of man, 248 ff.
- Loan:
recipient of, 723 f.
rules of, and how differing from a voluntary grant, 723 f.
utmost endeavour does not apply in, 432 whether acquirable by war, 1312 ff.
- Locatum, how different from a mutuum, 747
- Long hand, delivery of possession by, 611 f.
- Loss, directly inflicted is one thing, and that which comes by consequence, another, 1222 f. See also Damage
- Lost articles:
return of, required by dominion, 662 f.
Roman law and rules on, 662
- Lot:
casting of, Hobbes' division of, 338 pact concerned with, and purpose of, 766 f.
- Lottery, contracts concerned with, 769
- Love, described, 247
- Lust:
for vengeance, described, 248
wandering, is opposed to natural law, 842 ff.
- Lysander, on trickery, 198
- Magistrate:
as such has no right to make war, 1301 ff.
the right of setting up, in states, 1013, 1017
whether able to make war on presumed will of supreme sovereign, 1303 f.
- Maiden ravished in the field, 293
- Maintenance:
owed children by their parents, 627 f.
what is included under, 628
what is owed children beyond, 629 f.
- Majesty, the distinction between real and personal, 1057 f.
- Majority:
decides will of a council, 986 f.
- limitations of this rule, 989 f.
regularly has final power in all states but monarchies, 986 ff.
whether obligating a minority in a system of states, 1050 f.
- Malefactors, on pacts made with, 419 f.
- Males, inherit a kingdom above females, 1095, 1097
- Malice, on damage done in, 322
- Man:
as a sociable creature, 211 ff.
by nature loves himself more than society, 944 ff.
dignity of, 38
diversity of nature of, 151 f.
endowments of, 4 f.
in a state of nature, 154 f.
love of, for himself, 205
love of society does not prove love of state, 952 f.
many faults in, disturb civil society, 953 ff.
must seek a defence against wickedness of men from men themselves, 967 f., and to this end many should band together, 968 nature of, the true basis of law of nature, 205 ff.
necessity of being sociable, 208 f.
nobility of, 148 f.
proneness to evil, 149 ff.
weakness of, 152 f., 207
what is required by nature of, 6 f.
whether a 'political animal', 215, 952 ff.
- Man, duties of. See Duties of man, &c.
- Man, state of:
adventitious, defined, 8
in relation to other men, 8 f.
natural, defined, 8, and when this commences, 8 natural or adventitious, 7
- Mandate:
agent of, should show utmost diligence, 719
defined, 718
singular veneration for, among Romans, 718 f.
- Marchets of women, defined, 856
- Marginal sea, extent of, 563
- Market, on furnishing, 368 f.
- Marriage. See also Matrimony:
obligation of, 790
of rulers, creating a system of states, 1045

- on permitting, to foreigners, 371 f.
 whether children must have consent of their parents before contracting, 931 ff.
- Master. See also Slavery: nature of relation between slave and, 934 obligation of captives toward their, 937 f.
- Masturbation, 69
- Material element in moral actions, furnished by animals and things, 67
- Matrimony. See also Marriage; Divorce:
 adultery and wilful desertion dissolve,
 877 ff.
 between brothers and sisters, 901 ff.
 between parents and children is wicked,
 898 ff.
 how far civil law may rule upon, 851 ff.
 in the forbidden degrees, 901 ff.
 irregular, of Amazons, 854 ff.
 laws and rights of regular, 855 ff.
 mankind should not be propagated contrary to laws of, 844 ff.
 most perfect form of, is for one woman to be joined to one man, 874 f.
 on error in, 888 ff.
 on less common forms of, 619 f., 908 ff.
 physical fitness is required for, 888
 the seedbed of mankind, 840 unlawful for several to marry or lie with one woman, 864 ff.
 unlawful hastily to dissolve, 875 ff.
 what kind of an obligation to marry may arise from civil laws, 846 ff., what from natural law, 849 ff.
 whether consummated by consent and not cohabitation, 863 f.
 whether there is any obligation to marry,
 840 ff.
 why forbidden between blood kin, 891 f.
- Matthaeus, Anton:
 on distinction between crime and penalty,
 310 f.
 on whether adultery is committed by polygamy, 871 f.
- Meaning of words:
 due to imposition, 461 ff.
 variations in, 467
- Means by which obligations arising from a pact may be met. See Obligations
- Means to an end, in an obligation, 208
- Media:
 of negation, 35
 of participation, 35
- Mediator:
 difference between, and agent, 451
 of peace, 831
- Member of a partnership. See Partnership
- Mendicants, 255
- Mental reservation, 477 f.
- Mercenaries:
 use of, in war, 1308 f.
 what is owed, 1311
- Merchandise, right of free passage for, 358 f., and whether toll can be charged for the same, 359 ff.
- Merchant law, of Rhodes, 308
- Merit:
 before God, 139
 nature of, 138 ff.
 nobility is usually and properly based upon, 1265
- Metaphysics, 3
- Metempsychosis, 180
- Military courts, strict rulings of, 1148 f.
- Military service:
 exemption from, 1149
 no man should render himself useless for,
 1150 ff.
 whether citizen may refuse, because of pact with enemy, 1149 f.
- Military signals, use of, to deceive, 468
- Milton, John, views of, upon divorce, 883 ff.
- Ministers:
 should assume odium of their sovereign, 1240 sovereigns should secure services of competent and honest, 1122 f.
- Minor:
 on consent given by, 407 f.
 pacts entered into by, 508 f.
- Minor cause, of an act, 84
- Minority:
 defined, 10
 how affecting pacts of prince, 1343
- Minority, a, whether obligated by majority in system of states, 1050 f.
- Miracles, expected to accompany perjury,
 493 f.
- Misdeed, no one should be punished for another's, 1225 ff.
- Misfortune, not every, is human punishment, 1222
- Modes:
 defined, 5
 divisions of, 16

Modestinus, on usucapion, 646
 Mohammedan religion, 233
 Mohammedans, belief of, in fate, 240
Mohatra, 761
 Monarchy:
 defined, 1025
 how established, 1032 f.
 ways of acquiring sovereignty in. See Sovereignty
 whether oldest form of state, 1025 will of king is will of state in, 985 f.
 Monasticism, evil of, 235 f.
 Money:
 as eminent price, 676
 cause for introduction of, 690 f.
 evil of debasing, 694
 how change in intrinsic value of, affects a mutuum, 750, or in extrinsic value,
 750 ff.
 how contributed in a partnership, 763 f.
 how far directors of states can determine value of, 693 ff.
 in determining value of, consideration should be taken of land, 696 f.
 increased avarice, 694 ff.
 usually consists of metals, 691 ff.
 value of, is subject to change, 697 f.
 Monks, 348
 Monogamy, most perfect form of marriage,
 874 f. See also Marriage; Matrimony
 Monopolies, 738 ff.
 Moral cause, kinds of, 68
 Moral certainty:
 often but a strong presumption, 36
 position of Ziegler upon, 36 f.
 Moral evils, whether ever to be chosen, 46
 Moral latitude, 32 f.
 Moral quantities, latitude in, 35 f.
 Moral questions:
 Grotius holds no certainty possible in, 33 f.
 Grotius' position on, answered, 34 f.
 Morality:
 connexion of, with blushing, 31 of human actions is dependent on intrinsic indifference of will, 54 f.
 origin of, only in laws of God, 27 f.
 Morals, defined, 67
 Mortgage:
 how different from a pledge, 781
 nature of, 598
 Mortgaging, of kingdom requires consent of people, 1290

Mother, on original power over children lying with, 910 ff., 915 f., which is then derived from her upon others, 912 f. See also Paternal Power
 Movables:
 how subject to usucapion, 647, 649, 655 occupancy of, depends on will of supreme authority, 571 f.
 when understood to be occupied, 578
 Mutilation:
 manner of fixing compensation for, 326
 of oneself, 298
 on defence against, 278
 to avoid military service, 1150 ff.
 Mutuum:
 commodities used in, 748
 defined, 747
 in case some change takes place in intrinsic value of money, 750, or in its extrinsic value, 750 ff.
 on a tacit, 748 f.
 whether an alienation, 749 f.
 Nakedness:
 natural shame of, 894 ff.
 Velthuysen on, 894 ff.
 Natural children:
 are owed maintenance, 628
 right of legitimate takes precedence over that of, 632 f., provided father acknowledges them, 634, or has not disin-herited them, 635
 Natural equality. See Equality, natural Natural gifts, may not be imputed, 72 Natural law. See Law of nature; Natural liberty; State of nature
 Natural liberty. See also Law of nature;
 State of nature:
 affords no place for human punishment,
 1160 f., 1170 f.
 allows arbitrary fixing of price, 685 f.
 enjoyed by a king, 1342 f.
 is not freedom from obligations, 164 on manner of settling disputes in state of. See Disputes
 Natural obligation. See Obligation
 Natural price, defined, 686
 Natural punishments, defined, 222
 Nature, does not give right over things,
 96 ff.
 Nature, law of. See Law of nature
 Nature, state of. See State of nature

Necessity:

- basis of right and privilege of, 296 ff.
- kinds of, 295 f.
- may not arise from one's own fault, 304
- right allowed by, over property of others, 301 ff.
- right and privilege of, 295 ff.
- right which preservation of our property allows over property of others, 308 f.
- what rights allowed by, over a man himself or directly over others, 298 f., or indirectly, 299 f.

Need:

- as setting price, 676 f.
- whether cause for establishment of state, 958 f.

Negligence, presumption of, in usucapion, 650

Nemesis, 224

Nobility:

- due to imposition of states, 1264 f.
- is not born with one by nature, 1262 ff.
- nature of, to-day over most of Europe, 1268 ff.
- nature of Roman, in early period, 1265 ff., and afterwards, when it was accorded to honours borne in state, 1267 f.
- of blood is little valued in some places, 1270 ff.
- usually and properly based upon merits, 1265

Nocturnal thief. See Robber by night

Novation. See Renewal

Nullification, how allowed in crimes, 140 f.

Oath. See also Perjury:

- a king cannot lay aside his own valid, 1344
- as an accessory bond of obligations, 501
- attended by miracles, 493 f.
- classes of, 518 f.
- 'corporal oath', 516
- decisive, of a controversy, 520
- does not change nature of act to which it is added, 507 ff.
- end of, 492 f.
- excludes cavils, 509 ff.
- how far heir is obligated by, of deceased, 516 ff.
- in a promise, 424
- in bearing witness (assertive), 519 f.
- in confirmation, 519
- is to be interpreted in light of intention of one who requires it, 514 ff.

must be taken in name of God, 494 f., and by faith of swearer, 499 nature of, 491 ff.

of a people cannot bind posterity, 517 f.

of Joshua to Gibeonites, 503 of judges, 519

on intention of swearer of, 499 ff.

on releases from, 522 f.

promissory, 519

sanctity of, 491

should not always be interpreted strictly, 511 ff., nor without tacit conditions and limitations, 513 f.

supplementary and purgative, 520 f.

to perform unlawful things does not obligate, 505 f., nor such as impedes a greater good, 506 f.

when elicited by fraud, 501 ff.

when extorted by fear, 503 ff.

when taken for another, 516

whether every violation of, constitutes a perjury, 521 f.

whose may not be believed, 415

Object, of an offence, measures its seriousness, 1194 ff.

Objects of actions, the twofold division of, 133

Obligation:

- a breach of faith by one party releases other, 788 f., as well as a change of status upon which an obligation was based, 789 f.

a man cannot obligate himself, 94

adventitious, 390

arises from promise or pact, 390

based upon natural law in a treaty, 1329 ff.

caused by an imperfect promise, 393 f.

congenital or adventitious, defined, 381

defined, 20

differs from coercion, 91

extends only to things possible, 428

Grotius on fear in connexion with, 421

how affecting will, 91

how civil laws may make marriage an, 846 ff., and how natural law, 849 ff.

how far incumbent upon an heir by an oath of deceased, 516 f.

how fear of deception interferes with rise of, 411 ff., and fear of violence, 416 ff.

how laid upon a man, 95

imperfect, 304 f., 307

Obligation (cont.).

imperfectly and perfectly mutual, 388 f.
 in permissions, 108 f.
 inequality of, in natural law, 386 is not created by a mere assertion, 393 lying upon those who have formulated treaties which have not been ratified,
 1340 f.
 mutual and non-mutual, 387 f.
 mutual, of buyer and seller, 736 f.
 natural and civil, defined, 383 f., and their efficacy, 385 ff.
 natural, strictly civil, and mixed, 385 ff.
 nature of, 92
 no, to do things illegal, 436, or dis-honourable, 437, or such as involve some base deed, 437 ff.
 no, to undergo punishment, 1163 not based upon force, 95 ff., nor upon natural superiority, 99 ff.
 not caused by mere acts of humanity, 351
 not caused by oath to do unlawful things, 505 f., nor by one which impedes a greater good, 506 f.
 oaths as an accessory bond of, 501 of baring our mind to another, 468 f.
 of emancipated children, 922 f.
 of kings, how far binding upon their successors, 1345 f.
 of peace, by natural law, 165 ff.
 of the law of nature, comes from God,
 217 ff.
 on an impossible thing is void, 428 f., yet compensation may be demanded, 429 origin of, 91 f.
 perfect and imperfect, 315, 441 perfect, of parents to maintain their children, 627 f.
 perpetual and temporary, 387
 presupposes the means to end, 208 requires a superior, 94 f.
 rule of, regarding those who cause a damage, 318 f.
 should affect will, 62
 signs and tokens of, 425 f.
 sovereignty is a stronger, than a pact, 1016 special, on citizens of a democracy, 976 time of commencement of, for a pro-missor, 425
 to believe in God, 381 ff.
 to refrain from another's things, 661 to suffer things beyond power of man to bear, 432 ff.

 to what extent made void by time, 790 true basis of, 101
 whether imposed by mere agreements,
 396 ff.
 whether in mere verbal pacts, 396 ff.
 whether there is any, to marry, 840 ff.
 whether there is one upon man to preserve his life, 256 f.
 agents for contracting. See Agents arising from a pact, means by which met,
 782 ff.
 attending speech, 457 ff. See also Speech of a state are not cancelled by change,
 1360 f.
 of soldiers, how far extending, 1152 ff.
 when commencing for a man, 8 which arise on their own account from dominion of things, 661 ff.
 which cease with death, 790 f.
Obstagium, defined, 777
 Occasion:
 defined, 53
 differs from cause, 68
 four factors of, 71
 of an evil is one thing, its cause another,
 1223 ff.
 Occupancy:
 different ways of acquiring, 569
 in time of war, 584 f.
 of movables, depends on will of supreme authority, 571 f.
 of treasures, 583 f.
 original ways of acquiring, 569 f.
 takes place as a whole or by sections,
 570 f.
 when immovable things are understood to be occupied, 577 f., and when movable, 578
 Occupation. See First occupation Occupation, an:
 how affecting simple civil esteem, 1234 ff.
 is required of all men, 347 f.
 Ocean. See Sea
 Offence. See also Crime
 fixes simple civil esteem, 1236 f.
 no one should be punished for another's,
 1225 ff.
 Offence, seriousness of, is measured first by object, 1194 ff., then by the passion by which a man was moved, 1196 ff.,

- then by the scope of purpose which he had in mind, 1198 ff., then by firmness of his purpose, 1200 ff., and by his habit or record, 1202 ff.
- Onerous contracts. See Contracts, onerous
- Opinions of citizens, right of states to examine, 1014 f., 1017 f.
- Opium, as affecting will, 61
- Option, lying with legatee, 797
- Orators, held liable for evil advice, 85
- Orders, on power of, 1074 ff.
- Ordinary price. See also Price:
defined, 676 f.
did not suffice for human life, 689 f.
- Organization, of a state. See State
- Origin of mankind:
Biblical and other accounts of, 162 f., 169 f.
common, makes all men kinsmen, 169 f., and causes natural equality, 333 ideas of ancients on, 542
- Ownership:
defined, 19
established by a pact, 454
force of, 302
gives rise to moral qualities, 16
Grotius on, and theft, 303 ff.
of fish in lake, 579 f.
reasons for introduction of, 301
whether from natural law, 225
- Ox, goring:
damage inflicted by, 67
Hebrew law on, 182
- Pact or Pacts. See also Agreements; Contracts; Promises; Treaties:
as affected by fraud, deceit, unjust fear, 508 f.
by which limited sovereignties exist, 1068 ff.
by which man becomes a citizen, 994 f.
commonly added to selling, 733 ff.
difference between conditional promise and, 448, and arbitrary conditions, 448 difference between contract and, 700 ff.
dishonourable, has no obligation, 437, nor such as can be performed only by some base deed, 437 ff.
do not alone ensure peace of mankind, 964 effect of an evil, 437 ff.
favourable and odious, 806
Hobbes on difference between contract and, 699, and Roman law on this, 699 f.
how affected by fear of deception, 411 ff.
how far dominion is secured by, 610 f.
how invalid, may become valid, 423
interpretation of, 793 ff.
is understood with signs, 465 f.
lost articles claimed by, 663 made valid by fear of violence, 416 ff.
mixed with chance, are found in peace, 766, as well as in war, 767 f.
most general division of, 454 necessity and nature of, in formation of state, 973 ff.
no, between arbitrators and parties, 827 ff.
not necessary for a state of peace, 175 f.
of marriage, as affecting divorce, 875 f., 879 of parties in arbitration, 828
of wager, 768
on agents for contraction of, 449 ff. See also Agents on compulsion in, 434 f.
on error in, 409 ff.
relating to war, 1316 ff.
rules of prudence in, 414 f.
signs and tokens of, 425 ff.
sovereignty is a stronger obligation than, 1016 tacit, at basis of paternal power, 914 f.
tacit, definition and illustrations of, 402 ff., 719, 994
Ulpian's definition of, 424
whether made invalid by suspicion of deception, 411 ff.
which formed a state, created supreme civil sovereignty, 1000 f.
with enemy, whether a citizen may refuse military service because of, 1149 f.
with robbers, 419, and Roman law on such, 420 with signs, is general or special, 466 ff.
- Pacts, accessory:
force of, when affirmative, 773 f.
if base, are invalid, 771 f.
illustrated, 403
sometimes disorganize business, 772
the two kinds of, 771
variety of, 771
when added after time a negative pact causes exception, 773 when added at once, are valid, provided other things are equal, 772 f.

- Pacts relating to war. See War, pacts relating to
- Pain, how estimated by Hebrew law in injuries, 325
- Paper, goes with writing, 589
- Pardon:
- how far lawful, prior to a penal law, 1187 ff., and subsequent to it, 1190 ff.
 - whether lawful at any time, 1186 f.
- Parents:
- duty of, 917 f.
 - Hebrew law on marriage between, and children, 900 f.
 - love of, for their children, 206 f.
 - marriage between, and children is wicked, 898 ff.
 - twofold right of, to correct their children, 1177 f.
- Particular justice. See Justice
- Parties, to a dispute. See Disputes
- Partnership:
- contract of, 704
 - good faith in, 765
 - how compensation is made to a, 785
 - in all goods, 764 f.
 - insurance in, 764
 - irregular, 764
 - money and labour may be balanced in several ways in, 763 f.
 - ways of formation of, 763
- Passage:
- of goods, whether toll can be charged for, 359 ff.
 - servitude of, 605
- Passion, of an offender, measures seriousness of an offence, 1196 f.
- Passions, the:
- affecting the will, 60 f.
 - principal ones defined, 247 f.
 - to be governed by reason, 246 f.
 - view of Grotius on, 60 f.
- Pasturing, servitude of right of, 605
- Pater fiduciarius*, 774
- Paterfamilias. See Head of a family;
- Paternal power
- Paternal power:
- according to Hobbes original power over children lies with mother, 910 ff., which is then derived from her by others, 912 f.
 - common view of origin of, 910
 - how far belonging to father rather than mother, 915 ff.
 - how lost, 931
 - in infancy and childhood, 919 f.
 - of father as such, how great over his children, 917 ff.
 - on obligations of emancipated children, 922 f.
 - should not extend to life and death, 919
 - upon what reasons sovereignty of father is based, 913 ff.
 - what powers over adult children belong to fathers outside states, 923 ff., and within states, 926 ff.
 - whether children must have consent of their parents for contracting marriage, 931 ff.
 - whether father can sell his son, 921 f.
- Patience, how far required of a Christian, 284 f.
- Patrimony, power of king over possessions, if kingdom is his own, 1274 f.
- Paulus, on recovery of payment made for another's property, 670
- Pawn. See Pledge
- Payment, whether recoverable, if made for another's property, 670
- Peace:
- advantages of, elaborated by Isocrates, 197
 - commended by law of nature, 213
 - deception not allowable in concluding, 484 f.
 - divisions of, 9
 - guarantors of, 1328
 - how far upon concluding, the possessions of private citizens can be left untouched, 1326
 - interpretation of terms of, 806
 - is disturbed by differences in view, 964
 - is natural state of man, 169 f.
 - is ordinary status of man, 1292 f.
 - laws of man's natural, 172 ff., which needs no agreements, 175 f., but is little to be trusted, 176 ff.
 - mere respect for law of nature does not insure, 962 f., nor arbitrators, nor pacts, 963 f.
 - on division of power of concluding, 1017 ff.
 - on guarantors of, 1328
 - reason for power of concluding, being vested in states, 1013
 - state of, defined, 9

- the situation when referred to decision of battle, 1327 f.
time limit for fulfilment of, to be strictly observed, 1326 f.
whether legally concluded with rebels, 1325 f.
whether pacts of, are weakened by exception of fear, 1324 f.
Pegasian decree, 803
Penal law. See also Sanction:
 how far pardon is lawful prior to, 1187 ff., and subsequent to, 1189 ff.
Penalties. See also Punishment, human; Sanction:
 Matthaeus' distinction between crimes and, 306 f.
 reason for power in states to inflict, 1011 f., and on division of such power, 1017 ff.
 should be meted out with justice, 1121
People, a. See also State:
 cannot by oath bind descendants, 517 f.
 cannot throw off sovereignty of king, 1058 f.
 how body of, may perish, 1366 f., and how its form, 1367
 how far eternal, 1364 ff.
 how may be taken back from enemy, 1314 f.
 kingdoms established by free consent of, 1082 f.
 on pacts between, and sovereign, 1068 ff.
 remains same, though form of commonwealth changes, 1360
Per aversionem, sale by, 735
Perjury, 491 f. See also Oath Permission:
 in laws, 108 f.
 obligation in, 108
 open and tacit, 109
 plenary and less plenary, 109
Person intestate. See Succession to a person intestate Persons, moral:
 composite, 13
 compound, divisions of, 13
 defined, 11
 divisions of, 11 f.
 feigned, 15
 in a state, 6 f.
 one individual may be several, 13 f.
 produced by imposition, 15
Persons, private, varieties of, 12 f.
Philosophy, prime (metaphysics), task of, 3
Physical fitness, required for marriage, 888
Physical quantities, 35
Piccart, on division of parts of supreme sovereignty, 1020 Picture, canvas goes with, 589 f.
Pirates, oath to, 505
Place, as mentioned in promises, 448
Planted things, go with ground, 587 f.
Plants, man's consumption of, does not constitute an injury, 526
Plato, on names of things, 462 f.
Pleasures, how far man should strive for, 246 Pledge:
 a temporary, 670 f.
 how different from a mortgage, 781
 in a contract, 706 f.
 is either useful or barren, 780
 one of chief rights to property of others, 598 use of, 779 f.
 verbal, must be kept, 396 ff.
 whether securable by usucapion, 780 f.
Plutarch, on vices, 72
'Political animal':
 Aristotle on man being, 952 f.
 what is required of man to be, 954 ff.
Polygamy:
 before forbidden by divine law, 33
 Mohammedan law on, 869
 use of, among many peoples, 868 ff.
 whether lawful, 864 ff.
 whether opposed to natural law, 870 ff.
Polytheism, 14
Pope, claim of, to grant kingly titles, 1009
Positive entity, 70
Possession. See also Delivery of possession:
 for usucapion, must be continuous, 648 f.
 how secured of corporeal and incorporeal things, 609
 in bad faith, 663 f.
 nature and kinds of, 608 ff.
 place of, in dominion, 607 f.
 whether arbitrators should pronounce upon, 830 Possessions:
 citizens do not everywhere owe dominion of, to state, 1275 ff.
 how far upon concluding peace those of private citizens can be left untouched, 1326

Possessions (cont.).

- of crown cannot be alienated without consent of people, 1290 f.
- power of a king over, if the kingdom is his own patrimony, 1274 f.
- rights of a king over, of state, 1287 f.
- the supreme sovereignty can pass laws on how citizens may use, 1277 ff.
- Possessor in bad faith, to what obligated, 663
- Possessor in good faith. See also Purchaser in good faith:
 - may withdraw from contract with one who has no dominion, 671
 - not obligated, if he has given away a thing given him, 668 f., nor if he has sold a thing bought, 669
 - not required to make restitution of a thing which has perished, 667, but obligated to restore any of its fruits still existing, 667 f., and their value if consumed, provided he would have had to consume the same amount anyway, 668, but not such as he neglected to use, 668
 - of property open to usucapion, 654 f.
 - of stolen goods, 648
 - right of, 598 f.
 - to what obligated, 663, 666
 - whether rightful to retain property of another, when owner unknown, 671
- Postliminium*, defined, 1314
- 'Pot of fortune', 769 f.
- Power:
 - defined, 18
 - divisions of, with regard to objects, 18 f.
 - of husband over wife. See Husband, power of
 - personal and communicable, 18 f.
 - quality and titles of, 1253 f.
 - whether alone foundation of honour, 1245 ff.
- Power of a head of a family. See Paternal power
- Power of a master. See Master
- Power of life and death. See Life and Death, power of
- Prayers, not heard by God when for an evil end, 237
- Precedence. See also Rank:
 - arguments on which a claim is made to, 1251

- custom of antiquity on, 1252 f.
- is fixed by the supreme sovereignty, 1259
- who may by his own right have, over another, 1249 ff.
- Preparedness for war, need for, 176 f., 1126 f.
- Prescription:
 - how differing from usucapion, 646
 - length of time of, 647 f.
 - whether of natural law, 653
- Price. See also Rise of prices:
 - basis of ordinary, 676 f.
 - causes which raise or lower common, 687 ff.
 - defined, 676
 - in a contract of insurance, 770
 - is a moral quantity in things, 20, 675 f.
 - kinds of, 676
 - legitimate, legal, and common or natural, 685 ff.
 - necessity of introduction of, 675
 - of fancy, 684 f.
 - on common, 687
 - ordinary, did not suffice for human life, 689 f., therefore an eminent price was set in money, 690 f., which usually consists of metals, 691 ff.
 - why many useful things have no, 677 ff.
 - why prices of things rise, 680 ff.
- Price, contracts which presuppose. See Contracts
- Pride:
 - Descartes on, 339 f.
 - often offends against the natural equality of men, 339 f.
- Primogeniture:
 - as affecting origin of first state, 1026
 - Hobbes on, 338
 - rights of, 630 f.
- Prince. See also King; Sovereign:
 - citizens may not lawfully use force against, merely because he is called a tyrant, 1109 ff.
 - ways in which injury may be done citizens by, 1104 ff.
 - when an invader is to be considered a lawful, 1113 f.
 - whether extravagant injuries of, can be resisted, 1106 ff.
- Principal cause of an act, 81 ff.
- Principal in a mandate, 718 f.
- Priority in time, 443

- Prisoner of war, how obligated to his captor, 1149 f.
- Private parts, reason for shame of one's, 892 ff.
- Privilege of necessity. See Necessity
- Privileges:
- favourable and odious, 806
 - granted by kings, how far subject to recall, 1346 f.
- Probability, doctrine of, 42 f.
- Probable conscience. See Conscience
- Profits:
- how divided in a partnership, 763 f.
 - made from goods of another belong to him, 666 f.
 - whether taxes should be levied on, 1283 f.
- Projecting or extending over, servitude of, 604
- Promise or Promises. See also Agreements:
- agents for the contraction of, 449 ff. See also Agents
 - are not to be made rashly, 396 ff.
 - as the source of adventitious obligations, 264
 - cannot be made on another's things, 442, nor on things obligated to another, 443
 - conditions of, 444 ff.
 - difference between conditional, and pacts, 448
 - favourable and odious, 806
 - for dishonest deeds, 440 ff.
 - future, do not transfer a right, 395 f.
 - gratuitous, obligation of, 389 f.
 - how invalid may become valid, 423
 - hurtful to promisee may not be performed, 436 f., nor dishonourable, 437, nor such as can be performed only by some base deed, 437 ff.
 - imperfect, obligates giver, but confers no right on another, 267, 393 f.
 - is not changed by addition of an oath, 507 ff.
 - made by a king when accepting a throne, 1068 ff.
 - nullified by error, 408 f.
 - on a burden added to, 453 f.
 - on consent required in. See Consent
 - perfect, 395
 - requires consent of promisee, 423 ff.
 - Ulpian's definition of, 424
 - when becoming binding, 425
 - whether ratified by silence of supreme sovereign, 1341
- Promissory oath, 518 f.
- Proneness to evil, of man, 149 f.
- Proofs, in case of loss of, 832
- Propagation of mankind, should not take place contrary to laws of marriage, 844 ff.
- Properties of things, natural, 4 f.
- Property:
- how natural equality of men stipulates division of, 338 f.
 - is not distinguished for sake of hoarding, 301
 - may be acquired by war, 1310
 - may be seized if held by another, 302
 - of another, should not be damaged, 314
 - of others, what right necessity allows over, 308 f.
 - on defence of, 288 ff.
 - right which the preservation of our, allows over that of others, 308 f.
 - slaves are in a fashion equivalent to, 938 ff.
- Property, transfer of. See Dominion, transfer of
- Propositions, 24
- Proprietorship. See also Dominion:
- arises immediately from agreement of men, 536 f.
 - can exist only between more than one, 535 f.
 - defined, 532 ff.
 - diminution of, 533 f.
 - how things become object of, 558 f.
 - is a moral quality, 532
 - it is idle for things of inexhaustible use to be made subject to, 558 f.
 - must allow for custody, 559
 - usefulness of, to mankind, 541 f.
 - ways of acquiring. See Occupancy
 - what is required in order for things to become subject to, 558 f.
- Proselyte of righteousness, 15
- Prospect, servitude of, and of not cutting off, 604
- Prospects, on the buying of, 737 f.
- Prostitution:
- among the Egyptians, 192
 - general discussion of, 842 ff.
 - Roman law on, 439 f.
- Protagoras, on dishonesty, 198
- πορνημους*, 734 f.

Prudence:

defined, 24 f.

rules of, in pacts, 414 f.

Punishment, human. See also Crime;

Offence; Sanction:

cannot be meted out to a supreme sovereign, 1056

defined, 1162 ff.

how dealt to a body, 1218 ff.

how far private individuals can inflict, 1181 ff.

is possible only in states, 1161 natural liberty affords no place for, 1160 f., 1170 f.

no one should suffer, for another's misdeed, 1225 ff.

not every misfortune is, 1222

place of, in laws, 104 f.

respect is had in, to person of him who is to suffer, 1210 ff.

settlement of, by lot, 767 should be inflicted against will of sufferer, 486, 1163 f.

should serve some end, 1173 ff.

species of justice to which is to be referred the exaction of, 1166 ff.

the first end of, is to reform guilty person, 1175 f.

the second end of, is to protect injured party, 1179 f.

the third end is security of all others, 1180 f.

to whom belongs power to exact, 1170 ff.

what is regarded in determining amount of, 1204 ff.

what may be measure of, 1210 whether individuals can confer upon states right to inflict, 1158 ff.

whether the Hebrew law is in every case an adequate measure of, 1212 ff.

who may exact, of another, 1176 ff.

Purchase, when incomplete, 730 f.

Purchaser in good faith, whether able to recover what he paid for another's property, 670

Purple, goes with garment, 590 f.

Purpose, of an offender measures seriousness of his offence, 1198 ff., as also does firmness of, 1200 ff.

Qualities, moral:

caused by ownership, 16

divisions of, 16

operative, 17 f.

passive, 18

primary and derived, 17

sensible, 19

Qualities of moral actions, number of, 113 ff.

Quality of power, 1253 f.

Quantities, moral:

defined, 16, 20

in actions, 21

Quantity:

as basis of price, 675

in moral acts, 35

moral and physical, of things, 675 f.

Quantity of moral actions:

absolute, 131

relative, 134

Quarrying stone, servitude of right of, 605

Raising and not raising higher, servitudes of, 604

Rank:

among allies, 1256 f.

of citizens is fixed by supreme sovereignty, 1257 ff.

Rape:

of the Sabines, 371

partial accountability for, on part of the woman, 68

Ravisher, reparation due by, 328

Razing of houses, allowed by fire, 308

Reason, the, presupposed in giving of consent, 404 f.

Rebels, whether peace can legally be concluded with, 1325 f.

Receiving and not receiving roof water, servitude of, 604

Recipient of a deposit:

degree of diligence required of, 725 f.

whether able to use deposit, 726 f.

Recipient of a loan, 723 f.

Reciprocal donation. See Donation, reciprocal Reciprocal usage, 780

Redemption:

of captives, 1321 f.

of land, Hebrew law on, 735

Regents, nature of sovereignty of, 1079

Release of a debt, how made, 787 f.

Religion, right of a state to control, 1014 f.

- Reluctance, when assumed in a court of law, 65
- Renewal of a debt, 791 f.
- Rent. See also Letting:
 how fixed, 743 f.
 when lowered, 742 f.
- Reparation:
 due in cases of adultery, 327 f.
 for damage done by a man's possessions, as by animals, 320 f.
 for scars, 326 f.
 how fixed by Hebrew law in cases of injury, 324 ff.
 if malice is involved, 322
 in case of a ravisher of a virgin, 328
 in case of murder, 322 ff.
 in cases of theft, should be made good by state, 329
 in damages, 313 ff.
 owed by a thief, 328 f.
- Repentance:
 defined, 53
 where allowed, 92 f.
- Representation, on right of, 635
- Representatives, defined, 11 f.
- Reprisals, on equity of, in war, 1305
- Rescission, 734
- Residence, on allowing, to foreigners, 366 ff.
- Resistance. See Self-Defence
- Restitution:
 formal claim for, of a debt, 666
 no obligation on him who has given away a gift, 668 f., or sold a thing bought, 669 of a thing consumed in good faith not required, 666 f., nor of one which has perished, 667, but of its fruits, if still existing, 667 f., and their value if consumed, provided same amount would have had to be consumed anyway, 668, but not such as was neglected to be used, 668 of gifts made with a bad motive, 671 f.
 of property, bought from another, to original owner, 671
 when to be made, 306
- Restriction, of the interpretation of a law. See Interpretation
- Retaliation, absurdity of, as rule for punishments, 1214 ff.
- Retractus*, 734
- Retribution, law of, does not apply in war, 1298
- Revenge, spirit of, in man, 955
- Revenues, manner of control of, by the state, 1283 f.
- Reverence:
 due parents by children, 927 f.
 part of, in an obligation, 95
- Revolt, against a prince, how far justified, 1106 ff.
- Reward:
 defined, 221 f.
 following good actions, 223
 whether recoverable, when for a wicked deed, 440 f.
- Rhodes, merchant law of, 308
- Riches, how far to be striven for, 243 ff.
- Right:
 a, does not create an obligation, 390
 as pleasure of stronger, 102
 defined, 19, 390
 emphyteutic, 598
 equality of, between all men, 332 f.
 Hobbes on transfer of, 390 f.
 how far a king may resume his former, 1342 ff.
 nature and source of, which is violated by falsehood, 473 ff.
 not created by promises in future tense, 395 f.
 not given by an imperfect promise, 393 not possible against God for His promises, 395 of a king over possessions of a state, 1287 f.
 of a possessor in good faith, 598, 599 of burning lime, servitude of, 605 of cutting stakes and wood, servitude of, 605 of digging sand, servitude of, 605 of one in womb, 1092 f.
 of pasturing, servitude of, 605
 of preference, 734 f.
 of quarrying stone, servitude of, 605 of representation in inheritances, 635 of safe conduct, 1321
 perfect, and imperfect, 118 f., 315, 598 real limitation of transfer of, 392 f.
 superfluous, 598
 to all things, is not given by nature, 96 ff.
 to expect honour from others, 1242, 1248 f.
 to grant kingly title, 1008 f.
 to know the truth, 470 f.

- Right (cont.).
 to things, whether acquirable by war, 1311 ff.
 who may by his own, have precedence over another, 1249 ff.
- Right conscience. See Conscience
- Right of life and death. See also Life and death:
 in a system of states, 1048
 whether conferable upon states by individuals, 1158 ff.
 whether included in power of husband over wife, 863
- Right reason:
 as basis of natural law, 201 ff.
 dictates of, 203 f.
- Rights:
 allowable by necessity over property of others, 301 ff.; see also Necessity established by a law, cannot be annulled, 92 f.
 in things belonging to another, 598 of man in a state of nature, 158 ff.
 of regular marriage, 842 f.
 when commencing for a man, 8
 which a preservation of our property allows over property of others, 308 f.
- Rise of prices, as due to:
 distinctiveness, 681
 labours, &c., 684
 luxury, 681 f.
 necessity, 683
 scarcity, 680 ff.
- Risk:
 in a contract of insurance, 770
 in partnerships, 763 of a thing sold, 731 ff.
- River:
 deposits and lands made by, 593 ff.
 land submerged by, 596 f.
 private fields changed by, 595 ff.
- Roadway, servitude of, 605
- Robber, oath to, 505. See also Thief
- Robber by night:
 Hebrew law upon, 290
 whether he can be slain, 290 ff.
- Robbery, punishment for, 1213 f.
- Roman Jurisconsults. See Jurisconsults, Roman
- Roman law. See Law, Roman
- Roman nobility:
 nature of, in the early period, 1265 ff.
- was later accorded to honours borne in state, 1267 f.
- Roof water, servitude of, 604
- Roy, Hugo de, on usucapion, 652
- Rule of moral actions. See Law
- Ruler, oaths in the name of, 496 f.
- Running water, right of, 352
- Sabinus, on selling, 729
- Sacred objects:
 not excepted from licence of war, 1309
 not subject to usucapion, 647
- Sacrosanctity, is confined to actual kings, 1112 f.
- Safe conduct, on right of, 1321
- Safety:
 necessity of, 295 f.
 of state is supreme law, 1118 f.
- Salmasius, on whether a mutuum is an alienation, 749
- Sanction. See also Penalties; Punishment, human:
 Cumberland on, 104 f.
 defined, 104
 of natural law, 221 ff.
 penal, in natural law, even though not so expressly defined there, 385 place of, in civil law, 1165 f.
 purpose of, 199
- Sanctity:
 is confined to actual kings, 1112 f.
 of an oath, 491
 of supreme sovereignty, 1103 ff.
- Sand, servitude of right of digging, 605
- Scars, reparation for, 326 f.
- Schools, public, train citizens in good behaviour, 1120
- Sciences, moral:
 answer to Aristotle's position on, 29
 Aristotle's attitude toward, 22 certainty of, 22 ff.
 divisions of, 24
 how demonstrated, 22 f.
- Scrupulous conscience. See Conscience
- Sea:
 citizen attacked upon, 1300
 extent of nation's dominion over, 563 gift of God is not opposed to dominion of, 560 how far navigation and commerce on ocean are free, 566 ff.
 nature of use of, 562 f.

- open, is free from dominion, 565 f. reasons advanced against a proprietary right over, 561 f.
 tolls demanded on, 360 f.
 what parts of, are occupied, 563 f.
- Secondary wives, rules on, 908 f.
- Secret instructions, issued to an agent, 449 f.
- Security may be taken of an army crossing our territory, 355
- Seizure, how far sovereignty is subject to, 1084 ff.
- Selden, view of, that law of nature was known to Gentiles, 220 f.
- Self-Defence: against mutilation, 278
 death inflicted in, is not a crime, 286 ff.
 in case of a box on ear, 280 ff.
 in case of a robber by night, 290 ff.
 is lawful even if violent, 264 f.
 nature of, in a state of natural liberty, 267 ff., and in a commonwealth, 271, 289 on defence of property, 288 ff.
 on part of one first to commit an injury, 293 f.
 time for, in a state of natural liberty, 272 ff., and in states, 275 ff.
 to preserve chastity, 279
 two kinds of, 264
 whether commanded by natural law, 265 ff.
 whether proper against one who makes a mistake, 271 f.
- Self-Development, is required by general duties of humanity, 347 ff.
- Self-Interest, limitation of, 213 f.
- Self-Love: dangers from, 827
 is not law of nature, 210 ff.
 of man, 949 ff.
- Selling:
 duty of seller to buyer and vice versa, 736 f.
 general principles of, 728 ff.
 how coinciding with letting and hiring, 741 f.
 on pacts commonly added to, 733 ff.
 on risk and gain of a thing sold, 731 ff.
 when a contract of, is closed, 730 f.
- Senate, power of:
 during an interregnum, 1091
 in a limited monarchy, 1074 f.
- Seneca, on necessity of a social life, 208 f.
- Seniority, 10
- Sense of words. See also Speech:
 how gathered from reason of law, 804 f.
 when sought by conjecture, 797 ff.
- Sensual pleasure, as the summum bonum, 216 f.
- Servants, labours of. See Labours of servants
- Servitudes:
 compared with usufruct, 602
 kinds of, on city property, 603 ff., and on country property, 605 nature and number of, 598 f.
- Settlement of disputes. See Disputes
- Sex attraction, reason for, 840
- Shame, sense of:
 natural, 892 ff.
 origin of, 896 ff.
 planted in man by God, 31 f.
- Shores, foreign, right to approach, 361 ff.
- Short hand, delivery of possession by, 611 f.
- Signs:
 as used in telling truth, 470
 attended by an agreement, 465 f.
 different kinds of, 458 ff.
 in promises and pacts, 402 necessary for alienation, 606 f.
 of consent, 425 ff.
 on part of an enemy, which allow self-defence, 273 ff.
 rule for use of, 458
 to show consent of acceptor of a promise, 423 f.
 to show internal subsequent consent, 423 words as, 794
- Simony, 678
- Simple approbation of will, 52
- Simple esteem. See Esteem, simple
- Sin:
 defined, 42
 on choice of, 436
 the two factors in, 1160 f.
 whether evil command of a superior can ever be carried out without, 1143 ff.
- Sins, the five heinous, of the Hindus, 62
- 'Sins of daily occurrence', 74
- Sisters, marriage between brothers and, 901 ff.
- Size, just, of a state, 968
- Slaughter of animals. See also Animals:
 defence of, 529 ff.
 doubts on, 526 ff.

- Slave or Slaves. See also Slavery:
 compensation for death of, 323
 fugitive, not subject to usucaption, 647 is capable of receiving an injury, 940 ff.
 is in fashion equivalent to property,
 938 ff.
 nature of relation between master and, 934 number of, greatly increased by war, 937 on the offspring of, 942 f.
 Roman law on escaped, 582
 status of, 1233 ff.
 usufruct of, 601
 ways in which freed, 945 f.
 whether some men are such by nature,
 340 ff.
- Slavery. See also Master; Slave: disadvantages in, 943 ff.
 greatly increased by war, 937
 nature of, 934
 not an institution of nature, 934 f.
 not directly ordained of God, 935 f.
 originated in a contract, 936
- Slaying of another:
 allowable in self-defence, 286 ff., and in defence of one's possessions, 288 ff.
 in case of a robber by night, 290 ff.
 in time of famine, 298 f.
- Sociable attitude, definition of, 208
- Sociableness:
 Bacon's corollaries from, 210
 is required by law of nature, 210 ff.
 necessary for man, 208 f.
 Seneca on, 208 f.
- Social life, is enjoined upon men by God,
 217 f.
- Societies:
 share of members in, 119 f.
 the three kinds of, 839 f.
- Society:
 of men, first introduced for mutual aid, 169 reasons for formations of, 213 f.
 seriousness of offences against, 1195
- Socrates, Aristotle's answer to theory of,
 on virtue, 79
- Sodomy, evil of, 842
- Soldiers:
 how far the obligation of, extends,
 1152 ff.
 may not desert their post, 433
- Soul:
 immortality of, 216 f.
 of the universe, 180
 power of, 148 f.
- Sovereign, supreme:
 can be superior to an entire people, 1058 ff.
 can in time of war expose citizens to peril of their lives, 1148 f.
 how far capable of determining value of money, 693 ff.
 is not accountable, 1055 f.
 is superior to man-made laws, 1056 f.
 on duty of, 1117 ff.
 pact between, and citizens, 974 ff.
 power of, in releasing from oaths, 523 f.
 whether a promise is ratified by silence of, 1341 whether it is right for a citizen to serve in an unjust war at command of his,
 1145 ff.
- Sovereignty. See also Command:
 exposition of connexion of parts of,
 1017 f.
 how a person may be freed from another's,
 1087 f.
 how established in marriage, 862 f.
 how far in infancy and childhood children are capable of, 920 f.
 how far seizable by just force, 1084 ff., and how far by unjust force, 1086 f.
 is a stronger obligation than a pact, 1016 is established by a pact, 454 number of ways of holding, 1078 f.
 of husband over wife, 859 ff.
 on ways of acquiring, 1084 ff.
 ways by which acquirable over conquered, 1314
 what is 'absolute', 1063 f.
 what is embraced in, 953 f.
 whether substance or accident, 1005 f.
 who may properly be said to have a part of, 1016 f.
 why styled 'supreme', 1055
- Sovereignty, absolute:
 defined, 1063
 Hobbes' position that all supreme sovereignty is likewise, 1077 f.
 is not found equally in all forms of commonwealths, 1064 ff.
- Sovereignty, civil:
 citizens often complain unjustly of, 1104 on the creation of, 1000 ff.
 on the power of, in determining the value of citizens, 1229 ff.

Sovereignty, limited:

- basis upon which different parts of sovereignty are limited, 1072 ff.
- pacts by which existing, 1068 ff.
- power of senate and assembly in, 1074 ff.
- source of, 1066 ff.

Sovereignty of the father. See paternal power

Sovereignty, supreme:

- can pass laws about use which citizens should make of their possessions, 1277 ff.
- exists no less in a democracy than in a monarchy, 1026 ff.
- fixes rank of citizens, 1257 ff.
- Grotius on occupancy of, 585
- holder of, is not accountable, 1055 f., and is superior to man-made laws, 1056 f.
- is acquirable by war, 585
- is conferred by a pact, 974 ff.; this is denied by Hobbes, 977 ff.
- is weakened by unequal treaties, 1331 ff.
- lawful commands of, should not be resisted, 1103 ff.
- may be plenary or limited, 1078 f.
- on characteristics of, 1055 ff.
- on parts of, and their natural connexion, 1010 ff.
- on power of, over lives and fortunes of citizens, which arises by reason of their crimes, 1158 ff.
- on power of, over lives of citizens in defence of state, 1148 ff.
- on power of, over possessions both of state and of individuals, 1274 ff.
- on sanctity of, 1103 ff.
- whether there can be a temporary, 1079 f.
- why sovereignty in a state is styled 'supreme', 1055

Space:

- how different from state, 7
- two aspects of, 7

Specification, described, 591 ff.

Speculative truths, 40

Speech:

- general consideration of, 454
- how used, 457 f.
- obligations attending, 457 ff.
- on ambiguous, 476 f.
- on mental reservations in, 477 f.
- origin of, 460 f.
- the different signs, 458 ff.

Spinoza:

- on obedience to God, 383 f.
- on rights of man in a state of nature, 159 ff.

Spoils of war, to whom belonging, 1310 f.

Spontaneity:

- of an action, 56 f.
- of the will, 52

Stakes, servitude of right of cutting, 605

Staple, right of, 359, 360

State (status):

- a definite, 7
- adventitious, 9
- aspects of, 7
- change of, releases from an obligation, 789 f.
- confused with attribute, 10
- considered determinately, 9 f.
- definition of nature of, 5 f.
- does not establish a peculiar species of state, 1035 ff.
- faults of, in states, 707 f.
- fixes simple civil esteem, 1233 ff.
- nobility is due to imposition of, 1264 f.
- of peace and war, 9
- peace is ordinary, of man, 1292 f.

State. See also System of states:

- a union of strength and wills is required for, 971 ff.
- accidents of, do not establish a new species, 1023 ff.
- can surrender to another a citizen as a hostage, 1156 f.
- citizens do not everywhere owe dominion of their possessions to, 1275 ff.
- debts of, are not cancelled by change, 1360 f.
- defined, 983 ff.
- forms of, 1023 ff.
- from love of society does not at once follow love of, 925 f.
- Hobbes' comparison of, to a man, 984
- how far a king may obligate, 1345 f.
- how far duration of civil honours depends upon the judgement of, 1272 f.
- individuals are deprived of right of war within, 1299 f.
- irregular, 1040 f.
- just size of, 968
- mixed, 1037 ff.
- not founded because of fear, 214 f.
- on changes within, and dissolution of, 1360 ff.

State (cont.).

- on internal structure of, 967 ff.
- on mixed, of more recent writers, 1038 ff.
- on motive leading to establishment of, 949 ff.
- should make good loss in cases of theft, 329
- the real cause of founding, 959 ff.
- when losing esteem, 1232
- whether a citizen can suffer an injury from, 1103 f.
- whether able to surrender an innocent citizen, 1154 ff.
- whether need or helplessness be a cause for the establishment of, 958 f.
- State of nature. See also Law of nature; Natural liberty:
 - and commonwealths, 163
 - answer to Hobbes' view of, 170 ff.
 - defined, 154
 - degrees of, 163 ff.
 - different aspects of, 154
 - explanation of the phrase, 164
 - full or limited, 154
 - Hobbes' view that it is mutual war, 166 ff.
 - Hobbes' views of rights of, 158 f.
 - Horace, Lucretius, Diodorus, and Cicero on, 155 ff.
 - how men may be said to be in, 163
 - is not merely constituted by barbarous customs, 173 ff.
 - is one of peace, 165 ff., 172 f.
 - miserable condition of, 154 ff.
 - no superior in, 826
 - rights of, 158 ff.
 - sort of self-defence allowed by, 267 ff.
 - Spinoza's views of rights of, 159 ff.
 - time of self-defence in, 272 ff.
 - use of reason posited in, 172 f.
 - whether leading to war, 165 f.
- Status.* See State (status)
- Stoic fate, evil of, 234
- Stoicism, 239
- Stoics:
 - on pardon, 1186, 1190
 - on wives in common, 866
- Stolen property:
 - is not subject to usucapion, 647
 - valuation of, 329
- Stone, servitude of right of quarrying, 605
- Strangers, on admitting, to one's country and hospitality, 366 ff.

Strength:

- a man should not strive beyond his, 239 ff.
- union of, required for a state, 972 f.
- Subject, man ceases to be a. See also Citizens:
 - if he emigrates from a country, 1348 ff.
 - upon seizure by an enemy, 1358
 - when his king dies without a successor, 1348
- Substance, nature of, 5
- Succession in monarchies:
 - in a patrimonial kingdom, 1093 ff.
 - in kingdoms established by will of a people, 1096 ff., and if it be a simple hereditary succession, 1096 ff., or lineal, 1098 f., or by transverse degrees, 1099 f.
 - on judge of disputes about, 1100 ff.
 - when a posthumous successor is expected, 1092 f.
- Succession to a person intestate. See also Inheritance:
 - children are preferred to all others in, 627
 - civil laws have ample power to regulate, 641 ff.
 - degrees of relationship in, 628
 - depends upon presumed intention of deceased, 625, yet as it appears reasonable, 625 ff.
 - parents succeed for want of children, 635 f., and for want of them, kinsmen in order of relationship, 636 f.
 - the order among kinsmen in, 640 f.
 - whether benefactors rank above kinsmen, 639 f.
 - whether friends are to be preferred to kinsmen, 637 ff.
- Successors, how far contracts of kings obligate their, 1345 f.
- Suicide, whether lawful, 257 ff., 260 ff.
- Summum bonum*, as sensual pleasure, 216 f.
- Sumptuary laws:
 - passing of, belongs to right of supreme sovereignty, 1277 f.
 - should be passed by sovereign, 1125 f.
- Superficiary right, 598 f.
- Superior, a:
 - has no natural right over an inferior, 96 ff.
 - is none in a state of nature, 826
 - it is not right to commit a crime at command of, 1143 ff.
 - makes possible an obligation, 94 f.

- on making pacts with, 415
- power of, in releasing from oaths, 522 f.
- whether a man can carry out evil command of, without sin, 1140 f.
- Superiority, natural, does not give power to impose an obligation, 99 f.
- Supply and demand, as modifying price, 688 f.
- Supreme authority, occupancy of movables depends on will of, 571 f.
- Supreme law, safety of state is the, 1118 f.
- Supreme sovereign. See Sovereign, supreme
- Supreme sovereignty. See Sovereignty, supreme
- Surety, a:
 - cannot be held for more than principal debt, 775, but can be held more securely, 776 f.
 - differs from an expromissor, 778
 - of indemnity, 778
 - on punishment of, 1223 f.
 - use of compensation by, 785 f.
 - what benefits of law belong to, 777 f.
 - when released, 782
- Surety, how partaking of a contract, 706. See also Bail
- Suretyship, nature of, 706, 775 ff.
- Suspicion of deception:
 - Hobbes' views on, 412 f.
 - whether making pacts invalid, 411 f.
- Swearer of an oath:
 - must make it by his own religion, 499
 - on intention of, 499 f.
- System of states:
 - how affairs of state are managed in, 1049
 - how dissolved, 1051 f.
 - is not necessarily created by an empire with provinces, 1043 f.
 - whether a majority obligates a minority in, 1049 ff.
 - which arises because of a common king, 1044 ff.
 - which has been formed by a treaty, 1046 ff.
- Tax-collectors, must be controlled by state, 1282
- Taxes:
 - may be exacted by state, 1279 ff.
 - may not be evaded by a trust, 775
 - right of a state to levy, 1013, and on division of such power, 1017 ff.
- should be collected and spent honestly, 1123 ff.
- whether to be levied on profits or expenses, 1283 f.
- Ten Commandments. See Decalogue
- Tenant. See Lessor
- Testament. See Wills
- Testator, right of, 613 f. See also Wills
- Theft:
 - Grotius on, 303 ff.
 - is not a crime when committed under necessity, 301 ff.
- Thief owes reparation for damage, 328 f.
- Things:
 - it is idle to make proper, inexhaustible, 558 f.
 - much law is concerned with, 524
 - power of mankind over, 524 ff.
 - what is required for, to become proper, 558 f.
- Threats, how interfering with rise of obligations, 411 f., 416 ff.
- Time:
 - as mentioned in promises, 448
 - how far making void obligations, 790
 - limit of, for fulfilment of peace is to be strictly observed, 1326 f.
 - of self-defence in a state of nature, 272 ff., and in commonwealths, 275 ff.
 - when added to a loan, 723
- Title, kingly, whose right it is to grant, 1008 f.
- Titles:
 - differ in different lands, 18
 - force of, 17 f
 - kinds of, 17 f.
 - of power, 1253 f.
- Tokens of consent, 425 ff.
- Toll, whether possible to charge, for passage of goods, 359 ff.
- Trade, right to prevent, 370 f.
- Traitors, use of, in war, 1308 f.
- Transfer of dominion. See Dominion, transfer of
- Transverse degrees, succession by, 1099 f.
- Treason, nature of crime of, 382
- Treasure of Merits, evil of, 236
- Treasures, on ownership of discovered, 583 f.
- Treaties. See also Agreements; Pacts:
 - are not understood to be tacitly renewed, 1339 f.

Treaties (cont.).

- between nations, why entered into, 964
- creating a system of states, 1046 ff.
- division of, 1329
- how far a king is bound by his predecessor's, 1338
- interpretation of, 808
- nature and number of equal, 1331 f., and of unequal, 1332 ff.
- not necessary for a state of peace, 175 f.
- real and personal, 1336 f., which are distinguished either by special signs, 1137, or by general, 1337 f.
- reason for power of concluding, being vested in states, 1013, and on divisions of such power, 1017 ff.
- what obligations lie upon those who have formulated, which have not been ratified, 1340 f.
- whereby no obligation is contracted beyond that of natural law, 1329 ff.
- whether a promise is ratified by silence of supreme sovereign, 1341
- whether allies made after conclusion of, are properly so called, 1339
- whether concerned with deposed kings, 1338 f.
- which of several confederated states should receive aid, 1334 ff.

Truce:

- beginning and end of, 1320
- course to be followed after breaking of, 1321
- declaration of war not required at termination of, 1319 f.
- does not concern cause of war, 1319
- how to understand length of, 801
- is concluded by an express pact, 1320
- nature of, 1318
- on duration of, 1318 f.
- status of man seized in enemy's country and forcibly detained, after expiration of, 1321
- what is or is not allowed by, 1320 f.
- when obligating subjects, 1320

Trust:

- as a contract, 774 f.
- kinds of, 774 f.

Truth. See also Falsehood:

- how far a part may properly be withheld, 475
- nature of, 470 f.

obligation to speak, 468 f.

Truths, speculative, 40

Tryphonius, on property left with another, 665

Tutela fiduciaria, 774

Tyranny:

- whether a peculiar species of state, 1036 f.
- why so abhorrent to Greeks, 1053 f.

Tyrant, citizens may not lawfully use force against a man merely because he is called a, 1109 ff.

Ulpian, on pact and promise, 424

Unborn, the, how far injured by usucapion, 656 ff.

Unde vi, meaning of, 805, 806

Understanding:

- can apprehend natural law, 39 f.
- is developed by education and laws, 39
- possesses a natural rectitude, 39
- rules to follow in useful judgements, 43 ff.
- two qualities of, 38 f.

Ungrateful mind, 376 ff.

Universal justice. See Justice

Universal war, denial of Hobbes' position on, 170 f.

Untruth. See Falsehood

Use, 600, 602

Usucapion:

- appears to rest upon a tacit agreement of all nations, 655 f.
- continuous possession is a requirement of, 648 f.
- how defined and where allowed by Roman laws, 646 ff.
- how differing from prescription, 646
- how far good faith is required in, 648
- how far injuring those yet unborn, 656 ff.
- in war, 660
- law obligating return of another's property must not conflict with, 662 f.
- length of time for, 652, 654
- obtains even among different nations, 658 ff.
- of movables, 647
- reasons for introduction of, 649 f.
- referred by many to civil law, 652 f.
- whether a pledge can be secured by, 780 f.
- whether arising from a tacit relinquishment of dominion, 653 ff.
- whether in natural law, 225

- whether the law of, is penal, 650 ff.
- Usufruct:
 defined and elucidated, 600 ff.
 kingdoms held by a kind of right of, 1082 relation of, to dominion and proprietorship, 533 right of men to things is only, 524
- Usurper, how far acts of, are valid after his expulsion, 1361 f.
- Usury:
 Aristotle on, 757 f.
 Cato on, 758 f.
 contracts that amount to, 759 f.
 defence of, 759 f.
 is not opposed to law of nature, 754 ff.
 laws of Hebrews on, 752 ff.
 makeshifts frequently employed to avoid name of, 760 ff.
 Mohammedan law on, 759 f.
- Utility. See also Advantage:
 things of innocent, are to be freely granted others, 350 f.
 two kinds of, 195
 whether basis of natural law, 194 ff.
- Valuation of stolen property, 329
- Value of money:
 change in, how affecting a mutuum, 750 ff.
 how far determinable by directors of states, 693 ff.
 is subject to change, 697 f.
 land should be considered in determining, 696 f.
- Vassalage, how he who is freed from, may receive majesty, 1007 f.
- Velthuysen:
 controversy of view of, on moral cause, 69 f.
 holds that natural law can be known from end of creation, 200 f.
 on impossibilities, 73 f.
 on moral habits, 79 f.
 on nakedness and natural shame, 894 ff.
 on natural and divine law, 187 f.
 on primitive community, 538 f.
- Verbal pledge must be kept, 396 f.
- Vice, unnatural:
 Hebrew law on, 182
 Plato on, 181
- Vices:
 defined, 58
- effect of, upon will, 59 f.
 what, may be imputed, 73 f.
- Victoria, Franciscus a, on why the Spaniards were entitled to subdue the Indians, 364 f., 370
- Vincible ignorance, 47 f.
- Vindicative justice:
 not concerned in death caused in defence of one's property, 289 of God, 186 f.
- Violence:
 is allowable in self-defence, 264 f.
 offered a virgin, Hebrew law on, 65
- Virgin, ravished:
 is owed compensation by her ravisher, 328
 on consent of, 439
- Virginity, as necessary for marriage, 889
- Virtues, defined, 59
- Volition:
 effective, 54
 of simple approbation, 53 f.
 of will, 52
- Voluntary actions. See Actions
- Voluntary ignorance. See Ignorance
- Votes:
 of a majority decide will of a council, 986 f., and limitations of this rule, 989 f.
 on equality of, 990 f.
 on uniting and dividing, 991 f.
- Vows made to God, 425
- Wager, contract of, 768
- Wages defined, 221 f.
- War. See also Truce:
 a magistrate as such has no right to make, 1301 ff.
 a man may go to any length in, 323
 a truce does not concern cause of, 1319 attitude of Italian condottiere toward rules of, 227 f.
 between Moslem nations in the Koran, 831 breaks obligation of living on friendly terms, 387 cause for, 377 f., 542
 civil, 1300
 civil sovereignty was not a product of, 1006 f.
 declaration of, 1307, not required at termination of a truce, 1319 f.
 divisions of common or universal, 9 divisions of pacts which presuppose, 1316

War (cont.).

duty of soldiers in, 433 equity of reprisals in, 1305 formal, 767
 formal or less so, 1300 f.
 Grotius on obligation of possessor to prevent, by use of arbitrators, 826 f.
 Grotius on rights of necessity in a just, 308 f.
 how booty of, may be recovered, 1314
 how far an injury done to a citizen furnishes a cause for, 1304 f.
 how far incorporeal objects may be acquired by, 1312 ff.
 how property may be acquired by, 1310 humanity is required of victor in, 1298 f.
 increased the number of slaves, 937 interpretation of statement that a man may not wage war without permission of another, 809
 just and unjust, 356
 just cause for, 441
 justified only by extreme necessity, 386 licence over person of an enemy in, 1308 licence taken by nations in, 1307 f.
 lives of citizens can rightfully be exposed to peril in time of, 1148 f.
 mediators of peace in, 831
 on declaration of, 1307
 on occupancy in time of, 584 f.
 on redemption of captives of, 1321 f.
 on responsibility for damages of, 767 on sovereignty acquired by, 585
 on usucapion in, 660 f.
 on whose behalf, may be justly waged, 1305 ff.
 one may lie to an enemy in, 485 opposed by man's reason, 172 pact of peace after an unjust, 1324 f.
 pacts made by generals in time of, 1322, and those by private citizens, 1322 f.
 pacts mixed with chance in, 767 f.
 pacts relating to, 1316 ff.
 particular, 9
 peace is ordinary status of man; war is an extraordinary indulgence of nature, 1292 ff.
 position of violator of rules of, 227 f.
 power of generals and governors in, 1302 reason for power of, being vested in states, 1013, and on division of such power, 1017 ff.

right of safe conduct in, 1321 rules of, 227
 rules of, are not binding on wager of a just, 227 f.
 sacred objects are not excepted from licence of, 1309
 state of, defined, 9
 to whom belong spoils of, 1310 f.
 whether a governor can make, on presumed will of supreme sovereign, 1303 f.
 whether consequent upon a state of nature, as Hobbes holds, 165 ff.
 whether it is right for a citizen to serve in an unjust, at command of his sovereign, 1145 ff.
 which of several allies should receive aid in, 1334 ff.
 within states individuals are deprived of right of, 1299 f.
 Ward, debtor of, use of compensation by, 785
 Water, servitude of:
 a flow of, 604 f.
 conveyance of, 605
 drawing of, 65
 leading herds to, 605
 Weakness of man, 152 f., 207
 Wealth, does not give rise to inequality among men, 345 Wife:
 duties of, to her husband, 855 ff.
 source of power of husband over, 859 ff., and whether this is immediately conferred by God, 861 ff., and necessarily involves right of life and death, 863 Will:
 acting spontaneously or freely, 52 affected morally by an obligation, 63
 as concurring in moral actions, 52 ff.
 as intention, 53
 definition of act of, 66
 freedom of, not affected by divine foreknowledge, 55 fruition of, 53
 in intention or choice, 52
 in volition, 52
 incited by repression, 63
 influenced by climate, 57 f., by humours of body, age, food, &c., 58, by repetition of same acts, 58 f., by virtues and vices, 59, by passions, 60 f., by drunkenness or drugs, 61 f.

- influenced by external forces, 57 f.
 inherently seeks the good, 56 f.
 is intrinsically indifferent, 54 f.
 is under man's control, 239
 liberty of, 53 f., 145
 manifestations of, 53
 may choose an evil, 63
 when defective, 816
- Wills, a union of, is required for a state,
 972 f.
- Wills. See also Successions to a person in- testate:
 correct definition of, 614 f.
 donations in case of death, 623 f.
 examination of Grotius' definition of,
 613 f.
 how far proceeding from natural law and how far from positive, 618 ff.
 not found among earliest men, 617 f.
 one may receive an inheritance from a will lacking in some formalities, provided no one opposes it, 620 f., but an heir may attack such a will as if none had been made, 622 f.
 opening of, 619
 whether proceeding from natural law,
 615 ff.
- Witnesses:
 attitude and rejection of, 832 ff.
 in pacts, 426
 may be accused of falsehood, 835
 oaths of, 519 f.
- Women:
 Athenian law on contracts of, 407
- marchets of, 856
 Roman law limiting property left to, 631
- Wood, servitude of right of cutting, 605
- Words. See also Conjectures; Interpreta- tion:
 are regularly to be understood in their proper usage, 794 ff., and of an art according to that art, 795 ff.
 as signs in showing consent, 426 have a broad and a strict significance, 805 f.
 restriction of interpretation of, 815 ff.
 rules based on interpretation of, 806 ff.
 take their meaning by imposition, 461 ff.
 the sense is sought by conjecture, 797 ff., and if contradictory or apparently so,
 798 ff.
 vary in meaning, 466 ff.
- Writing, the paper goes with the, 589
- Written agreements, desirability of, 426 f.
- Young of animals, belong to owner of dam, 587
- Ziegler:
 on hunting of wild animals, 576
 on moral certainty, 36 f.
 on reparation for damage done to children
 by adultery, 327
 on right of passage of persons, 356 f., and of goods, 358
 on things derelict, 581
 on valuation of stolen property, 329

THE CLASSICS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

THIS series, which includes the classic works connected with the history and development of international law, was undertaken by the Carnegie Institution of Washington in 1906, at the suggestion of Mr. James Brown Scott, then Solicitor for the Department of State, under whose supervision as General Editor the series has since been published. On January 1, 1917, the project was transferred to the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, and the publication of the series is being continued by the Endowment's Division of International Law, of which the General Editor of the Classics is the Director.

The republication of these Classics has been undertaken principally on account of the difficulty of procuring the texts in convenient form for scientific study. The text of each author is reproduced photographically, so as to lay the source before the reader without the mistakes which creep into a newly printed text. An introduction is prefixed to each work, giving the necessary biographical details concerning its author and stating the importance of the text and its place in international law. Tables of errata in the original are added when necessary, and notes to clear up doubts and ambiguities or to correct mistakes in the text are supplied. Each of the Classics is specially edited by an expert in international law and is accompanied by an English version made expressly for the series by a competent translator.

The following works can be obtained by remittance of the indicated price to the publishers, either the Clarendon Press, Oxford, England, or the Oxford University Press, 114 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y., who are the regular selling agents for the Clarendon Press in the United States.

Ayala, Balthazar: De jure et officiis bellicis et disciplina militari. Edited by John Westlake. 2 vols. Washington, 1912. [No. 2 of the series.] Price, $7.00.

Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1582, with portrait of Ayala, Introduction by John Westlake, &c. xxvii+226 pages.

Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by John Pawley Bate. xii+250 pages.

Bynkershoek, Cornelius van: De dominio maris. 1 vol. New York, 1923. 108+81 pages. [No. 11 of the series.] Price, $2.00.

1. Introduction by James Brown Scott.

2. A Translation of the Text, by Ralph Van Deman Magoffin.

3. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1744.

4. An Index of Authors Cited and a List of Errata in the 1744 edition, by Herbert F. Wright.

Bynkershoek, Cornelius van: Quaestionum juris publici libri duo. 2 vols. Oxford, 1930. [No. 14 of the series.] Price, 30 shillings in Great Britain, $10.00 in United States.

Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1737, with a List of Errata, and a portrait of Bynkershoek. x+xxiv+417 pages.

Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by Tenney Frank, with an Introduction by J. de Louter, and an Index. xlv+304 pages.

Gentili, Alberico: De iure belli libri tres. 2 vols. Oxford, 1933. [No. 16 of the series.] Price, 35 shillings in Great Britain, $8.00 in United States.

Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1612, a List of Errata, and a photograph of monument to Gentili. x+viii+742 pages.

Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by John C. Rolfe, with an Introduction by Coleman Phillipson, and Indexes by John C. Rolfe. li+iii+479 pages.

Gentili, Alberico: De legationibus libri tres. 2 vols. New York, 1924. [No. 12 of the series.] Price, $5.00.

Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1594, with an Introduction by Ernest Nys, and List of Errata. 38a+xvi+233 pages.

Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by Gordon J. Laing, with translation (by E. H. Zeydel) of Introduction by Ernest Nys, and an Index of Authors Cited by Herbert F. Wright. 38a+x+208 pages.

Gentili, Alberico: Hispanicae advocacionis libri duo. 2 vols. New York, 1921. [No. 9 of the series.] Price, $5.00.

Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1661, with an Introduction by Frank Frost Abbott and a List of Errata. 44a+xvi+274 pages.

Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by Frank Frost Abbott, with an Index of Authors by Arthur Williams. 12a+x+284 pages.

Grotius, Hugo: De jure belli ac pacis libri tres. 2 vols. [No. 3 of the series.] Price, both volumes, 2 guineas in Great Britain, $10.00 in United States; Vol. II only, 1 guinea in Great Britain, $5.00 in United States; Vol. I not sold separately.

Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1646, with a portrait of Grotius. Washington, 1913. xxiv+663 pages.

Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by Francis W. Kelsey, with the Collaboration of Arthur E. R. Boak, Henry A. Saunders, Jesse S. Reeves, and Herbert F. Wright, with an Introduction by James Brown Scott. Indexes and List of Editions and Translations. Oxford, 1925. xlv+946 pages.

Legnano, Giovanni da: De bello, de repraesaliis et de duello. Edited by Sir T. Erskine Holland. 1 vol. Oxford, 1917. xxxiii+458 pages. [No. 8 of the series.] Out of Print.

1. Collotype of the Bologna Manuscript of circa 1390, with Extended and Revised Text of Same, Introduction, List of Authorities Cited, &c., by Sir T. Erskine Holland, together with Photograph of Legnano's Tomb.

Classics of International Law

2. A Translation of the Text, by J. L. Brierly.
3. A Photographic Reproduction of the First Edition (1477).
- Pufendorf, Samuel von: De officio hominis et civis juxta legem naturalem libri duo. 2 vols. New York, 1927. [No. 10 of the series.] Price, $4.00.
- Vol. A. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1682, with an Introduction by Walther Schücking, and List of Errata. 302+xxii+167 pages.
- Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by Frank Gardner Moore, with translation (by Herbert F. Wright) of Introduction by Walther Schücking, and Index by Herbert F. Wright. 272+xi+152 pages.
- Pufendorf, Samuel von: Elementorum jurisprudentiae universalis libri duo. 2 vols. Oxford, 1931. [No. 15 of the series.] Price, 30 shillings in Great Britain, $10.00 in United States.
- Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1672, with an Introduction by Hans Wehberg, a List of Errata, and a portrait of Pufendorf. xxvi+xvi+377 pages.
- Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by William Abbott Oldfather, with a Translation (by Edwin H. Zeydel) of the Introduction by Hans Wehberg, and an Index. xxxiii+304 pages.
- Pufendorf, Samuel: De jure naturae et gentium. 2 vols. Oxford, 1934. [No. 17 of the series.] Price, 63 shillings in Great Britain, $10.00 in United States.
- Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1688, with an Introduction by Walter Simons, a List of Errata, the Text of the Quotations from Greek authors, and a portrait of Pufendorf. 662+vi+1,002 pages.
- Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by C. H. and W. A. Oldfather, with a Translation of the Introduction, List of Classical Authors and Translations, and Indexes. 622+xi+1,465 pages.
- Rachel, Samuel: De jure naturae et gentium dissertationes. Edited by Ludwig von Bar. 2 vols. Washington, 1916. [No. 5 of the series.] Price, $4.00.
- Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1676, with portrait of Rachel, Introduction by Ludwig von Bar, and List of Errata. 162+x+335 pages.
- Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by John Pawley Bate, with Index of Authors Cited. 162+iv+233 pages.
- Textor, Johann Wolfgang: Synopsis juris gentium. Edited by Ludwig von Bar. 2 vols. Washington, 1916. [No. 6 of the series.] Price, $4.00.
- Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the First Edition (1680), with portrait of Textor. Introduction by Ludwig von Bar, and List of Errata. 282+vi+148+168 pages.
- Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by John Pawley Bate, with Index of Authors Cited. 26+v+349 pages.
- Vattel, E. de: Le droit des gens. 3 vols. Washington, 1916. [No. 4 of the series.] Price, $8.00.
- Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of Books I and II of the First Edition (1758), with portrait of Vattel and Introduction by Albert de Lapradelle. lix+541 pages.
- Vol. II. A Photographic Reproduction of Books III and IV of the First Edition (1758). xxiv+376 pages.
- Vol. III. A Translation of the Text, by Charles G. Fenwick, with translation (by G. D. Gregory) of Introduction by Albert de Lapradelle. lxxxviii+398 pages.
- Victoria, Franciscus de: Relectiones: De Indis and De jure belli. Edited by Ernest Nys. 1 vol. Washington, 1917. 500 pages. [No. 7 of the series.] Price, $3.00.
1. Introduction by Ernest Nys, and Translation of Same, by John Pawley Bate.
2. A Translation of the Text, by John Pawley Bate.
3. Revised Text, with Prefatory Remarks, List of Errata, and Index of Authors Cited, by Herbert F. Wright.
- A Photographic Reproduction of Simon's Edition (1696).
- Wolff, Christian von: Jus gentium methodo scientifica pertractatum. 2 vols. Oxford In press. [No. 13 of the series.] Price, 37 shillings in Great Britain, $10.00 in United States.
- Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the Edition of 1764, with an Introduction by Otfried Nippold, a List of Errata, and a portrait of Wolff. lvi+413 pages.
- Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by Joseph H. Drake, with a Translation (by Francis J. Hemelt) of the Introduction by Otfried Nippold, an Index, and a portrait of Wolff.
- Zouche, Richard: Juris et judicii fecialis, sive juris inter gentes, et quaestionum de eodem explicatio. Edited by Sir T. Erskine Holland. 2 vols. Washington, 1911. [No. 1 of the series.] Price, $4.00.
- Vol. I. A Photographic Reproduction of the First Edition (1650), with Introduction, List of Errata, and Table of Authors, by Sir T. Erskine Holland, together with portrait of Zouche. xvi+204 pages.
- Vol. II. A Translation of the Text, by J. L. Brierly. xvii+186 pages.

Address orders to

THE CLARENDON PRESS or THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, OXFORD, ENGLAND 114 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N.Y.

Kansas City Public Library

Presented to the Library by Carnegie Endowment for Internat'l Peace

9-16-5m-P

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

140 679

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY